Manf.—Linen, worsted stockings, and embroidered muslins.

Chief Towns.—LIFFORD, the county town; DONEGAL, BALLYSHANNON, Rathmellon, and Kellybegs.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

History and Antiquities.—From the 12th to the 17th centuries, the southern part of the county was called Tyrconnel, and belonged to the O'Donnels. There are ruins of the palace of the old Irish kings, and of many castles and religious houses, stone crosses, and a round tower.

DONEGAL, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Donegal, at the mouth of the Esk, 11 miles N.E. of Ballyshannon. Corn and butter are exported. Near the town are Donegal castle, the ruins of a Franciscan monastery, and a chalybeate spring. Pop. 1,500.—This place gives the title of marquis, in the Irish peerage, to the family of Chichester.

DONEGAL BAY, an indentation of the Atlantic, on the W. coast of Ireland, extending 25 miles between Gesigo point on the S., and Teelin Head on the N. It is about 20 miles wide, receives several rivers, and contains several inlets, creeks, and harbours.

DONETZ, do-nets', a river of Southern Russia, and the principal affluent of the Don. It rises in the government of Koursk, and, after a course of 400 miles, unites with the Don, 40 miles N.E. of Novo Tcherkask.

DONGARPUR, don-gar-poor', a fortified town, the capital of a protected state of Rajputana, Central India. Lat. 23° 50′ N. Lon. 73° 45′ E.

DONGOLA, or MARAKAH, don-go'-la, a town on the left bank of the Nile, and capital of a province of the same name, in Nubia. It is important both as a place of trade and a military depôt. It has an indigo-factory, but its principal exports consist of slaves in return for goods of different kinds from Cairo. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 19° 10′ N. Lon. 30° 22′ E.

DONINGTON, don-ing'-ton, a town of Lincolnshire, 9 miles S.W. of Boston. There is an ancient church. Pop. 1,700.

DONIPHAN, don'-e-fan, a county of Kansas, United States. Pop. 15,000.

DONIZETTI, GAETANO, don-e-zet'-te, a distinguished Italian musical composer, who received his first instructions in his art in the Musical Institute of Bergamo. In 1815 he removed to Bologna, and, entering the army, produced, in Venice, in 1818, his first opera, entitled "Enrico di Borgogna." In 1822 he left the army, but, still continuing to cultivate his musical abilities, he put forth, in 1830, his "Anna Bolena" at Milan. Up to this period he had produced no fewer than thirty-one operas; and during the next fourteen years he added to these thirty-three more. Many have sunk into oblivion; but others, being of the highest class, retain their possession of the popular musical mind. Among these we may mention "Anna Bolena," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "La Fille du Régiment," "Don Pasquale," &c. In 1833 he was appointed professor of counter-point in the Royal College of Music at Naples, and afterwards became chapel-master and composer to the imperial court at Vienna. Having unfortunately contracted habits of intemperance, he was for some time confined in a lunatic asylum.

Born at Bergamo, 1798; died 1848.

DONKOW, don'-koff, a Russian town, on the right bank of the Don. There are six churches and a monastery. An annual fair is held. Pop. 2,500.

DONNE, JOHN, DR., don, an English divine and poet, descended from a good Welsh family, and who, though reared a Roman Catholic, embraced, at the age of 19, the Protestant religion. Soon afterwards he went abroad, and on his return became secretary to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, when he privately married a daughter of Sir George Moore, lieutenant of the Tower. The latter was so irritated at the match, that he not only prevailed upon the chancellor to dismiss him from his service, but got him imprisoned in that ancient fortress. His confinement, however, was short, and a reconciliation was effected. At the desire of King James, he entered into orders, and became his chaplain. He was made D.D. by the University of Cambridge, and rose to such fame by his preaching, that he had the offer of no fewer than fourteen different livings during the first year of his ministry. In 1617 he was chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn; in 1621 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and, soon after, Vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West. Dr. Donne was a man of great wit, learning, and gravity. His satires are highly praised by Dryden, who calls him "the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet, of our nation." They were adapted and imitated by Pope. Three volumes of his sermons were published after his death, and some miscellaneous essays. His death was caused by fever. He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, and Izaak Walton wrote his biography, which has taken place as a standard work.

Born in London, 1573; died 1631.

DONNE, BENJAMIN, an English mathematician, who made a survey of Devonshire in 1761, for which he received a premium of £100 from the Society for promoting Arts and Commerce. About the same time he published "Mathematical Essays," in 8vo, which had a favourable reception, and procured him the office of keeper of the library at Bristol, where he kept an academy many years. In 1771 he printed an "Epitome of Natural and Experimental Philosophy," and in 1774 a work entitled "The British Mariner's Assistant." In 1796 he was appointed master of mechanics to the king. Besides the books above mentioned, he wrote treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry.

Born at Bideford, 1729; died 1798.

DONNYBROOK, don'-ne-brook, a village of Ireland, 2 miles from Dublin. The place is chiefly known in connection with the famous fair, abolished in 1855. Pop. 1,890.

DONZY, dawn'-ze, a town of France, in the department Nièvre. There is a remarkable church. Manf. Iron. A good trade is carried on in wood, iron, cider, and honey. Pop. 2,200.

DOOLY, doo'-le, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 12,420. Vienna is the capital.

DOON, a lake and river of Ayrshire, Scotland. The river flows through the lake, and, after a course of 30 miles, falls into the Frith of Clyde, 2 miles S. of Ayr. It is celebrated by Burns in his beautifully plaintive lyric beginning, "Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon." The scenery on the banks is in some parts very beautiful. The LAKE is 22 miles from Ayr, and is 5 miles long, by nearly a mile broad. The remains of Doon Castle are on a small island on the lake.

DOONGURPOOR, doon-gur-poor', a town of India, capital of a small principality in Goojerat, 95 miles N.E. of Ahmedabad. Lat. 23° 47′ N. Lon. 73° 52′ E.

DOOSHAUK, or JULLALABAD, doo-shauk', a town of Afghanistan, formerly of much greater importance than it is at present. It is surrounded by a mud wall with towers. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 31° 58′ N. Lon. 61° 45′ E.

DOR, MOUNT, dor, a mountain group of France, belonging to the Auvergne, in the department of the Puy-de-Dome. They are volcanic, and their principal summit is the Pic de Sancy, which has an elevation of nearly 6,200 feet above the level of the sea. The rivers Dor and Dogne have their sources in them.

DORA, or DURIA (MAJOR and MINOR), dor'-a, two rivers of N. Italy, tributary to the Po, The Major rises at the foot of Little St. Bernard, and, after a course of 100 miles, joins the Po near Crescentino, and, under the French, gave its name to a department. The Minor rises in the Cottian Alps, and, after a course of 70 miles, falls into the Po near Turin.

DORAK, do-rak', a town of Persia, in the province of Khuzistan, at the junction of the Dorak with the Jerrahi. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 6,000.

DORAMA, do-ra'-ma, a town of Arabia, 32 miles N.E. of Deneyeh. It is a halting place for caravans. Pop. 8,000.

DORAT, CLAUDE JOSEPH, do-ra', French poet, who produced in the most sumptuous fashion poems of mediocre quality, and spent a considerable patrimony, dying in debt.

Born at Paris, 1734; died 1780.

DORCAS, dor'-kas, a Christian woman of Joppa, whom Peter restored to life. One of the principal exercises of her benevolence was in the making of garments for poor widows; and from her, the "Dorcas meetings" of those who charitably engage in making garments for the poor, are so called.

DORCHESTER, dor'-chest-er, a parliamentary borough, the capital of Dorsetshire, situate on an ascent from the right bank of the river Frome, 8 miles N. of Weymouth. It consists principally of three spacious streets, and has three churches (All Saints, ancient, and Holy Trinity and St. Peter's), and some modern structures, a county hospital, three almshouses, a county gaol, town-hall, market-house, shire-hall, theatre, and cavalry barracks. The town is nearly surrounded by fine avenues of trees. There is a good trade in butter and malt liquors. Pop. 7,568. A station on the Great Western and London and South-Western railways.—This is the Roman Durnovaria, an important military station. Near the town are the remains of a large amphitheatre, the finest in England, with seats cut in the chalk capable of accommodating 13,000 spectators. There are also the traces of Roman and British camps, and many antiquities have been discovered.

DORCHESTER, a seaport of Massachusetts, United States, 4 miles S. of Boston. Pop. 6,000, employed in the fisheries and various manufactures.

DORCHESTER, a county of Maryland, U.S., on the E. shore of the Chesapeake. Area, 604 square miles. Pop. 23,110. The capital is Cambridge.

DORCHESTER, CARLETON DUDLEY, viscount, an eminent English statesman, who, after visiting different European courts in a diplomatic character, was appointed ambassador to the United Netherland Provinces, where he bore a distinguished part in the synod of Dort. On his return to England, he was, in 1626, created a peer by the title of Baron Carleton. He was soon after sent again to the Hague, and was employed there in several important measures, when he was recalled, created Viscount Dorchester, and made secretary of state.

Born in Oxfordshire, 1573; died 1631.

DORDOGNE, dor'-done, a large river of France, formed by the union of the Dor and Dogne, and, after a course of 220 miles, falling into the Garonne, 15 miles below Bordeaux.

DORDOGNE, a department of the S.W. of France, adjoining the Gironde, Charente, and Corrèze. It is generally hilly, but there are many beautiful valleys, and on the sides of the hills are vineyards. Much of it is uncultivated. The department is divided into 5 arrondissements and 582 communes. The capital is PERPIGNAN.

Rivers.—The Dordogne and the Vezere.
Pro.—Rye, buckwheat, maize, and chestnuts.
Minerals.—Coal, iron, copper, lead, manganese, lithographic stones, and marble.
Manf.—Paper, brandy, liqueurs, oil, and iron wares.
Pop.—495,037.

DORDRECHT, dort'-rekt, a town of the Netherlands. (See DORT.)

DORÉ, PAUL GUSTAVE, dor-ay', a French artist, noted chiefly for his drawings illustrative of the Bible, Milton, Dante, Chateaubriand, and Tennyson, which are marvellously effective, exhibiting an almost unparalleled power of mingling the awful and the grotesque. He has also produced several large oil paintings, which have excited great admiration. He began his career as a caricaturist, but his genius soon took a higher flight.

Born at Strasburg, 1832. Died 1883.

DORIA, ANDREA, dor'-e-a, a celebrated Genoese naval commander. Being born of a noble family, he early adopted the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the service of different Italian states. At length his own country required his assistance against the rebels of Corsica, and these he defeated. He was then appointed commander-in-chief of a fleet of galleys, and inflicted severe loss on the African pirates. On the revolution breaking out in Genoa, he entered into the service of Francis I. of France, which he quitted for that of Pope Clement VII., but shortly afterwards joined the party of Charles V. of Spain, and succeeded in driving the French out of Genoa. Charles now offered to invest Doria with the sovereignty of Genoa, but he nobly refused it, stipulating only that the republic should continue under the imperial protection. Having delivered Genoa from the oppression of the French yoke, he was, in 1528, honoured by the senate with the title of the "father and saviour of his country," and had a statue erected to his honour, and a palace built for him. He made his name famous through the Mediterranean by his naval exploits, particularly against Barbarossa and the African corsairs. Doria was created prince of Melfi, in Naples, by Charles V. His death, at the great age of 92, was lamented by the Genoese as a public calamity.

Born at Oneglia, 1468; died at Genoa, 1560.

DORIANS, one of the four principal nations of Greece, who appear to have occupied the country along the north shore of the Corinthian Gulf.

DORIGNY, NICHOLAS, Sir, do-reen'-ye, an eminent engraver and designer, who resided for a lengthened period in Italy, and engraved many celebrated Italian paintings. In 1711 he came to England for the purpose of engraving the cartoons of Raffaele, and had a room set apart for him at Hampton Court. He completed his task in 1719, when he received a purse of 100 guineas for a couple of sets, which he presented to George I., who also knighted him. His sight now began to fail, and, in 1723, he disposed of his drawings, and, in the following year, returned to Paris.

Born at Paris, 1658; died 1746.

DORIS, dor'-is, a country of Greece, between Phocis, Thessaly, and Acarnania. According to Greek legend, it received its name from Dorus, the son of Deucalion, who made a settlement there. In modern Greece, Doris is a district of the nomarchy or government of Phocis.

DORISLAUS, ISAAC, dor-is-lai'-us, a Dutch doctor of civil law at Leyden, whence he went to England, and was appointed to read lectures on history at Cambridge; but avowing republican principles, was obliged to resign. He afterwards became judge-advocate in the king's army, but quitted his majesty's service for that of the parliament, and assisted in drawing up the charge against Charles I. In 1649 he was sent ambassador to the Hague, where he was stabbed, while at supper, by some exiled royalists. The parliament caused his body to be brought to England, where it was interred in Westminster Abbey. Here, however, it was not suffered to remain. At the Restoration it was exhumed, and finally buried in St. Margaret's churchyard.

DORKING, or DARKING, dor'-king, a town of Surrey, picturesquely situated on the left bank of the river Mole, 22 miles S.W. of London.

It consists of three principal streets, well paved and lighted with gas, and has a trade in lime, flour, and poultry. This last is a peculiar breed, having five claws, and is in great demand for the London market; it is supposed to have been introduced by the Romans. Pop. 6,328.—A station on the South-Eastern Railway.

DORNACH, dor'-nak, a village of Switzerland, 20 miles from Soleure, remarkable for the victory obtained by the Swiss over the Austrians in 1499, and which gave Switzerland her independence. Pop. 700.

DORNBIRN, dorn'-birn, a town in the N.W. of Tyrol, Austrian empire, on the little river Lossen, 8 miles S. of the Lake of Constance. Manf. Muslin embroidery, and wooden houses for exportation. Pop. 8,500.

DORNOCH, FRITH OF, dor'-nok, an arm of the sea, in Scotland, dividing the S. part of Sutherlandshire from the county of Ross. Its entrance is nearly 15 miles wide.

DORNOCH, a town and royal burgh of Sutherlandshire, Scotland, on the N. coast of the Frith of Dornoch, 14 miles from Cromarty. Pop. 625. The bishops of Caithness resided here up to the time of the Revolution. Gilbert Murray, one of them, is supposed to have built the cathedral in the 13th century, and was canonized under the name of St. Gilbert. The cathedral was partially restored in 1837.

DOROGH, do-rog', a town of Hungary, 20 miles N.W. of Debreczin. Pop. 8,000, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

DORPAT, or DERPT, dor'-pat, a town of European Russia, in Livonia, on the Embach, 150 miles N.E. of Riga. A university was established here in 1802, by the emperor Alexander. It had originally been founded in 1632, by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, but had, from 1656, been suppressed. There are a famous observatory and a botanical garden. The town was formerly fortified, but the ramparts are now public promenades. There are many handsome residences of the Livonian nobility. Pop. 29,727. Lat. 58° 22′ N. Lon. 26° 43′ E.

DORRE ISLAND, dore, an island off the west coast of Australia, at the entrance to Shark Bay. It is 20 miles long. Lat. 25° 10′ S.

DORSET, THOMAS SACKVILLE, Earl of, grand treasurer of England, was raised by Queen Elizabeth to the peerage, under the title of Lord Buckhurst. He was one of the commissioners who tried Mary, queen of Scots, and it was he who was deputed to announce her sentence to that unfortunate lady. In 1598, he succeeded Lord Burleigh as treasurer, and was president of the commission appointed to try the earl of Essex. James I. created him earl of Dorset, and he continued to receive in his reign the same favour he had enjoyed in the preceding. He died suddenly while sitting at the council, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. In his youth he cultivated letters, and acquired celebrity from his tragedy of "Gorboduc," which is considered the first regular dramatic piece produced in England.

Born at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536; died 1608.

DORSETSHIRE, dor'-set-sheer, a county in the south of England, bounded N. by the counties of Somerset and Wilts, E. by Hampshire, S. by the British Channel, and W. by the counties of Devon and Somerset. It is diversified by hill and dale in the S., level in the N., and traversed in the centre by chalk downs, on which large numbers of sheep are pastured. The highest point of the downs at Pidesden Pen is 934 feet. The coast line, 75 miles long, rises in St. Alban's Head to a height of 344 feet.—PORTLAND ISLAND is connected with the mainland by a remarkable formation of pebbles, known as the Chesil Bank.

Rivers.—The principal are the Stour, Frome, Piddle, Char, and Wey.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, hemp, and linseed. The dairy husbandry is important.

Minerals.—A bituminous slaty coal, two kinds of freestone, quarried in the isle of Portland, and in Purbeck a kind of coarse marble and potter's clay.

Manf.—Twine, cordage, netting, sacking, sailcloth, buttons, stockings, linens, silks, and woollens. The mackerel fishery is carried on between Lyme and Portland from April to June, and other fish frequent the coast in great variety.

Area.—980 square miles.

Pop.—190,979.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county returns three members, and there are seven boroughs, each returning one member.

Chief Towns.—DORCHESTER, BRIDPORT, POOLE, WEYMOUTH, SHAFTESBURY, and WAREHAM.

DORT, or DORDRECHT, dort, one of the most ancient towns of the Netherlands, in the province of South Holland, on an island formed in the Maas, 12 miles S.E. of Rotterdam. The town is fortified on the south side, and occupies a very strong position. Among the public buildings are the great church, St. Mary's, with a lofty tower and chimes; an elegant town-house, the exchange, the church of St. Nicholas, hospitals, and other institutions. The situation of Dort is highly favourable for trade, and the harbour sufficiently commodious. Great quantities of timber are floated here from Switzerland and Upper Germany down the Rhine. It has several docks for shipbuilding; a brisk traffic is carried on in yarn and linen, as well as in salt, flax, corn, and oil. There are some sugar-refineries, tobacco-factories, and saw-mills. The salmon fishing is productive. Pop. 29,214. This place was the original residence of the counts of Holland, and, in 1572, the independence of the United Provinces was here first declared. In 1618 and 1619 the synod, which pronounced against the doctrines of Arminius, was also held here. It was the birthplace of the two De Witts.

DORTMUND, dort'-moond, a town of Prussia, in the province of Westphalia, on the Einscher, 47 miles N.E. of Cologne. It is the centre of a great mining district, and the seat of several courts and public offices. The town-hall is one of the oldest in Germany. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, cutlery, and tobacco. Pop. 78,289. In 1815, this place, previously a free Hanse town, was given to Prussia at the congress of Vienna. A station on the Cologne and Minden Railway.

DOSITHÆUS, do-si-thē'-us, a heresiarch of Samaria, who asserted that he was the Messiah, and had with him a woman, whom he called the moon. Retiring into a cave, he there starved himself, in order that his disciples might believe he had ascended to heaven. His sect, which lasted till the 6th century, abstained from animal food, and observed the sabbath with excessive rigour.

DOS-BARRIOS, dose-bar'-re-os, a town of Spain, in the province of Toledo. Pop. 2,500, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

DOS-HERMANAS, hor-ma'-nas, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 7 miles E. of the town of Seville. Manf. Wine and oil. Cattle are reared. Pop. 3,500.

DOTHAN, do'-than, a town of Palestine, to the W. of the Sea of Galilee. Near this place Joseph was sold by his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 17), and the prophet smote the Syrians with blindness (2 Kings, vi. 13).

DOTIS, do'-tis, a market-town of West Hungary, 12 miles S.E. of Komorn. It has several churches and chapels, a college, gymnasium, and high school; a fine chateau, the property of the Esterhazy family, and the remains of an old castle, the former residence of the kings of Hungary. Manf. Woollens and porcelain. Pop. 5,000.

DOUAI, or DOUAY, doo'-ai, a fortified town of France, on the small river Scarpe, department Nord, 150 miles N.E. of Paris. It has manufactures of cotton, linen, lace, and thread. Its principal buildings are the church, a Gothic town-hall, a belfry, a Catholic college, a cannon-foundry, an arsenal, an artillery school, a theatre, public library, and several hospitals. It has been long noted for its university, also for its English schools. Manf. Lace, cottons, gauzes, glass, soap, earthenware, leather, paper, and sugar. Pop. 20,608.

DOUARNENEZ, doo-arn'-nai, a seaport of France, department Finistère. The church of Plouaré, in the vicinity, is a very interesting building. There is a harbour, frequented by small vessels. The bay, on the S.E. shore of which the port is situated, is one of the most beautiful on the west coast of France. Pop. 3,900.

DOUBLEDAY, EDWARD, dub'-el-dai, a distinguished English naturalist, who, in the departments of entomology and ornithology, produced some excellent works. After making a tour in the United States, he returned, and became one of the curators in the British Museum. Here he was enabled to pursue his favourite studies to a large extent, and commenced a work in parts, "On the Genera of Diurnal Lepidoptera." This work he did not live to complete.

Born in London, 1810; died 1849.

DOUBS, doobs, a department of France, bounded on the E. by Switzerland, and on the S.W. by the department of the Jura. The surface is hilly, being crossed by four ranges of the Jura mountains, but fertile in the valleys, with excellent pasturage for a valuable breed of draught-horses which it possesses, and the dairy products are important. The river, from which the department takes its name, passes through it, rising at the foot of Mount Jura, and washing St. Hypolite, Besançon, Dôle, &c., and, after a course of 288 miles, losing itself in the Saône, near Verdun.

Area.—2,000 square miles.

Pop.—310,827.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are four arrondissements and 370 communes. The chief towns are, BESANÇON, the capital, BAUME-LES-DAMES, MONTBELLIARD, and PONTARLIER.

DOUCE, FRANCIS, dooce, an antiquary, chiefly known by his work entitled "Illustrations of Shakspeare and Ancient Manners." At his death he bequeathed his writings and correspondence, in a strong box sealed up, to the British Museum, which would not accept it, on account of its being labelled with the following inscription:—"Mr. Douce's papers, to be opened in the year 1900." It was then presented to the Bodleian library. Mr. Douce also wrote a dissertation on Holbein's "Dance of Death," accompanied by 54 engravings on wood, which are admirably executed.

Born in London, 1762; died 1834.

DOUDEVILLE, dood'-veel, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Seine, 25 miles N.W. of Rouen. Manf. Coarse cottons, bricks, and lime. Pop. 1,800.

DOUÉ, doo'-ai, an ancient town in the department Maine-et-Loire. Near it are the remains of an amphitheatre, cut out of the solid rock by some supposed to be Roman, and by others, the remains of a palace of Dagobert, king of Aquitaine, and some curious natural grottoes. There are tanneries and coal-mines, and a trade is carried on in grain, linen, iron, and cattle. Pop. 3,000.

DOUGLAS, dug'-las, the name of a famous Scotch family, the origin of which is uncertain. A Douglas first figures in authentic history in the 12th century. The Earls of Douglas, the Earls of Angus, and the Earls of Morton, who figure so conspicuously in Scottish history, were members of this famous race.

DOUGLAS, GAWIN or GAVIN, a Scotch poet, who was the younger son of the 5th earl of Angus, and obtained the bishopric of Dunkeld, to which was added the rich abbey of Aberbrothick. Political events compelled him to leave Scotland for England, where he died of the plague. He was buried in the Savoy church, London.—His works are—1. A translation of Virgil's "Æneis;" 2. "The Palace of Honour," a poem; 3. "Aureæ Narrationes, Comediæ aliquot Sacræ;" 4. "De Rebus Scoticis Liber."—His "Palace of Honour" is his principal original composition, designed to show the instability of worldly pomp, and to prove that true honour and happiness are only to be found by a constant practice of virtue. His translation of "Æneis" was the first made of a classic author into any British tongue, unless Hector Boethius be called a classic. It is a work of great merit.

Born at Brechin, 1475; died in London, 1522.

DOUGLAS, SIR JAMES, a Scotch nobleman, and one of the principal companions of Bruce in winning the independence of his country. He was made a knight-banneret under the royal standard at Bannockburn; and, at that battle, commanded the centre division of the Scottish van. Robert Bruce having made a vow to go against the infidels, and not being able to fulfil it, ordered that his heart should be carried to Palestine after his death, and deposited in the holy sepulchre. Douglas and some others set out on this adventure, but were all killed by the way.

Died 1397.

DOUGLAS, DAVID, an eminent botanist and enterprising traveller. In 1823 he was sent by the Horticultural Society of London to the United States as a botanical collector, and, in the following year, explored the vegetable productions of the country in the neighbourhood of the Columbia, towards California. He further extended his researches, and, in 1827, crossed the Rocky Mountains to Hudson's Bay, where he met with Sir John Franklin, then returning from his second overland Arctic expedition. With him he returned to England; but, in 1829, sailed again for Columbia river. He afterwards visited the Sandwich Islands, where he fell into a trap set for the capture of wild bulls, and met his death from one of these animals, which had also fallen into it.—The botany of England stands greatly indebted to Douglas. He introduced almost all the new hardy plants in its gardens, and many valuable timber-trees, besides numerous beautiful species of ornamental shrubs.

Born at Scone, Scotland, 1798; killed 1834.

DOUGLAS, General Sir Howard, bart., an English military officer, who distinguished himself by his devotion to his profession. After serving in the Peninsula from 1809 to 1812, he published a treatise "On Military Bridges," which was succeeded by another on "Naval Gunnery," and brought him prominently before the lords of the Admiralty. To the edition of 1855 of this work he appended a chapter on the siege of Sebastopol and the operations in the Crimea generally. As a military engineer, his judgment was considered to be entitled to great weight.

Born at Gosport, 1776; died 1861.

DOUGLAS, a seaport and principal town of the Isle of Man, on the S.E. shore, 80 miles from Liverpool. The harbour is spacious and safe, and it has several episcopal chapels and meeting-houses, a custom-house, market-house, post-office for the island, assembly-rooms, libraries, and baths. Of late years Douglas has become a fashionable watering place, and new piers and several handsome hotels have been opened. There is a coasting trade, with some fisheries. Pop. 15,719.

DOUGLAS, a town of Scotland, in the county of Lanark. The spire and aisle of the old church of St. Bride, the burying place of the Douglases, remain. Near the town is Douglas castle, on the site of an older edifice, destroyed by fire in 1760. Pop. 1,500.

DOUGLAS, a county of Missouri, United States. Pop. 7,753.

DOUGLAS, a county of Nebraska, United States. Pop. 37,645.

DOULLENS, dool'-lens, a town of France, department of Sombre, 18 miles N.E. of Amiens. It has a citadel, theatre, and pleasant boulevards. Manf. Beet sugar, canvas, cotton, and leather. There is a trade in canvas bagging, oil seeds, hemp, flax, and cattle. Pop. 2,400. This town was, in 1814, taken by the allies.

DOUNE, a market town of Perthshire, Scotland, 9 miles N.W. of Stirling. Six famous fairs are held annually. Near the town, on an eminence overlooking the Teith, are the ruins of the ancient castle of Doune, with two massive towers. Pop. 1,300.

DOUR, dour, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 9 miles S.W. of Mons. There are coal and iron mines, and quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 6,000.

DOURDAN, dour-dahn(g), a town of France, department Seine-et-Oise, on the Orge, 25 miles S.W. of Paris. There are a very fine Gothic church, and the remains of a strong castle. Manf. Silk and woollen hosiery. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,300.

DOURO, doo'-ro, a large river of Spain and Portugal, rising on the borders of Aragon, and, flowing W., traverses more than half the width of Spain and the whole of Portugal, between which countries it forms the boundary for about 60 miles. After a course of 400 miles, it falls into the Atlantic, 3 miles from Oporto. Its basin is the largest in the Peninsula. The wine country of the Douro begins 50 miles to the E. of Oporto.—This river was crossed in 1809 by the British army under the duke of Wellington, when he surprised the French under Marshal Soult, and won the battle of Oporto.

DOURO, or DUERO, an old province in the north of Portugal, having the Atlantic on the W., and on its other sides, the provinces Minho, Beira, Tras-os-Montes, and Estremadura. The old province is now divided into the districts of Oporto, Entre-Douro-e-Minho and Aviero and Coimbra. Area, 3,872 square miles.

DOUSA, or VAN DER DOES, Janus, doo'-sa, a Dutch statesman, historian, scholar, and poet, who studied at Delft, Louvain, and Paris, in 1572 was ambassador to England, and in 1574, was appointed governor of Leyden. On the establishment of its university, he was appointed first curator. He wrote Latin poems, among which is one on the history of Holland.

Born at Noordwyk, 1545; died 1604.

DOVE, duv, a river of England, rising near Buxton, on the Peak of Derbyshire, and, after a course of 40 miles through romantic scenery, falling into the Trent below Burton.

DOVE, Heinrich Wilhelm, do'-vai', a German physical philosopher. He studied at Breslau and at Berlin, where he took the doctor's degree in 1826, and afterwards became professor of natural philosophy and member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. His works, which are highly valued by scientific men, refer chiefly to meteorology, climatology, electricity, and light. He was director of the Prussian observatories.

Born at Liegnitz, in Silesia, 1803; died 1879.

DOVER, do'-ver, a seaport and parliamentary and municipal borough of Kent, situate on a small stream (the Dour, from which the name of the town is derived), which falls into its harbour, 66 miles S.E. of London. It consists chiefly of three long streets converging to one point; the upper part called the Town, and the lower the Pier. It has seven churches (including the remarkable ancient building, St. Mary, in the Castle, restored in 1863; St. James the Apostle, very ancient, probably Anglo Saxon, restored in 1869; St. James, in the Decorated style, recently erected at a cost of £10,000; and the new church of St. Thomas the Apostle, erected in 1862, on the site of an older edifice); a Roman Catholic church, opened in 1868, numerous chapels, a town-hall (formerly the ancient hospital of Maison Dieu), and a gaol; a free school, a charity school, the National Sailors' Home, erected 1858, the Dover museum, and an hospital. It is defended by a strong and spacious castle, and all the neighbouring heights are fortified. The castle occupies a lofty eminence, steep and rugged towards the town and harbour, and presents a precipitous cliff, 320 feet above the sea. It has subterraneous works and casemates, a bomb-proof magazine, and a barracks capable of accommodating 2,000 men. Altogether it covers an area of 35 acres. It was first erected in the Saxon times, and greatly strengthened by the Normans. There are other strong fortifications—Fort Burgoyne, the Western Heights, the Western Outworks, the South Front, the Drop Redoubt, the Citadel, and the North Centre Bastion,—protecting the town; and at the end of the magnificent pier, more than 2,000 feet long, and recently constructed at a cost of £750,000, is a fort carrying two guns of great size. Near the town is the famous Shakspeare's Cliff, supposed to be that described by Edgar in "King Lear," 350 feet high. It is tunnelled by the South-Eastern Railway, and in 1847 immense masses of the cliff fell. The harbour consists of three basins, the outer one inclosed by two piers, 150 feet apart. It is the principal place of embarkation to France, and has constant communication with Calais. Pop. 28,500. Lat. of castle, 51° 7′ 8″ N. Lon. 1° 19′ 5″ E. This town is the terminus of the South-Eastern and London, Chatham, and Dover Railways.

DOVER, a city of New Hampshire, United States, 35 miles E. of Concord, on the right bank of the Piscataqua, at the lower falls of Cocheco. Manf. Woollens, cotton, carpets, shoes, and leather; and there are dye-works, grist and saw-mills, and a distillery. A large amount of shipping is owned. Pop. 11,687.

DOVERON, or DEVERON, dō'-ver-on, a river of Scotland, rising in the W. of Aberdeenshire, and after a course of 55 miles, chiefly in a north-easterly direction, enters the North Sea at Banff.

DOVRE FJELD. (See NORWAY.)

DOW, or DOUW, GERARD, dow, Dutch painter, remarkable for the exquisite finish of his pictures, which, although mostly of small size, fetch very high prices.

Born at Leyden, 1613; died 1680.

DOWLATABAD, dou-la-ta-bad ("abode of prosperity"), a city and fortress of Hindostan, in the Nizam's dominions. The fort stands on the summit of a mountain 500 feet high, and commands the town, which is in a decayed condition, and only partially inhabited. Lat. 19° 57′ N. Lon. 75° 18′ E.

DOWN, doun, a maritime county of Ireland, bounded N. by the county of Antrim and an arm of the sea, E. and S. by the Irish Sea, and W. by the county of Armagh. The Mourne mountains occupy the southern portion, and attain, in Slieve Donard, an elevation of nearly 2,800 feet above the level of the sea. The other parts are chiefly undulatory and hilly, but there are fine level tracts along the rivers. The coast line, about 70 miles in length, is generally bare and rocky, with numerous small islands. The more important inlets are Belfast Lough, Strangford Lough (almost a lake), and Dundrum and Carlingford bays.

Rivers.—The Bann, Lagan, and Newry; and there are numerous small lakes.

Pro.—Oats, potatoes, flax, and barley.

Minerals.—Copper and lead are found; also black marble susceptible of a high polish, slate, coal, freestone, and crystals.

Manf.—Linen, muslins, woollens, hosiery, leather, and salt. The fisheries employ some thousands of people. The county exports butter, hides, pork, and skins, with considerable quantities of its manufactured goods,

Area.—967 square miles.

Pop.—269,927, of whom two-thirds belong to Protestant denominations.

Chief Towns.—DOWNPATRICK, BANNBRIDGE, DONAGHADEE, NEWRY, and NEWTOWNARDS.

Parliamentary Representation.—Four members are returned, two for the county, and one each for Downpatrick and Newry.

DOWN, or DOWNPATRICK, a parliamentary and municipal borough, chief town of the above county, situate near the mouth of the Quoyle, in Lough Strangford, 21 miles S.E. of Belfast. The principal public buildings are a cathedral, a new Catholic church, chapels, schools, court-house, infirmary, prison, barracks, and several charitable institutions. Vessels of small tonnage can reach the quays, about a mile from the town. In the vicinity are ancient earthworks. Manf. Linen, soap, leather, and malt-liquors. Pop. 3,621.—A station on the Belfast and County Down Railway.

DOWNHAM-MARKET, a market-town of Norfolk, on the Ouse, 11 miles from Lynn. The church, St. Edmund's, is an ancient Gothic structure. A large butter market is held. Pop. 2,752.—A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

DOWNS, THE, a portion of the North Sea, off the S.E. coast of England, between the N. and S. Foreland, opposite Ramsgate and Deal. This well-known roadstead, eight miles by six, affords a most valuable refuge to shipping, the Goodwin Sands serving as a breakwater.

DOWNTON, doun'-ton, a town of Wiltshire, on the right bank of the Avon, 6 miles S.E. of Salisbury. It has a church, several chapels, a grammar school, an ancient cross, and the remains of a castle. Manf. Lace, ticks, and it has both tanneries and malting-houses. Pop. 3,654.—A station on the London and South-Western Railway. At a short distance is the estate of Standlinch, purchased for the heirs of Lord Nelson, for which parliament voted £100,000.

DOXA, or HIRSCHBERG, dox'-a, a town of Bohemia, on a lake of the same name, 38 miles N.E. of Prague. There are the ruins of an old castle, and, on an island in the lake, of a large building, known as "Mouse Tower," because, having been used as a granary, the whole of the corn was eaten up by mice. Manf. Cotton and knitted stockings. Pop. 2,000.

DOYEN, GABRIEL FRANCOIS, do-yain(g), French painter, who studied at Rome, and in his latter years went, on the invitation of the empress Catherine, to St. Petersburg, where he became professor in the Academy of Painting.

Born at Paris, 1726; died at St. Petersburg 1806.

DOZY, REINHART, dō'-ze, Dutch orientalist, descended from a family of French Protestants. He studied at Leyden, where in 1850 he was appointed professor of history. He here published many works on the literature and history of the Arab races, and especially on the subject of the Moorish occupation of Spain, in which he has exposed the falsehoods of the monkish chroniclers.

Born at Leyden, 1820.

DRACHENFELS. (See RHINE.)

DRACHENSBERG, drä'-kens-berg, a range of mountains in South Africa, forming the boundary between Natal and the Free States and Basutoland. In some parts an elevation of 9,000 feet is obtained. The Orange, Vaal, and other large rivers rise in this range.

DRACO, drai'-ko, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, who exercised the office of archon, and, in 624 B.C., compiled a code of laws, which, on account of their severity, were said, by the orator Demades, to be written in letters of blood. He punished all crimes with death, alleging, that as the smallest crimes deserved it, he could not find a more severe punishment for the most atrocious. These laws were, at first, enforced, but were afterwards often neglected, on account of their extreme rigour, Solon ultimately totally abolishing them, except that which punished a murderer with death. Notwithstanding the severity of his code, his popularity was so great, that it was the proximate cause of his death. The Athenians, agreeably to a custom among them, out of great respect, heaped hats and cloaks on him at the theatre to such a degree, that they smothered him.

DRAGE, a river of Prussia, rising 40 miles S. of Koslin, and after a course of about 90 miles, joining the Netze.

DRAGONERA, dra-go-nair'-a, a small island in the Mediterranean, 2 miles N. of Majorca.

DRAGONI, dra'-go-ne, a town of Italy, 12 miles N.E. of Capua. There are marble quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 1,900.

DRAGON'S MOUTH, a strait between the island of Trinidad, in the West Indies, and the coast of Venezuela. It is nearly 15 miles across at its narrowest part, and is divided by islands into four channels.

DRAGTEN, drag'-ten, a market-town of Holland, province of Friesland, 15 miles S.E. of Leeuwarden. It is a busy, flourishing place, with good public buildings. Weaving, rope-making, tanning, watch-making, and lime-burning are carried on, and three horse and cattle markets are held annually. Pop. 4,500.

DRAGUIGNAN, dra'-goo-eeñ'-yawng, the chief town of the department of the Var, France, beautifully situated on a tributary of the Argens, 40 miles N.E. of Toulon. It contains a court-house, a fine clock-tower, and hospital, and the streets are adorned with trees and fountains. Manf. Woollens, silks, hosiery, leather, soap, earthenware, brandy, and oil. Pop. 7,600.

DRAGUT, dra'-goot, the favourite and successor of the corsair Barbarossa, whom he equalled in skill and valour. After a series of daring exploits, he was killed before Malta. (See BARBAROSSA.)

DRAKE, SIR FRANCIS, drak, a celebrated British admiral, was one of the twelve sons of a Devonshire yeoman, a zealous Protestant, who in consequence of persecution went to Kent, where he became connected with seafaring men. His son, Francis, early went to sea, and subsequently served under Sir John Hawkins. After passing through some adventures, and playing some doubtful parts, he, in 1570, raised sufficient volunteers to man two ships, and made several voyages to the West Indies, where he reaped considerable advantages. In 1572 he sailed again for the Spanish main, crossed the Isthmus of Darien, and returned to Plymouth loaded with treasure. He next served under the earl of Essex, in Ireland, where he distinguished himself so much by his bravery, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to Queen Elizabeth. In 1577 he made another voyage to America, sailing through the Straits of Magellan, plundering the Spanish towns on the coast of Chili and Peru, capturing a rich Spanish galleon, and sailing northward till he reached the 48th degree. Here he took possession of New Albion, and then steered for the East Indies. He doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to Plymouth in 1579. This voyage round the world occupied two years and nearly ten months. Queen Elizabeth ordered his ship up to Deptford, and partook of a banquet on board, and then conferred the honour of knighthood on Drake. In 1585, and the whole of 1586, he was engaged in the West Indies, where he took several places from the Spaniards; visited the colony of Virginia, in America, planted by Raleigh, and brought some of the colonists to England with him. By these it is supposed that tobacco was first introduced into England. Drake returned loaded with treasure. In 1587 he commanded a fleet of thirty sail, with which he entered Cadiz, and destroyed a number of shipping, and afterwards, between St. Vincent and Cadiz, burned 100 vessels and destroyed several castles on the coast. This Drake humorously termed "singeing the Spanish monarch's beard." On his return he captured a richly-laden Spanish carrack, and spent a considerable portion of his prize-money in supplying the town of Plymouth with water. The year following, he commanded, as vice-admiral, under Lord Howard, and was instrumental in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. In 1589 he was returned member of parliament for Plymouth. After this he went to the West Indies with Sir John Hawkins; but the two commanders disagreeing in their plans, little was done by them, and Drake died from a disease which broke out in the fleet.
Born near Tavistock, 1539; died in the harbour of Nombre de Dios, 1595.

DRAKE, FRIEDRICH, Prussian sculptor, pupil of Rauch, and especially famous for medallions, busts, and statues of eminent contemporaries. He is professor of sculpture in the Academy of Berlin, and chevalier of the Red Eagle.
Born at Pyrmont, 1805.

DRAKENBERG, CHRISTIAN JOCOBENSEN, dra'-ken-bairg, a Norwegian seaman, who is noticed here on account of the great age he attained. In his 13th year he went to sea, in his 68th was captured by Algerine pirates, and was kept in slavery till his 84th. In his 102nd he was taken into the service of Count Samsoe, with whom he went to Copenhagen. In his 111th year he married a widow 60 years of age, and died at the age of 146. He was never known to be intoxicated.
Born at Blomsholm, Norway, 1626; died 1772.

DRAKENBORCH, ARNOLD, dra'-ken-bork, professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, who published editions of Livy and Silius Italicus, with learned notes.
Born at Utrecht, 1684; died 1747.

DRAMBURG, dram'-burg, a fortified town of Prussia, on both banks of the Drage, and divided into the old and new towns, connected by a bridge. Manf. Woollen goods, leather, gloves, hats, and fire-arms. Pop. 2,900.

DRAMMEN, dram'-men, a seaport town of Norway, in the province of Aggerhuus, on the Drammen, 24 miles S.W. of Christiania. It is divided into three parts, Bragenaes, on the north bank of the river, and Stromsoe and Tangen on the south, the river being crossed by a handsome bridge. It has a college, parish church, and several schools. Manf. Leather, tobacco, sail-cloth, oil, ropes, spirits, and earthenware. There are shipbuilding-docks, and a large trade in deals, timber, pitch, and iron. Pop. 19,209. Lat. 59° 44′ N. Lon. 10° 12′ E.

DRANSE, drans, a river of Switzerland, canton Valais, formed by the union of two mountain torrents, and joining the Rhone 2 miles below Martigny.

DRANSE, a river of Savoy, which enters the Lake of Geneva from the south, after a rapid course of 27 miles.

DRAPER, Sir WILLIAM, drai'-per, an English general, whose father was collector of customs at Bristol. He received his education at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, after which he went to the East Indies, where he rose to the rank of colonel. In 1763 he took Manilla, in conjunction with Admiral Cornish; but the place was preserved from plunder, on condition of its paying a ransom of four millions of dollars, which was never discharged. For this service he was created a knight of the Bath. In 1769 he was engaged in a controversy with Junius, in defence of his friend the marquis of Granby. In 1779 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Minorca. When that place surrendered, he brought an accusation against General Murray, the governor, after whose trial General Draper was commanded by the court to make an apology to him.

Born at Bristol, 1721; died at Bath, 1787.

DRAVE, drav, a river of Europe, which rises in the Tyrol, 16 miles from Brunecken, and, after a course of nearly 400 miles, joins the Danube 10 miles E. of Eszek. Its chief affluents are the Drau and the Mur. It forms the boundary between Croatia and Slavonia on the south and Hungary on the north.

DRAYTON-IN-HALES, or MARKET, a town of Shropshire, on the Tern, 19 miles N.E. of Shrewsbury. The parish church was originally erected in the 12th century, but almost rebuilt in 1787. Manf. Paper and hair seating. Pop. 4,039.

DRAYTON, MICHAEL, an English poet, who received his education at Cambridge. In 1593 he published a collection of pastorals, entitled, "The Shepherd's Garland," which was followed by his poems of "The Barons' Wars," and "England's Heroical Epistles." The "Barons' Wars" contain many passages of great beauty, and were imitated by Milton. In 1613 he published his "Polyolbion," or a Description of England, to which Selden wrote notes. This is his great work, "exhibiting, at once, the learning of an historian, an antiquary, a naturalist, and a geographer, besides being embellished with the imagination of a poet." He was appointed poet laureate in 1629. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Hartshill, Warwickshire, 1563; died 1631.

DREBACH, dré'-bak, a town of Saxony, district of Zwickau. Manf. Lace, tiles, and lime. There are bleachfields and spinning mills. Pop. 2,300.

DREBEL, CORNELIUS, dreb'-el, a Dutch philosopher, whose principal work is "De Naturâ Elementorum," 8vo. He invented the thermometer which bears his name, and is also said, although erroneously, to have been the discoverer of the microscope and telescope.

Born at Alkmaar, 1572; died in London, 1634.

DRENTHE, drent-hé, a frontier province of the Netherlands, having on the E. Hanover and the provinces of Friesland, Gröningen, and Overyssel on the N.W. and S. The country is flat and marshy, with a generally infertile soil. The principal employment of the population is pasturing flocks and digging and exporting peat. Area, 948 square miles. Pop. 124,160. Lat. between 52° 37′ and 53° 23′ N. Lon. between 6° 12′ and 7° 10′ E.

DRESDEN, dres'-den, one of the four districts into which the kingdom of Saxony is divided. It is more pastoral than agricultural, rearing large herds and flocks of cattle, goats, sheep, and swine. Minerals. Iron, silver, copper, lead, antimony, coal, lignite, and marble. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 808,512.

DRESDEN, the capital of the kingdom of Saxony, on both sides of the Elbe, 116 miles S.E. of Berlin. On the south side is the Altstadt, an old town, with its suburbs, Pirna, See, and Wilsdruf, and farther west (beyond a small stream, the Weisseritz), a new quarter, Friedrichstadt. On the north of the Elbe is the Neustadt, or new town. The old and new towns are connected by a fine bridge of sixteen arches, originally built in the 13th century, but almost reconstructed about 1730. Farther to the west, the river is crossed by another, a carriage and railway bridge. In the old town, near the foot of the bridge, is the royal palace, or Georgenburg, a large and irregular building begun in 1534 and completed about 200 years afterwards. In the vaults of the palace are kept the Saxon regalia and a valuable collection of precious stones and articles in gold, silver, and ivory. Farther to the west is the Zwinger, built in 1711 by the elector Augustus II., intended as the entrance to a magnificent palace, which was never completed. It consists of six pavilions, connected by a gallery, and a splendid picture gallery, added between 1846 and 1855, containing more than 1,500 valuable paintings, chiefly of the Italian and Flemish schools, and a collection of casts from the antique. In the Zwinger are the Rustkammer, or historical museum, and a museum of natural history. Between the royal palace and the Zwinger is the Prince's Palace, built by Augustus II., in 1718. The Brühl Palace is near the river, about a third of a mile E. of the bridges; the Augusteum, or Japanese palace, so named from the grotesque ornamentation on the exterior, is in the new town. It was built for a summer residence by Augustus II., and now contains the royal public library of about 320,000 volumes, a cabinet of coins, and collections of porcelain, and ceramic products generally. There are 19 churches and chapels, the most interesting being in the old town; the most noticeable are the Frauenkirche, or Our Lady's (near the royal palace), founded in the 11th century, and having a noble dome; the church of St. Sophia, the church of Holy Cross, the church of St. John, and the Roman Catholic Church, near the bridge, and communicating with the royal palace, containing a famous organ and many statues and pictures. The Jews have a large synagogue, built in the Oriental styles. Among the other public buildings of interest are a very handsome new theatre, the opera house, the new post-office, the town-hall (nearly in the centre of the old town), the house of assembly, the corn exchange, the arsenal and mint. In the new market, about midway between the old market and the river, is a statue of Augustus II. There are several very attractive gardens and places of public resort, especially the "great garden" in the Pirna suburb, 5 miles in circumference; the garden's of the Japanese palace, Prince Maximilian's garden, and the Brühl terrace, overlooking the river. Among the educational and scientific institutions are the Academy of Art, to which belongs a school of architecture; a natural history and medical society, and other societies devoted to the prosecution of various branches of science. There are two gymnasia, a military, polytechnic, and numerous other schools.

Manf.—Gold and silver articles, mathematical, surgical, and musical instruments, straw plait, painters' canvas and colours, artificial flowers, and chocolate. The famous Dresden china is not made here, but at Meissen, 16 miles to the north-west.

Railway and other Communications.—The lines of railway to Leipzig, Görlitz and Prussian Silesia have their termini in the new town. Steamers ply between the town and upper part of the Elbe.

Pop. of the district, 808,512; of the city, 245,550.

Lat. 51° 3′ N. Lon. 13° 44′ E.

History.—Originally a fishing village, it grew into some importance, and was a considerable town, before the end of the 13th century. In 1510 it was fortified, and was greatly enlarged and embellished in the beginning of the 18th century. It suffered severely during the Seven Years' War, and in the wars of Napoleon. In 1813 the Allies were defeated here by the French in a terrible battle. Many improvements have been made in the last few years.

DREUX, droo, an old town of France, in the department of Eure-et-Loir, on the Blaise, 45 miles W. of Paris. The church and town-hall are fine Gothic buildings. On the summit of a hill overhanging the town are the ruins of an ancient castle, and a beautiful new chapel in the Grecian style, surmounted by a cupola, containing the tombs of two children and other relatives of king Louis Philippe. Manf. Woollens, iron, and leather, and it has a trade in sheep and cattle. Pop. 6,900. In 1188 this town was burned by the Norman English; and in 1562 the prince of Condé was taken prisoner in a severe action fought between the Calvinists and the Catholics in its neighbourhood.

DREW, Samuel, droo, was born of humble parents in the parish of Austell, Cornwall, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but, though nearly destitute of education, he became noted for his shrewd and subtle powers of debate among his fellow workmen, while his free manners of life induced him to slight the principles of religion. Having, however, heard Dr. Adam Clarke preach, he was induced to change his opinions; determined to obtain knowledge, which he pursued with great energy, and became a local Methodist preacher, while still following his trade of a shoemaker. In 1799 he appeared as an author, in a tract entitled "Remarks on Paine's 'Age of Reason,'" which was well received; he subsequently published "An Essay on the Immateriality and Immortality of the Soul," which established his fame as a metaphysical theologian. He now abandoned trade, and devoted himself to religious literature, producing among other valuable works, a "Treatise on the Being and Attributes of God." He edited with much ability the "Imperial Magazine," from 1819 to his death.

Born 1765; died March 29, 1833.

DREW, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 12,231. Capital, Monticello.

DREWENZ, drew'-ents, a river of Prussia, which rises in the S.E. of the district of Konigsberg, and enters the Vistula 4 miles E. of Thorn, after a course of 100 miles, a portion of which forms the boundary between Prussia and Poland.

DRIBURG, dre'-burg, a Prussian town, in the province of Westphalia, on the Aa, 39 miles S. of Minden. The chalybeate baths in the neighbourhood are much frequented. There is a trade in cattle, and two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,200.

DRIESEN, dre'-sen, a town of Prussia, on an island formed by the Netze, 64 miles N.E. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Manf. Woollens and linen, leather, beer, and spirits. There is some shipping trade. Pop. 3,700.

DRIFFIELD, GREAT, drif'-feeld, a town of the East Riding of Yorkshire, 20 miles N.W. of Hull. It has an ancient church, of Gothic and Saxon architecture, several chapels, and a union workhouse. A large corn and cattle trade is carried on. Pop. 9,153.—It is a station on the North-Eastern Railway.

DRIMACHUS, drim'-a-kus, a famous robber of Chios. When a price was set upon his head, he ordered a young man to cut it off, and go and receive the money. Such an uncommon instance of generosity so pleased the Chians, that they raised a temple to his memory, and honoured him as a god.

DRIN, drin, a large river of European Turkey, rising on the frontiers of Montenegro and Albania. It is formed by the junction of the Black and White Drin, and has a generally western course of 110 miles, entering the Gulf of Drin in the Adriatic, 5 miles below Alessio.

DRIN, another river of Turkey, rising in the Dinaric Alps, and partially separating Bosnia from Servia. After a course of 180 miles it joins the Save 57 miles N.W. of Belgrade.

DROGHEDA, dro'-he-da, a seaport-town and parliamentary and municipal borough of Ireland, in the counties of Meath and Louth, built on both sides of the Boyne, 4 miles from its mouth and 31 miles N. of Dublin. The principal buildings are three churches, a Catholic cathedral, several monasteries and nunneries, an infirmary, barracks, town-hall, linen-hall, custom-house, and market-house. There are remains of one of the ancient gates and of several monasteries. Vessels of 500 tons can reach the quay. Manf. Linens, cottons, and iron. Brewing is largely carried on. Pop. 12,297, nearly all Roman Catholics.—A station on the Northern of Ireland Railway. In 1649 Cromwell was twice repulsed in besieging this town; but in the third attempt he was successful, and most of its garrison were put to the sword.

DROHOBICZ, dro'-ho-bitsh, a town of Austria, in the province of Galicia, on a tributary of the Dniester. The public buildings include a castle, two handsome churches, and a monastery. Iron mines, large salt works, and pitch wells are in the vicinity. A good trade is carried on in wine, linen, cotton, and leather, and corn and cattle markets are held. Pop. 17,000, the greater number of whom are Jews. Lat. 49° 25′ N. Lon. 23° 30′ E.

DROITWICH, droit'-wich, a parliamentary and municipal borough of Worcestershire, on a canal communicating with the Severn, 7 miles N.E. of Worcester. It contains several fine churches, an hospital, and a union workhouse. Its principal manufacture is fine white salt, of which about 115,000 tons are annually procured from its celebrated brine springs. Pop. 3,761.—It is a station on the Great Western Railway.

DROME, drome, a river of France, rising in the Upper Alps, and, after a course of 68 miles, joining the Rhone 12 miles S.W. of Valence.

DROME, a department of France, comprehending the S.W. part of Lower Dauphiny. It is bounded by the departments of the Isère, Hautes-Alpes, Basses-Alpes, and Vaucluse; the Rhone separating it on the W. from Ardèche. It is mountainous in the E., which is traversed by offshoots of the Alps, the sides of which are clothed with forests of oak, pine, and beech. In other parts of the department, vines and the mulberry are cultivated, and chestnut, walnut, and olive trees are grown. The department is divided into 4 arrondissements and 370 communes.

Rivers.—The Rhône, Drôme, and Isère.
Pro.—Silk, and the grape. Hermitage is the product of the latter.
Minerals.—Iron, coal, copper, lead, granite, and marble.
Area.—2,496 square miles.
Pop.—313,763.
Chief Towns.—VALENCE, the capital; MONTÉLIMART, DIE, and NIONS.

DROMORE, dro-mor', a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, on the Lagan, 14 miles S.W. of Belfast. Manf. Linen. Pop. 2,308.

DROMORE, a post-township of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, U.S., on the E. side of the Susquehannah, 17 miles from Lancaster. Pop. 2,300.

DRONERO, dro-nair'-o, a town of Italy, 12 miles N.W. of Cuneo, near the foot of the Alps, on the Maira, crossed by a fine stone bridge. The old part of the town is surrounded by walls, and there are two suburbs. There are several churches, a monastery, college, and some remains of an old castle. Manf. Silks, hempen cloth, and agricultural implements. Four fairs are held. Pop. 3,400.

DRONFIELD, dron'-feeld, a town of Derbyshire, 6 miles N. of Chesterfield. Manf. Cutlery, iron-wares, and chemicals. Pop. 4,000.

DRONNE, dron, a river of France, which joins the Isle near Coutras.

DRONTHEIM, or TRONDHJEM, NORTH and SOUTH, dront'-hime, two of the amts, or provinces of Norway, situate on the W. coast, between Bergen, Aggerhuus, the Swedish frontier, and Norrland. Area, 19,735 square miles. It is divided by mountains from Sweden. Pop. 199,075.

DRONTHEIM, or TRONDHJEM, a town of Norway, the capital of the above provinces, on the Nid, in Drontheim fiord, by which the town is nearly surrounded. It is defended by the fortress of Munkholm, on an island in the fiord, and has a cathedral, several churches, a theatre, exchange, bank, schools, and charitable institutions. Its trade is carried on in dried fish, tar, deals, and copper. The imports consist chiefly of groceries, cloths, wine, and corn. Pop. about 15,000. Lat. 63° 25′ 8″ N. Lon. 10° 28′ 7″ E.

DROSSEN, dros'-sen, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Leuze, 15 miles N.E. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Manf. Woollens and linen, hosiery, leather, hats, earthenware, bricks and tiles. There is a good trade in horses and cattle, and four fairs are held annually. Pop. 4,000.

DROUET D'ERLON, JEAN BAPTISTE, droo'-ai dair'-lawng, a French marshal, who, after passing through the various ranks, became a general of division in 1805. In 1807 Dantzic capitulated to him, he was wounded at Friedland, served in Spain under Massena, and was opposed on many occasions to the English. When Napoleon fell, in 1814, Drouet entered the service of the Bourbons as general of division, but was soon charged with conspiring against the royal family, and arrested. He contrived to escape, and, on Napoleon's return from Elba, he was one of the most eager to receive him, was made a peer of France, and commanded the first corps d'armée during the "hundred days." He was condemned, in 1816, to death, found an asylum in Bavaria till 1832, when he returned to France, and was appointed to the command of the army in La Vendée. In 1834, he was appointed governor-general of Algeria. Here he was the author of several administrative reforms; but, not displaying against Abd-el-Kader the necessary energy, he was recalled in 1835, being made, however, a marshal in 1843. He wrote his autobiography, under the title of "The Military Life of General Drouet."

Born at Rheims, 1765; died 1844.

DROUYN DE LHUYS, EDOUARD, droo'-awng de(r) lweece, a modern French statesman, who early entered the diplomatic service of his country, and was employed in several minor positions at various courts. He was also elected a deputy of the Chamber. Here he was opposed to the policy of M. Guizot, and was one of those who signed the list of charges drawn up against the ministry by Odillon Barrot. In the first cabinet of Louis Napoleon, after he became president, Drouyn de Lhuys was appointed foreign minister, and acquitted himself with considerable ability in those difficult times. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to England, and, subsequently, in 1852, being again foreign minister, addressed to the various powers despatches announcing the establishment of the empire under Napoleon III. During the dispute between Turkey and Russia, his endeavours for peace were strenuously exerted. He took part in the conferences at Vienna in 1855, and, on their breaking up without any result, resigned his office. The following year he also tendered his resignation as senator. In 1863 he again took office as foreign minister, but resigned in 1866. On the downfall of the empire he retired to Jersey.

Born at Paris, 1805.

DROYLSDEN, droils'-den, a township of Lancashire, 4 miles E. of Manchester. There are a handsome new church, several other places of worship, and a mechanics' institution. Manf. Cotton goods and chemicals. There are dye and print works. Pop. 8,679.—A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire lines.

DRUMMOND, WILLIAM, drum'-mond, a Scotch poet, was the son of Sir John Drummond, of Hawthornden, was educated at Edinburgh University, studied law on the continent, and was destined for the law; but Parnassus had more charms for him than the courts. At the age of 25 he succeeded to the paternal estates, and in his retirement at Hawthornden he wrote several beautiful poems; but the death of a lady, to whom he was about to be married, affected him so much that he went abroad, where he remained some years. On his return, he settled at Hawthornden, and wrote his "History of the five Kings of the name of James," and several pieces to promote peace and union in that turbulent time. Ben Jonson, in 1619, made a journey to Scotland expressly to see him, and afterwards published a well known account of his visit, and the conversations they held. Hazlitt says of Drummond's sonnets, that "they come as near as almost any others to the perfection of this kind of writing."

Born at Hawthornden, 1585; died 1649.

DRUMMOND, THOMAS HENRY, inventor of the Drummond light, was appointed to a cadetship at Woolwich, where he soon began to distinguish himself by his mechanical talents in the engineering department of the government institution of that place. Having served here some time, he went to Plymouth, thence to Chatham, and thence to Edinburgh, where he got acquainted with Captain Colby, then engaged in the trigonometrical survey. From this officer he obtained employment, and, in surveying a portion of Ireland, invented a new light, which greatly assisted his observations in foggy weather. He also invented a heliostat, an instrument for reflecting the rays of the sun, which was used in this survey. This instrument, in an improved form, connected with the theodolite, has been found of great service. He continued to devote himself to scientific pursuits, until ill-health compelled him, for a time, to resign his situation. He was subsequently engaged in laying down the boundaries to the old and the new boroughs, under the provisions of the Reform Bill; in which capacity he distinguished himself by his usual perseverance and accuracy. In 1835 he became under-secretary for Ireland, and in the following year was head of a commission appointed to report on a railway system for Ireland. His death was hastened by overwork. There is a statue to his memory in the Royal Exchange, Dublin.

Born at Edinburgh, 1797; died 1840.

DRUMMOND'S ISLAND, an island in Lake Huron, North America, belonging to the dominion of Canada. It is 20 miles long, by 10 wide, is a trading post, and has a British fort upon it.

DRUMMOND'S ISLAND, in the South Pacific Ocean. It is of coral formation, about 30 miles long, and in no part more than three quarters of a mile in breadth. It is inhabited by a large number of ferocious savages, most of whom are entirely naked. Lat. 1° 20′ S. Lon. 174° 57′ E.

DRURY, ROBERT, droo'-re, an English seaman, who, in 1702, was shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, where he remained 15 years. After his return to England, he published a very exact and curious account of that island, 8vo, 1729.

Born 1687; died 1735.

DRURY, DRU, an English entomologist, supposed to have been descended from Sir Dru Drury, a knight of the reign of Elizabeth. He was for several years a silversmith and cutler in the Strand, London, and was a great collector of subjects of natural history. He wrote three volumes on insects.

Born in London, 1725; died 1804.

DRUSILLA, dru-sil'-la, was the youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa II. She became wife of Azizus, king of the Emessenians, but deserted him, and married Felix. She perished in an eruption of Vesuvius.

Lived in the 1st century.

DRUSUS, dru'-sus, a name common to many eminent Romans, the most remarkable of whom are the following:—

DRUSUS, CÆSAR, a son of Tiberius and Vipsania, who made himself famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raised to the greatest honours by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia, the wife of Drusus, and, in conjunction with her, Sejanus caused him to be poisoned by a eunuch.

Died 23.

DRUSUS, a son of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greatest trust under Tiberius. His enemy Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his insinuations; Drusus was confined by Tiberius, and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after his confinement.

Died 33.

DRUSUS, NERO CLAUDIUS, a son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, adopted by Augustus. He was brother to Tiberius, who was afterwards made emperor. He greatly signalized himself in his wars in Germany and Gaul against the Rhæti and Vindelici, and was honoured with a triumph. He died of a fall from his horse, in the 30th year of his age.

Born 38 B.C.; died 9 B.C.

DRYADES, dri'-a-dees', nymphs who presided over the woods. Oblations of milk, oil, and honey were offered to them, and sometimes the votaries sacrificed a goat.

DRYANDER, JOHN, dre-an'-der, a mathematician and physician of Wetteren, in the county of Hesse. He was a professor at Marpurg, and wrote several books on physic and mathematics, which were once held in great esteem.

Born 1500; died at Marpurg, 1560.

DRYDEN, JOHN, dri'-den, an English poet, the grandson of a Northamptonshire baronet, was educated at Westminster school under Dr. Busby, where he showed considerable talent for versification. He was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650, proceeded to the degree of M.A., and in 1657 removed to London, where, in the following year, he wrote an elegy on the death of Cromwell. His sorrow, however, was of short duration; for at the Restoration, he complimented Charles II. in a poem, entitled "Astrea Redux." In 1662 appeared his first play, called "the Wild Gallant," which was indifferently received. Soon afterwards he produced "The Rival Ladies," and next "The Indian Emperor," which made him famous. This last was written in conjunction with Sir Robert Howard, who introduced him to the earl of Berkshire, whose eldest daughter he married, but who brought him no happiness. He engaged with the king's theatre for an annual stipend, on condition of furnishing a certain number of plays in each year. On the death of Sir William Davenant, he was nominated poet laureate, and historiographer royal, with a salary of £200 a year and a butt of wine. His eminence as a dramatic writer was now established, but it exposed him to the envy of several rival wits. Among these the duke of Buckingham held him up to ridicule in the character of Bayes, in "The Rehearsal;" and the earl of Rochester being offended, it is supposed, at some allusion in an "Essay on Satire," written jointly by Dryden and Lord Mulgrave, caused the former to be cudgelled by some hired ruffians as he came home from a coffee-house. Others, however, declare that the vanity of the duchess of Portsmouth, one of the king's mistresses, was wounded by a jeu d'esprit of Dryden, and that this procured him the cudgelling. To his antagonists in satirical weapons, he was decidedly superior. "His keen and trenchant blade," says Sir Walter Scott, "never makes a thrust in vain, and never strikes but at a vulnerable point." The duke of Buckingham is the Zimri of the poet's "Absalom and Achitophel," a political satire which achieved a great success. On the accession of James II. Dryden became a Roman Catholic, and, like most converts, endeavoured to defend his new faith at the expense of the old one, in a poem, called "The Hind and Panther," which was admirably parodied by Prior and Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, in "The Country Mouse and the City Mouse." At the Revolution he lost his posts. In 1695 his translation of Virgil appeared; which performance alone is sufficient to immortalize his name. Pope pronounces it "the most noble and spirited translation in any language." His ode, "Alexander's Feast," is known to all. He was buried between the graves of Chaucer and Cowley, in Westminster Abbey, where is a monument to his memory, erected by John, duke of Buckingham. Dryden's works are too numerous to be here distinguished. His critical prefaces are admirable; his prose being matchless for its freedom, vigour, variety, and copiousness. It ranks with the best in the English language. His poetry is correct, harmonious, and strong, particularly his satires. As a dramatic writer, he chiefly excelled in tragedy. His plays are numerous, he having been the sole or joint author of twenty-seven.

Born at Aldwinckle, Northamptonshire, 1631; died 1700.

DRYOPE, drī'-o-pe, a woman of Lemnos, whose shape Venus assumed to persuade all the females of the island to murder the men.—A virgin of Œchalia, whom Andræmon married after she had been beloved by Apollo. She was changed into a lotus.—A nymph, mother of Tarquitus by Faunus.

DRYOPES, drī'-o-pees', a people of Greece near Mount Œta. They afterwards passed into the Peloponnesus, where they inhabited the towns of Asine and Hermione, in Argolis.

DU BARRY. (See BARRY.)

DU BARTAS. (See BARTAS.)

DU BELLAY, doo bel'-lai, a French cardinal and statesman, who enjoyed the favour of Francis I., and was sent as ambassador to Henry VIII. of England and the pope, Paul III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom during the absence of Francis, who was engaged against the emperor Charles V. in Provence. Falling into disgrace on the death of this king, he retired to Rome. —This cardinal protected and encouraged letters, and it was at his suggestion that the college of France was founded. Rabelais was attached to his establishment.

Born 1492; died 1560.

DUBBO, dub'-bo, a town of New South Wales, Australia, on the Macquarie river, 226 miles N.W. of Sydney. It is a thriving place, with good public buildings. Pop. 1,200. Lat. 32° 21′ S. Lon. 148° 39′ E.

DUBEN, doo'-ben, a town of Prussia, on the right bank of the Mulde, 17 miles N.W. of Torgau. Manf. Cloth. A trade in wood is carried on, and there are three annual fairs. Pop. 3,900.

DUBHOY, or DUBBOI, a town of Gujerat, India, 20 miles S.E. of Baroda. It was formerly a place of great importance, and there are extensive remains of ancient fortifications, gates, and temples. The "gate of diamonds" is famous for beauty.

DUBITZA, doo-beet'-cha, a fortified town of European Turkey, in Bosnia, on the right bank of the Unna, a tributary of the Save. Pop. 6,000.

DUBITZA, AUSTRIAN, a strongly fortified town of Croatia, on the left bank of the Unna, immediately opposite the above.

DUBLIN, dub'-lin, a county of Ireland, in the east of the province of Leinster, bounded E. by the Irish Sea, N. by Meath, W. by Meath and Kildare, and S. by Wicklow. The coast, which is much indented with creeks and bays, is 70 miles long, and there are several small islands. (See DUBLIN BAY.) The surface of the county is a rich plain, with slight undulations. In the vicinity of the city of Dublin the lands are fertile and luxuriant, and generally the county is the best cultivated part of Ireland. The principal river is the Liffey. The Dodder is a small stream, falling into Dublin Bay. There are two canals, the Grand and the Royal canals, by which a navigable communication is effected between the Liffey and the Shannon. The fisheries along the coast are important.

Minerals.—Copper, lead, iron, manganese, fuller's earth, and potter's clay; and there are several mineral springs.

Area.—354 square miles.

Pop.—418,152.

Chief Towns.—DUBLIN, the metropolis of Ireland, and KINGSTON.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, two for Dublin City, and two for Dublin University.

DUBLIN, a city, seaport, parliamentary and municipal borough, metropolis of Ireland, and one of the handsomest towns in Europe, in the province of Leinster, and county of Dublin. It stands close to the bay of that name, into which the river Liffey runs, after dividing the city, a large portion of which is built on land reclaimed from the sea. From the point where the Liffey enters the bay, it is embanked on either side with a noble wall of free-stone, forming a range of beautiful and spacious quays through the whole city. The river is crossed in its course through the city by seven stone and two iron bridges. Dublin is, besides, nearly insulated by two canals, which give great advantages for inland communication. The city is built rather in the form of a rectangular parallelogram, round which a road, called the Circular, is carried, 9 miles in length. The business part is chiefly on the west side of the river; the more aristocratic residences, in fine streets, squares, and terraces, on the east side. The poor part is called "the Liberties," and the streets are narrow, dirty, and irregular. The finest street is Sackville-street, nearly half a mile long and 120 feet wide. In this street is a marble statue, by Mr. Favell, of the late Sir John Gray, M.P. for the City of Kilkenny, erected by public subscription, in June, 1879. There are several squares, and Stephen's Green is nearly a mile in circuit. Merrion Square, a fashionable quarter, is about 13 acres in extent. At the W. end of the city is Phœnix Park, a royal demesne, about three miles in length and two in breadth. In it is a Corinthian fluted pillar 30 feet high, surmounted by a phœnix, erected by the Earl of Chesterfield, when viceroy in 1747. The park contains inclosures, the vice-regal lodge, with appropriate buildings for the secretaries and rangers; also a military hospital, a large military school for the maintenance and education of soldiers' children, with a beautiful church, a salute-battery, and a magazine strongly fortified. On an eminence is erected, in honour of the Duke of Wellington, and at a cost of £20,000, a splendid obelisk, 210 feet in height. Near the Dublin gate of the park is the People's Garden, a public promenade and flower garden, in which is a statue of the Earl of Carlisle. The "Castle," which was completed and flanked with towers in 1213, is situate about the centre of the city, and is occupied for the purposes of government. It consists principally of two squares, which contain apartments for the lord-lieutenant and the officers of his suite, and residences for his secretaries, with suitable offices for transacting the business of the civil and war departments. In the lower court are the Treasury and other offices, besides the civil establishment of the ordnance department, and an extensive armoury. The Castle chapel, in this lower square, is an exquisite specimen of Gothic architecture. The other public edifices are the Royal Exchange, the Commercial Buildings, the Four Courts, Corn-exchange or Burgh-quay, the Linen-hall, the Custom-house, the Stamp-office, Post-office, and the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament-house. Opposite to the east front of the custom-house are several large docks. The spacious Spencer Dock was opened in 1873; and recently the harbour has been greatly improved by the erection of two large breakwaters. Adjacent to the post-office, standing in Sackville Street, is Nelson's pillar, 134 feet high. In the centre of College Green, to which the principal front of the bank looks, is an equestrian statue of William III., erected in 1701. On the east side of College Green is the grand front of Trinity College, which is of Portland stone, of the Corinthian order. The park is in the rear of the college, and contains 25½ acres, adorned with fine trees. In front of the college are statues of Goldsmith and Burke; a statue of O'Connell is in the City Hall, and of the Earl of Eglinton on St. Stephen's Green. There are 20 Protestant episcopal parish churches, and 20 non-parochial, including several new and very handsome edifices, two cathedrals, besides many chapels, and other structures for various religious denominations. St. Patrick's cathedral is an antique building, erected in 1190, decorated with a steeple in 1370, and a very lofty spire in 1750. It has been restored lately at the sole expense of Sir B. Guinness, the eminent brewer. Christ Church, the ancient cathedral of Dublin, built in 1038, is another venerable pile, containing some curious monuments, and has been recently restored at the expense of Mr. Henry Roe, who has also made a gift of a Synod Hall, adjoining the cathedral. St. George's church is a superb edifice, with a magnificent front, and spire 200 feet high. There are 9 Catholic churches, several monasteries and convents, and a Jewish synagogue. No city, for its size, abounds more in charitable institutions. These are in general well endowed, and some of them are splendid buildings. To the W. of the city, opposite Phœnix Park, is the royal hospital of Kilmainham, for the reception of disabled and superannuated soldiers, on the plan of that of Chelsea. There are also many learned societies. The environs, especially Rathmines, on the south, and Glasnevin, on the north, are very beautiful. The chief trade of Dublin consists in exporting poplins, linens, porter, and provisions.

Lat. 53° 20′ N. Lon. 6° 17′ W.
Communications.—By railways and canals, Dublin communicates with the W. of Ireland and the towns of Belfast, Cork, Limerick, Kingstown, Howth, Drogheda, and other places. By steamboats it communicates with Belfast, Liverpool, Glasgow, Cork, Holyhead, Bristol, Plymouth, Southampton, London, Waterford, Leith, and Newcastle.
History.—This is the Eblana of Ptolemy. The present name is supposed to be derived from the Irish "Dubhlin," or black pool. It was taken by the Danes in the early part of the 9th century, and by the English, under Strongbow, in 1169. The building of the castle was begun in 1205; the first mayor was appointed in 1409, and the title of lord mayor assumed in 1665. Trinity College was founded in 1591.

DUBLIN BAY, an inlet of the Irish Sea, having at its W. end the mouth of the river Liffey, with Dublin harbour. Its entrance is between two lighthouses, one at Howth Head on the N., and the other at Kingstown on the S.

DUBNITZA, doob-nee'-za, a town of European Turkey, on the bank of the Djerma. In its vicinity the grape is cultivated, and there are large iron works. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 42° 10′ N. Lon. 23° 20′ E.

DUBNO, dub'-no, a Russian town, on the Irwa. There are several Greek and Roman Catholic churches, a Greek abbey, and a ducal residence. A large trade is carried on in corn, flax, tobacco, fish, and cattle, and there is a well-attended fair at Whitsuntide. Pop. 8,500. Lat. 50° 25′ N. Lon. 25° 40′ E.

DUBOCAGE, MARIE ANNE LE PAGE, doo'-bo-caj, a talented French authoress, who was a member of the academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, and Rouen. She early distinguished herself by a taste for poetry, and translated Pope's "Temple of Fame" into French. In 1746, she obtained the prize given by the academy at Rouen, and afterwards translated Milton's "Paradise Lost," which she followed by a translation of the "Death of Abel." In 1749 she produced a tragedy, called "The Amazons," and subsequently "The Columbiad," an epic poem on the discovery of America, which is esteemed her greatest work. She also published "Travels through England, Holland, and Italy," in the epistolary form.
Born at Rouen, 1710; died 1802.

DUBOIS, GUILLAUME, doo-bwaw', archbishop of Cambray, cardinal, and prime minister of France, was the son of a poor apothecary in Limousin. He became valet to the superior of the college of St. Michael at Paris, where he studied, and entered into orders. Being appointed private reader to the duke de Chartres, afterwards duke of Orleans and Regent, he received the rich abbey of St. Just, and subsequently became counsellor of state. In 1717 he was sent to England as plenipotentiary to sign the triple alliance, which had been entered into against Spain, between England, France, and Holland. On his return, he was made minister and secretary of state, and obtained the archbishopric of Cambray. In 1721, the pope advanced him to the cardinalate, and, in the following year, he was appointed first minister of state. From that time he reigned absolute master, and the French court, already so depraved, sank still lower in its vices; but happily his death soon put an end to his power. He possessed great talents, but these were sullied and clouded by his vices of debauchery, avarice, and guilty ambition.
Born at Brives-la-Gaillarde, in Auvergne, 1656; died 1723.

DUBOIS, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 15,992. Jasper is the capital.

DUBOS, JEAN BAPTIST, doo-bo', a French writer, who was employed in some secret transactions by M. de Torcy, minister of foreign affairs, for which he was rewarded with several benefices. He is principally known by his "Critical Reflections on Poetry and Painting," 2 vols. 12mo; a work which, at the time of its appearance, was highly esteemed. He also wrote some political pieces, and a "Critical History of the Establishment of the French Monarchy in Gaul."
Born at Beauvais, 1670; died at Paris, 1742.

DUBOSSA, or NOVO-DUBOSARI, doo-bos'-sa, a town of Russia, in the government of Kherson, on the left bank of the Dniester. Tobacco is extensively grown in the district. Pop. 5,500.

DUBOVKA, doo-bof'-ka, a town of European Russia, on the right bank of the Volga. It is a depôt for goods sent from the northern to the southern provinces. There is a trade in wood, oil, and iron. Pop. 13,700. Lat. 49° N. Lon. 44° 45′ E.

DUBROVNA, doo-brof'-na, a town of Russia, on the left bank of the Dnieper. There are a Roman Catholic and four Greek churches, and a synagogue. Manf. Woollens and linen, plush and clocks. A considerable trade in timber is carried on. Pop. 7,000.

DUBUQUE, do-book', a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 43,000. The capital is Dubuque.

DUBUQUE, capital of the above county, beautifully situated on the right bank of the Mississippi. There are several churches and a Roman Catholic cathedral. It is the oldest town of the State, having been settled by French Canadians in 1786; is the depôt of the lead regions of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois, and a railway centre, and a good general trade is carried on. Pop. 22,254.

DUCANGE, CHARLES DUFRESNE, Sieur, doo-kansh, a French author, who studied for the profession of the law, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to history and philosophy. His first work was "A History of Constantinople under the French Emperors," which was succeeded by his Glossaries of the Writings of the Middle Ages and the later Latin and Greek Authors, works of great value in enabling us to understand the writers of the dark and middle ages. He also produced some other historical works, and left a large number of manuscripts. His children received a pension of 2,000 francs from Louis XIV.

Born at Amiens, 1610; died at Paris, 1688.

DUCAREL, ANDREW COLTÉE, doo'-ka-rel, an eminent civilian and antiquary, who published a number of topographical and antiquarian works. His best known is one on Anglo-Gallic, Norman, and Aquitaine coins, which appeared in 1757. "Anglo-Norman Antiquities," considered in a tour through Normandy, is another valuable work on the particular subject of which it treats. Ducarel was commissary of St. Catherine's and Canterbury, and was brought to England soon after his birth. When the Society of Antiquaries was incorporated, in 1755, he was appointed one of its first fellows.

Born in Normandy, 1713; died at South Lambeth, 1785.

DUCAS, MICHAEL, doo'-kas, the author of a history of the Grecian empire, from the reign of Andronicus the Elder to the fall of that empire; printed at the Louvre in 1649.

Lived in the 15th century.

DUCATO, CAPE, doo-ka'-to, is at the S. extremity of the island of Santa Maura, one of the Ionian islands. It is the Leucadian promontory, or "Lover's Leap," of the ancients, about 2,000 feet in perpendicular height, from which Sappho, the poetess, is supposed to have precipitated herself. There are some traces of a temple dedicated to Apollo, which stood on the summit. Lat. 30° 34′ N. Lon. 20° 32′ E.

DUCHESNE, ANDRE, du-shain', French historian, who was appointed, by Cardinal Richelieu, royal geographer and historiographer. He wrote several valuable historical and genealogical works. He was accidentally crushed to death in a narrow street in Paris.

Born at Ile-Bouchard, in Touraine, 1584; died 1640.

DUCK, a river of Tennessee, United States, rising in the Cumberland Mountains, and, after a course of 180 miles, falling into the Tennessee. It is navigable for 90 miles.

DUCK, STEPHEN, rustic poet, the son of a farm labourer in Wiltshire. He wrote "The Thresher's Labour," which attracted the attention of Queen Caroline, who gave him a pension of £30 a year, made him one of her yeomen guards, and afterwards keeper of her library at Richmond. He published another volume of poems, and having studied for the church, was ordained, and made rector of Byfleet, Surrey. He was a good man, and an able preacher, but gave way to fits of despondency, which ended in his committing suicide by drowning.

Born at Great Charlton, Wiltshire, 1700; died at Reading, 1756.

DUCKWORTH, SIR JOHN THOMAS, bart., duk'-werth, a British admiral, who entered the navy in 1759, under Admiral Boscawen, and took part in several engagements with the French. Having served in various ships, and seen a great deal of active service, he, in 1793, was attached to Lord Howe's fleet, and, in the celebrated action of June 1, 1794, greatly distinguished himself by his bravery, as well as naval skill. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the Leeward islands; and in 1801, for aiding in the reduction of the Swedish and West India islands, was created a K.C.B. In 1803 he was appointed commander-in-chief of Jamaica, and, for the vigorous measures he adopted in protecting the commerce of that island, received the thanks of its House of Assembly, with the presentation of a sword valued at £1,000. In 1805 he defeated the French in the bay of St. Domingo, for which he was thanked by both houses of parliament, and had an annuity of £1,000 bestowed upon him. In 1807 he forced the passage of the Dardanelles, in spite of the Turks; and, from 1810 to 1815, held the commander-in-chiefship of Newfoundland. He subsequently became governor of Plymouth, and, in 1813, was created a baronet.

Born at Fulmer, Bucks, 1748; died at Devonport, 1817.

DUCLOS, CHARLES PINOT, doo-klo', an historiographer of France, who became perpetual secretary to the French Academy. His principal works are—"Memoirs on the Manners of the 18th Century," "The History of Louis XI.," and "The Confessions of Count de B * * *."

Born at Dinant, 1705; died 1772.

DUCROW, ANDREW, du-cro', famous equestrian performer and pantomimist, remarkable for grace and daring. He was for many years proprietor of Astley's amphitheatre, and originated the present style of circus performances.

Born 1793; died 1842.

DU DEFFAND, MARIE DE VICHY, CHAMROND, Marquise, def-fahn', member of a noble family of Burgundy, and in her youth distinguished for beauty and wit. She made an unhappy marriage with the Marquis du Deffand, from whom she soon separated, and became a leader in the fashionable and dissolute society of the period. Her salon was frequented by all the leading wits of Paris, and she corresponded with Horace Walpole, Voltaire, D'Alembert, Montesquieu, and others. Many of her letters have been published. For the last 27 years of her life she was blind.

Born 1697; died 1780.

DUDDON, dud'-don, a river rising near the junction of the counties of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire; and after a course of 20 miles falls into the Irish sea, by a broad estuary nearly dry at low water.

DUDERSTADT, doo'-der-stat, a Prussian town, in Hanover, at the confluence of the Hahle and Breme, 15 miles E. of Gottingen. The old town is fortified, and there are four suburbs. There are an ancient town-house, a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, and a monastery. Pop. 4,500.

DUDEVANT, AMANTINE LUCILE AURORE, madame, dood'-vang, was better known by her assumed name of George Sand. She was a descendant by the father's side of the famous Marshal de Saxe. She was educated at a convent in Paris, and at first intended to become a nun. Having been married at 18, she parted from her husband in her 27th year, and went to Paris to pursue a life of literary independence. There she adopted for a time the costume of a man, and produced, in conjunction with a young student named Jules Sandeau, a novel, called "Rose et Blanche," which met with success. Her next performance, entitled "Indiana," was entirely her own, and it immediately made her celebrated. She affixed the name of George Sand to it, to commemorate her friendship with Sandeau. Thenceforward she wrote voluminously in the region of fiction; but perhaps the best of all her tales is "Consuelo." In 1848 she started a democratic newspaper of her own in Paris; but her views proving unpalatable to the régime of Louis Napoleon, it was suppressed. From that time she mostly wrote for the stage, but not with equal success to that which marked her former efforts in stories of the imagination. One of her latest works was an autobiography. She was considered to be the most eminent female French author of the 19th century.

DUDLEY, dud'-le, a market town and parliamentary borough of Worcestershire, from which it is detached, and surrounded by Staffordshire, 9 miles N.W. of Birmingham. There are four churches; the parish church is dedicated to St. Thomas, and a chapel of ease belonging to it is dedicated to St. Edmund. It has also several dissenting places of worship. The castle is a grand and spacious ruin. It was founded in 760 by Dodo, a Saxon chief, demolished in the Parliamentary Wars, rebuilt and destroyed by fire in 1750. At a little distance from it are the interesting remains of a priory. In the town are a well-endowed free grammar-school and two charity schools. There are vast caverns of limestone and iron and coal mines in the neighbourhood. Manf. Iron, nails, glass, fire-irons, grates, and chain-cables. Pop. 46,233.

DUDLEY, EDMUND, an English statesman, who being, when young, introduced to the court of Henry VII., became one of the favourites of that monarch. In 1494 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Grey, Lord Lisle. In the parliament of 1504 he was speaker of the House of Commons, and, two years afterwards, obtained the stewardship of Hastings. On the king's death, he and Empson were sent to the Tower, and beheaded on Tower-hill.

Born 1462; died 1510.

DUDLEY, JOHN, son of the preceding statesman, was created Viscount Lisle and knight of the Garter, by Henry VIII. In the next reign he was made earl of Warwick. On the execution of Sir Thomas Seymour, he was appointed lord high admiral, and in 1551 was created duke of Northumberland. Pursuing an ambitious policy, he effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guilford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey, the eldest daughter of the duke of Suffolk, and a branch of the royal family. When the days of Edward VI. were drawing to a close, he prevailed upon him to set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession, in favour of Lady Jane, and on his death he caused his daughter-in-law to be proclaimed. An insurrection being raised in favour of Mary, however, she was proclaimed in London, and the duke executed.

Born 1502: died 1553.

DUDLEY, AMBROSE, son of the above, was condemned with his father, but received a pardon. In 1557 he went with his two brothers to the Low Countries, and served in the Spanish army before St. Quentin. In the next reign he was created earl of Warwick. He died of a wound, in defending New-Haven against the French.

Born 1530; died 1589.

DUDLEY, ROBERT, younger brother of the above. (See LEICESTER, Earl of.)

DUDLEY, SIR ROBERT, son of the earl of Leicester by the Lady Douglas Sheffield, though treated by his father as illegitimate, yet was left the bulk of his estate, after the death of his uncle Ambrose. In 1594 he made a voyage to the South Seas, and, in the following year, commenced a suit to prove his legitimacy; but the countess dowager of Leicester filing an information against him for a conspiracy, he went to Florence, where the grand-duke appointed him chamberlain to his wife, the archduchess of Austria, sister to Ferdinand II. That emperor created him a duke of the holy Roman empire, on which he assumed the title of duke of Northumberland. He drained the morass between Pisa and the sea, by which Leghorn became one of the first ports in the world. He wrote several pieces, the chief of which is "Del Arcano del Mare," &c., 1630.

Born at Sheen, in Surrey, 1573; died at Florence, 1639.

DUDLEY, DUD, one of eleven natural children of the earl of Dudley, by Elizabeth Tomlinson. He studied at Oxford, and then turned his attention to the iron manufacture of his native place, which was languishing, and took out a patent for smelting iron with coal instead of wood charcoal, as had been hitherto the practice. When the Civil War broke out, he sided with the Royalists, was taken prisoner, but escaped, and passed the remainder of his life in obscurity and poverty. He published a work on the new method of making iron.

Born at Dudley, 1599; died at St. Helen's, Worcestershire, 1684.

DUENAS, doo-an'-yas, a town in Spain, province of Leon, near the right bank of the Pisuerga. There are a Gothic church, town hall, prison, and large cemetery. The Castella canal passes near the town. Pop. 2,300, chiefly engaged in agriculture and cattle rearing.

DUFRESNE. (See DUCANGE.)

DUFRESNY, CHARLES RIVIÈRE, doo-fres'-ne, a French comic writer, who was descended from Henry IV., to whom he bore considerable resemblance. He possessed great talents for landscape and ornamental gardening, and was, on this account, appointed by Louis XIV. comptroller of the royal gardens. The "grand monarch" also gave him several privileges; amongst which was the monopoly of the manufacture of looking-glasses. This right, however, with others, he soon disposed of for certain sums of ready money, and always managed to be penniless in an exceedingly short space of time. Losing his first wife, he married his laundress, in order to pay the washing-bill due to her.

On leaving the court, he began to write for the theatres with Regnard, and afterwards alone, composing some dramatic pieces, which, though containing much wit, were uneven and irregular in their style." Amongst the best of his works are "L'Esprit de Contradiction," "Le Double Veuvage," "Le Mariage fait et rompu."

Born at Paris, 1648; died 1724.

DUGDALE, SIR WILLIAM, dug'-dail, an English antiquary, who, in 1638, was made a pursuivant-at-arms by the name of Blanche Lyon. He subsequently became Rouge Croix, which gave him a residence in the Herald's College, and opened up the treasures of antiquity to his inspection. He was with Charles I. in several engagements, and in 1642 was created M.A. by the University of Oxford. On the ruin of the royal cause he compounded for his estate, settling in London, where he completed his "Monasticon Anglicanum," in 3 vols. folio. At the Restoration he was made Norroy, and in 1677 Garter king-of-arms, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood, which, on account of his limited estate, he would rather have declined. Besides the "Monasticon," Dugdale wrote the "History of Warwickshire," of which an enlarged edition appeared in 2 vols. folio; the "History of St. Paul's Cathedral;" "the "History of Embanking and Draining of Fens and Marshes;" "Origines Juridicales, or Historical Memoirs of the English Laws," &c.; the "Baronage of England," 3 vols.; a "Short View of the late Troubles in England;" the "Ancient Usage in Bearing of Arms," &c. He was a most laborious man, taking great delight in illustrating the antiquities of his country.

Born at Shustoke, Warwickshire, 1606; died 1686.

DUGUAY TROUIN, RENÉ, doo-goo'-ai-trou-an', French naval officer, who first distinguished himself as a privateer, and as a recognition of his exploits received a command in the royal navy. In 1707 he defeated the English fleet with great loss at the entrance of the Channel, and in 1711 captured Rio Janeiro, which was ransomed by the Portuguese for an immense sum. Duguay was loaded with honours, and in 1731 further distinguished himself against the pirates of the Levant coast.

Born at St. Malo, 1673; died 1736.

DUGUESCLIN, BERTRAND. (See GUESCLIN, DU.)

DUHALDE, JOHN BAPTIST, doo'-hald, a French Jesuit, who compiled, from the accounts of the missionaries, an "Historical and Geographical Description of the Empire of China and Chinese Tartary."

DUMANGOS, doo-man-gos', a town of the island of Pana, one of the Philippines. Rice is extensively grown in the vicinity. Pop. 25,000.

DUMARAN, doo'-mar-an, one of the Philippine Islands. It is about 17 miles long, by the same breadth. Lat. 10° 30′ N. Lon. 120° E. It has a town on the S. coast, with a population of about 2,000.

DUMAS, LOUIS, doo'-ma, an ingenious Frenchman, who was bred to the law, but applied himself to mathematical and mechanical studies, inventing an instrument called the bureau typographique, to teach children reading and writing mechanically. He also devised another for instructing them in music, and wrote works on those subjects explanatory of his method.

Born at Nimes, 1676; died 1744.

DUMAS, ALEXANDRE, one of the most fertile French dramatists and romancists, was the son of a republican general, and, by the grandmother's side, of negro descent. His father died when he was a child, and he received but an imperfect education. He went to Paris, and at the age of 23 made his first attempt in literature, and rapidly rose into fame. His dramas numbered more than eighty, and his novels more than forty. He employed a number of poor literary hacks, who elaborated the romances he slightly sketched, and who received small pay, while he had all the credit and emolument of the productions. Among the most famous of these productions are "Les Trois Mousquetaires," and "Le Comte Monte-Cristo." Altogether he published about 1,200 volumes, many of them representing a low state of morals, rather repulsive than attractive to the general tone of English sentiment. He also wrote "Impressions of Voyages," and his "Memoirs," which were commenced in 1852, and by 1856 had extended to twenty-seven volumes.

Born at Villiers Cotterets, in the department of the Aisne, 1802; died 1870.

DUMAS, ALEXANDRE, son of the preceding, novelist and dramatist, commonly known as Dumas Fils, or, the Younger. He is a prolific writer, but the morale of his productions may be judged by his "La Dame aux Camélias" (on which is founded the opera, "La Traviata,"), "Le Demi-Monde," and many dramas very popular on the French stage, but very repulsive to English views of the proprieties of social life.

Born in Paris, 1824.

DUMAS, JEAN BAPTISTE, a distinguished French chemist and botanist, who, in 1823, received the appointment of demonstrator of chemistry at the Polytechnic School, and was also made professor of chemistry at the Athénée of Paris. From this period the science of organic chemistry stands deeply indebted to his exertions. In 1829 he founded the Central School of Arts and Manufactures, and, in 1834, became professor of organic chemistry in the School of Medicine. In 1845 he was made president of the Society for the Encouragement of Industry, and, in 1849, received the porte-feuille of Agriculture and Commerce. In 1851 he acted as vice-president of the Great Exhibition in London, and subsequently became vice-president of the superior council of public instruction in France. He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1875.

Born at Alais, in the department of Gard, 1800.

DUMBARTON, or DUNBARTON, the chief town of Dumbartonshire, a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh and seaport, near the confluence of the Leven with the Clyde, 15 miles N.W. of Glasgow. It consists principally of one well-paved street, and has a capacious church, with a handsome spire. Manf. Machinery, iron, glass, and rope. Pop. 14,172.—A station on the North British railway. There is regular communication by steamboat with Glasgow and Greenock.—The ancient castle of Dumbarton crowns a lofty and precipitous rock, 560 feet high, which rises abruptly from a level plain at the confluence of the Clyde and Leven, by which its base is washed on two sides. It was from this castle that Mary, Queen of Scots, whilst yet a child, was conveyed to France; and it was to it that her friends intended to conduct her, after her escape from Lochleven. It is one of the four fortresses stipulated, in the articles of the Union, to be kept in repair. In 1847 it was visited by her majesty, Queen Victoria.

DUMBARTONSHIRE (anciently Lennox), a county in the W. of Scotland. It has 35 miles of coast, that on the Clyde being generally low and sandy. A portion of the W. border is formed by Loch Long, and on the E. side for 24 miles in Loch Lomond. The north of the county is mountainous, Ben Voirloch rising to 3,300 feet. The scenery is very remarkable, the climate mild and moist. There are extensive woods and good arable land to the south of Loch Lomond and along the banks of the Clyde. The chief crops are oats, wheat, barley, turnips, beans, and potatoes. The Clyde runs along the south border and receives the Leven, the outlet of Loch Lomond, and there are numerous smaller streams and lakes. Cattle and sheep are reared in all parts of the county.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, limestone, and slate.
Area.—297 square miles.
Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

DUMDUM, dum'-dum, a town and cantonment of British India, 8 miles N.E. of Calcutta. It has a cannon-foundry, and is the head-quarters of the Bengal artillery.

DUMFRIES, a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh, and port, the capital of Dumfriesshire, stands on the Nith, over which are two bridges; 9 miles from its point of discharge is the Solway Frith. On the opposite side of the river is a large suburb, Maxwellton. The town consists of several streets, the principal of which runs parallel to the river. There are three Established, four other Presbyterian churches, several other places of worship, an hospital, infirmary, and lunatic asylum. The other public edifices are a town-house, a county gaol and court-house, an academy, theatre, assembly-rooms, and several associations, with libraries, reading-rooms, a mechanics' institute, and an observatory. In the centre of the town is a building known as the Mid Steeple, built by Inigo Jones, in which the meetings of the town council are held, and in Queensberry-square is a Doric column erected in honour of Charles, duke of Queensberry. Manf. Hosiery, hats, baskets, leather, and shoes. These articles are exported, with freestone, sheep, and grain. Pop. 17,092.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western and Caledonian railways.—Dumfries was exposed to repeated calamities, from the invasions of the English during the border wars. In this town, John Comyr, the competitor for the Scottish throne, was, in 1305, stabbed by Robert Bruce. In the churchyard of St. Michael's, Robert Burns, the Scottish poet, is buried; and a monument is there erected to his memory. He was for several years an officer of excise in the town, and the street where he resided is now known by his name.

DUMFRIESSHIRE, dum-frees'-sheer, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by the county of Lanark; E. by those of Peebles, Selkirk, and Roxburgh; S. by the Solway Frith and the English border; and W. by the counties of Kirkcudbright and Ayr. A large portion of the country is mountainous, rising, in Hartfelt, to 2,635 feet, barren, and covered with heath; but in the dales of the Nith, the Annan, and the Esk, it is fertile. There are rich alluvial tracts along the rivers and the Solway. Independently of the Solway Frith, it is watered by the Nith, the Annan, the Esk, and many tributary streams. There are also several small lakes; and sulphurous and chalybeate springs at Moffat and Hartfell. The usual crops are produced; and a great many cattle, sheep, and pigs are reared.

Minerals.—Lead, iron, silver, and some gold. Coal and lime are abundant.
Area.—1103 square miles.
Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

DUMMOW, dum'-mo, a town of India, in the division of Jubbulpore, Central Provinces. There is a large bazaar. Lat. 23° 50′ N. Lon. 79° 30′ E.

DUMONT, PIERRE ETIENNE LOUIS, doo'-maung, a Swiss divine, who became minister of the Protestant church in Geneva, was for a short period minister of the French Protestant church in St. Petersburg, and afterwards went to London, where he was tutor to the sons of Lord Shelburne, and became acquainted with Sir Samuel Romilly and other eminent men. After a visit to France (where he formed the friendship of Mirabeau), he returned, and became the editor of several of the treatises of Jeremy Bentham, from pure admiration of the wisdom of that philosopher. In 1814 he returned to Geneva, and became a member of its representative council in Milan; and there, on the panopticon plan of Mr. Bentham, had a prison erected, in 1824.

Born at Geneva, 1759; died 1825.

DUMONT D'URVILLE, JULES SÉBASTIEN CÉSAR, door'-veel, a French naturalist and navigator. Being commissioned by Charles X. of France, in 1826, to go in search of La Perouse, the French navigator, and his companions, he took the command of the frigate Astrolabe, and was so far successful as to obtain a knowledge of the fate of these voyagers. Whilst engaged in this duty, he made some important surveys of the coasts of various islands in Australasia and the Eastern seas. An account of his labours was published in 1830, and is esteemed as a valuable contribution to science. In 1837 he proceeded on a voyage to the south pole, and penetrated to lat. 64° 20′ S.; lon. 184° 18′ E. On his return he published an account of his expedition. He was killed in a railway accident between Versailles and Meudon.

Born 1790; died 1842.

DUMOURIEZ, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, doo-moor'-e-ai, an officer in the French military service, who, at an early age, served in the Seven Years' War, and was afterwards commandant at Cherbourg, where he commenced the formation of a great naval establishment. At the commencement of the great revolution he espoused the liberal side, although attached to the constitutional monarchy of 1791. Suspected by those whose political principles were more violent, he retired from internal politics, and took service under Marshal Luckner, then fighting against the Austrians on the northern frontier. Here he soon distinguished himself, and, receiving the command of the army opposed to the duke of Brunswick, took up a position in the forest of Argonne, which enabled Kellermann to beat the Prussians at Valmy, and saved France from invasion. He next entered Flanders, won the battle of Jemmapes, took Liège, Antwerp, and a large portion of the country; but was compelled to return to Paris on the trial of Louis XVI. After the execution of that monarch, he resumed his command, entered Holland, and took Breda; but was defeated at Neerwinde and Louvain. As he still wished for a return of the government to constitutional monarchy, he displeased, because he was averse to the proceedings of, the Convention against the Belgians, and entered into secret negotiations with the enemy, which brought an accusation of treason against him, when, with several of his officers, he fled to the Austrian head-quarters. His ideas of a constitutional monarchy, however, were not conformable to the notions of the allies, and he refused to serve against his country. He now wandered through several parts of the continent, with a price set upon his head, and at length crossed to England; but was thence driven by the operation of the Alien Act. He then took refuge in Hamburg, where he remained for some time; but again returned to England, and, throughout the remainder of his days, enjoyed a pension from the British government.

Born at Cambrai, 1739; died at Henley-upon-Thames, 1823.

DUNA. (See DWINA.)

DUNABURG, or DVINABERG, doo'-na-berg, a fortified town of Russia, on the Dwina, formerly the capital of Polish Livonia. It is considered to be a position of great military importance. There is a large trade, and three fairs are held. Pop. 64,513.

DUNA VECSE, doon'-a-veks, a market-town of Central Hungary, 40 miles S. of Pesth, on the left bank of the Danube. Pop. 8,000.

DUNBAR, WILLIAM, dun'-bar, a Scottish poet, who wrote several beautiful effusions, and, after being almost unknown for 200 years, was resuscitated in his poems, which are now acknowledged to be amongst the most original in his language. He was a preaching friar of the order of St. Francis. He visited England in the reign of James IV., in 1503, and afterwards seems to have been attached to the household of Queen Margaret. His "Thistle and Rose," an allegory celebrating the matrimonial union of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., is a rich specimen of poetical imagery. His writings exhibit a rich fancy and devotional feeling, mingled with shrewdness and remarkable grotesque humour.

Born at Salton, E. Lothian, 1460; died about 1520.

DUNBAR, dun-bar', a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh, and seaport of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire, at the mouth of the Firth of Forth, 29 miles N.E. of Edinburgh. The principal street is broad and spacious. The old harbour is difficult of access, but a new one has been constructed at a cost of £50,000. The town has a parish church, assembly-rooms, town-hall, and public libraries. Manf. Cordage and sail-cloth, paper, tiles, and malt-liquors. Pop. 3,311.—A station on the North British railway. West from the harbour stand some vestiges of the castle, in which, after the battle of Bannockburn, Edward II. took refuge, and afterwards pursued his flight by sea to Berwick. In 1337 Black Agnes, the countess of Dunbar, defended it for nineteen weeks against the earl of Salisbury. Dunbar was erected into a royal burgh by David II.; and here, in 1650, the Scotch royalists were defeated by Cromwell.

DUNBAR, a township of the United States, in Pennsylvania, 8 miles from Union. Pop. 2,100.

DUNBLANE, or DUMBLANE, dum-blain', a city and burgh of barony, in Perthshire, Scotland, on the Allan, 28 miles S.W. of Perth. It consists principally of one street, intersected by lanes. Its cathedral is now in ruins, except the choir, which serves for the parish church. It is supposed to have been erected in the 12th century. Pop. 6,327. —A station on the North British and Caledonian railways. Not far from this place is Sheriffmuir, where, in 1715, a battle was fought between the royal troops and the followers of the Pretender. The town gives the title of viscount, in the peerage of Scotland, to the duke of Leeds.

DUNCAN, ADAM, Lord, dun'-kan, a British admiral, was bred to the sea, and, in 1761, attained the rank of post-captain. Being intimate with Admiral Keppel, the latter appointed him his captain. In 1789, he became rear-admiral; and in 1793, vice-admiral of the blue. In the war he was appointed to the North Sea station, where he blockaded the Dutch in the Texel, till the summer of 1797, when an alarming mutiny broke out in his squadron. His conduct on this occasion was firm, and, notwithstanding the difficulties in which he was placed, he detained the Dutch until he was enabled to meet them in action. An engagement then took place on October 11, off Camperdown, when the Dutch admiral, De Winter, after a brave resistance, was obliged to strike. Eight ships were taken, two of which carried flags. For this service the gallant admiral received the thanks of parliament, was created Viscount Duncan of Camperdown, and Baron Duncan of Lundie, in the shire of Perth. An annual pension, also, of £2,000 was granted him, and the two next heirs of the peerage. In 1709 he was promoted to the rank of admiral of the white.

Born at Dundee, Scotland, 1731; died 1804.

DUNCANSBY HEAD, dun'-kans-be, the N.E. headland of Scotland, in the county of Caithness, 1¼ miles E. of John o' Groat's House. Lat. 58° 39' N. Lon. 3° 1' W.

DUNDALK, dun-dawlk', a parliamentary and municipal borough and seaport of Ireland, in the county of Louth, on the Castletown river, at the mouth of a bay in the Irish Channel, 50 miles N. of Dublin. It consists principally of one wide street, intersected by many lanes, and has a good harbour. Among the public buildings are a market-house, court-house, exchange buildings, gaol, guild-hall, barracks, schools, and several churches. Manf. Leather, soap, tobacco, starch, and salt. There are a distillery, brewery, flax-mills, and considerable fisheries. Pop. 11,913. A station on the Northern of Ireland Railway. There are a Druidical circle, and the remains of a Franciscan friary. King Edward Bruce, brother of Robert, king of Scotland, was slain in battle near Dundalk, and buried near the town, at a place called Faughart. Dundalk was captured by the Irish in 1641; by Cromwell in 1649, and by Schomberg in 1689.

DUNDALK BAY extends about 8 miles inland, and is about the same in width.

DUNDAS, HENRY, dun-das', Viscount Melville. (See MELVILLE.)

DUNDAS ISLANDS, a group lying off the E. coast of Africa, between the equator and lat. 1° 30' S. They comprise nearly 500 coral islets.

DUNDAS STRAIT, a strait in N. Australia, separating Victoria Peninsula from Melville Island. It is 18 miles across.

DUNDEE, dun-de', a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh and seaport of Forfarshire, Scotland, on the left bank of the estuary of the Tay, about 10 miles from the open sea, and 50 miles N. of Edinburgh. It is large and well built, consisting of several principal streets, diverging from the market-place or High-street, which is a spacious square, 360 feet long by 100 broad. There are, besides, various smaller streets, which are generally narrow. Suburbs consisting chiefly of handsome villas, stretch along the bank of the Tay. The Town churches are three parish churches built around an ancient tower, the only remaining portion of an edifice destroyed by fire. The tower, 156 feet high, was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott in 1873. St. Paul's Episcopal church has a spire 217 feet high; St. Paul's Free church, a spire 167 feet high; and St. Enoch's Free church, two lofty towers. The town-hall, a handsome building in the Roman Ionic style, with a tower 140 feet high, was built in 1734; and among the finer buildings are the royal exchange, in the Flemish pointed style, opened in 1856; the Albert Institute and Free Library, erected from the designs of Sir Gilbert Scott, at a cost of £30,000, the large corn-exchange, the justiciary and sheriff-court buildings, the post-office, the high school, the orphan hospital, and the Morgan hospital, opened in 1868, and erected and endowed at a cost of nearly £80,000, under the will of Mr. John Morgan, a native of Dundee, for the maintenance and education of 100 boys. There is a beautiful public park of 37 acres, at the east of the town, presented by Sir David Baxter, at a cost of £50,000, and opened by Earl Russell in 1863. The slope of the hill of Balgay, to the west of the town, about 60 acres, is laid out as a park and cemetery, and there are three other cemeteries. There are a literary institution, and numerous charitable institutions. The harbour accommodation includes four wet docks. The last constructed, the magnificent Victoria Dock, was opened by Lord Strathmore, in August, 1875. About a million and a quarter have been recently spent on the harbour-works. At the north end of the mid quay is the royal arch, commemorating her Majesty's landing in 1844.

Manf.—Dundee is the chief seat in Great Britain of the manufacture of the coarser kinds of linen, dowlas, canvas, and cordage; and since 1830 has been famous for the manufacture of fabrics from jute, a coarse, strong fibre grown in India, from which bags and sacks, and even handsome carpets are made, about 120,000 being annually consumed. Of this manufacture Dundee has the monopoly, and the products are in demand all over the world. Flax, tow, and hemp are also manufactured, and it is estimated that the products of these materials and jute are of the annual value of considerably over five millions. Confectionery, especially marmalade, is extensively made; and leather-dressing, shoemaking, ship-building, and machine-making are carried on. In connection with the linen, jute, and other textile trades, about 100,000 persons find employment. The whale-fishery, in which about 12 fine screw steamers are employed, and the boiling of the blubber brought back, gives employment to a large number of persons.

Pop.—140,239; the town ranking as the third in Scotland in number of inhabitants.

Lat. 56° 27' N. Lon. 2° 58' W.

Railway and other Communications.—Dundee is a station on the North British, Caledonian, and Highland railway, and is in connection with the Great Northern

There are regular lines of steamers to Leith, Newcastle, Hull, Liverpool, and London.

History.—Dundee was erected into a royal burgh by king William, who began his reign in 1165. Its ancient rights were re-established by a charter of king Robert Bruce, and finally confirmed by the great charter of Charles I. It has frequently suffered from the calamities of war,—was besieged by the duke of Lancaster in 1385; besieged and pillaged by Montrose in 1645; and was taken and given up to pillage and massacre by Monk during the protectorship of Cromwell.

DUNDEE, JOHN GRAHAM, of Claverhouse, Viscount, Scotch royalist, who, having served in the French and Dutch armies, was employed in Scotland against the Covenanters, and made himself conspicuous by his abilities as a soldier and ruthless severity. He was raised to the peerage as Viscount Dundee in 1688. After the accession of William III., he took up arms against the government, and was killed at the battle of Killiecrankie. The Scotch peasants regarded him with superstitious hatred, believing that he was in league with the powers of darkness, and his memory is still execrated. Scott introduces him as a character in "Old Mortality," and makes him the hero of his stirring song, "Bonnie Dundee."

Born 1649; died 1689.

DUNDONALD, THOMAS COCHRANE, Earl of, a British admiral, and tenth earl of this name, entered the naval service at the age of 18, having previously been for a short time in the army. He soon distinguished himself by his bravery, being almost continually engaged in the most difficult and daring enterprises, in boarding vessels, or cutting out rich prizes from beneath the very mouths of the guns in the land fortresses of the enemy. He was appointed to the command of a sloop of war when only 25 years old, and in ten months captured 33 vessels and assisted in the capture of many others. In the following year he captured a large Spanish frigate, and having been appointed to the command of a frigate he made many prizes off the Spanish coast, especially the Fortuna, with specie to the amount of £150,000, and rich merchandise. In 1807 he volunteered to defend the fort Trinidad, on the coast of Catalonia in Spain, and with only 160 men repelled an assault of 1000 of the enemy, and after holding the fort for twelve days, blew up the magazine and returned to his ship. In 1809 he commanded a fleet of fire-ships, with which he destroyed the French fleet in the Basque Roads, for which he was rewarded with the knighthood of the Bath. In 1814 he was charged with having spread a report relative to the abdication of the emperor Napoleon I., which had a great effect on the funds, and which caused him to be brought to trial. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay £1,000, to stand in the pillory, and to undergo one year's imprisonment. When this happened, he was a member of the House of Commons for Westminster. He was therefore deprived of his seat, stripped of the order of the Bath, and struck off the list of captains. These proceedings were iniquitous in the extreme, as they arose almost entirely from his being a radical reformer and strong opponent of the Liverpool-Castlereagh administration. The public were enraged at such a sentence. The punishment of the pillory was remitted, he was immediately re-elected, and his fine paid by public subscription. His prospects of advancement in the service of his country were, however, for the time annihilated. Accordingly, he sought employment abroad, and in 1818 received the command of the fleet of the Chilians, to fight for their independence. In this war he displayed his usual bravery. In 1822 he exchanged the Chilian for the Brazilian service, and, in the following year was made marquis of Maranao by Dom Pedro. On leaving this service he returned to England, and, in 1827 and 1828, assisted the Greeks in their war of independence. By his father's death he now succeeded to the title of Lord Dundonald, and, on the accession of the Whigs to power in 1830, was reinstated in his command in the British navy, and made a rear-admiral. In 1841 he became vice-admiral of the blue, and, in 1847, had his order of the Bath restored to him. In 1851 he became vice-admiral of the white, and in 1854 rear-admiral of the United Kingdom. Being greatly devoted to scientific pursuits, he offered, in 1856, to blow up the walls of Sebastopol during the siege of that fortress; but the committee appointed to consider his plan, rejected it. His life, under the title of "Autobiography of a Seaman, by Thomas, Earl of Dundonald," has been published. As a daring, brilliant, and successful naval commander, he ranks with Nelson. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born 1775; died 1860.

DUNDRUM BAY, dun'-drum, an inlet of the Irish Sea, on the E. coast of Ireland, in the county of Down, 7 miles from Downpatrick. Breadth, at entrance, about 10 miles.

DUNEDIN, dun-e'-din, the capital of the province of Otago, and the most important commercial city in New Zealand, is situated on the east side of South Island, on a picturesque site at the south-western side of a bay running inland, about 9 miles from Port Chalmers, with which it is also connected by a railway. Its streets are well paved and well lighted with gas. It is supplied with water from a reservoir constructed at the head of the Water of Leith Valley. There are three churches of England, four Presbyterian churches, one Wesleyan Methodist, a Baptist, and two or three of the less numerous sects, besides the Roman Catholic church of St. Joseph. An Anglican and a Roman Catholic Bishop have sees here; the Jews have also a synagogue. There are a university, high school, government offices, and provincial council-hall. The Masonic body and Oddfellows each have a hall, besides the Friendly Societies' Hall. There are two theatres, the Princess's and the New Queen's. The former theatre was burnt down in 1875, but has since been re-built. The Botanical and Acclimatization Societies' Gardens are the resort of many promenaders in summer weather. There are also two other recreation grounds, used principally by cricket clubs; and a fine racecourse, one of the best in the colony, near the ocean beach, about two miles from the city; and the city is encircled by a reserve called the Town Belt, through which a carriage drive is being made. The municipal business is conducted by a mayor and twelve councillors, three of whom represent each of the four wards. There is a regular line of steamers between Dunedin and Melbourne, and communication is frequent between all the ports on the coast of New Zealand. The export of wool is very great, amounting to about 14,000,000lbs. annually. The suburbs of Dunedin are Caversham, Rosslyn, Nevada, and Mornington. Pop., including suburbs, 42,802. Lat. 45° 50′ S. Lon. 170° 36′ E.

DUNFERMLINE, dun-ferm'-lin, a town and royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, in the county of Fife, 3 miles N. of the Firth of Forth, and 16 miles N.W. of Edinburgh. It is irregularly built, having been the work of many different periods, and some of the streets are narrow and inconvenient. It has a collegiate church and various other places of worship. The ancient abbey, originally founded in the 11th century, by Malcolm and his queen, was a Benedictine monastery. Of the abbey, the refectory, a tower, and arched gateway remain. The nave of the abbey church is in the Romanesque style, 106 feet long and 55 feet wide. The choir was replaced in 1821 by the present parish church, which has a tower 100 feet high. A portion of the massive palace remains, and there is a mass of ruins known as Malcolm Canmore's Tower. There are a town-hall and county buildings, gaol, several public schools, a mechanics' institute, and a music-hall. Manf. Table-linen, diapers, and damasks. There are also rope, tar, and soap works; collieries, iron-foundries, fire-clay works, breweries, and a tobacco-factory. Pop. 26,568.—A station on the North British Railway.—Here Edward I., of England, stayed for some months in 1304, and on leaving it, set it on fire. King Robert Bruce re-built it, and was buried in it. In 1821 a tomb was discovered, supposed to have contained his body.

DUNGANNON, dun-gan'-non, a parliamentary and municipal borough of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone, 11 miles N.W. of Armagh. It has a church, an hospital, a court, market-house, and bridewell. Manf. Linen, earthenware, and firebrick, and there are large lime-quarries and collieries in Ulster. Pop. 3,955.—This was the principal seat of the kings of Ulster till 1607, when the last of these sovereign chiefs was forced to flee from his country, leaving his possessions to be presented to Sir Arthur Chichester by James I.

DUNGARVAN, dun-gar'-van, a parliamentary and municipal borough and seaport of Ireland, in the county of Waterford, on a bay of the same name, 25 miles S.W. of Waterford. Its chief edifices are a parish church, several Catholic chapels, a convent, castle, barracks, bridewell, and market-house. There are the remains of an Augustinian abbey, founded in the 7th century, and of the walls built by King John. The town is now a fashionable bathing place. It exports grain, butter, and cattle; but its inhabitants are principally supported by herring fisheries. Pop. 6,234.

DUNGENESS, dun-je-ness', a cape or headland on the coast of Kent. It is defended by a fort, and has a lighthouse in lat. 50° 55′ N.; lon. 0° 58′ E.

DUNKELD, dun-keld', a city and burgh of barony in the east of Perthshire, Scotland, on the left bank of the Tay, crossed by a fine bridge, 15 miles N.W. of Perth. It is of great antiquity, and is said to have been the seat of the Pictish kings. The town is not well built. The scenery around it, however, has been long the object of admiration to all strangers. Here are the ruins of a cathedral built in the 14th century, the choir of which now serves for the parish church. In the neighbourhood is the duke of Athol's seat, with very extensive and beautiful grounds, in which are still shown the two first larches introduced into Britain. They were brought, in 1738, from the Tyrol. Manf. The principal are linen and yarn. Pop. 900.

DUNKIRK, or DUNKERQUE, dun'-kirk, "the church on the downs," so called from sand-banks on the coast, a fortified seaport-town of France, in the department Nord, 43 miles N.W. of Lille. It is, in general, well built, and has several churches, among them that of St. Eloi, the body of which is Gothic, and the portico of the Corinthian order; a theatre, concert-hall, hospitals, a college, public library, military prison, and is defended by a citadel. The barracks are extensive and elegant, but the churches are less remarkable for architecture than for the paintings they contain. A very fine palace of justice was built in 1864, at a cost of £20,000. The harbour is shallow and difficult of entrance, but there is a large and safe roadstead. Manf. Soap, starch, beet-root sugar, leather, and cordage. There are, besides, iron-works, distilleries, salt-refineries, and ship-building yards. The trade by sea is very considerable, and the cod and herring fisheries productive. Pop. 34,769.—In 1388 this town was burned by the English; after which period its possession was repeatedly contested by the French and Spanish. In 1658 it was given up to the English by Turenne; and, in 1662, sold by Charles II. to Louis XIV., for £200,000. In 1793 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the allies, under the duke of York. It was made a free port in 1826.

DUNKLIN, a county of Missouri, United States, bordering on Arkansas. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 9,604. The capital is Kennet.

DUNMANUS BAY, dun-ma'-nus, an inlet on the coast of the county of Cork, Ireland, between Sheep Head on the N., and Three Castle Head on the S., a breadth of about three miles. It is about 12 miles long, and separated by a narrow peninsula from Bantry Bay.

DUNMANWAY, a town in the county of Cork, Ireland, near the junction of the three streams that form the Brandon river. Brewing and tanning are carried on, and there is a good trade in corn. Pop. 2,100.

DUNMOW, GREAT, dun'-mow, an ancient town of Essex, 32 miles from London. A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

DUNMOW, LITTLE, a village and parish of Essex, 2 miles S.E. of Great Dunmow. Here a flitch of bacon was given to any married couple who, having been married a year and a day, will swear that they have not quarrelled once in that time, or repented of their alliance. Recent and not very successful attempts have been made to revive the custom.

DUNNET HEAD, dun'-net, the N. extremity of Great Britain, on the N. coast of Caithness, having on it a lighthouse, 340 feet above the sea. Lat. 58° 40′ N. Lon. 3° 21′ W.

DUNNING, JOHN, dun'-ning, Lord Ashburton, an eminent lawyer, was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After studying under his father some time, he entered the Middle Temple in 1752, and in 1756 was called to the bar. He soon rose to distinction in his profession, and obtained a seat in parliament, where he distinguished himself on the side of the opposition. He was counsel for the East India Company against the Dutch, and obtained great popularity by his defence of Wilkes. Afterwards he became solicitor-general, recorder of Bristol, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1782 he was created Lord Ashburton, but died in the following year. His lordship was an upright lawyer, and often pleaded the cause of the poor, unsolicited, and without a fee.

Born at Ashburton, Devonshire, 1731; died 1783.

DUNOIS, JEAN, doo'-nwaw, count of Longueville, and called the "Bastard of Orleans," grand chamberlain of France, was a natural son of Louis, duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI. At a very early age he distinguished himself by his great bravery, and defeated the English in 1427, at Montargis. At the siege of Orleans, he shared the laurels of success with Joan of Arc, and in 1429 contributed greatly to the victory at Patay. The same year he brought under the royal authority the town of Chartres, and in 1436 re-occupied Paris, which had been taken by the English. After these considerable services to the state, he sullied his fair fame by engaging in a conspiracy against Charles VII., and instigating against that king the revolt of his son, afterwards Louis XI. He repaired his disloyalty, however, by throwing himself at the feet of the former monarch, and caused all to be forgotten in his devotion at the sieges of Harfleur, Gallardon, and Dieppe. In 1444 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and, from this time to 1450, was engaged against the English, who were now driven out of both Normandy and Guienne. Soon after Louis XI. came to the throne, Dunois was deprived of his offices and estates, which were, however, afterwards restored to him. He was appointed, for his services, grand chamberlain.

DUNOON, dun'oon', a favourite watering place of Scotland, on the W. side of the Firth of Clyde, 8 miles W. of Greenock. A ruinous fragment of Dunoon Castle, once a royal fastness and palace, is near the pier. Pop. 3,756.

DUNS, JOHN, duns, commonly called Duns Scotus, a famous Franciscan divine, the place of whose birth is uncertain, and has been much disputed. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1301 became professor of theology. He was so distinguished by his eloquence, that it is said 30,000 scholars came to listen to his precepts. In 1304 he went to Paris, where he acquired a great reputation as a disputant, and was called the "subtle doctor." He opposed the notions of Thomas Aquinas, which produced two parties, the Thomists and the Scotists. Some of his followers, who did not possess equal ability, made themselves so conspicuous by the substitution of mere scholastic jargon for philosophical reasoning, that the epithet "duns," modernized into "dunce," was applied to them.

DUNSE, dunce, a burgh of barony of Berwickshire, in Scotland, 13 miles W. of Berwick-on-Tweed, on the Whitadder. It is well built, and has an elegant town-house, a parish church, and several chapels for dissenters. Pop. 2,618.—A station on the North British Railway.

DUNSTABLE, dun'-sta-bel, a town of Bedfordshire, situate at the base of the Chiltern Hills, 18 miles S.W. of Bedford. The parish church is a portion of a priory of Black Friars founded in the 12th century. Manf. The plaiting of straw is carried on to a great extent, and it may be regarded as the principal seat of that manufacture in Britain. Pop. 4,558.—A station on the Great Northern and London and North-Western Railways.

DUNSTAN, ST., dun'-stan, Anglo-Norman ecclesiastic and statesman. He was of noble birth, and remotely related to the royal family. He studied for the priesthood, and distinguished himself not only by erudition but by proficiency as a musician, painter, and adept in the mechanical arts. Having taken the clerical habit, he was introduced to king Athelstan, but his abilities excited the envy of others about the court, who charged him with sorcery, and procured his dismissal. He then retired to Glastonbury, where he pursued his studies and exercised himself in mechanical pursuits in private. He lived and worked in a small cell, and his seclusion gave rise to many absurd stories, especially the famous legend of his seizing the devil by the nose with red-hot smith's tongs. On the accession of Edmund in 940 he was recalled to court, but again encountered opposition, for which he was consoled by being appointed abbot of Glastonbury. During the nine years of the reign of Edred, Dunstan was in great favour, and exhibited remarkable energy in directing the affairs of the kingdom. On the succession of Edwy in 955, Dunstan, having seriously offended him, was deprived of his office and banished, and the Benedictine monks whom he had introduced were driven out of the monastery. Dunstan fled to Flanders; but three years afterwards Edwy died, and was succeeded by his brother Edgar, a lad of 15, who became a passive instrument in the hands of Dunstan, who returned and assumed the chief control of the government. He enforced celibacy of the clergy, depriving all married priests of their benefices, increased the fleet, and so repelled the northern pirates, and established a firm, if severe, system of administration. In 960 he was made archbishop of Canterbury. After Edgar's death, Dunstan was appointed regent during the minority of the young king Edward, who was assassinated by order of his stepmother Elfrida. Under the new king, Ethelred, Dunstan lost his influence and died, it is said from grief and disappointment. He was a man of remarkable energy, and devoted his great abilities to establishing the supremacy of Rome over the Anglo-Saxon Church and government.

Born near Glastonbury, 925; died at Canterbury, 988.

DUNTON, JOHN, dun'-ton, a noted bookseller, who published the "Athenian Mercury," which was reprinted in 4 vols. 8vo, under the title of the "Athenian Oracle." In 1710 appeared the "Projects of Mr. John Dunton." He also wrote a book called "Dunton's Life and Errors," which abounds in literary history of a curious kind.

Born in Huntingdonshire, 1659; died 1733.

DU PAGE, du paij, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 342 square miles. Pop. 19,160.

DUPERREY, LOUIS ISIDORE, doo'-pair-re, a French hydrographer, who in 1817 made a voyage in the North Pacific Ocean, and mapped the Ladrone Islands and several others; but, whilst engaged in his duties suffered shipwreck among the Sandwich Islands, in 1820. After remaining ten weeks on an island, he and the crew were taken by an American ship to Monte Video, whence he returned to France in the same year. He was subsequently engaged in making surveys in the South Pacific, and afterwards published the result of his expeditions, which are regarded as valuable contributions to the physical sciences of the South Seas.

Born at Paris, 1786.

DUPETIT THOUARS, ARISTIDE AUBERT, doo-pe-te'-tou'-ar, French naval captain, who greatly distinguished himself against the English in the West Indies, and afterwards fitted out a vessel to search for La Perouse, and carry on the fur trade on the N.W. coast of America. He was taken prisoner by the Portuguese, and kept in a dungeon at Lisbon, from which he escaped and went to America, where he made two attempts to reach the North West by land. On his return to France he commanded an 80-gun ship in the expedition to Egypt, and was killed in the naval battle of Aboukir.

Born near Saumer, 1760; died 1798.

DUPIN, LOUIS ELLIES, doo'-pa, a French writer, who, about 1684, commenced his valuable work entitled "Bibliothèque Universelle des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques," &c., or "History of Ecclesiastical Writers," which, notwithstanding its general excellence, was much censured by zealous Romanists for some freedom of sentiment, which the author was compelled to retract. He afterwards became involved in a profitless dispute with Dr. Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, on a projected union between the English and Gallican churches. Besides the above work, he wrote several others on the Scriptures, church government, and practical divinity.

Born at Paris, 1657; died 1719.

DUPIN, ANDRÉ MARIE JEAN JACQUES, French statesman and lawyer, who, in 1815, became a member of the Chamber of Representatives, and opposed the proposal to proclaim the son of Napoleon I., emperor, under the title of Napoleon II. In the same year he was united with Berryer in the defence of Marshal Ney. Subsequently, he defended several others, among whom may be named Béranger, in 1821, from the vengeance of arbitrary power. In 1826 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and assisted by his influence and opposition to produce the revolution of 1830. In the same year he was made procureur-général of the Court of Cassation, and, in 1832, became president of the Chamber of Deputies, to which office he was re-elected seven times. After the forced abdication of Louis Philippe, in 1848, he proposed the young count of Paris to be king of the French, but failed in this attempt to stem the republican tide. He then endeavoured to form a new government, and, in the following year, became president of the Legislative Assembly. During this stormy period of political vicissitude, his conduct was marked by great firmness and courage. In 1852, when the decrees confiscating the property of the House of Orleans was published, he resigned his procureur-generalship. In 1857, however, he again accepted the office of procureur-général, and in his address, written at the time, he says, "I have always belonged to France, and never to a party." He has written several valuable works on law, and one book, "Manual of Ecclesiastical Right in France," was censured by the "Congregation of the Index," at Rome.

Born at Varzy, in the department Nièvre, 1783; died 1865.

DUPIN, FRANÇOIS PIERRE CHARLES, Baron, brother of the above, entered the French navy in 1803, as an engineer, and, after performing some services in the Mediterranean, become professor of mechanics and the physical sciences in the Ionian Academy, which he assisted in forming, at Corfu. In 1812 he returned to Paris, and, in 1813, instituted the maritime museum at Toulon. After the peace of 1815, he visited Great Britain, for the purpose of examining the public engineering-works, and afterwards published the results of his examinations. In 1824 he was raised to the rank of baron, and in 1828 was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, as representative for the department of Tarn, and after the revolution of 1830, represented Seine. When the change of 1848 was effected, he became a representative in the Constituent Assembly, and also in the Legislative Assembly. After the revolution of 1851, he became a senator. In 1851 he was president of the French jury at the Great Exhibition in London. He has written a great number of important works connected with the science of engineering.

Born at Varzy, 1784.

DUPLEIX, SCIPIO, doo-plai', historiographer of France, wrote a work on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he presented to the chancellor Seguier to be licensed, but that magistrate threw it into the fire. This so preyed upon his mind, that he died. Besides the above, he produced "Memoirs of the Gauls," "History of France," "Roman History," "A Course of Philosophy," &c.

Born at Condom, 1569; died 1661.

DUPLEIX, JOSEPH, Marquis, a celebrated Frenchman, who, in 1730, was sent as director of the colony of Chandernagore, where he carried on an extensive commerce through all parts of the Indies. In 1742 he was made governor of Pondicherry, which, in 1748, he defended against two English admirals. For this he was created a marquis by the French king, and a nabob by the Mogul. He was recalled, however, in 1754.

DUPLIN, dup'-lin, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 18,773.—The capital is Kenansville.

DUPONT, JACQUES CHARLES, known as DE L'EURE, French statesman, who filled several important offices during the Revolution and the Empire. He was vice-president of the legislative body, and vice-president of the chamber of representatives after the battle of Waterloo. In 1830 he was appointed minister of justice, but soon resigned office, and became leader of the opposition. At the revolution of February, 1848, he was chosen president of the provisional government.

Born at Neuborg, 1767; died 1855.

DUPRAT, ANTOINE, doo-pra', a French statesman, who became president of the parliament of Paris in 1507, and chancellor of France in 1515. He was also appointed tutor to the count of Angoulême, afterwards Francis I., and was the author of the famous "Concordat," which rendered him so acceptable to the court of Rome, that he obtained several ecclesiastical preferments and a cardinalship.

Born 1463; died 1535.

DUPRÉ DE ST. MAUR, NICHOLAS FRANCIS, doo'-prai, a French writer, who was a member of the Academy of Paris, and translated into French Milton's "Paradise Lost." He also wrote an essay on the coins of France, "Inquiries concerning the Value of Moneys," &c.

Died at Paris, 1775.

DUPUIS, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, doo-pwé', French author and philosopher. He was the son of a poor schoolmaster, and studied at the College of Harcourt, with such distinction that, at the age of 24, he was made professor of rhetoric at Lisieux. He afterwards was appointed professor of eloquence in the College of France, member of the Academy of Inscriptions and of the commission of public instruction. When the revolution broke out, he was a member of the Convention, of the Council of Five Hundred, and subsequently of the legislative body. His most famous works are a treatise on the origin of constellations and the explanation of fable by astronomy—a work on the origin of all worship and the universal religion, which led to the commission appointed by Napoleon to explore Upper Egypt; and a chronological and mythological explanation of the Zodiac.

Born near Chaumont, 1742; died 1809.

DUPUYTREN, GUILLAUME, le Baron, doo-pwé'-tren, a distinguished French surgeon and anatomist, who invented several surgical instruments, and greatly extended the limits of his profession by the scientific character which he gave to his clinical instructions. In 1820 Louis XVIII. conferred on him the title of baron, and in 1823 appointed him royal surgeon. He wrote very little, but, on the evening before he expired, desired that a medical paper might be read to him, "that he might carry," said he, "the latest news of disease out of the world." Whilst pursuing his studies, Dupuytren was so poor that he could hardly obtain the means of keeping life in his body; yet he bequeathed a fortune of £280,000 to an only daughter, and £8,000 for the endowment of a pathological and anatomical chair in Paris.

Born at Pierre-Buffière, in the department of Haute-Vienne, 1777; died in Paris, 1835.

DUQUESNE, Abraham, Marquis, doo-kain', a celebrated French seaman, first went to sea under his father, who was in the service. He distinguished himself at so early an age, that at 17 he had the command of a vessel, in which he fought several successful actions with the Spaniards. In the troubles which occurred in France during the minority of Louis XIV., he was in the service of Sweden, and defeated the Danish fleet commanded by King Christian IV., near Gothenburg. Recalled to France in 1647, he got together a squadron at his own expense, and was engaged several times both with the English and Spanish. In the French war of 1672 with Holland, Louis XIV. sent him against De Ruyter, and Duquesne defeated him in a terrible engagement near Messina, in 1676. He afterwards gained great successes against the pirates in the Mediterranean, and humbled the dey of Algiers. Being a Protestant, Louis XIV. did not raise him to those high positions which his services entitled him to; and thus he never became an admiral; but was made a marquis, and especially exempted from the decree of banishment issued against all Protestants.

Born at Dieppe, 1610; died 1688.

DURAN, Don Augustin, door'-an, a modern Spanish critical and miscellaneous writer, who has made some excellent collections of the romances of his native country, and acquired considerable fame by some of his own poetical imitations of old ballads.

Born at Madrid about 1793.

DURANCE, doo'-rans, a river of France, rising near Mont Genèvre, in the Hautes-Alpes, and, after a course of 180 miles, joining the Rhone three miles below Avignon.

DURAND, Jean Nicholas Louis, doo'-rant, an eminent French architect, who, in 1780, obtained the great prize for an architectural design from the Royal Academy of Architecture in Paris. He afterwards became professor of architecture in the Polytechnic School, and produced several works illustrative of his art. These are not now considered very valuable, although they have been greatly commended.

Born at Paris, 1760; died 1834.

DURANGO, doo-ran'-go, a city of Mexico, the chief town of a state of the same name, built at an elevation of nearly 7,000 feet. The principal edifices are a cathedral, theatre, a mint, and several convents. Manf. Iron, wood, wool and leather. Pop. of the state, 196,852; the city, 27,119.

DURANGO, a town of Spain, in the province of Biscay, 13 miles S.E. of Bilboa. Manf. Leather and hardware. Pop. 2,200.

DURANTE, Jean Etienne, doo-rant', first president of the parliament of Toulouse, in 1581, and murdered by the Leaguers. He wrote "De Ritibus Ecclesiæ," printed at Rome in 1591.

DURAZZO, doo-ratz'-o, a fortified seaport-town of European Turkey, on the coast of Albania, on the peninsula of Peli, in the Adriatic. There is a considerable trade in grain and oil. Pop. 1,200. This is the ancient Epidamnus, the expulsion of the aristocracy of which, 436 B.C., was the origin of the Peloponnesian war.

DURBAN, dur-ban, a port of the colony of Natal, South Africa. There is a harbour with a lighthouse. It is the oldest town in the colony, having been founded in 1842. Pop. 17,127. Lat. 29° 50′ S. Lon. 31° 10′ E.

DUREN, doo'-ren, a town of Prussia, on the Roer, 18 miles E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. It is surrounded by walls, is the seat of several courts and public offices, and has both Protestant and Catholic churches of fine architecture, a gymnasium, and three nunneries. Manf. Woollens, paper, leather, iron and steel wares. Pop. 12,800.—This was a Roman town, and is mentioned by Tacitus by the name of Marcodurum. Charlemagne here defeated the Saxons. In 1594 it was taken by the French, and, in 1815, given to Prussia.

DURER, Albert, doo'-rer, an eminent German painter and engraver on wood, was the son of a goldsmith in Nurenberg, who instructed him in his art. At an early age, Albert showed such remarkable artistic talent, that he was apprenticed to Wohlgemuth, an artist of Nurenberg. He afterwards travelled in Germany and Italy, and acquired the friendship of Raffaelle, and on his return, the emperors Maximilian I. and Charles V. appointed him their artist, and conferred upon him rank and riches. His best historical paintings are in the collections of Dresden, Vienna, Munich, and Prague. He raised wood engraving to the dignity of an art, and produced nearly 300 engravings, which are among the choicest treasures of connoisseurs. He was also the first who printed woodcuts in two colours. Durer wrote a book on the rules of painting, and some other works; and, since the revival of German art, he is looked upon as its great exemplar. He was an earnest and religious man, and an ardent advocate of the doctrines of the Reformation. His death was the result of consumption.

Born at Nurenberg, 1471; died 1528.

D'URFEY, Thomas, dur'-fe, a facetious English poet, who wrote a number of plays and songs, which are very licentious. Charles II. was wont to lean upon his shoulders, and hum the tunes of some of his songs. His effusions however, on account of their looseness, are now justly forgotten. He resided frequently with the earl of Dorset at Knowle, where is a portrait of him, painted when he was asleep, after dinner; for he had such an ordinary visage, that he could not bear to have his likeness taken. His ballads, &c., were printed under the title of "Pills to purge Melancholy." He died in poverty.

Born at Exeter, 1628; died in London, 1723.

DURHAM, dur'-ham, a maritime county of England, bounded N. by Northumberland, E. by the German Ocean, S. by Yorkshire, from which it is separated by the river Tees, and W. by the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. It has a coast-line of 32 miles, generally low. It is mountainous and heathy in the W., where are branches of the Pennine chain, the loftiest peaks being Kilhope Law, 2,196 feet; Collier Law, 1,678, and Pontop Pike, 1,018. The most fertile portions of the county are found in the valleys, watered by numerous streams.

Rivers.—Derwent, Skerne, Wear, Tees, and Tyne.

History.—Durham is part of the Saxon kingdom of Northumbria.

DURHAM, an episcopal city, parliamentary and municipal borough, and capital of the above county, on the Wear, by which it is almost surrounded, 15 miles S. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The river is crossed by several bridges, and an ancient cathedral overhangs its banks, which are laid out in gardens, and beautifully wooded. This venerable structure was commenced in the year 1093, a century after the foundation of the city; and its central tower, which is 214 feet high was erected between 1233 and 1258. The two west towers are each 138 feet high. The cathedral, which contains many ancient monuments, among them the tombs of Sts. Cuthbert and Bede, was restored in the last century and again recently. It is 507 long, by 200 feet wide. Near the cathedral, on the summit of the same hill, is the castle, founded in 1072, and now the university of Durham. The university was opened in 1833. A college was founded in 1290, but abolished at the dissolution of monastic houses, in the reign of Henry VIII. Besides the cathedral, Durham contains seven parish churches, and other places of worship, a county infirmary, a gaol, almshouses, public libraries, assembly-rooms, a mechanics' institute, and several charitable houses. Manf. Woollens, hats, iron and brass goods. Pop. 14,932. Lat. 54° 56′ N. Lon. 1° 35′ W.—A station on the North-Eastern railway.

DURHAM, JOHN GEORGE LAMBTON, Earl of, was educated at Eton, and, in 1814, became member of parliament for the county of Durham. In 1828 he was raised to the peerage, by the title of Baron Durham, of the city of Durham, and, in 1830, became prominently connected with the reform agitation. In the same year he was made lord privy seal, under the administration of Earl Grey. In framing the Reform Bill at that time, he proposed the introduction of the ballot; but this was rejected. In 1833 he resigned his office in the government, and was created earl of Durham. In the same year he was sent on a special mission to Russia, and, on his return, differed from his colleagues, but was, in 1835, again sent to Russia, where he remained for two years, and became an especial favourite with the emperor of that country. In 1839 he was sent as governor-general, with extraordinary powers, to Canada; but conceiving himself not supported in his measures by the home government, he returned, without being recalled, in the next year. For this step he was rebuked, and not permitted to land under the usual salute. This may be regarded as the close of his public life.

Born at Lambton Castle, Durham, 1792; died at Cowes, Isle of Wight, 1840.

DURIAN, STRAIT OF, du-ri-an', between the E. coast of Sumatra and the island of Lingen. It is about 120 miles in length.

DURKHEIM, durk'-hime, a town of Bavaria, at the entrance of the valley of the Isenach, 14 miles S.W. of Mannheim. Manf. Glass and paper. The annual sausage market has been established for about 300 years. The mineral waters are famous. Pop. 5,500.

DURLACH, door'-lak, an old town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Baden, on the river Pfinz, 3 miles E. of Carlsruhe. Manf. Linen, tobacco, chicory, and vinegar; and there are important fruit and grain markets. Pop. 6,400.

DUROC, MICHAEL GÉRARD CHRISTOPHE, Duke of Friuli, doo'-rok, studied in the military academy of Pont-à-Mousson, entered the French army in 1792, and accompanied Napoleon I. to Egypt, where he greatly distinguished himself, but was severely wounded by the bursting of a howitzer. When the imperial court was formed, in 1805, he was made grand-marshal of the palace, and was subsequently engaged in several diplomatic missions, although he still continued to play his part in the wars of France. He was made duke of Friuli, and fell in the battle of Bautzen. He was an attached and faithful friend of the emperor, who wept over him on his deathbed.

Born at Pont-à-Mousson, 1772; died 1813.

EACHARD, JOHN, ē'-chard, an eminent English divine, who became fellow, and afterwards master, of Catherine Hall, Cambridge. In 1670 he published a piece entitled "The Grounds and Reasons of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion inquired into." This he attributed to the improper education of young men for the ministry, and to the absurd style of preaching too generally adopted. He blended much humour with his remarks, which occasioned considerable controversy. His best work, however, is his "Dialogues between Philantus and Timothy," which were intended to expose, what he considered, the absurdity of the philosophy of Hobbes. He had great powers of ridicule, but on serious subjects he did not exhibit much talent.

Born in Suffolk, 1636; died 1697.

EADMER, ēd'-mer, an ancient English historian, who was brought up in the Benedictine monastery of Canterbury, and, in 1120, was elected bishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland, but was never consecrated, and returned to Canterbury, where he became precentor. He was the friend and biographer of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; but his principal work is the "Historia Novorum," or "History of his own Times," which was first printed by Selden in 1623. He also wrote lives of St. Wilfrid, St. Oswald, St. Dunstan, &c.

Died 1124.

ECHARD, LAWRENCE, é-chard, an English divine and historian, was brought up at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1695. On entering into orders, he obtained two livings in Lincolnshire. In 1699 he published a "History of Rome," and, in 1702, his "General Ecclesiastical History." His principal work, however, is the "History of England." He also published a "Gazetteer, or Newsman's Interpreter," which was once a popular book, and the foundation of all its class. In 1712 he was made archdeacon of Stow, and some time after, obtained three livings in Suffolk.

Born in Suffolk, about 1670; died 1730.

ECHELLENSIS, ABRAHAM, ek-el-len'-sis, a Maronite, and professor of the Oriental languages at Rome. He translated Apollonius's Conics from the Arabic into Latin, and assisted Le Jay in his Polyglot Bible,

ECHIDNA, e-kid'-na, in mythology a celebrated monster, sprung from the union of Chrysaor, who had issued from the blood of Medusa, with Callirhoe, the daughter of Oceanus. She is represented as a beautiful woman in the upper parts of the body, and as a serpent below the waist. By Typhon she became the mother of Cerberus, the Hydra, the Chimæra, the Sphinx, the Nemean lion, and other monsters.

ECHIMADZIN, or VAGARHABAD, ek-me-ad-zin', the ecclesiastical capital of Armenia, in the dominions of Russia, 25 miles from Mount Ararat. It is the seat of the primate of the Armenian church. Pop. Unascertained.

ECHO, ek'-o, in mythology a daughter of the Air and Tellus, who chiefly resided in the vicinity of the Cephisus. She was once one of Juno's attendants, but her loquacity displeased Jupiter; when she was deprived of the power of speech by Juno, and only permitted to answer the questions which were put to her. After she had been punished by Juno, she pined away through love of Narcissus.

ECHTERNACH, ek'-ter-nak, a town of the grand duchy of Luxemburg, on the right bank of the Sauer, 20 miles N.E. of Luxemburg. It is surrounded by walls, and has five gates. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, delft-ware, and wooden tobacco-pipes. There are six annual fairs. Pop. 3,600.

ECIJA, ai-the'-ha, a town of Spain, in the province of Seville, on the left bank of the Jenil, 45 miles N.E. of Seville. It contains many churches, convents, and hospitals; it has also a large square, with a piazza, remains of Moorish architecture, and some beautiful shady promenades. The climate is so hot, that the town is known as "the oven of Andalusia. Manf. Linens, woollens, leather, earthenware, wine, and oil. There is a large annual fair. Pop. 25,237 Lat. 37° 33′ N. Lon. 5° 8′ W.—The town is the Colonia Augusta Firma of the Romans.

ECK, JOHANN MAYR VON, ek', German theologian and the opponent of Luther, son of a peasant of Suabia. He studied hard and rose to be doctor of theology, canon of Eichstädt, and chancellor of the university of Ingolstadt. He assailed Luther's "Theses" with great energy, and, in 1520, went to Rome and obtained a papal bull of condemnation, but, at Leipsic, the adherents of Luther were so resolute that Eck was compelled to take refuge in the monastery of St. Paul. He took an active part in the Augsburg Diet of 1350, and in the convocations of Worms and Ratisbon in 1540 and 1541.

Born at Eck, in Suabia, 1486; died 1543.

ECKERMANN, JOHANN PETER, ek'-er-man, friend and biographer of Goethe. He studied at Gottingen, and went to Weimar, where he was appointed tutor to the son of the grand duke. He edited the posthumous writings of Goethe, and wrote the "Conversations with Goethe," which are so well known.

Born at Winsen, in Hanover, 1792; died at Weimar, 1854.

ECKERNFORDE, ek'-ern-ford, a seaport of Prussia, on an islet in the Baltic, 17 miles N.W. of Kiel. It has shipbuilding-docks, distilleries, and a malting trade. The harbour is deep and secure. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 54° 28′ N. Lon. 9° 52′ E.

ECKHUNG CHOO, ek-heong' choo, a river of Tibet, supposed to be the principal head stream of the Indus, rising in the Kailas mountains in lat. 31° 25′ N., lon. 81 40′ E. It takes the name of the Indus in lon. 79° E.

ECKMUHL, ek'-mool, a town of Bavaria, on the Laber, 13 miles from Ratisbon, celebrated for being the scene where the Austrians were defeated by the French in 1809. Davoust showed great bravery in this action, and was named by Napoleon, prince of Eckmuhl.

ECUADOR, ek-wa-dor', an independent republican state of S. America, enclosed on the N., E., and S. by Colombia, Brazil, and Peru; having the Pacific Ocean on the W. It is mountainous in the west, where two ranges of the Andes throw up lofty summits to the height of upwards of 19,000 feet, in Chimborazo, Antisana, Cotopaxi, and others. These ranges enclose several lofty table-lands, the chief being Cuença, Hambato, and Quito, at elevations of from 8,600 to 9,500 feet above the sea level. There are 16 active volcanoes, and earthquakes are frequent. In the E. the country falls into the central plain of the continent.

Rivers.—The Amazon and its tributaries, the Putomayo, Nafo, Pastago, Maras, and the Huallaga. On the west, or maritime side of the mountains, the Esmeralda, Guayaquil, and Mira are the principal, and flow into the ocean.

Pro.—Wheat, cotton, sugar, coffee, cocoa, corn, tobacco, yams, fruits, wax, gums, and sarsaparilla. Agriculture, however, considered in a scientific point of view, is in a very backward state. There are extensive forests, and the chinchona-bark tree is common. The shores of the Pacific, and the rivers, abound with fish.

Minerals.—Gold, quicksilver, lead, iron, copper, and emerald stones. Gold is found in the sands of all the rivers, and sulphur is abundant near Chimborazo. The mineral riches of the country, however, are by no means developed.

Manf.—Woollen and cotton goods.

Area.—219,000 square miles.

Pop.—946,033, of whom 200,000 are aborigines.

Lat.—Between 1° 40′ N. and 5° 50′ S. Lon. Between 69° and 81° 20′ W.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—Ecuador is divided into three departments—Quito, Guayaquil, and Assuav. The principal towns are QUITO, the capital; GUAYAQUIL, RIOBAMBA, PUNO, CUENÇA, and LOXA.

Constitution and Government.—A president is elected for a term of four years, and there is a congress of two houses, to which the president, cabinet of three ministers, and the vice-president, are responsible. No hereditary privileges or titular distinctions are allowed.

History.—In 1526 this country was discovered by Pizarro, when it was comprised in the empire of the Incas. It was held under the Spanish crown till 1812, when it was erected into a free republic. In 1822 it united with New Grenada and Venezuela to form the republic of Colombia. This union, however, was dissolved in 1840, when Quito, with its associated departments, took the name of Ecuador.

EDAM, e'-dam, a town of the Netherlands, province North Holland, 12 miles N.E. of Amsterdam, near the Zuyder Zee. It is walled, but the old fortifications are now planted with trees. There are Calvanistic, Lutheran, Baptist, and Roman Catholic churches. There is a great market for cheese. Pop. 4,000.

EDAY, e'-dai. (See ORKNEY ISLANDS.)

EDDYSTONE ROCKS, ed'-di-stone, a reef of rocks in the English Channel, on which is the well-known lighthouse of that name, 14 miles S.W. of Plymouth breakwater. The lighthouse is 85 feet high, and was erected of Portland stone, incased in granite, in 1759. The light can be seen at a distance of 13 miles. Two lighthouses had been previously placed on the rocks. One was destroyed by a storm in 1703, and the other burned in 1755.

EDELINCK, GERARD, ed'-e-link, an eminent Dutch engraver, who mostly resided in France, where he executed most of his works; among which may be noticed, as his finest, the picture of the Holy Family, by Raffaele, and "The Tent of Darius," by Le Brun.

Born at Antwerp, 1627; died at Paris, 1707.

EDEMA, GERARD, é-de-ma, a Dutch landscape painter, who went to Norway and Newfoundland to delineate the plants and insects of those countries. He settled in London in 1670, and became famous for painting landscapes.

EDEN, é'den, a river of England, rising in the Pennine Chain, in Westmoreland, and, after a course of 65 miles, falling into a fine estuary of the Solway Firth.

EDEN, a river of Scotland, rising in Berwickshire, and, after a course of 18 miles, falling into the Tweed, 4 miles below Kelso.—Another, rising in Kinross-shire, and, after a course of 18 miles, falling into St. Andrew's Bay.

EDEN, "delight," the country in which, according to the book of Genesis, God planted the garden for our first parents. It is supposed to have been near the Persian Gulf, between the Tigris and Euphrates, but the question of the exact site has given rise to a vast amount of learned but not very profitable discussion.

EDENTON, é-den-ton, a port of entry of Chowan county, N. Carolina, U.S., 66 miles from Norfolk. Pop. 2,000.

EDESSA, e-des'-sa, the modern Orfa, an ancient city of Mesopotamia, on the Dairan, 78 miles S.W. of Diarbekin, was the capital of Osroene under the Romans, and one of the frontier places of the empire. It contained manufactories of arms and engines of war, and was one of the first cities to receive the doctrines of Christianity, its inhabitants remaining true to the faith up to the time of the Crusades. In 1097, Baldwin, the brother of Godfrey de Bouillon, here founded a principality, which was the first Christian state erected by the Crusaders, and was regarded as the bulwark of the Holy City. After many vicissitudes, it was conquered by the Turks.

EDFOU, ed'-foo, a town of Upper Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile, 50 miles S. of Thebes. Manf. Egyptian earthenware, and blue cotton cloths. Pop. 2,000.—This place is celebrated for possessing the finest remains of antiquity in Egypt, two temples, one of great size and magnificence.

EDGAR, ed'-gar, king of England at the age of 16, succeeded his brother Edwy, in 958. He made war against the Scots, and compelled Wales to pay him yearly a certain number of wolves' heads, which cleared the country of those animals. Securing his kingdom from invasion by the maintenance of a large fleet, he subdued Ireland, and governed his people with a vigorous success. His queen dying, and he hearing of the great beauty of Elfrida, a daughter of the earl of Devon, he sent Earl Ethelwald, one of his favourite courtiers, to see if the charms of the lady were equal to what was reported of them. The moment he beheld her, the earl forgot his duty to his master, gave a false report of her charms, and married the lady himself. His conduct ultimately became known to the king, who caused him to be slain for his treachery, when the beautiful Elfrida became the wife of Edgar.

Born 943; died 975.

EDGAR, king of Scotland, was the son of Malcolm III., by the sister of Edgar Atheling of England. His niece married Henry I. of England, which circumstance terminated a war which had been raging between the two countries.

Died 1107.

EDGAR, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 642 square miles. Pop. 25,000. Paris is the capital.

EDGARTOWN, capital of Duke's county, Massachusetts, United States, on the N.E. side of the island of Martha's Vineyard. There is a good harbour and a long pier. Manf. Oil, candles, and salt. Pop. 2,200.

EDGBASTON, edj'-bas-ton. (See BIRMINGHAM.)

EDGECOMBE, edj'-kum, a county of N. Carolina, United States. Area, 492 square miles. Pop. 26,000. Capital, Tarborough.

EDGEFIELD, edj'-feeld, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 1,540 square miles. Pop. 45,000. The capital is Edgefield.

EDGEHILL, edj'-hil, an elevated ridge in Warwickshire, 7 miles from Banbury, where, in 1642, the first blood was shed between the royalist troops of Charles I. and the parliamentary forces. The royalists were defeated with great loss.

EDGEWORTH, MARIA, a favourite modern English authoress, was born in England, but at the age of 15 removed to Ireland, where her education proceeded under the direction of her father, a gentleman of independent property, and in 1798 they published a joint production on "Practical Education." "Early Lessons" was the next production, which attained great popularity. In 1802 appeared the "Essay on Irish Bulls," another joint production; but it is not on these that the fame of Miss Edgeworth rests, but on the excellent series of novels, which already had begun to appear under her sole name; the first of these was "Castle Rackrent," which was issued in 1801, and which indicated the possession of powers of a very rare character. In all her novels, her pen was devoted, not only to make us feel what is good, but to make us do what is good. This is especially the case in her "Belinda," "Leonora," "The Modern Griselda," "Moral Tales," "Popular Tales," "Tales of Fashionable Life;" in short, all that she has written. Her last and most popular novel was "Helen," which appeared in 1834, and which was closed by the juvenile story of "Orlandino." It was to her "rich humour, pathetic tenderness, and admirable tact" in the delineation of her Irish characters, that Sir Walter Scott was indebted for the suggestion to do something in a similar way for his own country. He accordingly began the Waverley novels, keeping, no doubt, the productions of Miss Edgeworth clearly in his view.

EDGWARE, edj'-wair, a town in Middlesex, 10 miles from London. The church of St. Margaret was rebuilt in 1845, on the site of an ancient edifice forming part of a monastery. Pop. 3,749.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

EDINBURGH, ed'-in-bur-reh, the metropolis of Scotland, is also the capital of Edinburghshire, and is situate in its northern part, at the distance of about a mile and a half S. of the Firth of Forth, to which the outskirts of the city almost extend. It stands on high and uneven ground, being built on three ridges, running in a direction from east to west. The central ridge, on which the city was originally built, is terminated abruptly on the west by a precipitous rock, crowned by the Castle, while, to the east, it gradually inclines to a plain or valley, whence, on the south side, rise the lofty elevations of Arthur's Seat (822 feet) and Salisbury Crags (500 feet), and, on the north, the Calton Hill. The valley to the north of this ridge, which was formerly filled with water, and known as the North Loch, is converted into beautiful gardens, and is, on the E. side, crossed by the North Bridge, and, in its centre, by the earthen Mound. A railway bridge is near to and parallel with the North Bridge. On the rising ground to the north of this valley stands the New town of Edinburgh. Both sides of the central ridge, occupied by the principal street of the Old town, named in different parts the Canongate, Netherbow, High-street, Lawnmarket, and Castle Hill, extending from the Castle to Holyrood House, are covered with buildings, crowded together in the closest array, and descending from the main street, chiefly in winding narrow "closes." The southern part of the town is reached by two bridges over the intervening valley, George the Fourth and the South Bridge. In the bottom of the valley, on the south side of the High-street and parallel with it, runs a narrow street called the Cowgate. This street communicates, by streets and narrow lanes, with the southern part of the town, containing several old-fashioned squares, and leading to the handsome suburbs called Newington, Greenhill, Boroughmuirhead, and Morningside. Here are the Meadows, a large level park, surrounded by trees and walks; and, adjoining them, Bruntsfield Links, an extensive common, frequented by the golf-players of Edinburgh. The New town is built on the lower and northernmost of the ridges, and is connected with the Old town by the North Bridge and the earthen Mound. The ground which it occupies was added to the royalty in 1767; and, since that period, numerous streets and squares have been constructed on it, in beauty and regularity unsurpassed by those of any other city in the world. The Calton Hill is connected with Prince's-street by an elegant bridge, of one large arch, called the Regent's Bridge, Waterloo Place, and with Leith by a broad and very fine road, called Leith Walk; and at the western extremity of the New town there is a lofty bridge, Dean's, over Leith water. The scenery around the city, owing to the abrupt and craggy heights of the Calton Hill and Arthur's Seat, which suddenly rises from the surrounding plain, and presents the rocky heights of Salisbury Crags towards the city, is very fine; and all that art can do has been done to display its natural advantages. Around the Calton Hill, walks have been made at different elevations, from which the surrounding town and country are seen to great perfection; a walk also winds round the still greater elevation of Salisbury Crags, from which the view is, at once, grand and imposing. Of the public buildings in Edinburgh, the Castle is the most remarkable. It stands on the highest point of the wedge-shaped rock, 400 feet high, and, with its works, occupies an area of seven English acres, and is separated from the town by an open space nearly 300 feet square. It can accommodate 2,000 soldiers, and has an armoury space for 30,000 stand of arms. Here is the celebrated gun called Mons Meg, built of malleable iron staves, and supposed to have been forged in Flanders, in 1486. In one of the apartments, called the Crown-room, the regalia of Scotland were deposited at the Union. They were found in 1818, when the chest in which they had been placed was broken open by a royal warrant. In one of its rooms James VI., afterwards king of England, was born, and on the esplanade which leads to the Castle, is now placed a bronze statue of the late duke of York. There is a tradition, which says that this castle was the residence of the daughters of the Pictish kings, previous to their marriage: hence it is called the "Camp of the Maidens." At the opposite, or eastern extremity of the Old town, stands the palace and abbey of Holyrood, for several centuries the residence of the monarchs of Scotland, and associated with many of the most interesting events in her history. The abbey, of which only the ruins of the chapel remain, was founded in the year 1128, by David I.; and in the burying-place within, are interred several of his successors. In the chapel connected with these ruins, Queen Mary was married to Lord Darnley; and to the abbey there is attached a privilege of sanctuary for insolvent debtors. The Palace is a large quadrangular building of hewn stone, with a court within, surrounded by piazzas. In one of the apartments of this edifice, David Rizzio, the confidential secretary of Queen Mary, was murdered, in 1566. At each angle of the west front are two double circular towers; and, in the centre, is a portico, ornamented by four Doric columns, which support a cupola in the form of a crown. It contains a gallery 150 feet long, 72½ wide, and 18 high, adorned with imaginary portraits of the kings of Scotland from the time of Fergus I. As it now stands, it is not of high antiquity. Its north-west towers were built by James V., but the remaining part of it was added during the reign of Charles II. In the area in front of the building is a fountain occupying the place of a statue of the Queen, removed some years ago. In the centre of the city, to the south of High-street, and near George the Fourth's bridge, is a small square called Parliament-square, in which is an elegant equestrian statue of Charles II. Here is also a great irregular pile of buildings, in which the supreme courts hold their sittings for the administration of justice. The original portion of this mass was intended for the reception of the Scottish parliament. It consists of an extensive hall, 122 feet in length by 49 in breadth, and not less than 40 feet high. It contains marble statues of the first Lord Melville, Lord President Blair, Lord Jeffrey, Lord Cockburn, and other eminent judges. The workmanship of the inner roof, which is of a polygonal figure, of massive oak timber, ornamented with gilding, and supported by abutments projecting from the wall, has been generally admired. Here is the advocates' library, the richest and rarest collection in Scotland, consisting of not less than 150,000 volumes, and about 1,700 MSS., and a smaller one belonging to the writers to the signet, besides several public offices. Nearly opposite to the Parliament-square stands the Royal Exchange, which was founded in the year 1752, and was formerly employed as a custom-house. The Register-office, in which the public records of Scotland are deposited, is situate at the east end of Prince's-street, facing the North Bridge. It was founded in 1774. Of the churches, the metropolitan church, dedicated to St. Giles, the tutelar saint of the city, is the most ancient. It is built in the Gothic style, figure of a cross, is 206 feet long and 110 broad, and forms one side of the Parliament-square. It was erected into a collegiate church in 1466, but is said to have been founded nearly 600 years before. The steeple contains a set of musical bells. The church has been recently restored, and contains three separate places of worship. There the Solemn League and Covenant was subscribed in 1643, by the English commissioners, the commission of the Church, and the committee of estates of Parliament. Both the regent Murray, assassinated at Linlithgow, and the Marquis of Montrose are interred within its precincts. Among the more noteworthy churches are the Old and New Greyfriars (in the churchyard attached to which are many very interesting historical monuments), the Tron, the Canongate, St. Cuthbert's, Lady Yester's, St. Andrew's, and St. George's; and a number of other churches, chapels, and places of worship for the various sects and denominations of which the inhabitants consist. At the top of the High-street is the Victoria, or Assembly Hall, a fine structure in the decorated Gothic style, with a spire 241 feet high. This building is used for public worship, and altogether there are 35 churches of the Established Church, 41 Free churches, 25 United Presbyterian, and 14 Episcopalian. St. George's Cathedral, a superb building, in connexion with the Episcopal Church, built at the expense of two ladies, was opened in 1879. The university of Edinburgh was originally founded in the year 1582. The buildings are quadrangular in form, with a spacious court, and are situated in Nicolson-street. The Museums of Science and Art immediately adjoin. The High School, standing on a part of the Calton Hill, is the principal grammar-school of the city; but there are other educational establishments, affording every facility for the highest class of instruction that can anywhere be obtained, in almost every department of knowledge. Among these may be named the Edinburgh Academy, and the Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. The Royal Institution in the New town, fronting Prince's-street at the foot of the Mound. It is in the Grecian style, with a fine portico, and surmounted by a colossal statue of Queen Victoria. It accommodates the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the Royal Institution for Encouraging the Fine Arts, the Antiquarian Museum, and the Schools of the Royal Scottish Academy. There are also the Wernerian Society, and the Astronomical Institution, for the purpose of promoting the science of astronomy, with an observatory on the Calton Hill; the Highland Society, established for advancing the interest of agriculture, manufactures, and arts in the Highlands of Scotland; the Faculty of Advocates, and the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons. The principal charitable institutions are Heriot's Hospital, a large quadrangular building in the south part of the town, which was endowed by George Heriot, jeweller to James VI., for educating and maintaining the sons of burgesses and freemen; Watson's Hospital, for the sons and grandsons of poor citizens; the Merchant Company's Schools, and there are other institutions devoted to charitable objects. The city and county jails are at the foot of the Calton Hill, on the top of which is Nelson's Monument, and near it other monuments to Dugald Stewart, Playfair, and Burns. The columns of the National Monument, intended to be a literal reproduction of the ancient Parthenon, but not completed, are also there. That of Sir Walter Scott is in Prince's-street, and is a very striking object, being a Gothic cross, 200 feet high, with a marble statue of Scott. There are also memorials of Hume, the historian; Allan Ramsay, James Watt, Lord Melville, George IV., William Pitt, Professor Wilson, Dr. Simpson, Mr. Adam Black, Dr. Livingstone, and the Earl of Hopetoun. The principal establishments connected with the revenue are the Customs-house and Excise-office, both elegant mansions in the New town: and the Post-office, a splendid structure in the Palatial Italian style, in Waterloo-place,—a splendid street which ranges on each side of the Regent, or Waterloo Bridge. The chief places of public amusement are the theatres and the Assembly-rooms. The fashionable resorts are Prince's-street, the Queen's Drive, round the base of Salisbury Crags, and Arthur's Seat.

Manf.—The principal are household furniture, carriages, which are executed in a style of superior elegance; engraving in all its branches, musical instruments, glass, linen, silk, sarcenet, and fine shawl-weaving. There are also brass, iron, and marble works, spirit-distilleries, and nearly 30 ale-brewing establishments. The trade of bookselling and printing is also carried on to a great extent; and various periodical and other works of high celebrity are published.

Municipal Government.—There are a lord-provost and six bailies, who are elected by a town council of 41 members.

Communications.—Edinburgh is connected by railway with almost every important town in Great Britain, and the Union Canal is a valuable means of transit for goods to the western parts of Scotland. The port of Edinburgh is LEITH, reached by a broad road, Leith Walk.

History.—The origin of Edinburgh is lost in antiquity. About the year 854, according to the accounts of the earlier historians, it was a town of some note, and was called Edwinesburch, or the castle of Edwin, probably so named after Edwin, prince of Northumberland. Its Gaelic name is Dun-edin, and its poetical one Edina, which was given to it by George Buchanan. In 1215 a parliament was assembled here for the first time. In 1437 the kings of Scotland usually resided in it, and held regular parliaments; and about the year 1456 it began to be considered the metropolis of Scotland. It has been the birthplace of a great number of distinguished men, both in arts and arms.

EDINBURGHSHIRE, or COUNTY OF MIDLOTHIAN, is situate in the eastern part of the S. division of Scotland, and is bounded N. by the Firth of Forth and the river Almond, which separates it from West Lothian, or Linlithgowshire; E. by the counties of Haddington and Berwick; S. by the counties of Lanark, Peebles, and Selkirk; and on the W. corner, by part of the county of Linlithgow. The general aspect of the county is pleasant, being fertile, highly cultivated, and yielding excellent crops. The Moorfoot and the Pentland hills pass through it, the highest point of which is Carnethy, attaining an elevation of 1,802 feet above the level of the sea.

Rivers.—None large. The principal are the North and South Esk, the Almond, and the Water of Leith.

Pro.—The chief crops consist of wheat, barley, oats, beans, peas, turnips, and potatoes. The farms vary from 190 to 400 acres, and are remarkable for the excellence of their arrangements. A large portion of the county is kept in pasturage, especially in the south and hilly parts.

Area.—367 square miles.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, sandstone, and limestone.

Pop.—388,977.

Chief Towns.—EDINBURGH, the capital, LEITH, DALKEITH, MUSSELBURGH, and PORTOBELLO.

History.—At the period of the Roman conquest, Mid-Lothian and the surrounding districts were constituted a province, under the name of Valentia. Subsequently, the county was principally occupied by the Saxons, and held by them till 1020, when it was ceded to Malcolm II.

EDISTO, or POMPON, e-dis'-to, a river of S. Carolina, United States, which, after a course of 160 miles, falls into the Atlantic, by two branches, called N. and S. Edisto, about 20 miles S.W. of Charleston. At its mouth it forms several islands, of which the largest, also called Edisto, is about 12 miles long and 10 broad.

EDMONTON, ed'-mon-ton, a town of Middlesex, 7 miles N.E. of London, consisting of a long main street, and numerous villas. It is divided into Upper and Lower Edmonton. The church of All Saints, in the Perpendicular style, has some ancient tombs and brasses. It has a trade in timber. Cowper's poem of "John Gilpin" has made this place famous, it having been the wish of that worthy citizen to repair

"Unto the Bell at Edmonton,
All in a chaise and pair."

The Angel tavern now occupies the site of the Bell. Charles Lamb died here, 1834. It is a station on the Great Eastern railway. Pop. 23,463.

EDMUND, St., ed'-mund, became king of East Anglia, in 855, and was in 870 conquered, and put to death by the Danish princes Hinquar and Hubbar, whose propositions for peace, from their humiliating conditions, he had rejected. "His body," Fuller says, "was placed in a goodly shrine, richly adorned with jewels and precious stones, at Bury, in Suffolk." He was canonized, and Bury St. Edmunds was so named from its being the place of his burial.

Born 841; died 870.

EDMUND I., king of England, son of Edward the Elder, succeeded his brother Athelstan in 940. He subdued Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland. For his personal elegance and splendour, he received the name of the Magnificent, and was stabbed at a feast in Gloucester, by Leolf, a robber, whom he had caused to be banished.

Born 923; died 946.

EDMUND II., commonly known as Ironside, son of Ethelred II., whom he succeeded on the English throne in 1016. A fierce war raged between him and Canute, king of Denmark, and he ultimately was forced to agree to a participation of the kingdom with the Danish prince. He was, it is supposed, assassinated. (See CANUTE.)

Born 989; died at Oxford, 1017.

EDOM, e'-dom, "red," the name given to the country occupied by Esau. It is about 100 miles long and 20 broad, between the south of Palestine and the Gulf of Akabah, the north-eastern arm of the Red Sea. At a later period the name was changed to Idumea, and the country so named extended west to the Mediterranean.

EDRED, ed'-red, king of the Anglo-Saxons, was the youngest son of Edward the Elder, and succeeded his brother Edmund in 946. He repressed several revolts of the Danes, and defeated Malcolm, king of Scotland.

EDREI, ed'-re-i, "a very great cloud or mass," a city or district of Og, king of Bashan.

EDRISI, ed-re'-se, an Arabian writer on geography, the member of a family which traced its descent from Mahomet. He studied at Cordova, and travelled extensively. He obtained from travellers in all countries contributions towards a knowledge of geography, and produced a work on that science, which has been translated into several languages.

Born at Ceuta, 1099; died 1164.

EDROPAL, ed-ro'-pal, a town of Servia, on the frontiers of Bulgaria, on the banks of the Little Isker. Pop. 2,000.

EDUR, e-door', the capital of a Rajpoot state of Gujerat, India, tributary to the Guicowar. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 23° 50' N. Lon. 73° 3' E.

EDWARD the Elder, ed'-ward, son of Alfred the Great, succeeded his father in 901. He subdued Northumbria and East Anglia, and extended his dominions as far as Scotland.

Born 870; died 925.

EDWARD the Martyr, son of Edgar the Great, king of England, was murdered by order of his stepmother Elfrida, at Corfe Castle. His youth and innocence, coupled with his tragical death, procured for him the designation of the Martyr.

Born 962; assassinated 979, in the fourth year of his reign.

EDWARD, king of England, called the Confessor, was the son of Ethelred. He succeeded Hardicanute in 1042. Having been reared in Normandy, he brought over many of the natives of that country, whom he preferred at his court, which gave great disgust to his Saxon subjects. He married Edetha, the daughter of Earl Godwin, but she was his wife in name only, for he professed a holy desire to refrain from the pleasures of matrimony, for which he was, a hundred years after his death, canonized and designated "the Confessor." In other matters he was considerably less scrupulous, especially in the treatment of his mother. He framed a code which is supposed to be the origin of the common law of England. He abolished the tax of Danegelt, was the first who pretended to cure the king's evil by touch, and restored Malcolm to the throne of Scotland, which had been usurped by Macbeth. He consulted William of Normandy about the choice of a successor, and this afterwards furnished that prince with a plea for invading the kingdom after the death of Edward. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Islip, Oxfordshire, 1004; died 1066.

EDWARD I., king of England, surnamed Longshanks, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1272. At the time of his father's death he was in Palestine, fighting against the Saracens for the recovery of Jerusalem, and when he returned, completed the conquest of Wales and subdued Scotland. To preserve Wales, he caused his son, who was born in Caernarvon, to be called the "Prince of Wales," which, ever since, has continued to be the title of the eldest son of the king of England. In 1296 he invaded Scotland, and devastated the country with fire and sword. (See WALLACE, BALIOL, and BRUCE.) Whilst in the Holy Land, Eleanor, the wife of this sovereign, saved his life by sucking the poison from a wound which he received from a vengeful assassin. She was the daughter of Ferdinand III., king of Castile. His second wife was Margaret, daughter of Philip the Hardy, king of France. The laws which he framed gained for him the name of the English Justinian; and he was undoubtedly one of the most energetic and able monarchs who ever occupied the English throne. "The great Plantagenet," is another title which has been given him. (See CAERNARVON.)

Born at Winchester, 1239; died at Carlisle, on his way to Scotland, 1307.

EDWARD II., the son of the above, was created prince of Wales in 1284, and after his accession to the throne, suffered himself to be governed by his favourites, Gaveston and the Spencers, which occasioned the barons to rise against him. In his reign the battle of Bannockburn was fought near Stirling, in Scotland, which restored to that country whatever she had lost in the previous reign of her independence. In 1327 he was deposed by his subjects, and his crown conferred on his son, when he was confined in Berkeley Castle, Gloucestershire, where he was murdered.

Born at Caernarvon, 1284; died 1327.

EDWARD III. was the son and successor of the above, and ascended the throne in 1327. Two years afterwards he married Philippa of Hainault. One of his first acts on obtaining full power was to banish his mother, Isabella, and to execute Mortimer, her paramour, who had contrived the murder of his father. His reign was active and glorious. He obliged the Scots to acknowledge Edward Baliol for their king, who did him homage for his crown. This was the result of the battle of Halidon Hill, in which the Scots were defeated, and had 30,000 slain. He next laid claim to the crown of France, and gained the battles of Crécy and Poictiers. In the first was defeated Philip of Valois, and in the last King John, who was taken prisoner and sent to England. He also defeated the French in a naval engagement off the coast of Flanders, which is the first sea-fight on record between the English and the French. Edward also, about the same time, defeated David Bruce, king of Scotland, and took him prisoner. He afterwards reduced Calais, and peopled it with English. In this reign Chaucer, the father of English poetry, lived; the order of the Garter was instituted; the art of weaving cloth introduced from Flanders; gunpowder invented; and cannon first used at Crécy. He had seven sons and five daughters, some of whom died young. As his gallant son, Edward the Black Prince, died before him, he was succeeded by his grandson, Richard II. (See EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE, CRÉCY, and POICTIERS.)

Born at Windsor, 1312; died 1377.

EDWARD IV. was the eldest son of Richard, duke of York, and disputed the crown with Henry VI., whom he succeeded in 1461. He married Lady Elizabeth Grey, whose husband had fallen, as an adherent of the house of Lancaster, and whose beauty, whilst pleading for the restoration of her husband's lands, won the heart of the king. This marriage so disgusted the earl of Warwick, commonly called the King-maker, that he joined the Lancastrian party, and, in 1469, defeated Edward's forces near Banbury. Soon afterwards Edward was taken prisoner; but, effecting his escape, he put himself at the head of his followers, and obtained a victory over Warwick at Stamford Wells. The earl fled to France, whence he returned with a supply of troops, and proclaimed Henry VI., who had been confined in the Tower for six years, and set him on the throne. This event procured for Warwick the title of "king-maker." Edward had fled to Holland, but soon returned with assistance, and marched to London, where he took Henry prisoner. Shortly afterwards, he met Warwick on the field of battle at Barnet, where the Lancastrians were defeated, and the earl slain. Another victory at Tewkesbury secured him the quiet possession of the throne, after which there are few memorable events to record of this monarch.

Born at Rouen, 1441; died 1483.

EDWARD V., king of England, son of the above, succeeded his father at the age of twelve. Richard, duke of Gloucester, his uncle, afterwards Richard III., took the guardianship of both him and his brother, and placed them in the Tower, where they were smothered in their beds. (See RICHARD III.)

Born in the sanctuary of Westminster Abbey, 1470; died 1483.

EDWARD VI., the son of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, ascended the throne in 1547, at the age of ten years. He was a prince of promising talents, virtue, and piety. The Reformation, begun by his father, was energetically carried on by Archbishop Cranmer, throughout his reign. His aversion to popery was so great, that he signed a will, in which he set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, lest they should favour the Roman Catholics, from the succession, and settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey. He founded the hospitals of Christchurch, Bridewell, St. Thomas, and a number of grammar-schools, which are still popularly known as King Edward's schools. He died of consumption.

Born at Hampton Court, 1537; died at Greenwich, 1552.

EDWARD, PRINCE OF WALES, commonly called the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour, was the eldest son of Edward III. He accompanied his father to France in his 16th year, and distinguished himself there above all the warriors of his age; particularly at the battle of Crécy, or Cressy, where he captured the standard of the king of Bohemia, embroidered with three ostrich-feathers, and the motto, Ich dien, "I serve." These he adopted himself; and from that time to the present, they have continued to be the crest and the motto of the princes of Wales. He also gained the victory at Poictiers, where he took prisoners John, king of France, and his son, whom he brought captives to London. Their entry into the capital took place in 1356. In 1361 he married the daughter of Edmond, earl of Kent, brother to Edward II., a widow, by whom he had a son, who was afterwards Richard II. By the peace of Bretigny, he obtained the principality of Aquitaine and Gascony, taking up his residence at Bordeaux. Here he gave an asylum to Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, who had been driven from his throne by his brother Henry, count of Trastamare. Peter was restored to his kingdom by Edward; but the Castilian behaved to him with the basest ingratitude, refusing to find supplies for the English troops.

Born at Woodstock, 1330; died 1376.

EDWARDS, GEORGE, an eminent English naturalist, who, after travelling some time abroad, returned, and became librarian of the College of Physicians, London. He published a "History of Birds," "Gleanings of Natural History," and a volume of "Essays."

Born at West Ham, Essex, 1693; died 1773.

EDWARDS, THOMAS, an English divine, who, in 1755, printed a translation of the Psalms, and afterwards was chosen master of the grammar school at Coventry, and presented to the rectory of St. John Baptist in that city. In 1759 he published the "Doctrine of irresistible Grace proved to have no Foundation in the New Testament;" and, in 1762, defended Bishop Hare's system of the Hebrew metre against Dr. Lowth, in which he failed. In 1766 he took his doctor's degree, and, four years later, obtained the living of Nuneaton, in Warwickshire, where he died. Besides the above works, he published selections from Theocritus, with notes, and some other pieces.

Born at Coventry, 1729; died 1785.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN, an American divine, who was educated at Yale College, and in 1757, was chosen president of Princeton College, New Jersey, where he died of the small-pox. Mr. Edwards was an acute metaphysician, but a rigid Calvinist. He wrote "A Treatise concerning Religious Affections," "An Inquiry into the Modern prevailing Notion of that Freedom of Will which is supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency;" "The Great Doctrine of Original Sin defended." "Sermons," &c. &c.

Born at Windsor, Connecticut, 1703; died 1758.

EDWARDS, BRYAN, historian and geographer, who became a member of the Assembly of Jamaica, W. Indies, where he delivered a speech against Mr. Wilberforce's propositions concerning the slave-trade, in 1789. He afterwards settled in England, and became member of parliament for Grampound, in Cornwall. He made his first speech in defence of his countrymen against the advocates for the abolition of slavery. He wrote "The History, Civil and Commercial, of the British Colonies in the West Indies," "The Proceedings of the Governor and Assembly of Jamaica in regard to the Maroon Negroes;" and "An Historical Survey of the French Colony in the Island of St. Domingo."

Born in Jamaica, 1743; died 1800.

EDWARDS, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 216 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

EDWIN, ed'-win, a son of Ella, king of Northumberland, who succeeded to the throne, in 589, when an infant, but his territories were invaded by Ethelfirth, a neighbouring chief, and the young prince was taken for refuge to North Wales. When he grew up he defeated and killed the usurper, and recovered his dominions. He subsequently became the most powerful prince in England; and was, with his family and chief followers converted to Christianity by Paulinus, who had been sent as a missionary by Pope Gregory. He was killed in battle at Hatfield Chase, Yorkshire. He is known in poetical legend as Edwin of Deira.

Born 586; died 634.

EDWY, ed'-we, king of England, son of Edmund I., succeeded his uncle Edred in 955. He married Elgiva, his relation within the prohibited degrees of kindred, which proved the ruin of both. Archbishop Odo seized the queen, and having branded her in the face with a hot iron, sent her to Ireland, after which she was put to a cruel death. Edwy was driven from the throne, and died under excommunication.

Born 939; died 958.

EECLOO, ai'-kloo, a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, 12 miles N.W. of Ghent. Its public buildings are, several churches, a town-hall, prison, convent, and schools. Manf. Woollens, cottons, soap, oil, vinegar, salt, chocolate, and tobacco. There are breweries, distilleries, and dye-works. A large trade is carried on in grain, linen, and timber. Pop. 9,800.

EFFERDING, af'-fer-ding, a town of Austria, near the right bank of the Danube, 107 miles W. of Vienna. It is fortified, a castle, a Gothic Roman Catholic church, and a Protestant church. Pop. 1,300.

EFFINGHAM, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 4,500. Springfield is the capital.

EGBELL, eg'-bel, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Sirkovi, 53 miles N.W. of Neutra. A large trade in hemp is carried on. Pop. 2,900.

EGBERT, eg'-bert, the first king of all England, and the last of the Saxon heptarchy. He was proclaimed king of Wessex in 800, and in 828 united all the other kingdoms under him. He distinguished himself against the Danes.

Died 837.

EGEDE, HANS, ai'-geed-é, superintendent of the Danish missionaries in Greenland, went, in 1721, and resided there for fifteen years, labouring to convert the inhabitants. Egede wrote a description of Greenland, published first in 1729.

Born 1681; died 1758.

EGEDE, POVEL, son of the above, became assistant to his father, and afterwards bishop of Greenland. He published a new edition of his father's book, and a journal respecting Greenland.

Born 1708; died 1789.

EGELN, ai'-geln, a town of Prussia, 17 miles S.W. of Magdeburg. Manf. Furs. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,900.

EGER, ai'-ger, a river of Austria, rising in Bohemia, and, after a course of 125 miles, joining the Elbe. There is a circle of the same name.

EGER, capital of the division, on the bank of the above river, 90 miles W. of Prague. It has a handsome deanery, church, and seven other churches, a large town-hall, two monasteries, and barracks. The ruins of the old citadel are near the river, and there is the Double chapel, a graceful Gothic building. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, chintz, leather, and soap. Pop. 13,500.—Wallenstein was assassinated here in 1634.

EGERDIR, ai'-ger-deer, a lake of Natolia, Asia Minor, 15 miles from Isbarta. It is 27 miles long, and 10 broad at its greatest points. At the S. extremity is a town of the same name, built at the foot of a promontory in the lake. Lat. 37° 52′ N. Lon. 31° 6′ E.

EGERI, aizh-er'-e, a lake of Switzerland, 4 miles from Zug. It is 4 miles long, with a breadth of about 2 at its broadest part.

EGERIA, e-jeer'-e-a, in Roman legend, a nymph of Latium, who dwelt in the forest of Aricia, near Rome. Renowned for her wisdom, she was frequently consulted by Numa Pompilius, who, according to Ovid, becoming enamoured of her, made her his wife. In order that this prince might introduce his laws and new regulations more readily into the state, he solemnly declared, before the Roman people, that they had been previously approved and sanctified by the nymph Egeria. Ovid says that Egeria was so disconsolate at the death of Numa, that she melted into tears, and was changed into a fountain by Diana.

EGERSUND, ai'-ger-sund, a seaport and fishing town of Norway. There is a good harbour, much resorted to by vessels engaged in the herring-fishery. Pop. 1,300. Lat. 58° 26′ N. Lon. 5° 50′ E.

EGERSZEG-ZALA, ai'-gers-zag-za'-la, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Zala. Pop. 3,000.

EGREMONT, eg'-re-mont, a market town of Cumberland, 38 miles S.E. of Carlisle, and near the coast there is an ancient parish church. Manf. Linen, sailcloth, leather, and paper. Pop. 5,976.

EGUISHEIM, or EXHEIM, ai'-guees-hime, a town of France, department Haut-Rhin, near the left bank of the Lauch. A massive tower, and having remains of a strong castle, is 130 feet high. Pop. 2,100.

EGYPT, é'-jipt, a country of Africa, bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean, E. by the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez, S. by Nubia, and W. by the extensive desert to the East of Fezzan. Egypt Proper includes the valley of the Nile from the last cataracts to the sea, and the broad alluvial district known as the Delta, from its triangular form resembling the Greek letter Δ, through which the river enters the Mediterranean. (See NILE.) But, politically, Egypt includes Nubia and the countries, as yet very imperfectly known, on the White Nile as far as the great lakes Albert and Victoria Nyassa, and, eastward, it includes the district known as the Libyan Desert, with the Greater and the Lesser Oases, and the Oasis of Ammon and Darfour. Inhabited Egypt is limited to the valley of the Nile, which in some parts is not more than 8 or 10 miles wide, and the Delta, which, at its widest part, from Alexandria in the west to Pelusium on the east, is about 160 miles. This valley, which is, allowing for the windings of the river, about 720 miles long, is the only portion of Egypt capable of cultivation, and is rendered so by the annual inundation of the Nile, which commences in June, continues to increase till September, and subsides about the end of October, leaving a rich deposit, which makes the soil amazingly fertile. The valley of the Nile is enclosed between ranges of hills, those to the east rising to from 400 to 800 feet, and to the west the Libyan chain. Beyond the latter range, and about 80 miles from the Nile, are the oases mentioned above. (See OASIS, GREAT, and OASIS, LITTLE.) About 16 miles S. of Memphis the Nile divides into two principal branches, forming the Delta, the western being known as the Rosetta, and the eastern as the Damietta branch. Anciently there were five other channels by which the river reached the Mediterranean, but they have become silted up in the course of ages. The fertile land of the Delta is for the most part separated from the Mediterranean by a series of lagoons, between which and the sea are narrow necks of land. Between the Rosetta and the Damietta arms of the river is Lake Bourlos, about 30 miles long; to the east of the Damietta branch is the large Lake Menzaleh, and, still further east, Lake Bardowal. West of the Rosetta branch are Edku, Madyeh or Aboukir, and Mareotis, all communicating with the sea by narrow channels. Near the point where the western range of mountains sinks in the desert are a chain of pools known as the Natron lakes, from which, in the dry season, the water evaporates, leaving a thick deposit of natron, or sesqui-carbonate of soda; and in the east, between Lake Menzaleh and the Isthmus of Suez, are the Bitter Lakes, having a similar character. West of the Nile, in lat. 29° 20′ N., among the Libyan Hills, in the fertile valley of Fayoum, in the lower part of which is a large lake, Birket-el-Kerun, 34 miles long and 6 miles in average breadth. In ancient times, so great was the fertility of Egypt, that not a foot of ground remained uncultivated, and there was a large number of canals, which are now filled up, but the remains of which may, in many parts, be distinctly traced.

Climate.—Generally uniform and remarkably dry. Rain is scarcely known, except near the sea shore. Thunder and lightning are nearly equally unfrequent. The prevalent winds are from the north, and continue from May to September, and from November to February. The winter months are the most delightful time of the year, the air being cool and the ground covered with verdure. At intervals during the spring, for about fifty days, Egypt is liable to the terrible wind of the desert, the simoom, which, from its intense heat and dryness, threatens, when long continued, almost the extinction of animal life; fortunately, however, it seldom lasts above three days. The heat of the climate, combined with the filthy habits of the people, is considered favourable to the ravages of the plague, which is supposed to be indigenous, whilst ophthalmia, another severe disease, is also peculiar to Egypt.

Zoology.—The wild animals are hyenas, jackals, hippopotami, the chameleon, and a kind of rat, called ichneumon. The birds are, ostriches, eagles, hawks, pelicans, waterfowls of all kinds, and the ibis, which resembles a duck, and was deified by the ancient Egyptians, on account of its destroying serpents and noxious insects. Among the reptiles are crocodiles, lizards, the asp, and a serpent, called the cerastes, or horned viper, whose bite is fatal to those who have not the secret of guarding against it. Locusts are unpleasantly abundant, and so are insects.

Pro.—Millet, maize, wheat, rice, onions, melons, cucumbers, sugar, opium, tobacco, hemp, cotton, lint, and indigo. The want of rain in this country being supplied by the annual inundation of the Nile, which begins to rise in June and to subside in September, it can hardly be said to depend for any of its fertility upon the clouds. When the waters retire, all the ground is covered with mud; then the corn is harrowed into it, and, in the following March, there is usually a plentiful harvest. But some lands are never fallow, and yield three harvests annually, particularly in Lower Egypt, where sowing and reaping are going on incessantly, wherever the water of the river can be obtained. The rice-fields are supplied with water from canals and reservoirs. There is no place in the world better furnished with corn, fruits, and all sorts of garden-stuff; and in Lower Egypt, oranges, lemons, figs, dates, almonds, cassia, and plantains, are produced in great plenty. The plants peculiar to Egypt comprise the papyrus, from which the first substance used in writing was made, the lotus, the zizyphus, and many aromatic species. There are no forests, and the palms and sycamores are thinly scattered.

Minerals.—No metals; but marble, alabaster, sulphur, salt, natron, saltpetre, and red granite, of which the pyramids are constructed. Emeralds are found in the mountains on the shores of the Red Sea.

Manf.—Morocco leather, pottery, coarse cotton, and woollen cloths, and sugar.

Antiquarian Remains.—Egypt is distinguished for her vast remains of antiquity, large portions of which bear no marks of decay, owing in a great measure to the preservative nature of the climate. The temples, palaces, and monuments remaining are of two periods, those built in the time of the Pharaohs, and those built during the reign of the Greek and Roman kings of the country. These remains are remarkable for their magnitude, the aim of their contrivers being apparently to astonish by their immensity. This enormous magnitude is particularly conspicuous in the pyramids. The largest of these measures nearly 500 feet in perpendicular height, and has a square base of 700. The greater part consists of a solid mass of masonry, composed of "Syene marble," or red granite. The temples, though they cannot rival the stupendousness of the pyramids, yet appear to exceed every other work of human art. The site of Thebes exhibits a space of ten miles, almost entirely covered with colossal sacred ruins. Even the statues with which they are adorned, always possess gigantic dimensions. Detailed descriptions of the more remarkable of these stupendous monuments are given under other headings. (See THEBES, MEMPHIS, EDFOU, KARNAK, LUXOR, MEDINET-ABOU, PHILÆ, ABOU-SIMBEL, &c.)

Area and Population.—The territories under the rule of the Egyptian government were much reduced by the events between 1880 and 1886, the outcome of which was to deprive Egypt of the nominal dominion previously exercised over the indefinite and immense district formerly designated Nubia, but subsequently called the Soudan. The area to which the government of Egypt was consequently limited was defined by official arrangements, as bounded to the north by Wady Halfa, including Lower and Upper Egypt, the Isthmus of Suez, El Arish in Asia, and the Red Sea coast from Suez to Kosseir. Pop. 6,806,381. The numbers were arrived at after enumerating Greeks, 37,301; Italians, 18,665; French, 15,716; Austrians, 8,022; English, 6,116; Germans, 948; and other foreigners, 4,216, making a total of 90,886 foreigners in all, about 90 per cent. in Lower Egypt.

Divisions of Egypt Proper.—From very remote times three geographical districts, possessing a marked variety of characteristics, have been recognized—Lower Egypt, or Masr-el-Bahri, including the Delta; Middle Egypt, or El-Wustani; and Upper Egypt, or El-Said. These three districts are subdivided into 11 administrative provinces.

Government.—Nominally a pashalik of the Turkish empire, Egypt has been virtually an independent state since the year 1811, when Mehemet Ali, appointed governor in 1806, made himself absolute master of the country by force of arms. His position was recognized by the imperial Hatti-Shériff of February 13, 1841, issued under the guarantee of the five great European powers, which established the hereditary succession to the throne of Egypt, under the same rules and regulations as that to the throne of Turkey. The title given to Mehemet Ali and his immediate successors was the Turkish one of "Vali," or viceroy; but this was changed by an imperial firman of May 27, 1866, into the Persian-Arabic of "Khidiv-el-Misr," or king of Egypt, and the present ruler has since been known as the Khidiv, or, as more commonly written, Khedive. By the same firman of May 27, 1866, obtained on the condition of the sovereign of Egypt raising his annual tribute to the sultan's civil list from 80,000 purses, or £376,000, to 150,000 purses, or £705,000, the succession to the throne of Egypt was made direct, from father to son, instead of descending, after the Turkish law, to the eldest heir. By a firman, issued June 8, 1873, the Sultan granted to the Khedive the hitherto withheld rights of concluding treaties with foreign powers, and of maintaining armies, thereby raising him to the rank of absolute sovereign. The administration of Egypt is carried on by a council of state of four military and four civil dignitaries, appointed by the Khedive. An attempt to form representative institutions was made in 1867, when the Khedive created a body called the Chamber of Delegates, chosen from among the most prominent persons in the country, to advise, when called upon, in the conduct of public affairs.

Railways and Telegraphs.—There are about 1,400 miles of railway, and 4,000 miles of telegraph; railways and telegraphs being state property.

History.—Until a very recent period almost the only knowledge of the history of ancient Egypt was such as could be obtained from Herodotus, the Greek historian, who repeated what the priests told him, and the incidental allusions in the Scriptures of the Old Testament. The discovery of the key to the interpretation of the hieroglyphical inscriptions, and a careful study of the evidence afforded by ancient monuments, has enabled investigators to construct a more authentic history. It may be briefly stated that about 2000 years before the Christian era, Egypt was divided into several small kingdoms. The Chaldean and Phœnician herdsmen obtained a footing in the country, and established a dynasty, known as the Hyskos, or Shepherd Kings; that they were driven out by Amasis, king of Thebes, who thus attained to the supreme rule; that two great monarchs, Thothmes III. and Rameses II. (supposed to be the legendary Sesostris), in the 15th and 14th centuries B.C., greatly extended the limits of their dominions, and made Egypt one of the most powerful empires in the world. About 26 dynasties are enumerated by modern Egyptologists, before the conquest of the country by the Persian Cambyses, 525 B.C. The country continued under the Persian yoke till the time of Alexander the Great, who, having conquered Persia, built the city of Alexandria. He was succeeded by Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, 323 years B.C. Ten kings of that name succeeded each other, till Cleopatra, the sister of the last Ptolemy, ascended the throne; when Egypt became a Roman province, and continued so till the reign of Omar, the second caliph of the successors of Mahomet, who drove out the Romans, after it had been in their hands 700 years. When the power of the caliphs declined, Saladin, in 1171, set up the order of the Mamelukes, who consolidated their power in 1250. In the 16th century, Selim, a Turkish emperor, conquered it. The French invaded the country in 1798, under Bonaparte, but they were driven from it by the British in 1802. In 1811, Mehemet Ali became master of Egypt by the massacre of the Mamelukes. In 1867 the Turkish government acknowledged, as ruler of Egypt, the newly invested Khedive, who misgoverned till 1879, when he was deposed in favour of his son Tewfik, who governed under the joint control of England and France. In 1882 there was a rebellion led by Arabi Pasha, who was soon defeated and banished. France retired from the control when the rebellion broke out, and the responsibility of maintaining the Khedive's government devolved upon England.

EHINGEN, é'-hing-en, a town of Wurtemberg, on the Danube, 14 miles S.W. of Ulm. There is an old ratterhaus, a fine ancient church, and three other churches. Manf. Cotton goods, syrup, starch, and vinegar. Pop. 3,000.

EHNINGEN, en'-ing-en, a town of Wurtemberg, 21 miles S.E. of Stuttgart. Pop. 5,000.

EHRENBERG, CHRISTIAN GOTTFRIED, air'-en-bairg', a distinguished German microscopist and naturalist, who made several scientific expeditions into various parts of the world; among which may be noticed one with Humboldt into the Ural and also the Altai mountains. He wrote largely on his favourite pursuits, and investigated the fossil forms of microscopic organic beings with success. He is a member of most of the scientific bodies of Europe.

Born at Delitsch, 1795; died 1876.

EHRENBREITSTEIN, air'-en-brit'-stine, "broad stone of honour," a first-class fortress of the Prussian states, on the summit of a stupendous rock, 490 feet high, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite Coblentz. It was originally a Roman fortress, and was, without success, besieged by the French, in 1632 and 1688. In 1799 it was taken by the French, and demolished after the peace of Luneville. In 1815 it was restored to the government of Prussia, and is now capable of containing 14,000 men. At the bottom lies the town of Thal-Ehrenbreitstein, where a large trade in wine, corn, and iron is carried on, and two cattle-markets and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,700.

EHRENFRIEDERSDORF, air'-en-frē'-ders-dorf, a town of Saxony, in a very elevated position, 44 miles S.W. of Dresden. There is a fine old church. Manf. Lace and hosiery. Lead and iron are worked in the neighbourhood, and a trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 2,700.

EHUD, ē'-hud, "he that praises," a famous judge of Israel, who slew Eglon, king of Moab.

EIBENSCHUTZ, i'-ben-shoots, an old town of Austria, province of Moravia, beautifully situated in a valley at the confluence of the Oslama with the Igla, 11 miles S.W. of Brüna. Manf. Black earthenware. Pop. 3,000.

EIBENSTOCK, i'-ben-stok, a town of Saxony, on the right bank of the Mulda, 7 miles from Schwartzenburg. Manf. Lace, muslins, tobacco, tin ware, and chemicals. Pop. 5,800.

EICHORN, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, ike'-horn, a German professor of oriental and biblical literature in the university of Gottingen. He filled several important posts, and, in 1819, was appointed privy councillor of justice for the kingdom of Hanover. His writings, illustrative of oriental and biblical literature, are numerous, and procured for him a reputation of being amongst the most learned and distinguished scholars of Germany.

Born at Dorrenzimmern, 1752; died 1827.

EICHSTADT, ike'-stat (oak town), a town of Bavaria, on the left bank of the Altmühl, 30 miles from Augsburg. It has an old Gothic cathedral, several churches, a Capuchin convent, gymnasium, a palace of the duke of Leuchtenberg, a town-house, built in the 15th century, and the old castle of St. Hilebald, now used as a barracks, on an eminence 1,200 feet high. There are several open squares, in one of which is a statue of St. Hilebald. Manf. Woollen and cotton wares, earthenware, hardware, and there are some breweries. Pop. 7,000. The town was of Roman origin, and named Aureatum. The bishopric was founded in 735. After being in the possession of various powers, this place passed, in 1805, into the hands of the Bavarian government. In 1815 it was made the capital of a principality of the same name, and bestowed on Eugene Beauharnais.

EICKWALD, EDUARD, ike'-wold, Russian naturalist, who has travelled extensively for scientific purposes, and published many works of high value on zoology, botany, mineralogy, and geology. After holding professorships at Kasan and Wilna, he was, in 1838, appointed professor of mineralogy and zoology at St. Petersburg. He is a member of the principal European scientific societies.

Born at Mattau, 1795.

EIDER, i'-der, a river of Prussia, rising 8 miles from Kiel, in Holstein, and, after a W. course for 90 miles, falling into the German Ocean at Tonning. By means of the Eider and the Schleswig-Holstein canal, water communication is established between the North Sea and the Baltic.

EIDSVOLD, ides'-vold, a town of Norway, 34 miles N.E. of Christiana. There are mineral waters in the neighbourhood, which make it a place of considerable resort. This place is remarkable on account of its being the scene of the meeting of the Norwegian delegates, who, in 1814, when the constitution was formed and sworn to, declared Norway independent, and Christian Frederick, prince of Denmark, king.

EIG, or EGG, eg, an island off the W. coast of Scotland, 12 miles from the mainland, in Inverness-shire. It is 4½ miles long and 2½ broad, and consists mostly of heathy pastures, upon which cattle are reared. The Scuir of Eig, at its S. extremity, attains a height of 1,339 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. about 300. Lat. 56° 57′ N. Lon. 6° 10′ W.—This island is remarkable on account of the numerous caves with which its coasts are indented. In one of these, according to tradition, the M'Donalds, inhabitants of the islands, concealed themselves from the pursuit of their enemies, the M'Leods of the island of Skye; but being discovered, fires were kindled at the mouth of the cave, and the M'Donalds suffocated to a man.

EILENBURG, i'-len-berg, a walled town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on an island of the river Mulde. Manf. Cotton cloth, woollen yarn, tobacco, starch, vinegar, and brandy. Pop. 10,200.

EILETHYIA, or ELKAB, i-le-thy'-i-a, a ruinous town of Egypt, containing the remains of several small temples, and some interesting rock tombs.

EIMBECK, or EINBECK, ime'-bek, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, on the Ilme, 40 miles S.E. of Hanover. It is surrounded by old walls, with five gates. Manf. Hosiery, linen fabrics, leather, tobacco, and chemicals. There are breweries and distilleries. Pop. 6,200.

EIMEO, i'-me-o, one of the Society Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean, 30 miles N.W. of Tahiti. It is 9 miles long and 5 wide, and consists of well cultivated valleys, and steep hills covered with forests. It was in this island that the efforts of the missionaries to introduce Christianity into Polynesia first met with success, and the London Missionary Society has now a mission there. Pop. 1,300. Lat. 17° 30′ S. Lon. 150° 10′ W.

EINDHOVEN, inde'-ho-ven, a town of Holland, province of North Brabant, near the junction of the Einde with the Dommet. It is a busy town, with a large market place. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, hats, vinegar, and tobacco. Pop. 3,000.

EINSIEDELN, ine'-see-deln, a town of Switzerland, in the valley of the Sihl, 9 miles N.E. of Schwytz. It has a famous Benedictine abbey, founded in the 9th century, and connected with which is a marble chapel with an image of the Virgin, which, on the 14th September, annually attracts 150,000 pilgrims. In 1798 the French despoiled this shrine of its riches. The present abbey was built early in the 18th century. There are nearly 80 inns and ale-houses for the accommodation of pilgrims. Pop. 7,700.

EINURU, ine-oo-roo', a town in the S. of India, containing ten temples. Lat. 13° 3′ N. Lon. 75° 16′ E.

EISENACH, ise'-nak, a town of the grand duchy of Saxe-Weimar, Germany, on the Hörsel, 45 miles W. of Weimar. The town is surrounded by walls, with five gates, the houses in general not well built; and it has a ducal palace, a town-hall, mint, prison, hospitals, a gymnasium, and several schools. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and linen goods, soap, white-lead, meerschaum pipes, leather, and carpets. Pop. 18,000. —In its neighbourhood is the castle of Wartburg, formerly the residence of the landgraves of Thuringia. Between 1521 and 1522, Luther passed ten months' imprisonment in this abode, under the friendly arrest of the elector of Saxony, and called it his Patmos. The chapel in which he preached, and the small study, in which it is asserted that he threw his inkstand at the head of the devil, is still shown.

EISENBERG, i'-sen-bairg, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Saxe-Altenburg, near the Saale, 26 miles E. of Weimar. There are a castle, observatory, town-house, and lyceum. Five annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,300.

EISENBURG, i'-sen-boorg, a county of Western Hungary. It is mountainous, with extensive plains and valleys, watered by the Raab and its tributaries. There are extensive and valuable forests. The capital is Steinmangen. Pop. 294,900.

EISENERZ, or INNERBERG, i'-sen-airtz, a town of Austria, in Styria. There is a Gothic church, built in the 13th century. The "iron mountain," which gives name to the town, is almost a mass of iron ore, which has been worked for a thousand years. Pop. 2,600.

EISENSTADT, i'-sen-stat, a free town of East Hungary, on the Leytha, 27 miles E. of Vienna. It is a walled town with a splendid palace, built in 1683 and enlarged in 1805, the property of the Esterhazy family, and a Franciscan monastery. In the suburbs is one of the largest conservatories in Europe, containing 70,000 specimens of exotic plants. Pop. 2,500.

EISFELD, ise'-feld, a town of Saxe-Meiningen, Germany, on the Werra, and at an elevation of 1,400 feet above the sea-level. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton goods, tiles, and tobacco. Pop. 2,800.

EISLEBEN, ise'-le-ben, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 24 miles N.W. of Merseburg. It consists of the old town, surrounded by walls, with seven gates, the new town, and suburbs. Manf. Linen goods, potash, and tobacco, and in its vicinity are silver and copper mines. Pop. 18,500. Here Martin Luther was born in 1483, and here he died in 1546. The pulpit in which he preached is still preserved in the church of St. Andrew.

EJEA, ai-hai'-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Saragossa, 30 miles W. of the town of that name. There are the remains of ancient walls and gates, and beautiful promenades on the banks of the rivers Luesia and Arva de Biel, which unite here. Manf. Linen and hempen fabrics. Pop. 2,400.

EKATERINEBURG, or CATHERINENBURG, ai-kat-e-rin-boorg', a fortified town of Russia, on both banks of the Isset, on the eastern slope of the Ural Mountains. It has several churches, consisting either of wood or stone. Great works are carried on for the Russian government, in iron-foundries and forges, for the manufacturing of cannon and anchors. An immense copper coinage is also produced; and the place is a seat of a council of mines. Standing on the high road between Russia and Siberia, it is a place of considerable trade, and in the vicinity are the gold mines of Niviansk and Beresoff. Pop. 25,133. Lat. 56° 50′ N. Lon. 61° 7′ E.—This place was founded by Peter the Great, in 1723.

EKATERINODAR, ai-kat'-e-rino-dar', a town of Russia, on the right bank of the Kuban, and about 100 miles from its mouth. There is a cathedral, with six wooden towers. It is the capital of the Cossacks of the Black Sea. Pop. 22,432. Lat. 45° 5′ N. Lon. 39° E.

EKATERINOGRAD, ai-kat-e-rin-o-grad', a town and fortress of Russia, in the government of Caucasus, on both sides of the Terek. It forms an important military post of the Cossacks of the line, and was founded, in 1777, by prince Potemkin, in memory of whom the empress Catherine II. erected a stone triumphal arch. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 43° 40′ N. Lon. 44° 3′ E.

EKATERINOSLAV, ai-kat'-e-re-nos-laf', a fortified town of European Russia, the capital of the government of the same name, on the Dnieper, 250 miles N.E. of Odessa. Manf. Cloths and silks. There is a large annual wool fair. Pop. 41,096. Lat. 48° 27′. Lon. 35° 5′ E.—This place was founded in honour of the empress Catharine II. in 1787.

EKATERINOSLAV, a government of Russia, to the N. and E. of the Sea of Azov. It comprises the district of Taganrog and the country of the Azovian Cossacks, but two-thirds of the country are barren steppes. Cattle grazing is extensively carried on. Area, 25,319 square miles. Pop. 1,697,061.

EKHMIM, ek'-mim, a town of Upper Egypt, on the Nile, 52 miles from Siout. Pop. about 3,000.

EKRON, or ACCARON, e-kron, "barrenness," a chief city of Philistia.

ELAGABALUS. (See HELIOGABALUS.)

ELAH, e'-la, "an oak" or "a curse," a king of Israel.—Also a place near which David slew Goliath.

ELAM, e'-lam, "a young man or virgin," a son of Shem, founder of the ancient Persian empire.

EL ARAISCH, el-a-raish', "the garden of pleasure," a fortified seaport of Morocco, in the province of Fez. It is now in a semi-ruinous condition. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 35° 13′ N. Lon. 6° 9′ W.

EL-AHSA, el-ah'-sa, a fine oasis, or fertile district of Eastern Arabia. The date-gardens are extensive and productive. Pop. 50,000.

ELAMBAZAR, e'-lam-ba-zar', a town of India, on the left bank of the Hadjee, 90 miles N.W. of Calcutta. It is a great mart for rice. Pop. 3,000.

ELATH, e'-lath, "kind, strength," or "an oak," a town of Arabia, on the eastern gulf of the Red Sea.

ELBA, el'-ba, an island of Italy, in the Mediterranean, separated from the Italian coast by the Channel of Piombino, which is about 5 miles wide. The island is 18 miles long, with a varying breadth between 3 and 10. It is mountainous, with a precipitous coast. The climate is temperate and healthy, except in some of the low districts, near the shore. Pro. Wine and fruit. Minerals. Iron, loadstone, alum, salt, and marble. The chief town is PORTO FERRAJO. Pop. 22,000.—This island has acquired historical celebrity, as the residence of Napoleon I. from 3rd May, 1814, to 26th February, 1815, when he sailed on his expedition to France.

EL-BASSAN, a town of European Turkey, province of Albania, 64 miles S.E. of Scutari, on a small stream running into the Scombi. Pop. 3,000.

EL-KHARGEH, a town, near an oasis of the same name, in Upper Egypt. In the vicinity are the remains of a great temple 142 feet long, 63 wide, and 30 feet high, and of some smaller temples. Pop. 3,000.

ELBE, elb, a river of Germany, rising amid the mountains called the Riesengebirge, between Silesia and Bohemia, and, after a winding course of 650 miles, falling into the German Ocean at Cuxhaven. In its course it receives 17 considerable rivers, and about 70 small streams, and drains an area of 56,000 square miles. At its mouth it is 10 miles wide, and it is connected by canals with the Oder and the Trave, an affluent of the Baltic.

ELBERFELD, el'-ber-felt, an important manufacturing town of Prussia, on both sides of the Wupper, 16 miles N.E. of Dusseldorf. It is an irregularly-built place, and is the seat of several commercial companies. Manf. Linen, cotton, ribbons, lace, merinoes, tapes, fancy woollen goods, and velvets. It is celebrated for its Turkey-red dyeworks, to which large quantities of yarn are sent from Britain, and there are extensive bleach fields. The town is united by a bridge with BARMEN. Pop. 106,363.

ELBERT, el'-bert, a county in the western district of Georgia, United States, between Savannah and Broad rivers. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 9,200.—The capital is Elberton.

ELBEUF, or ELBŒUF, el'-be(r)f, a town of France, on the left bank of the Seine, 12 miles S. of Rouen. It is an important manufacturing place in connection with the woollen trade, and there are more than 200 factories. The principal public buildings are the churches of St. Jean Baptiste and St. Étienne, in both of which are some fine specimens of painted glass. Manf. Woollen cloth and flannel. Pop. 23,000.

ELBING, el'-bing, a river rising in the Lake of Drousen, and falling into the Frische Haff, a large inlet of the Baltic.

ELBING, a town of Prussia, on the river Elbing, 35 miles S.E. of Dantzig. Its streets are narrow and the houses lofty. The chief buildings are several churches, the most remarkable of which are the Marienkirche, erected in the 14th century, a public library, and several charitable institutions. Manf. Linen and cotton cloth, leather, vitriol, oil, sail-cloth, tobacco, sugar, starch, soap, and chicory. PILAU, about five miles distant, is the port. Pop. 35,842.

ELBINGERODE, el-bin'-ge-rode, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, on the Rohbach, which here falls into the Bude. It is situated about 1,500 feet above the sea level. There are large iron mines in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

ELBOGEN, el-bo'-gen, a fortified town of Bohemia, on a steep rock, round which the river Eger winds. There are seven churches, one of them a fine Gothic building; an old castle, now used as a prison, and a town-house. Manf. Porcelain. Pop. 2,000.

ELBURG, el'-boorg, a fortified town of Holland, in the province of Gelderland, on the Zuyder Zee. It is traversed by the Oostbeck, over which there are five bridges. Pop. 2,100.

ELBURZ, el-boorz', a mountain of Asia, the culminating point of the Caucasus, 18,500 feet high. (See CAUCASUS.)

ELBURZ, a lofty mountain range, running along the southern border of the Caspian Sea. Demavend, 21,000 feet high, is probably the loftiest summit.

ELCHE, el'-kai', a town of Spain, province of Alicant, near the Eldor, and about 2 miles from the sea. The aspect of the town, encircled by plantations of palm trees, is quite Oriental, except that the streets are wide and clean. The church of Santa Maria has a large dome, and a famous organ. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton goods, cigars, soap, oil, and brandy. There is a large trade in cattle, rice, dates, and wool. Pop. 19,500.

ELCHE, DE-LA-SIENA, a town of Spain, 35 miles S.W. of Albacete. Manf. Linen, woollen, and hempen fabrics, wine, and oil. There is a good trade in hemp, esparto, silk, grain, and cattle. Pop. 3,000.

ELCHINGEN, el'-shing-en, a village of Bavaria, on the Danube, 8 miles below Ulm. In 1805 the Austrians were defeated near this village by the French, under Marshal Ney, who was created Duke of Elchingen.

ELDA, ail'-da, a town of Spain, on the Elda, 26 miles N.W. of Alicante. Manf. Soap, paper esparto, lace, and leather. There is a large annual fair. Pop. 4,000.

ELDAD, el'-dad, "loved of God," one of the elders of Israel, who prophesied among the people.

ELDAGSEN, el-dag'-sen, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, 15 miles S.W. of Hanover. Manf. Starch and tiles. Pop. 2,200.

ELDE, eld, a river of Germany, rising in Lake Muritz, and, after forming several other lakes in its course, falling into the Elbe near Dömitz.

ELDON, JOHN SCOTT, Earl of, el'-don, was the son of a small tradesman and publican, of Newcastle. He was educated first at the grammar school of his native town, and, after passing through the University of Oxford, where his career was nearly stopped by his making a runaway marriage, he entered himself a student of the Middle Temple in 1773, and took his degree of Master of Arts in the following year. After patient and laborious study, he rose into notice, and in 1783 was returned member of parliament for Weobly. In 1787 he was appointed chancellor of the bishopric and county palatine of Durham; and, in the following year, solicitor-general. In 1793 he was made attorney-general, and in 1799 was raised to the chief-justiceship of the Common Pleas, with a seat in the House of Lords, as Baron Eldon. In 1801 he became lord chancellor, which office he finally resigned in 1827. In 1821 he had been created Viscount Encombe and Earl of Eldon.

Born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1751; died 1838.

EL DORADO, eldo-ra'-do, a county of the United States, in the N. of California. Area, 2,000 square miles. It has minerals and gold in abundance. Pop. 10,000.—The capital is Calloma.

ELEANOR, el'-e-nor, duchess of Guienne, succeeded her father, William IX., at the age of 15, in 1137, and the same year married Louis VII., king of France. She accompanied him to the Holy Land, where she is said to have intrigued with her uncle, Raymond, prince of Antioch, and a young Turk named Saladin. A separation ensued between her and her husband, and in 1153 she married the duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II., king of England, which occasioned a succession of wars between the two kingdoms. Her jealousy of Henry, and subsequent conduct to Fair Rosamond, have afforded a copious subject to poets and romance-writers. She excited her sons to rebel against their father, for which she was imprisoned sixteen years. On the accession of Richard I. she was released, and in his absence in the Holy Land, was made regent. Her last years were passed as a nun in the abbey of Fontevrault.

Born 1122; died 1204.

ELEAZAR, el'-e-ai'-zar, high priest of the Jews, succeeded his brother, Simon the Just. He is said to have given a copy of the Hebrew scriptures to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who caused the same to be translated into Greek by seventy interpreters, which version is now known by the name of the Septuagint.

Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

ELECTRA, e-lek'-tra. Of this name, frequent in Greek legend, the following are the most remarkable:—One of the Oceanides, wife of Atlas, and mother of Dardanus, by Jupiter.—A daughter of Atlas and Pleione. She was changed into a constellation.—A daughter of Agamemnon, king of Argos. She first incited her brother Orestes to revenge his father's death, by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra. Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades, and she became mother of two sons, Strophius and Medon. Her adventures and misfortunes afforded subjects for the Greek dramatists, Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

ELEPHANTA ISLE, called by the natives GHARIPOOR, "full of caves," a small island, situate between Bombay and the western coast of India. It owes its celebrity to its wonderful cave and mythological sculptures. Opposite to the landing-place is a colossal statue of an elephant, from which the Portuguese named the island Elephanta. Lat. 18° 57′ N. Lon. 73° E.

ELEPHANT RIVER, a river of Cape Colony, which has a course of 140 miles, and enters the Atlantic about lat. 31° S., lon. 18° E.

ELEPHANTINE, el-e-fan-ti'-ne, a small island in the Nile, opposite Assouan, or Syene, on the confines of Nubia, remarkable for the ruins with which it is covered. In its neighbourhood are extensive granite-quarries, and remains of the temples erected by the Pharaohs. It was anciently called Abu, or the ivory island, from its having been a centre of the trade in ivory.

ELEUSIS, now LESFINA, e-lu'-sis, a decayed village of Attica, but, in ancient times, a city of Greece, near the northern shore of the Gulf of Salamis. The ancient highway which led to Athens is still the modern road, and the plain around the village is covered with scattered ruins. In 1356 B.C. was established the great festival observed every fourth year by many of the Grecian states, but more particularly by the people of Athens every fifth year. It was the most celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece, whence it is often called, by way of eminence, mysteria, "the mysteries." It was sacred to Ceres and Proserpine; everything contained a mystery, and Ceres herself was known only by the name of Achthæa, from the sorrows and grief (achthos) which she suffered for the loss of her daughter. This mysterious secrecy was solemnly observed, and enjoined on all the votaries of the goddess, and if any one ever appeared at the celebration either intentionally or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately punished with death. Persons of both sexes and all ages were initiated at this solemnity, and it was looked upon as so heinous a crime to neglect this sacred part of religion, that it was one of the heaviest accusations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. They were transferred from Eleusis to Rome, in the reign of Adrian, where they were observed with the same ceremonies as before, though, perhaps, with more freedom and licentiousness. They lasted about 1800 years, and were, at last, abolished by Theodosius the Great.

ELEUTHERA, el-u'-the-ra, one of the largest of the Bahama islands, in the W. Indies. It is 80 miles long, with a breadth of 10. Pop. 5,300. Lat. 25° 11′ N. Lon. 76° 15′ W.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS, e-lu'-ther-op'-olis, a great city of Judea, 14 miles N.W. of Hebron. The only remains are extensive ruins near the modern village of Beto-Gabra.

ELFDAL, elf'-dl, a village of Sweden, in Dalecarlia, remarkable for its quarries of porphyry. Lat. 61° 14′ 30″ N. Lon. 13° 58′ E.

ELFSBORG, a government of Sweden.

ELGIN, el'-gin, a royal and parliamentary burgh, the chief town of the county of Elgin, or Morayshire, on the Lossie, about 5 miles above its influx into the German Ocean. The river is here crossed by several stone bridges. In the middle of the High-street stands the church of St. Giles, erected on the site of the old church in 1828. The famous cathedral, founded in 1224, is now a ruin. Among the chief public buildings are Gray's hospital for the sick poor, founded by a bequest of £20,000 made by Dr. Alexander Gray, of Bengal, and opened in 1819, and the Elgin or Anderson's Institution for the reception of old persons, and the education of the young, established and richly endowed by General Anderson, a native of the town, who bequeathed £70,000 for the purpose. There are a collegiate parish church, and 9 other places of worship, and a large lunatic asylum. The ruins of the cathedral, and the remains of an old convent south of the town, and a castle on Lady-hill, contain many objects of interest to the archæologist and architect. There are 12 annual fairs and a weekly grain market. The port is Lossiemouth. Pop. 8,741.

ELGIN, or ELGINSHIRE, formerly Morayshire, a maritime county of the north-east of Scotland, bounded N. by the Moray Firth, S. by Inverness-shire, W. by Nairnshire, and E. by Banffshire. The surface is generally flat along the sea-coast, but there are some precipitous cliffs and raised beaches. There are hills of moderate elevation and fine fertile valleys in the interior. There are extensive sheep pastures in the hilly districts, and there are large forests and commons of furze, and broom. The climate is mild and dry.

Rivers.—The chief are the Spey, Lossie, and Finehorn, noted for beautiful scenery; and there are several lochs.
Minerals.—Freestone and slate.
Area.—531 square miles.
Chief Towns.—ELGIN and FORRES.

ELGIN, a town of Illinois, United States, on both sides of the Fox river, 34 miles N.W. of Chicago. It is a busy trading place. Manf. Agricultural implements and carriages. Pop. 10,057.

ELGIN, THOMAS BRUCE, seventh earl of, after finishing his university education in 1793, accompanied the Prussian army in its operations in Germany. In 1795 he was made envoy extraordinary, and sent to Berlin, and, in 1799, dispatched to Constantinople in the same capacity. Here he remained till the French were expelled from Egypt, in 1802. In 1800 he made a journey to Athens, for the purpose of recovering some of her remains of Grecian art, and was so far successful, as to make an excellent collection, which, in 1816, was purchased by the government, and placed in the British Museum, where it is known as the "Elgin Marbles."

Born 1777; died at Paris, 1841.

ELGIN, JAMES BRUCE, eighth earl of, was educated at Oxford, where he graduated in 1835. In 1841 he was returned member of parliament for Southampton; but on the death of his father in the same year, succeeded to the earldom, and in the following year was appointed governor of the island of Jamaica. In 1846 he became governor-general of Canada, where the character of his policy rendered him an especial favourite, not only with those over whom he had been called to rule, but with the ministries in England. In 1849 he was created an English peer, and in 1854 appointed to the lord-lieutenancy of Fifeshire, Scotland. War having broken out between England and China, Lord Elgin was, in 1857, sent out by the British government as plenipotentiary to China, to obtain satisfactory terms of peace, or, if this could not be done, to prosecute the contest with vigour. The Indian mutiny of the same year, however, prevented him from carrying into effect his instructions so soon as he would otherwise have done; for not only was part of the force destined for China diverted from its route and sent to Calcutta, but he himself left Hong-Kong with all the troops that could be spared, to go to the assistance of Lord Canning. Returning to China at the end of the year, he immediately made a demand of redress for injuries sustained by the British, and, upon the refusal of the Chinese, through Commissioner Yeh, to comply, Canton was attacked and captured. Lord Elgin then, in conjunction with Baron Gros, the French plenipotentiary, determined to proceed with an armed force to the vicinity of Pekin, and reached the mouth of the Peiho river, which he found strongly defended by forts on each bank. These being taken by Admiral Sir M. Seymour, the forces proceeded to Tien-tsin, and there the plenipotentiaries were met by Chinese commissioners, to adjust the terms of a treaty. After much procrastination, on various pretexts, which were met by Lord Elgin with great determination, the commissioners agreed to execute a treaty, in conformity with the terms proposed to them, and on the 26th June, 1858, this was signed at Tien-tsin. (See CHINA, TIEN-TSIN, and other relative articles.) This great point gained, Lord Elgin proceeded to Japan, and obtained from that government a treaty, signed Aug. 26, 1858, which opened the Japanese ports to British commerce, and placed this country on a footing with America and other nations that had already concluded commercial treaties with Japan. After effecting this important service his lordship returned to England; but, in consequence of the refusal of the Chinese to carry out the terms of the treaty of Tien-tsin, and the stoppage of the English envoy, Mr. Bruce, in the Pei-ho, and the subsequent repulse of the British gunboats at the Taku forts, Lord Elgin and Baron Gros were obliged to repair again to China in 1860, accompanied by a force sufficiently large to maintain the honour of the British and French arms. Pekin was occupied soon after the capture of the Taku forts and the battles of Chang-kia-wan and Pa-li-chian, and a convention was signed in ratification of the treaty of 1858. Lord Elgin, who had filled the office of postmaster-general after his return from China in 1859, succeeded Earl Canning in 1861 as viceroy of India, where his health failed, and he died after little more than two years' occupancy of the high position.

Born in London, 1811; died in India, 1863.

ELGOIBAR, el-goy'-bar, a town of Spain, on the right bank of the Deva, 22 miles S.E. of Bilbao. Manf. Iron, arms, and cutlery. There is a trade in wool, cattle, and sheep. Pop. 2,000.

ELGUETA, el-goo-ai'-ta, a town of Spain, in a lofty situation, 30 miles S.W. of San Sebastian. Manf. Linen and earthenware. Pop. 1,500.

ELI, e'-li, high priest and judge of Israel, who attained that office about 1156 B.C. Though a good man, he was timid, and did not exert himself in correcting the immoralities of his family. His two sons, Hophni and Phineas, were most abandoned characters, on which account the Lord appeared to Samuel, and denounced judgment upon the house of Eli, who received the tidings with pious resignation. Shortly afterwards, the Israelites were defeated by the Philistines, the ark taken, and the sons of Eli slain. When the news reached him, he fell from his seat, and broke his neck, aged 98.

ELIAB, e-li'-ab, "God my father," the elder brother of David.—Also, a brave man of Gad, in the army of David.

ELIAKIM, e-li'-a-kim, "god of the resurrection," the treasurer to King Hezekiah.

ELIAS, MOUNT, ST., a volcanic mountain of North America. (See AMERICA, NORTH.)

ELIAS MOUNTS, e-li'-as, the name of many summits in Greece, the highest of which is in the Morea, 10 miles from Mistra. Height, 7,829 feet.

ELIASHIB, e-li'-a-shib, "god of conversion," a high priest of the Jews, after the captivity.

ELIE DE BEAUMONT. (See BEAUMONT.)

ELIEZER, a-li-e'-zer, "God is my help," the faithful steward of Abraham.—Also, a prophet, who reproved Jehoshaphat.

ELIHU, e-li'-hu, "he is my God himself," the youngest and wisest of the four friends of Job.

ELIJAH, e-li'-ja, an eminent prophet of Israel, in the reigns of Ahab and Ahaziah. He was greatly persecuted by the wife of Ahab, but escaped all her machinations, and was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire.

ELIMELECK, e-lim'-e-lek, "my God is king," the father-in-law of Ruth.

ELIOT, JOHN, el'-yot, a pious divine, called the "Apostle of the Indians," was educated at Cambridge; but on embracing puritanism, he, in 1631, emigrated to New England, and became pastor of a congregation of Independents at Roxbury, where he established a grammar-school. In 1646 he began to learn the Indian language, that he might devote himself to the conversion of the natives. In this he met with great success, and obtained a considerable influence over the various tribes. He translated the Bible into their language, and several pieces of practical divinity. Baxter says of this divine, "There was no man on earth whom I honoured above him." A handsome memorial, to perpetuate his name, was erected in the "Forest Hills Cemetery," at Roxbury.

Born 1604; died 1690.

ELIOT, SIR JOHN, English patriot, a distinguished leader of the parliamentary opposition to the arbitrary measures of Charles I. He was imprisoned for his boldness, and died in the Tower.

Born 1590; died 1632.

ELIOT, GEORGE. (See EVANS, MARIAN.)

ELIOTT, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, Lord Heathfield, when young, was sent to Leyden, and thence to the military school in Picardy. He afterwards entered the Prussian service as a volunteer, and returned to Scotland in 1735. Not long after this, he joined the engineer corps at Woolwich, and obtained an adjutancy in the 2nd troop of horse grenadiers, with which he went to Germany, and was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1759 he was appointed to raise the 1st regiment of light horse, with which he served on the continent with great reputation. On his recall from Germany, he was sent to the Havannah, in the reduction of which he had an eminent share. At the peace, the king conferred on his regiment the title of royal. In 1775 General Eliott was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland, whence he returned soon after, and was made governor of Gibraltar, for which important post no man could have been better fitted. He was very abstemious, his constant food being vegetables, and his drink water. He never allowed himself more than four hours' sleep at a time, and was so accustomed to a hardiness, that it became habitual, and enabled him to defend that important fortress against the formidable operations of the French and Spaniards, in 1782, with such persevering obstinacy, that the siege of Gibraltar will be found one of the most glorious incidents in military history. On his return to England, he was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Heathfield and Baron Gibraltar.

Born in Roxburghshire, Scotland, 1718; died at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1790.

ELIPHAZ, e-li'-faz, "the endeavour of God," a son of Esau.

ELIS, é-lis, a country of Peloponnessus, lying to the N. of Arcadia. It runs along the coast, and is watered by the river Alpheus. It was famous for the horses it produced, whose speed was so well known and tried at the Olympic games. The capital of the county was Elis, now Kaloscopi.

ELISABETH, e-liz'-a-beth, "God hath sworn," the wife of Zacharias, and mother of John the Baptist.

ELISAVETHGRAD, or ELIZABETGRAD, ai-le-za-vet'-grad, a town and fortress of European Russia, in the government of Kherson, on the Ingul, 130 miles N. of Kherson. It is a military place, and has a magazine and an hospital. An annual fair is held, and very largely attended. Pop. 51,774.

ELISAVETOPOL, or GANJAH, ai-le-za-vet'-o-pol, a fortified town of Georgia, 90 miles from Tiflis. There are many churches and mosques. Pop. 15,000, principally Tartars and Armenians.

ELISHA, or ELISEUS, e-lī'-sha, "salvation of God," a Hebrew prophet, and the successor of Elijah, who called him from the plough. He performed numerous miracles, and was held in great respect by the kings of Israel and Syria.

Died about 840 B.C.

ELISHEBA, e-lish'-e-ba, "God hath sworn," the wife of Aaron.

ELISSA, e-lis'-sa, (See DIDO.)

ELIZABETH, e-liz'-a-beth, a town of New Jersey, United States, 44 miles N.E. of Trenton. Pop. 2,500.

ELIZABETH, CAPE, the N.E. point of entrance into Cook's Inlet, N. America. Lat. 59° 9' N. Lon. 151° 18' W.

ELIZABETH, PORT, is situate on the W. side of Algoa Bay, Cape Colony, South Africa. It is the capital of a district of the same name, and the chief seaport and commercial town of the Eastern province. The public buildings are good, and nearly all the trade of the Eastern frontier and the interior passes through the town. The anchorage is not good. Pop. 15,000.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, was the daughter of Henry VIII. by Anne Boleyn. She was educated in the Protestant religion, and, in the reign of her sister Mary, was sent to the Tower, and the warrant for her execution was actually prepared, but the fear of the popular commotion her death would cause, saved her life, and she was afterwards removed to Woodstock, where she was kept till 1555, and then taken to the royal palace of Hatfield. On the death of her sister, in 1558, she was proclaimed queen, and Philip of Spain, the husband of Mary, made her an offer of marriage, which, after a considerable amount of coquetting, she civilly declined. Now was commenced the restoration of those religious reforms which had been proscribed in the previous reign, but with that prudence and moderation, which showed how well qualified she was to govern the destinies of the people, over whom she had been called to reign in such troublous times. One of her first measures was to send succours to the reforming party in Scotland, which produced the treaty of Edinburgh and the departure of the French from that country. She next gave her assistance to the French Huguenots, who put Havre de Grace into her hands, whilst she continued gradually to tighten the reins of government upon her own Catholic subjects, and such other religionists as would disturb the peace of the state by their zeal and violence. Dudley, earl of Leicester, became her favourite, and had the ambition to aspire to her hand, and no doubt would have gained it, had not the influence of Burleigh and the other ministers been more powerful than the Queen's own inclinations. In 1568 Mary Queen of Scots fled to England, but being a Catholic, and having offended Elizabeth, she was taken prisoner, and after being kept many years in confinement, was at last beheaded in Fotheringay castle. (See MARY.) The treatment of Mary, against whom she would appear to have contracted a feeling of jealousy, is one of the blackest spots in the reign of Elizabeth. She afterwards endeavoured to clear herself of the odium which the death of Mary raised against her, and caused Davison, her secretary, to be prosecuted for issuing the warrant for the execution; but such conduct only made her guilt more transparent in the eyes of the penetrating and thoughtful. The French and Spaniards having formed a league for the extirpation of heresy, Elizabeth was induced to protect the Protestants, and her assistance was of great effect in bringing about the separation of the United Provinces from the dominion of Philip II. The king of Spain, in return, sent a body of troops to invade Ireland; but they were all cut off by Lord Grey, the deputy. In the mean time, various offers of marriage were made to the queen, the most remarkable of which was that of the duke of Anjou, who came to England for the purpose of espousing her; but after staying some time, and after Elizabeth had taken up the pen to sign the marriage articles, she withdrew her hand, and broke off the alliance. In 1588, Philip of Spain sent against England his famous armada, to which the Pope gave the appellation of Invincible. It consisted of 130 vessels, carrying 2,431 pieces of artillery, 4,575 quintals of powder, and manned with about 27,000 soldiers and seamen. To oppose this formidable force, Elizabeth had 181 ships, manned by about 18,000 sailors. On this occasion the queen distinguished herself by her great presence of mind and inflexible courage. She rode on horseback through the camp at Tilbury, and inspired her people with heroism by her deportment and her speeches. The English fleet, however, assisted by the winds, prevented the Spaniards from landing, and the boasted armada was destroyed. The duke of Medina, who commanded the Spanish fleet, escaped, and arrived at Santander, in the Bay of Biscay, with no more than 60 sail out of his whole fleet, and these very much shattered. In speaking of this victory, Camden says, "Several monies were coined; some to commemorate the victory, with a fleet flying with full sails, and this inscription, Venit, vidit, fugit,—'It came, it saw, it fled;' others in honour of the queen, with fireships and a fleet all in confusion, inscribed Dux fœmina facti,—'A woman the leader of the exploit.'" In this same year, Leicester, her favourite, died, and Robert Devereux, earl of Essex took his place; but this nobleman, on account of treason, was executed in 1601. After this event, Elizabeth seems to have become weary of the world, for she never recovered the shock which the signing of the death-warrant of Essex gave her. The last weeks of her life were passed in a great state of mental prostration. Elizabeth was endeared to her subjects by the glory of her reign, by the wisdom of her measures, and by the frugality of her administration, which rendered the public taxes few and light. With great energy of character, she united much vanity, thought herself the most beautiful and accomplished of women, and was, besides, violent and haughty in her temper. She understood the learned languages, and some of her letters and prayers, written with her own hand are extant.

Born at Greenwich, 1538; died at Richmond, 1603.

ELIZABETH, ST., daughter of Andreas II., king of Hungary. She was brought up at the Court of Thuringia, and at the age of 14 married the Landgraf Louis IV., who was greatly influenced by her piety. Three children were born, but six years after the marriage, Louis died while at the Crusades, and his brother seized her dominions. She suffered great privations, which she endured with saintly resignation, but on the return of some of her husband's companions in arms, she recovered a portion of her revenues. Thenceforth she devoted her life to works of charity, tending the sick, even those most loathsomely diseased, and enduring abominable brutality from her confessor Conrad, who beat her cruelly, under the pretence of administering spiritual discipline, but really because she spent her money in charity. She bore his treatment with patience, believing it to be her duty so to do, but died at the age of 24, her death being accelerated by privations and bodily suffering. Montalembert has written her history, which also furnished materials for Kingsley's "Saint's Tragedy."

Born at Presburg, 1207; died 1231.

ELIZABETH of Austria, daughter of the emperor Maximilian II., and married to Charles IX. of France, in 1570. She sent to Margaret, queen of Navarre, two books of her writing; one on the Word of God, and the other a relation of the chief events in France, during the time she resided there.

Born 1554; died in a convent, 1592.

ELIZABETH PETROVNA, daughter of the czar Peter the Great. In 1741 she usurped the imperial throne, by dethroning the infant Ivan, which was effected without the shedding of blood. At her accession, she made a vow that no capital punishments should take place in her reign. But her humanity was at least equivocal, as she afterwards inflicted upon the countesses Bestuchef and Lapoukin the punishment of the knout, and had their tongues cut out, for betraying some of her secret amours. Though dissolute in her manners, and the mother of several illegitimate children, she was extremely superstitious, and performed her devotions with rigorous exactness. She founded the University of Moscow, and the Academy of Art at St. Petersburg. In 1756 she joined Austria and France against Prussia, but died before the expiration of the Seven Years' War.

Born 1709; died 1762.

ELIZABETH STUART, queen of Bohemia, daughter of James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, was married in 1613 to Frederick Elector-Palatine, who was chosen by the Protestant princes of Germany to be king of Bohemia in 1619. A year afterwards he was driven from his throne by the Catholic League, and the royal family was driven into exile and resided in Holland. Frederick died in 1629, and his widow, who was the mother of 13 children, from whom she derived little comfort, at the age of 65 came to England, and lived in Craven House, Drury Lane. Her nephew, Charles II., did not take much notice of her during her lifetime, but had her buried in Westminster Abbey. One of her sons was the famous Prince Rupert, and her daughter Sophia married Ernest Augustus of Brunswick, afterwards elector of Hanover, and from her our present royal family is descended.

Born at Falkirk, 1596; died 1662.

ELIZABETHSTADT, é-liz-a-beth-stat, a royal free town of the Austrian empire in Transylvania, 36 miles N.E. of Hermannstadt. There are two fine churches and a monastery. Silk is cultivated, and considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 2,300, including many Armenians.

ELJAS, al'-has, a town of Spain, 58 miles N.W. of Caceres. A trade is carried on in linen, oil, flour, soap, grapes, and olives. Pop. 17,500.

ELKHART, elk'-hart, a county in the N. of Indiana, United States. Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 33,454.—Goshen is the capital.

ELKOSH, el-kosh', a town of Asiatic Turkey, 30 miles N. of Mosul. Pop. 2,500, all Roman Catholics.

ELLAND, el'-land, a township of England, in the W. riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles S.E. of Halifax. Manf. Coarse woollens. Pop. 8,278.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

ELLENBOROUGH, el'-len-bru (r), a village of England, in Cumberland, 6 miles from Cockermouth. Pop. 1,000.

ELLENBOROUGH, EDWARD LAW, first lord, an English judge. After completing his education at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, he became a student of law at the Inner Temple. On being called to the bar, he rapidly rose to the first posts of his profession. Between the year 1788-95 he was engaged as the leading counsel in defence of Warren Hastings: in 1801 he became attorney-general, entered the House of Commons, and received the order of knighthood. The following year he was created Baron Ellenborough, and was appointed lord chief justice of the court of King's Bench. In 1806 and 1807, he was a member of the Grenville, or "All the Talents" administration, retaining his judicial office. In 1815 he was one of the commissioners to investigate the conduct of the princess of Wales; in 1814 he was one of the judges at the trial of Lord Cochrane (see DUNDONALD, Earl of), and, four years afterwards, acted in the same capacity at the trial of William Hone. (See HONE.) He retired from the bench in the same year. He was a man of great abilities and force of character, but proud and sensitive, and it is said that courage exhibited by Hone in his defence, in opposition to him, hastened his death.

Born at Great Salkeld, Cumberland, 1750; died in London, 1818.

ELLENBOROUGH, EDWARD LAW, first Earl of, was the son of the preceding. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and in 1818 succeeded to the peerage as second baron. In 1828 he was appointed lord privy seal, in the duke of Wellington's administration; and president of the Board of Control in 1834 and again in 1841, in which year he superseded the earl of Auckland as governor-general of India, and under his government Scinde was annexed to the British crown. He made himself conspicuous by rhetorical proclamations and extravagant acts, such as carrying away in triumph the gates of the Juggernaut temple at Somnauth. In 1843 he was re-called, contrary to the wishes of the government of Sir Robert Peel, who in 1846 appointed him first lord of the Admiralty. In the previous year he had been created an earl, and had received the distinction of G.C.B. In the following year, with the fall of the ministry, he resigned his post, and after that time discussed in the House of Peers the affairs of India with considerable ability. In 1858 he was appointed, under the Derby administration, president of the Board of Control, which office he resigned the same year, in consequence of the censure inflicted on a severe letter written by him to Lord Canning, in reference to a proclamation issued by that nobleman, in his capacity of governor-general of India. Lord Ellenborough was a brilliant orator, and exercised great influence in the House of Lords. He was twice married, first to a daughter of the Marquis of Londonderry, and second to a daughter of Admiral Digby. He was divorced from his second wife, and leaving no issue, the title was extinct.

Born 1790; died 1871.

ELLENREIDER, MARIE, el-len-ré-der, a female painter of Germany, who studied at Munich and Rome, and was appointed court painter at Munich. Her chief productions, remarkable for graceful design, were altar pieces and Scriptural subjects.

Born at Constance, 1791; died 1863.

ELLESMERE, el'-meer, a town of Shropshire, 19 miles N.W. of Shrewsbury, near a beautiful lake or "mere," from which the name is derived. Pop. 2,013.

ELLESMERE, a port of Cheshire, on the left bank of the Mersey. There are large docks, wharfs, and piers. The chief business is the transhipment of iron ore. Pop. 2,200.

ELLESMERE, FRANCIS LEVESON GOWER EGERTON, Earl of, second son of the first duke of Sutherland, was educated at Oxford, and, from 1826 to 1830, represented Sutherlandshire in the House of Commons. In 1827 he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury; in the following year he became secretary for Ireland, and in 1830, secretary at war. On the death of his father, in 1833, he took the name of Egerton, and as Lord Francis Egerton, represented South Lancashire from 1835 to 1846. In this last year he was created earl of Ellesmere and Viscount Brackley, and in 1849 was elected president of the Asiatic Society. In 1855 he was created a knight of the Garter, and became colonel-commandant of the Lancashire yeomanry cavalry. Besides translations, chiefly from the German, especially a fine translation of "Faust," he has written works, in the form of tragedy, history, and biography, of considerable merit. He possessed one of the finest galleries of paintings in the kingdom.

Born in London, 1800; died 1857.

ELLICE ISLANDS, el'-lie, a group in the South Pacific, consisting of two large and numerous smaller islands. One is 13 miles, and another 5 miles in length. They are covered with cocoa nut and other trees. Lat. 8° 31′ S. Lon. 179° 21′ W.

ELLIOTSON, DR. JOHN, el'-yot-son, a distinguished English physician, who, from the opposition which his views met with in reference to the mesmeric treatment of patients, resigned some important appointments, and, in 1849, became physician to a mesmeric hospital in London. He made considerable contributions to medical science, and was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, of the Royal Society, and the founder and president of the London Phrenological Society.

Born in London, about 1800; died 1868.

ELLIOTT, EBENEZER, el'-yot, an English poet, who was an iron-merchant at Sheffield, and became famous as a writer of "Rhymes" against the "Corn Laws." These first appeared in a local paper, after their author had settled at Sheffield, and produced a powerful effect upon all who read them. When they re-appeared in a single volume, in conjunction with "The Ranter," he no longer sang in comparative obscurity, but commanded a wide circle of admirers. In 1834 a collected edition of his works was published. His effusions have procured for him the right of being emphatically the bard of Yorkshire, as he is certainly the poet of the poor and of the Corn-law struggle, before that ended in the triumphant achievement of the aspirations of his muse. He was successful in business, and the last eight years of his life were passed in affluence on an estate he had purchased near Barnsley. There is a statue to his memory at Sheffield.

Born at Masborough, Yorkshire, 1781; died 1849.

ELLIS, JOHN, el'-lis, an English poet, brought up a scrivener, and for many years deputy of his ward, and master of the Scriveners' Company. Mr. Ellis was the intimate friend of Dr. Johnson, and wrote several pieces in "Dodsley's Collection." He also published separately, "The Surprise, or Gentleman turned Apothecary," a tale in Hudibrastic verse; and "A Travesty of the Canto added by Maphæus to the Æneid."—In reference to this person, Dr. Johnson remarks to Boswell, "It is wonderful what is to be found in London. The most literary conversation that I ever enjoyed, was at the table of Jack Ellis, a money-scrivener, behind the Royal Exchange, with whom, at one period, I used to dine, generally once a week."

Born in London, 1698; died 1791.

ELLIS, GEORGE, one of the authors of the "Rolliad," to which he contributed "The Birth-day Ode," "The Ode on Dundas," &c., and was also a writer of the "Probationary Odes," and an acute contributor to the "Anti-Jacobin." His greatest work, however, is his "Specimens of the Early English Poets," which suggested Southey's "Specimens of the Later English Poets." He also produced "Specimens of the Early English Romances in Metre," which is another excellent work. Sir Walter Scott addressed to Ellis the 5th canto of "Marmion," and says, "He was the first converser

I ever saw. His patience and good-breeding made me often ashamed of myself, going off at score upon some favourite topic."
Born 1745; died 1815.

ELLIS, SIR HENRY, an English writer, who became connected, as a librarian, with the British Museum in 1805, and, in 1827, was made principal, which office he held till 1856, when he resigned it. During that time, he produced many antiquarian works; among which was an edition of "Brande's Popular Antiquities," which is highly esteemed. He also published original letters illustrative of English history, from autographs in the British Museum; and, in 1816, wrote the general introduction to the "Doomsday Book," which is considered an able performance. In 1832 he was created a knight of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic order, and, in 1838, was raised to the rank of knight bachelor.
Born in London, 1777; died 1869.

ELLIS, a county of Kansas, United States. Pop. 8,000.—Capital, Waxahachio.

ELLISTON, ROBERT WILLIAM, el'-lis-ton, a celebrated English actor, who was esteemed the best comedian of his time. "The Venetian Outlaw" was the only literary work he produced.
Born in London, 1774; died 1831.

ELLORA, el-lo'-ra, a decayed town of India, in the dominions of the Nizam, near Dowlatabad. The place is famous for the temples cut out of the solid rock, of which there are 19 large, besides several smaller. The most splendid is the Hindoo temple of Kailaso, which is entered by an ante-chamber 138 feet wide, and 88 feet deep, beyond which is a court 247 feet long, and 150 broad, in the centre of which is the temple itself, supported by pilasters and colossal elephants, and is 103 feet long and 56 broad, all cut out of the solid rock. In the great court are obelisks, and thousands of mythological figures of colossal size. Some of the other temples are Buddhist. Lat. 20° 2′ N. Lon. 75° 13′ E.

ELLORE, el-lo'-re, a town and military station in the district of Masulipatam, in the presidency of Madras, India, on both banks of the Jummulair, a torrent of the Eastern Ghauts. The climate is excessively hot, and very unhealthy. Lat. 16° 42′ N. Lon. 81° 10′ E. Pop. 25,092.

ELLSWORTH, els'-worth, a town of the state of Maine, United States, on both sides of the river Union, and 4 miles W. of Frenchman's Bay. A very large trade in the export of timber is carried on, and the coast and mackerel fisheries are very productive. Pop. 5,500.

It is well built, has a very fine high church, to which many pilgrimages are made, four other Roman Catholic churches, a Protestant church, gymnasium, and an old castle. Manf. Leather, ironware, crucibles, and wax. Pop. 3,000.

ELLWOOD, THOMAS, el'-wood, was bred in the Church of England, but was converted to Quakerism, through which he lost the favour of his father. He became reader to Milton, suffered imprisonment for his profession, and wrote a number of books in its defence. He also edited George Fox's Journal, and published a "History of the Old and New Testament;" a sacred poem on the life of David, &c.
Born 1639; died 1713.

ELM, elm, a parish and village of Switzerland, 10 miles S.W. of Glarus. Pop. 1,000. Although this place is 3,300 feet above the level of the sea, it is so encompassed by mountains, 8,000 feet high, that, during six months in the year, it is an entire stranger to the rays of the sun.

ELMINA, or ST. GEORGE DEL MINA, el-mé'-na, formerly capital of the Dutch settlements in Western Africa, and the strongest fortress on the Gold Coast. It was ceded to the British in 1872. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 5° 10′ N. Lon. 1° 40′ W.

ELMIRA, or NEWTON, el-mī'-ra, a post-township of Chemung county, New York, United States. Manf. Iron, steel, leather, and flour. It is connected by canal with the interior of Pennsylvania, and by railway with New York, Philadelphia, and other important places. Pop. 20,541.

There is a boat-building yard, and a large trade in grain is carried on. The annual cattle fair is well frequented. Pop. 5,000, including many Jews.

ELMSLEY, PETER, elms'-le, an eminent writer, and early contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," and also to the "Quarterly Review," on literary subjects. He became Camden professor of modern history at the University of Oxford, and was, besides, principal of St. Alban's Hall. As a Greek scholar, he was highly distinguished.
Born in London, 1773; died 1825.

ELNATHAN, el-nat'-than, "God has given," father-in-law of King Jehoiakim.

ELNE, eln, a town of France, department Pyrénées Orientales, 8 miles S.E. of Perpignan. The church, founded in the 11th century, is built on the model of the church of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem. Pop. 2,300.—This is the ancient Illiberis, where Hannibal first encamped after passing the Pyrenees.

EL-OBEID, el o'-baid, the capital of Kordofan, Africa, 230 miles from Sennaar. The dwellings are mostly composed of reeds, or straw, and sun-dried bricks. The inhabitants traffic in gold, hides, ivory, gum-arabic, and slaves. Pop. 30,000.

ELON, é-lon, "oak," or "grove," a judge of Israel.

ELPENOR, el-pé'-nor, in Homeric legend, one of the companions of Ulysses, changed into a hog by Circe's potions, and afterwards restored to his original shape. He fell from the top of a house where he was sleeping, and was killed.

ELPHIN, el'-fin, a town of Connaught, Ireland, 18 miles from Longford. Pop. 1,300.

ELPHINSTON, WILLIAM, el'-fin-stone, a bishop of Aberdeen, who founded the college which takes his name, in that city. He was also the principal means of establishing the Grayfriars' convent and the chapel royal at Stirling, and of introducing the art of printing into Scotland.
Born at Glasgow, 1430; died at Edinburgh, 1514.

ELPHINSTONE, THE HONOURABLE MOUNTSTUART, joined the Bengal civil service at the age of 18, and was very early an attaché to the political resident at the court of the Peishwa.

He then became attached to the suite of Lord Arthur Wellesley, afterwards Duke of Wellington, and acted as his aide-de-camp at the battle of Assaye. He was afterwards resident at Nagpore, envoy to Cabul, and, in 1816, when the marquis of Hastings took the command of the armies of the three presidencies against the confederated Mahratta powers, of which the Peishwa was the chief, Mr. Elphinstone was the British representative at his court, but was burnt out of his own ambassadorial dwelling by the emissaries of this pretended ally; and he reached the British camp with nothing except the horse he rode and the clothes he wore. In 1820 he became governor of Bombay, to which presidency the Peishwa's country was attached, and during the seven years he ruled Western India, the Elphinstone code became law, and, for its brevity, its completeness, its clearness, enlightened provisions, might be compared to the Code Napoléon. The education of the upper classes was commenced, and, on the principles he advocated, extended itself far and wide among the natives. At the close of his administration, in 1827, he left India, when, in addition to the presentations of addresses from all classes, a college, called after him, was established by the natives; his statue by Chantrey adorns the town-hall, and other substantial tokens of respect and affection were offered. After his arrival in England, he produced his "History of India." It is said he was subsequently offered the peerage twice, with the high offices of governor-general of India and of Canada. On her majesty's accession, a deputation of the directors of the late East-India Company waited upon him to ask him to accept the order of the Bath, and a seat in the privy council. Other honours, which men esteem gorgeous appendages, were also offered, and in turn declined.

Born 1778; died 1859.

EL ROSARIO, a town of the Mexican confederation, 55 miles N.E. of Mazatlan. It is a trading position of some importance. Pop. 5,000.

ELSINORE, or ELSINEUR, el'-se-nor (Danish, HELSINGÖR), a seaport of Denmark, on the E. coast of the island of Seeland, 24 miles from Copenhagen. It stands in the narrowest part of the Sound, on a declivity inclining towards the shore, 24 miles N. of Copenhagen. The harbour is accessible to small vessels. At a short distance to the east are the Gothic castle and the fortress of Kronberg. To the north-west are the château and pleasure-grounds of Marienlist, on the crest of a hill commanding splendid views. Manf. Straw hats, sugar, brandy, and arms. There are cotton printing works and a productive fishery. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 56° 2′ N. Lon. 12° 36′ E.—This town is the scene of Shakspeare's tragedy of "Hamlet," and the vaults of the castle of Kronborg are the fabled residence of Holger Danske, the mythic hero of the Danes. In the same fortress, Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England, and wife of Christian VII. of Denmark, was imprisoned. The Sound dues were here collected from all merchant vessels, except those of Sweden and Denmark. They were originally instituted for keeping up lights and landmarks on the Cattegat and neighbouring coasts. In April, 1857, a treaty was concluded between Denmark and the principal European powers, for the redemption of the Sound dues, the sum paid by Great Britain, as its share of the compensation, being £1,125,206.

ELSTER, els'-ter, two rivers of Germany, one of which, the White Elster, rises in Voightland, Bohemia, and falls into the Saale, 3 miles S. of Halle, in Prussia, after a course of 110 miles; the other, called the Black Elster, rises 2 miles from Elstra, in Saxony, and falls into the Elbe, 8 miles S.E. of Wittemberg. The length is 105 miles.

ELSTERBERG, el'-ster-berg, a town of Saxony, in the district of Zwickau, on the Elster, 73 miles S.W. of Dresden. There are the ruins of an old feudal castle, a church, and a free school. Manf. Straw plait, leather, and earthenware. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,400.

ELTHAM, elt'-ham, a village of Kent, 7 miles S.E. of London, chiefly noticeable for the remains of a royal palace, where several of the Plantagenet and Tudor sovereigns resided.—A station on the North Kent railway. Pop. 5,827.

ELTON, el'-ton, a salt-lake of Russia, 160 miles S.E. of Saratov. It is 11 miles long and 9 wide, but in no place more than 15 inches in depth. 100,000 tons of salt are annually obtained, and the collection gives employment to 10,000 persons. Lat. 48° 56′ N. Lon. 46° 40′ E.

ELTON, a township of Lancashire, 14 miles from Bury. Pop. 13,370.

ELTSCH, JOLVA, or JELSCHAU, altsh, a town of Hungary, in a valley, on a stream of the same name, 8 miles N.W. of Gömör. There are a large château, a Protestant church, and a high school. Manf. Ironware and leather. Pop. 4,500.

ELTVILLE, or ELFELD, elt'-veel, a town of Nassau, on the right bank of the Rhine, 6 miles W. of Mentz. Two fine Gothic towers are the remains of a castle built in the 14th century. The town is beautifully situated among vineyards, and there are many handsome residences in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,300.

ELVAS, ail'-vass, a strong frontier town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, situate on a rocky hill, not far from the Guadiana, and 10 miles W. of Badajoz. It is one of the most important strongholds in the kingdom, and has a cathedral in the mixed Arabic and Gothic styles, several churches, convents, college, seminary, hospital, arsenal, and a bomb-proof barracks capable of containing 6,000 or 7,000 men. It is supplied with water by a Moorish aqueduct, of four tiers of arches, rising to the height of 250 feet. Manf. Jewellery and arms. Smuggling across the Spanish frontier is largely carried on. Pop. 18,500.

ELWES, JOHN, el'-wes, an extraordinary miser, whose family name was Meggot, which he altered, in pursuance of the will of Sir Harvey Elwes, his uncle, who left him at least £250,000. At this time, he was possessed of nearly as much of his own, and was in the habit of attending the most noted gaming-houses. After sitting up a whole night at play, he would proceed to Smithfield to meet his cattle, which were coming to market, from his seat in Essex, and there stand disputing with a butcher for a shilling. If the cattle did not arrive, he would walk on to meet them. More than once he walked, without stopping, the whole way to his farm, which was 17 miles from London. He would walk in the rain in London sooner than pay a shilling for a coach; sit in wet clothes to save the expense of a fire; eat his provisions in the last stage of putrefaction, and he once wore for a fortnight a wig which he had picked up in a lane. In 1774 he was chosen knight of the shire for Berkshire, having made the express stipulation that the election should cost him nothing. He left a fortune of half a million sterling, besides entailed estates.

ELY, ISLE OF, ē-le, a district lying in the N. part of Cambridgeshire, occupying nearly half the county, from the rest of which it is cut off by the river Ouse. It consists mostly of fens, interspersed with small hills, usually crowned with villages, and is encompassed by a marsh, formerly covered with water. The soil is extremely fertile. Pop. 60,000. (See BEDFORD LEVEL.)

ELY, a city and episcopal see of England, and capital of the above district, 16 miles from Cambridge. It consists of one principal and some smaller streets, and is noted for its fine and venerable cathedral, built chiefly between the reigns of William Rufus and Edward III., on the site of a monastery founded in the 7th century by St. Etheldreda. The cathedral, which has recently been beautifully restored, is 535 feet long, and the transept is 190 feet. The west tower is 215 feet high. The west front and nave are of Norman work. The Lady's Chapel, defaced by the Puritans, was exquisitely beautiful. There are remains of the old conventual buildings. Pop. 8,166.—A station on the Great Eastern and Great Northern railways. It is the only city of England which is unrepresented in the House of Commons. Its bishopric was founded in 1107, and now comprises several parishes in Bedford, Cambridge, and Huntingdon.

ELY, a demesne of Ulster, Ireland, 4 miles from Enniskillen. It includes several woody islets about the head of Lower Lough Erne.

ELYMAS, el'-e-mas, "a magician," a sorcerer of Paphas, in Cyprus.

ELYSIUM, and ELYSII CAMPI, e-liz'-e-um, a place or island in the infernal regions, where, according to the mythology of the ancients, the souls of the virtuous were placed after death, and where complete happiness was found. The Elysian fields were, according to some, in the Fortunate Islands, off the coast of Africa, in the Atlantic. Others place them in the island of Leuce; and according to the authority of Virgil, they were situate in Italy; according to Lucian, they were near the moon; and to Plutarch, in the centre of the earth.

ELZE, eltz, an old town of Prussia, province of Hanover, at the confluence of the Saale with the Leine, 18 miles S. of Hanover. There is a trade in iron. Pop. 2,000.

ELZEVIR, LOUIS, el'-ze-vir, the first of a family of famous printers at Amsterdam and Leyden. He was for 37 years a bookseller at Leyden, and issued editions of classical works famous for beauty and correctness. Five of his sons carried on the business, and between 1583 and 1680, the series of classical works known to all collectors as the Elzevir editions, were published by them.
Born in Louvain, 1540; died 1617.

EMANUEL, e-man'-u-el, king of Portugal, succeeded John II. in 1495. He restored the nobility to their privileges, and greatly encouraged maritime expeditions, by one of which a new passage to India was discovered by Vasco da Gama, and to Brazil, in 1501, by Cabral. Emanuel also sent an expedition to Africa, and established a commercial intercourse with the kingdom of Congo, and afterwards sent expeditions to Prussia and China. He made Portugal the first naval power in Europe.

EMBA, em'-ba, a river of Turkistan, on the Kirghiz territory. It flows in a south-west direction, and enters the Caspian Sea, after a course of 300 miles.

EMBRUN, ang'-brun(g), a town of France, department Hautes-Alpes, on the right bank of the Durance, 20 miles E. of Gap. It is fortified, and has a Gothic cathedral, and an old episcopal palace, now used as a barracks. Manf. Broadcloth, counterpanes, hats, cotton yarn, and leather. Pop. 2,100. The town occupies the site of the ancient Ebrodunum.

EMDEN, em'-den, a fortified town of Prussia, in the province of Hanover, at the mouth of the river Ems or Dollart Bay, with a spacious and secure harbour, 15 miles from Aurich. The town lies low, and is protected from the sea by strong dykes. It is intersected by canals, which are numerously bridged, and impart to it all the appearance of a Dutch town. The principal buildings are the great church, erected in 1455, other churches, a fine old town-house, court-house, custom-house, barracks, gymnasium, educational establishments, and benevolent institutions. Manf. Hosiery, leather, soap, and tobacco. There are shipbuilding-docks, and it carries on a considerable trade in oats, barley, butter, and cheese, and employs a number of vessels in the herring fishery. Pop. 13,667. Lat. 53° 22′ 6″ N. Lon. 7° 13′ E.

EMERSON, WILLIAM, em'-er-son, an English mathematician, residing at Darlington, who began life as a schoolmaster, but quitted that employment, and contented himself with a small paternal estate. He was a profound mathematician, but of singular habits, vulgar in his manners, fond of low company, and extremely shabby in his dress. He always walked to London when he had anything to publish, and carefully revised every sheet himself. He wrote treatises on fluxions, mechanics, algebra, optics, astronomy, navigation, arithmetic; a commentary on the Principia of Newton, and several other esteemed works.
Born at Darlington, 1701; died there, 1782.

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO, an American essayist, was the son of a Unitarian minister of Boston, U.S., and designed for the same profession. He was educated at Harvard university, graduated in 1821, and in 1829 became pastor of a Unitarian congregation in Boston. The peculiarity of his views, however, led him into other studies, which broke his connection with the religious body to which he belonged. After publishing several essays or orations, he, in 1840, started a publication called the "Dial," devoted to the discussion of prominent questions in philosophy, history, and literature. It lived for four years, during which period Mr. Emerson kept himself before the public by delivering orations upon popular subjects. In 1844 he published "Lectures on New England Reformers," and subsequently lectured on Swedenborg, Napoleon, and other eminent men. In 1846 appeared a volume of poems, and in 1849 he visited England, where he delivered a series of lectures, and afterwards published them, under the title of "Representative Men." Soon after, he published "English Traits," embodying some of his observations on English manners, customs, and characteristics. Besides these more especial labours, he has written essays and poems, and contributed to various reviews and other periodicals.
Born at Boston, U.S., 1803; died 1882.

EMILIA, e-mil'-e-a, formerly known as the Emilian Provinces, but now officially recognised as a province of the kingdom of Italy, which includes part of the old States of the Church, and the late duchies of Parma and Modena. Pop. 2,235,729.

EMMA, em'-ma, daughter of Richard II., duke of Normandy, and mother of Edward the Confessor, king of England. She was first married to Ethelred, who was obliged to flee to Normandy with his sons Alfred and Edward, when the Danes invaded the kingdom. After his death she married Canute. In the reign of her son, the earl of Kent accused her of a too intimate familiarity with her relation, the bishop of Winchester. To prove her innocence, she is said to have walked barefoot over burning ploughshares without being hurt.

EMMEN, em'-men, two rivers of Switzerland, one rising in the Bernese Oberland, and, after a course of 45 miles, joining the Aar, 2 miles from Soleure; the other also rising in the Bernese Oberland, and, after a course of 30 miles, joining the Reuss, 2 miles from Lucerne. The valley of the first is one of the finest in Switzerland, and is famed for its cattle and horses, as well as its forest and flax culture.

EMMENDINGEN, em'-men-din'-gen, a town of Baden, on the right bank of the Elz, 9 miles N. of Freyburg. It is surrounded by walls, and on a height above the town are the remains of the castle of Hochberg. Manf. Paper, worsted, lime, and tiles. Pop. 2,000.

EMMERICH, em'-mer-ik, a town of Prussia, on the right bank of the Rhine, on the borders of Holland. It is encompassed with walls and ditches, and has several churches, a gymnasium, orphan hospital, and ecclesiastical seminary. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, hats, soap, leather, and tobacco. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 7,800.

EMPEDOCLES, em-ped'-o-klees, a philosopher, poet, and historian of Agrigentum, in Sicily. He adopted the doctrine of the metempsychosis, and wrote a poem on the system of Pythagoras, very much commended. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verses were so universally esteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with those of Homer and Hesiod.

EMPOLI, em-po'-le, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Arno, 16 miles S.W. of Florence. It is surrounded by walls, and has a fine church, built in 1093, but altered and renovated in 1738. Manf. Cotton, leather, straw hats, and glass. Pop. 6,500.

EMPSON, SIR RICHARD, emp'-son, the son of a sieve-maker at Towcester, Northamptonshire, who became a favourite with Henry VII., and, on account of his oppressions, rendered himself odious to the nation. He was beheaded with his coadjutor Dudley.

EMS, ems, a river of Germany, rising in Westphalia, and, after a course of 210 miles, falling into the bay of Dollart, in the North Sea, a little below Emden.

EMS, a watering-place of Nassau, on the Lahn, 5 miles from Nassau. It consists mostly of a long row of lodging-houses, which are occupied by the numerous visitors to the springs. Pop. 5,400.—The springs vary in temperature from 93° to 103° Fahr., and have long enjoyed a European celebrity.

EMSWORTH, ems'-werth, a town of Hampshire, 9 miles N.E. of Portsmouth. Manf. Sailcloth, fishing-nets, rope, and twine. Pop. 1,200.—A station on the South Coast railway.

ENARA, ai-nar'-a, a lake of Russian Finland, containing numerous islands, and communicating with the Arctic Ocean by the Patsjoki river. Area, 1,200 square miles. Lat. 69° N. Lon. 28° E.

ENAREA, e-nair'-e-a, a country of N.E. Africa, whence all the coffee and a large proportion of the slaves brought through Abyssinia, are transported, to be sold at the various marts in the N. and E. parts of the country. It is inhabited by a portion of the Gallas tribes. Lat. between 7° and 9° N. Lon. between 36° and 38° E.

ENCELADUS, en-sel'-a-dus, in mythology, a son of Titan and Terra, the most powerful of all the giants who conspired against Jupiter. He was struck with Jupiter's thunders, and imprisoned under Mount Etna. Some suppose that he is the same as Typhon. According to the poets, the flames from Etna proceeded from the breath of Enceladus; and as often as he turned his weary side, the whole island of Sicily felt the motion, and shook to its very foundation.

ENCINASOLA, en'-sin-a-so'-la, a town of Spain, on the frontier of Portugal, 62 miles N.W. of Huelva. Manf. Linen and coarse cloth. Pop. 3,000.

ENCKE, JOHANN FRANZ, enké, a German astronomer, director of the royal observatory at Berlin. He studied at Gottingen, and served in the Prussian artillery. He afterwards became astronomer at the observatory of Sneeburg, near Gotha, and subsequently director of the observatory at Berlin. He enlarged the boundaries of astronomical science, and resolved the orbit of the comet called after his name.

Born at Hamburg, 1791; died 1865.

ENCOUNTER BAY, en-koun'-ter, lies to the E. of Kangaroo Island, in S. Australia. Lat. 35° 30′ S. Lon. 139° E.

ENDEAVOUR STRAITS, en-dev'-or, a channel, formerly the entrance to Torrens Strait, on the north coast of Australia. It is about 30 miles long and 12 broad.

ENDERBY LAND, en'-der-be, a large tract of land in the Antarctic Ocean, discovered in 1831, by Biscoe. Lat. 67° 30′ S. Lon. 50° E.

ENDIAN, en-di'-an, a town of Persia, on the Tab, 16 miles from the Persian Gulf. Pop. 4,000.

ENDINGEN, en'-din-gen, an old fortified town of Baden, 12 miles N.W. of Freyburg. A considerable quantity of wine is made in the district, and there are three annual fairs. Pop. 3,000.

ENDOR, en'-dor, "fountain of generation," a city near Mount Tabor.

ENDRICK, en'-drik, a river of Scotland, rising in the county of Stirling, and falling into Loch Lomond, 14 miles from its source.

ENDYMION, en-dim'-i-on, in Greek mythology, a shepherd, son of Æthlius and Calyce. It is said that he asked Jupiter to grant him to be always young, and to sleep as much as he would; whence came the proverb of Endymionis somnum dormire,—"to sleep the sleep of Endymion." Diana, or the moon, saw him unclothed as he slept on Mount Latmos, and became enamoured of his great beauty, coming down every night from heaven to visit him. Professor Max Muller thinks that Endymion is one of the names of the sun, and that the sleep is the sunset, after which the moon appears. The people of Heraclea maintained that Endymion died on Mount Latmos, while the Eleans pretended to show his tomb at Olympia, in Peloponnesus.

ENFANTIN, BARTHÉLEMY PROSPER, an'(g)-fan(g)-ta, French socialist, known as "Le Père Enfantin," the chief exponent for many years of the doctrines of St. Simon. He edited several newspapers, and held important business positions. He wrote several works in explanation of his views.

Born at Paris, 1796; died 1864.

ENFIELD, en'-feeld, a town of Middlesex, 9 miles N.E. of London. There are an ancient church, and a handsome stone cross, erected in 1826. There is a government factory for rifles and swords. Pop. 19,119.—A station on the Great Northern and Great Eastern railways. The place was once famous for an extensive royal chase, disforested in 1779, and for a royal palace, whence Edward VI. went in procession to the Tower, on his accession to the throne. After Queen Elizabeth, it was alienated from the crown.

ENFIELD, WILLIAM, a dissenting minister, who was educated under Dr. Ashworth, at Daventry, and, in 1763, became minister of a congregation at Liverpool. About 1770 he removed to Warrington, as tutor in the belles-lettres in the academy there. During his stay at Warrington, he published several works; as, the "History of Liverpool," "Institutes of Natural Philosophy," &c. In 1785 he undertook the pastoral care of a congregation at Norwich, and continued there till his death in 1797. He is best known as the author of "The Speaker," a school-book at one time in general use.

ENGADINE, en-ga-deen', a beautiful valley of Switzerland, in the Grison canton, extending along both sides of the upper part of the Inn for about 45 miles, with an average width of 1½. This valley is subdivided into the Ober and Unter Engadine, and has an elevation of 5,750 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 11,000, nearly all Protestants.

ENGANO, or PUGNIATAN, en-ga'-no, an island of the Malay Archipelago, lying off the south-west coast of Sumatra. It has a circuit of about 30 miles, and is lofty and well-wooded. Lat. 5° 21′ S. Lon. 102° 20′ E.—Another small island on the coast of Papua.—A CAPE at the N.E. extremity of the island of Luzon, one of the Philippines. Lat. 18° 40′ N. Lon 122° 20′ E.—Also the most E. CAPE of Hayti. Lat. 18° 35′ N. Lon. 68° 20′ W.

ENGEDI, en-ge'-di, a town on the Dead Sea. The name means "the place of goats," and there are many caves in the rocks, in one of which David took refuge.

ENGEL, JOHANN JAKOB, en'-gel, German author. He was the tutor of Frederick William III. of Prussia, and wrote various philosophical and dramatic works, and a novel, which are highly esteemed.

Born at Parchim, 1741; died 1802.

ENGELHARDT, JOHANN GEORG VEIT, en'-gel-hart, German theologian, professor of theology at Erlangen. His works are very learned, and of high reputation.

Born at Neustadt, 1791; died 1853.

ENGEN, eng'-en, a town of Baden, on the Aach, 12 miles N.E. of Schaffhausen, where the Austrians were defeated by the French in 1800. Pop. 1,500.

ENGHIEN, ong'-e-a, a town of Belgium, 15 miles from Brussels. Pop. 3,750. Here is a superb castle, with a park and gardens, and the place gives a ducal title to a prince of the house of Bourbon Condé. Manf. Linen, lace, hats, leather, and soap. Pop. 3,700.

ENGHIEN, LOUIS ANTOINE HENRY DE BOURBON, Duc d', son of the duke of Bourbon, and grandson of the prince of Condé. This amiable young prince resided at a seat which had been left him by his great-uncle, the cardinal prince de Rohan, in the principality of Ettenheim, belonging to the elector of Baden. Here he devoted himself, under the misfortunes of his family, to the cultivation of his estate. Whilst thus occupied, the agents of Napoleon I. came by night, and having seized him in his bed, hurried him to France, where he was tried by a mock tribunal for being engaged in a conspiracy against Napoleon and condemned. He was shot in the fortress of Vincennes; an event which roused the indignation of Europe, and excited an interest and sentiment of sorrow wherever it was known.

Born at Chantilly, 1772; died 1804.

ENGIA. (See ÆGINA.)

ENGLAND, ing'-land, the most southern and considerable division of GREAT BRITAIN, under which heading various particulars relating to the United Kingdom as a whole will be given, and SCOTLAND and IRELAND are separately described. WALES, too, is described under the proper heading, and the following information refers to the characteristic features of England alone. Extensively varied in outline, with bold sweeps of coast, capacious bays, and wide estuaries of rivers, the form of England approaches that of a triangle, the base being the south coast, which measures, between the South Foreland, in Kent, and Land's End, in Cornwall, 317 miles; on the eastern side from the South Foreland to Berwick, 345 miles; and on the western side, from Land's End to Berwick, 425 miles. Allowing for curvatures, bays and estuaries, the total coast line is not less than 2,000 miles. The boundary between England and Scotland is marked by the Solway Firth, and the Cheviot Hills, stretching eastward to the Tweed. The aspect of the country is various and delightful, presenting all that beautiful variety which is to be found in the most extensive tracts of the globe. Although it possesses dreary scenes, lofty mountains, craggy rocks, black barren moors, and wide uncultivated heaths, yet few countries have a smaller proportion of land absolutely sterile and incapable of culture. The richest parts are, in general, the midland and southern. Towards the N. it partakes of the barrenness of the neighbouring portion of Scotland. A range of rude and elevated land extends from the borders of Scotland to the very heart of England, forming a natural division between the E. and W. sides of the kingdom. Cornwall is also a rough hilly tract; and a similar character pervades part of the adjacent counties. The principal mountain ranges are generally distinguished as the Northern, the Cumbrian, and the Devonian. The first consists of the Pennine range and the Cumbrian group, the former extending from the Cheviot Hills, on the Scottish borders, to the middle of Derbyshire. In this range is Cross Fell, attaining an elevation of nearly 3,000 feet above the level of the sea; and the Peak, in North Derbyshire, rising to a height of 1,800. The Cumbrian group lies to the W. of the Pennine, being separated from it by the valleys of the Eden and the Lune. In it are Sca Fell, the loftiest mountain in England, being 3,166 feet high, with Helvellyn and Skiddaw, both above 3,000 feet. The Cambrian range comprises all the Welsh mountains, and will be spoken of in the article on WALES. The Devonian range includes the hills of Cornwall, Devon, and part of Somersetshire. The elevations in these are not nearly so lofty as those in the others. In the smaller counties are extensive chalk ranges, traversing Wiltshire, Hampshire, Sussex, Surrey, and Kent, and northward through Hertfordshire and Suffolk, where the chalk ranges approach the shore, as they do in the south eastern counties. There are ranges of tall cliffs overhanging the sea, and the south-western coasts are generally bold and rocky. There are many extensive plains and valleys. In the south-east are the Wealds, stretching through Sussex, Surrey, and Kent for about 65 miles, and occupying an area of about 1,000 square miles. This Weald, a name of Saxon origin, was originally a forest or hunting ground. In the south-east of the district, occupying the southern part of Kent, is Romney Marsh, an extensive level district, composed of a rich marine deposit, having been recovered from the sea, and protected by embankments from inundation. It affords rich pasturage for cattle and sheep. Marsh lands and fens of a somewhat similar nature are near the shores of the Bristol Channel and the estuary of the Severn, on the W. coast; in those parts of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, which border on the Humber; and in the counties of Northampton, Bedford, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, where at least 1,000 square miles of valuable fertile land have been drained and reclaimed. (See BEDFORD LEVEL.) In the western counties are the beautiful and fertile vales of Taunton in Somersetshire, and of Exeter in Devonshire, of 100 and 200 square miles respectively. In Buckinghamshire is the rich Vale of Aylesbury, and farther north the Vale of Belvoir, watered by the Trent, and extending through Nottinghamshire. In Lancashire are flat and fertile tracts, between the Dibble and the Mersey, extending south into Cheshire, and including the beautiful Vale of Warrington. In Yorkshire is the rich alluvial district of Holderness, north of the Humber, and extending to the German Ocean. Still farther north are the Vale of York with an area of about 1,000 acres, and the Vale of Stockton, between the highlands of Durham and the eastern moorlands of Yorkshire, and towards the west is the Vale of Eden, 468 square miles, which begins between the Cumbrian and Pennine ranges, and widens out to an extensive plain, in the centre of which is Carlisle. (See counties under the proper headings.)

Rivers.—The principal river systems are the Thames, Wash, and Humber, which discharge into the German Ocean; and the Mersey and the Severn, discharging into the Irish Sea and the Bristol Channel. These are separately described under proper headings. Other rivers are mentioned in the following table of areas of drainage:—

Thames (with its tributaries)	6,160
Wash, including the Great Ouse, Nen, Welland, and Witham	5,850
Humber, including the Humber proper, Trent, and Ouse	9,550
Mersey	1,748
Severn	8,580
South Avon	1,210
Tyne	1,100
Eden	995
Dee	862
Parret	653
Towy	506

Lakes.—The most remarkable are Windermere, Ullswater, Derwent-water, and several others in the north-west counties, particularly in Westmorland and Cumberland. They lie embosomed, like polished mirrors, among the loftiest of England's mountains, and never fail to fill the mind with the most delightful sensations, when Nature has put on her "robes of green," and when they are visited annually by thousands of tourists.

Climate.—Humid, but healthy. From the insular situation of England, it is liable to sudden and frequent changes, and to great variations of dryness and moisture.

Forests.—Not extensive. Several are preserved for growing timber for the navy. These are, the New Forest, in Hampshire; the Forest of Dean, in Gloucestershire; and Windsor Forest.

Zoology.—The native animals are the fallow-deer, the dog, the fox, the hare, the rabbit, the martin, the badger, mole, hedgehog, &c. The domestic animals are cattle, horses, goats, sheep, hogs, &c. The wild boar was formerly a native of the country, as also the wolf and the bear; but these have long ago disappeared. Of the birds, the most remarkable are the eagle, falcons of various species, owls, ravens, carrion-crows, rooks, swans, the cuckoo, the cormorant, the nightingale, the peacock, the swallow, the stork, the curlew, the snipe, the plover, the pheasant, the black-cock, the ptarmigan, which is sometimes but rarely met with on the lofty mountains of Cumberland; the grouse, the partridge, the pigeon, the lark, the starling, and the thrush. Along the coasts fish are abundant. Cod is plentiful on the coast of Yorkshire, herrings on the E., and pilchards and mackerel on both the N. and S. sides of Cornwall and Devonshire.

Pro.—The principal productions of the country are wheat, barley, oats, rye, French wheat, beans, and peas. The indigenous fruits are few, and of little value; but others have been introduced, or brought to perfection, by the skilful cultivation of the English gardeners. These are chiefly apples, pears, plums, cherries, peaches, nectarines, apricots, figs, grapes, and other fruits. Hops are cultivated to a considerable extent, principally in Kent. Timber grows abundantly in most parts of the country; and the trees are mostly oak, elm, ash, beech, alder, and willow.

Minerals.—Valuable and abundant. Coal abounds in the northern, and in some of the midland and western counties; iron in Shropshire, Gloucestershire, Derbyshire, the north of Lancashire; and it is produced, though not in equal abundance, in other counties. Tin is confined to Cornwall and the adjoining parts of Devonshire, where it has been found from time immemorial. Black-lead is limited to a small district in Cumberland, and mines of copper are wrought in Cornwall, Devonshire, Derbyshire, and partially in Yorkshire and Staffordshire. In many parts of the kingdom marbles and freestone, or calcareous sandstone, of various colours and textures, are abundant. There are also mines of rock salt pits of fuller's earth, potter's clay, and quarries of slate.

Manf.—Important, being of greater extent than those of any other country. The manufacture of wool is one of the most ancient in the country, and is supposed to have been introduced by the Romans. It is chiefly carried on in Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Gloucestershire, and Somersetshire. The cotton manufacture is still more extensive, and has been carried to great perfection by the aid of every sort of powerful, complicated, and ingenious machinery. Its principal seat is in the towns of Lancashire and Cheshire. The hardware manufactures, of iron and steel, copper and brass, have been also brought to unrivalled perfection in England; and in this line are produced the heaviest articles of the casting furnace and rolling-mill, as well as the most minute and trifling articles, such as pins and all sorts of children's toys. Their principal seat is in the towns of Yorkshire, Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Worcestershire. Silk-weaving is carried on in the cities and towns of Spitalfields, Macclesfield, Manchester, and Coventry. Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire are famed for hosiery; and earthenware is finished with beauty and taste, and in great variety, principally at the potteries of Staffordshire. Glass is manufactured in various parts, chiefly in Newcastle, Sunderland, Bristol, and, on a smaller scale, at some other places. China-ware of a very superior quality is made in Derby and Worcester. In London every sort of fine and elegant work is produced.

Pop.—24,608,391.

Divisions.—The country is divided into forty counties, viz., Bedford, Berks, Bucks, Cambridge, Chester, Cornwall, Cumberland, Derby, Devon, Dorset, Durham, Essex, Gloucester, Hereford, Hertford, Huntingdon, Kent, Lancaster, Leicester, Lincoln, Middlesex, Monmouth, Norfolk, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottingham, Oxford, Rutland, Salop, Somerset, Southampton, Stafford, Suffolk, Surrey, Sussex, Warwick, Westmorland, Wilts, Worcester, and York. The last, which is the largest county, is divided into the E., N., and W. Ridings. The counties are again subdivided into hundreds, wards, lathes, wapentakes, rapes, tythings, &c.

Parliamentary Representation.—169 members are returned for counties, 1 for the Isle of Wight, 278 for cities and boroughs, and 3 for universities.

Early History.—The aboriginal inhabitants of England were called Britons, and were invaded by Cæsar about 50 years before the Christian era. They were subsequently conquered by the Roman legions. In the early part of the 5th century, the Romans, who had kept possession of the country for upwards of four centuries, abandoned it, and the old inhabitants, being harassed by the Scots and Picts, called in the Saxons, who conquered the whole except Wales. The Saxons formed seven kingdoms, called the Heptarchy, each of which had its separate chief, till 827, when Egbert completed the conquest of the whole. About 866 the Danes made a descent on the coast, and conquered Northumberland, East Anglia, and Mercia, and finally possessed themselves of the whole kingdom, which they held till the time of King Alfred, who totally defeated them, and forced them from the country. At the beginning of the 11th century, Sweyn, king of Denmark, conquered all the northern parts of England, and on Ethelred's retiring to Normandy, the whole kingdom submitted to the invader. On his death the Danes proclaimed his son Canute. The Saxon line was restored in the person of Edward the Confessor, in 1041; but the Normans, under William the Conqueror, defeated the Saxons at Hastings, in 1066, and took possession of the realm. In 1283, Wales was subdued by Edward I., Llewellyn, their last king, being slain. (See BRITAIN, GREAT; BRITISH EMPIRE, UNITED KINGDOM.)

ENGLAND, NEW, a name given to certain states comprised in the United States of America. (See NEW ENGLAND.)

ENGLEWOOD FOREST, en'-gel-wood, a wide moor near Carlisle, Cumberland. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was disforested.

ENGLISH BAZAR, a large town of India, in the province of Bengal, on the right bank of the Mahanada, an affluent of the Ganges, 32 miles N.W. of Moorshedabad.

ENGLISH CHANNEL, THE, separates France from England, and extends from the Straits of Dover to the Land's End, Cornwall. At Dover it is 20 miles wide, and at the Land's End, 100.

ENGUERA, en-goo-air'-a, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, 43 miles S.W. of the town of Valencia. Manf. Linen and woollen goods. Pop. 5,200.

ENIKALE, a town in the Crimea.

ENKHUIZEN, enk'-hoi-sen, a fortified seaport-town of the Netherlands, on the western shore of the Zuyder Zee, 38 miles N.E. of Amsterdam. It is built in the form of a circle, and with great regularity. Its principal buildings are a town-house, with a lofty tower, and several churches. Fishing is the principal occupation of the inhabitants; but it has, besides, a trade in butter, cheese, timber, and cattle. There are ship-building yards, and a cannon-foundry. Pop. 5,000.

ENNA, en'-na, a town in the middle of Sicily, with a beautiful plain, where, according to mythological legend, Proserpine was carried away by Pluto.

ENNIS, en'-nis, a parliamentary and municipal borough, chief town of the county of Clare, Ireland, on the river Fergus, 20 miles N.W. of Limerick. It is of considerable size, but irregularly built, and has a court-house, gaol, barracks, town-hall, college, hospital, and two convents. Ennis College is near the town; and there are the ruins of a monastery founded by one of the O'Briens in 1240. There are flour-mills and a limestone quarry, and a trade is carried on in grain and cattle. Pop. 6,307. nearly all Catholics.—A station on the Waterford and Limerick railway.

ENNISCORTHY, en-nis-kor'-thy, a market-town of Ireland, on the river Slaney, 14 miles N.W. of Wexford. Its principal buildings are a parish church, court-house, market-house, an hospital, a dispensary, and convent. Manf. Woollens. Here is a castle, which, with its manor, at one period belonged to Spenser, the poet; and in the neighbourhood is Vinegar Hill, where the rebels, in 1798, were defeated by the royal troops under Lord Lake. Pop. 5,666. nearly all Catholics.—A station on the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford railway.

ENNISKILLEN, en-nis-kil'-len, a parliamentary and municipal borough, chief town of the county of Fermanagh, Ireland. The greater portion of the town is on an island in the Erne, between Upper and Lower Loughs Erne. Its principal buildings are a court-house, town-hall, barracks, linen-hall, infirmary, and the royal school of Poltara, founded by Charles I., and one of the best endowed in the kingdom. Manf. Leather, cutlery, straw plait, and sewed muslins. There is also a considerable trade in corn, timber, coals, and slate. Pop. 5,712. more than two-thirds being Catholics.—A station on the Irish North-Western railway. This place gives the title of earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the family of Cole: it is connected by railway with Dundalk and Londonderry. In 1595 it made an obstinate defence against Queen Elizabeth's army, and was unsuccessfully besieged by James II.'s troops in 1689.

ENNIUS, QUINTUS, en'-ne-us, a Roman poet, who wrote in heroic verse the annals of the Roman republic, and displayed much knowledge of the world in some dramatical and satirical compositions. He served in the wars when young, but afterwards became a Roman citizen. Scipio, on his deathbed, ordered his body to be buried by the side of this poetical friend. Conscious of his merit as the first epic poet of Rome, Ennius bestowed on himself the appellation of the Homer of Latium. Of all his writings, nothing now remains but fragments happily collected from the quotations of ancient authors.

ENNS, or ENS, ens, an old town of Austria, on the left bank of the Enns, near its confluence with the Danube, 11 miles S.E. of Linz. The castle of Ensegg is within the town. Manf. Iron and steel, with cotton-spinning. Pop. 4,000.

ENNS, a river of Austria, rising in the circle of Salzburg, 12 miles S. of Radstadt, and, after a course of 120 miles, falling into the Danube at the town of Enns.

ENOCH, é'-nok, the son of Jared, and the seventh from Adam, is celebrated in Scripture for his pious and upright life in an evil generation. He was translated into heaven without passing through the agony of death. St. Jude has cited a prediction of Enoch respecting the last judgment. There is a book extant, called the "Prophecies of Enoch," which was probably written in the 2nd century B.C.—Enoch was also the name of the eldest son of Cain.

ENOS, é'-nos, a maritime town of European Turkey, in Roumelia, 35 miles N.W. of Gallipoli. It is the port of Adrianople, and the seat of a limited trade, the harbour admitting only small vessels, from its being choked up with sand. The town is very ancient, and, as Ænos, is referred to by Homer and Virgil.—The GULF of Enos lies to the north of the town, and is 14 miles long by 5 broad.

ENOTAEVSK, en-o-ta'-evsk, a town of Russia, 80 miles N.W. of Astrakhan, on a branch of the Volga. Pop. 3,000.

ENRIQUEZ, GOMEZ ANTONIO, en-re'-kaz, a Spanish poet, of Jewish race, who was compelled, from fear of the Inquisition, to quit Spain and settle at Amsterdam. He was the author of 22 comedies, and some poems and satires.

Died 1670.

ENSCHEDE, en'-shade, a town of Holland near the Prussian frontier. The public buildings are good. Manf. Cottons, damasks, and diapers. There are bleacheries, print and dye-works. Pop. 8,000.

ENSISHEIM, or ENSHEIM, en'-sis-hime, a town of Germany, in Alsace, on the right bank of the Ill, 15 miles S.E. of Colmar. There is a large and ancient town-hall. Manf. Calicoes and straw hats. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,000. This was formerly the capital of Alsatia, and was three times taken during the Thirty Years' War.

ENTICK, JOHN, en'-tick, an English divine, who published a History of the War which ended in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo; a "History of London," 4 vols. 8vo; a "Latin and English Dictionary;" "An English Spelling Dictionary," and other works.

Born 1713; died 1773.

ENTRECASTEAUX, ontr-kas'-to, a French admiral, who early entered the navy, and became, in 1785, commander of the naval forces of his country in the East Indies. In 1791 he was appointed to the command of two frigates destined to search for La Perouse, and also to explore those coasts which that unfortunate navigator had not reached. In spite of all his endeavours, Entrecasteaux was unable to fulfil but the second part of his instructions. He explored the western coast of New Caledonia, the isle of Bougainville, and nearly 1,000 miles of the S.W. coast of Australia, besides visiting many points of the Tasmanian sea-board. Captain Rossel, who succeeded him, wrote an interesting account of the expedition.

Born at Aix, 1740; died at sea, near Java, 1793.

ENTRE DEUX MERS, ontr de(r)mair, a vine country of France, in the department of the Gironde. It lies between the Dordogne and the Garonne, and produces an excellent quality of wine, especially that of Sainte-Foy-la-Grande.

ENTRE DUERO E MINHO, or MIRHO, en'-trai doo-air-o ai meen-yo, formerly the most N. province of Portugal, bounded W. by the Atlantic, and N. by the Spanish province of Galicia. It is mountainous, interspersed with spots of great fertility, whereon large quantities of corn are raised. The river Lima traverses a valley of almost unequalled beauty. The province is divided into three districts, Braga, Vianne, and Porto, and the town of Braga is the capital. Pro. Oil, hemp, corn; and the port wines are mostly made in this province. Manf. Silks, Linens, cutlery, hardware, and porcelain. Area, 3,094 square miles. Pop. 982,735. Lat. between 41° and 42° N. Lon. between 8° and 9° E.

ENTRE RIOS, en'-trai re'-ose, a province of the Argentine Confederation, S. America, enclosed by Uruguay, Corrientes, Santa Fé, and Buenos Ayres. It is flat and swampy, being characterised by extensive prairies and vast plains, which, especially in the S., are annually covered with water. Cultivation is little advanced, and the chief products are hides, tallow, wines, and jerked beef. Area, 45,000 square miles. Pop. 188,000.

ENYED-NAGY, EGIDISTADT, or STRASSBURG, en-yed'-nai-g', a market-town of the Austrian empire, in Transylvania, 19 miles N.E. of Karlsburg. There is a large Protestant college. Manf. Hosiery, paper, and brandy. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,000.

ENZ, ents, a river of Germany, flowing through Wurtemburg and Baden, and, after a course of 55 miles, joining the Neckar, to the left of Besigheim.

ENZILLI, or INZELLI, en-zil'-le, a town of Persia, in the province of Ghilan, on the Caspian, inhabited mostly by Russians. Pop. 2,500.

EOOA, EAOWE, or MIDDLEBURG, eo'-a, the most eastern of the Friendly Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean. It is 30 miles in circuit, and has an elevation of 600 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 18° 19′ S. Lon. 175° 37′ W.

EOS, e'-os, the name of Aurora among the Greeks, whence the eastern parts of the world were called Eoo.

EÖTVÖS, JOZSEF, e-ot-vos', an eminent Hungarian, politician and littérateur. He studied at the university of Pesth, and for a short time practised as an advocate, but preferred literature, and wrote some dramas and novels. In 1836 he set out upon his travels, and visited England, of the institutions of which he formed a high opinion. When the revolution of 1848 broke out, he was appointed minister of public instruction, but held the office for only a brief period, and went to Munich. In 1851 he returned to Hungary, and in 1867 became minister of worship and education. Some of his works have been translated into English, and are held in high estimation for the talent they display.

Born at Buda, 1813; died at Pesth, 1871.

EPAMINONDAS, e'-pam-i-non'-das, a famous Theban general and statesman, descended from the ancient kings of Bœotia, and celebrated for his private virtues and military accomplishments. His love of truth was so great that he never disgraced himself by a lie. He formed a sacred and inviolable friendship with Pelopidas, whose life he saved in a battle. By his advice, Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the signal for war. Epaminondas was put at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, 371 B.C. Pursuing his victorious career, he entered the territories of Lacedæmon with 50,000 men, and gained many partisans; but, on his return to Thebes, he was seized as a traitor for violating the laws of his country. In the midst of his successes he had neglected the decree which forbade any citizen to retain the supreme power more than one month, and all his eminent services seemed insufficient to redeem him from death. He bowed to his fate, and only begged of his judges that it might be inscribed on his tomb that he had suffered death for saving his country from ruin. This reproach produced such an effect that he was pardoned, and again invested with the sovereign power. He was successful in a war in Thessaly, and assisted the Eleans against the Lacedæmonians. The hostile armies met near Mantinea, and while Epaminondas was bravely fighting, he received a fatal wound in the breast. Being informed that the Bœotians had gained the victory, he expired, exclaiming that h died unconquered. Fell in the 48th year of his age. The Thebans severely lamented his death; in him their power was extinguished; for only during his life had they enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian states. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous, and indignantly refused the rich presents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes, king of Persia. He is represented by his biographer as an elegant dancer and a skilful musician, accomplishments highly esteemed among his countrymen.

EPAPHRAS, ep'-a-fras, "covered with foam," a minister of Christ, supposed to have been bishop of the Colossian church.

EPAPHRODITUS, e-paf'-ro-di'-tus, "agreeable or handsome," a bishop or deacon of the Philippian church, sent to Paul at Rome.

EPAPHUS, ep'-a-fus, in Greek legend a son of Jupiter and Io, who founded in Egypt a city, which he called Memphis, in honour of his wife, who was the daughter of the Nile. He was worshipped as a god at Memphis.

EPÉE, CHARLES MICHEL, Abbé de l', dèl-a-pa', one of the founders of the system of instruction for the deaf and dumb. He was a preacher and canon at Troyes, but was deprived of the appointment on account of his Jansenist opinions. Being successful in instructing two deaf and dumb sisters, he founded an institution, and devoted himself to the work he had chosen.

Born at Versailles, 1712; died 1789.

EPENETUS, ep'-e-ne'-tus, "worthy of praise," the first convert of Paul in Greece.

EPERIES, e-per'-i-ees, a town of Hungary, capital of the county of Saros, on the left bank of the Tarcza, 150 miles N.E. of Pesth. It is of an oblong shape, with regular fortifications, and has a communal college, library, and several churches. Manf. Woollens, linens, earthenware, and beer. Pop. 11,000.

EPERNAY, ai'-per-nai, a small town of France, in the department of the Marne, on the left bank of the river of that name 15 miles S. of Rheims. It is the chief entrepôt for Champagne wines. In it is the great house of Möet and Chandon, whose vaults measure more than three miles in extent. Manf. Hosiery, pottery, leather, and sugar. Pop. 16,388.

EPEUS, e-pe'-us, in Homeric legend the son of Panopeus, fabricator of the famous wooden horse, which proved the ruin of Troy.

EPHES DAMMIM, e'-fees dammim, "the effusion of blood," the place near the Dead Sea, where Goliath and the Philistines were slain.

EPHESUS, ef'-e-sus, a famous city of Asia Minor, now in ruins, 35 miles from Smyrna. It was the ancient capital of Ionia, and had one of the seven Christian churches founded by the Apostles. Its temple, dedicated to Diana, was considered one of the seven wonders of the world. Its dimensions were 425 feet long and 220 broad. The roof was supported by 128 columns, 60 feet high, which had been placed there by as many kings. Of these, 36 were carved in the most beautiful manner, one of which was the work of the famous Scopas. This celebrated building was not totally completed till 220 years after its foundation. Chersiphron was its principal architect. The riches which were in the temple were immense, and the goddess who presided over it was worshipped with the most awful solemnity. It was burnt on the night that Alexander was born (see ERATOSTRATUS), but soon after, it rose from its ruins with greater splendour and magnificence. Ephesus for some time bore the name of Arsinoë, in honour of the wife of Lysimachus; but it was again known by its old name. The remains of this famous temple are now little more than immense masses of ruinous masonry. There are also traces of a large stadium, a theatre, and several towers. The site of the town is now occupied by Ayasaluk and other miserable villages.

EPHIALTES, or EPHIALTUS, ef-i-al'-tees, in Greek mythology, a giant, son of Neptune, who grew nine inches every month. (See ALOEUS.)

EPHRAEM SYRUS, e'-frai-em-si'-rus, a famous writer of the Syrian Church, known as "The prophet of the Syrians," "harp of the Holy Spirit," and by other designations. He was taken notice of when a poor boy, by the bishop of Nisibis, whom, in 325, he accompanied to the council of Nicæa. He afterwards lived as a hermit near Edessa, and was highly venerated for his holy and charitable life. He was the author of more than a thousand homilies, and of commentaries on the Scriptures. His style is lofty and imaginative. His death was caused by his exertions during a visitation of the plague.

Born 320; died 379.

EPHRAIM, e'-frai-im, the younger son of Joseph, who was adopted, together with his brother Manasseh, by Jacob among the tribes.

Born in Egypt, about 1710 B.C.

EPHRON, e'-fron, "dust," a Hittite friend of Abraham.

EPICHARMUS, ep'-i-kar-mus, a poet and philosopher of the Pythagorean school, and mentioned as being the first writer of comedy. Fragments of many of his works remain, but none in a complete state.

Born in Cos, in the 5th century B.C.

EPICTETUS, ep'-ik-te'-tus, a Phrygian Stoic philsopher, originally the slave of Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. Though driven from Rome by Domitian, he returned after the emperor's death, and gained the esteem of Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. He supported the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but declared himself strongly against suicide. His "Enchiridion" is a faithful picture of the Stoic philosophy. His style is concise, devoid of all ornament, and full of energy and useful maxims. The emperor Antoninus thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honour to himself and advantage to his country. His favourite maxim was "Bear and forbear." Into this he resolved every principle of practical morality.

Born at Hierapolis, Phrygia, about 50.

EPICURUS, ep'-i-ku-rus, the founder of a celebrated sect of philosophers, studied at Samos and Athens, whence he removed, in consequence of the war with Perdiccas, and opened a school, first at Mitylene, and next at Lampsacus. He finally settled at Athens, where he obtained a number of disciples, owing to the pleasantness of his system and his deportment. They lived together, had all things in common, and practised abstemiousness in living. It is said that he wrote no fewer than 300 volumes. The system of Epicurus, some think, tends to atheism, by ascribing too little to the Deity and too much to nature. His doctrine of pleasure being the supreme good, has been much misrepresented and abused; for his own life was irreproachable, and he inculcated virtue as the essence of pleasure. It must be admitted, however, that his system was afterwards grossly perverted from the author's original meaning.

Born in Samos, 341 B.C.; died 270 B.C.

EPIDAURUS, ep-i-dor'-us, a town of ancient Greece, at the mouth of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, chiefly dedicated to the worship of Æsculapius, who had there a famous temple. It received its name from Epidaurus, a son of Argus and Evadne. There were numerous temples, and a very large theatre, still in a good state of preservation. The town, now known as Epidavro, is a poor little place, where, in 1822, the first Greek congress assembled.

EPIGONI, e-pig'-o-ni, the sons and descendants of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the first Theban war. The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient history. They resolved to avenge the death of their fathers, and marched against Thebes, under the command of Thersander. The two armies met and engaged on the banks of the Cephissus. The fight was obstinate and bloody, but victory declared for the Epigoni, and some of the Thebans fled to Illyricum with Leodamas, their general, while others retired into Thebes, where they were soon besieged, and forced to surrender.

EPILA, ai-pe'-la, a town of Spain, on the right bank of the Talon, 19 miles S. W. of Saragossa. There is an old Moorish castle in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

EPIMENIDES, ep-i-men'-i-dees, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. He is reckoned one of the seven wise men, by those who exclude Periander from the number. According to the Greek legend, he was tending his flocks one day, and entered into a cave, where he fell asleep. His sleep, according to tradition, continued for 57 years, and when he awoke, he found every object so considerably altered, that he scarcely knew where he was. It is asserted that he lived 299 years. After death he was revered as a god by the Athenians.

EPIMETHEUS, ep'-i-me'-the-us, in mythology, one of the Oceanides, who inconsiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion. He had the curiosity to open the box which Pandora had brought with her. (See PANDORA.) Epimetheus was changed into a monkey by the gods, and sent into the island Pithecusa.

EPINAL, ep'-e-nal, a town of France, department of Vosges, on both sides of the Moselle, 200 miles S.E. of Paris. It has museums of antiquities and paintings, and an old Gothic church. The quays on the river are spacious. Manf. Lace, linen fabrics, hosiery, oil, iron and brass work, cutlery, paper, earthenware, and chemicals. Pop. 16,445.

EPINAY, LOUISE FLORENCE PETRONELLE, Madame d', dep'-e-nai, an accomplished French lady, daughter of M. Desdavelles, who was killed when serving in Flanders. At an early age she married her cousin, but soon separated from him in consequence of his extravagant habits. She afterwards formed an intimate friendship with Rousseau, to whom she gave a cottage, the famous Hermitage, in her park at Chevrette, but a quarrel took place, described at some length in the "Confessions" of Rousseau. The lady was the author of a book for the young, "Les Conversations d'Emilie," which obtained a prize. She wrote several works of a similar kind, but is best known by her memoirs and correspondence with Rousseau, Grimm, Holbach, Duclos, and others, which give a striking picture of the manners of the graceful but licentious fashionable society of the time of Louis XV.

EPIPHANIUS, ST., ep'-i-fai'-ne-us, a bishop of Constantia, in Cyprus, active in refuting the writings of Origen; but his compositions are more valuable for the fragments of others, which they preserve, than for their own intrinsic merit. He was conspicuous for his energy as an image breaker.

Born 310; died 403.

EPIRUS, e-pi'-rus, a country of ancient Greece, situate between Macedonia, Achaia, and the Ionian Sea. It was formerly governed by kings, of whom Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, was one of the first. It was afterwards joined to the empire of Macedonia, and at last became a part of the Roman dominions. It is now a portion of the Turkish province of Albania.

EPISCOPIUS, SIMON, e-pis-ko'-pe-us, a learned divine, whose Dutch name was Bisschop. In 1612, he was chosen divinity professor at Leyden, but met with considerable trouble on account of his being an Arminian. He was the principal of the Arminian remonstrants at the synod of Dort, which assembly deposed him and the other deputies from their ministerial functions, and banished them the republic. He then went to Antwerp, but in 1626 returned to Holland, and became minister to the remonstrants at Rotterdam. In 1634 he removed to Amsterdam, and was chosen rector of the remonstrants' college.

Born at Amsterdam, 1583; died 1643.

EPPING, ep'-ping, a town of Essex, 16 miles N.E. of London. It is famous for its butter, cream, and sausages. The royal FOREST of Epping is divided from the Forest of Hainault by the river Roding, and is still remarkable for the richness of its woodland scenery. Pop. 5,564.—A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

EPPINGEN, ep'-ping-en, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, on the Elsenz, 25 miles N.E. of Carlsruhe. It is an ancient place, and was a free imperial city. Manf. Linen. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 3,300.

EPSOM, ep'-som, a town of Surrey, 15 miles S.W. of London. Though irregularly laid out, it contains a number of good houses, and there are many villas in the vicinity. In its neighbourhood is a mineral spring, from which, at one time, the celebrated Epsom salts were manufactured. The Royal Medical Benevolent College, a handsome building, was erected in 1856, at a cost of £40,000, midway between the town and "Downs." Pop. about 6,916.—On Epsom Downs are annually held, generally in the last week of May, the most numerously attended horse-races in the world. The principal, or Derby stakes, are run for on Wednesday, and the Oaks on Friday.

EPWORTH, ep'-worth, a town of Lincolnshire, 10 miles N.W. of Gainsborough. Pop. 2,295, chiefly engaged in the culture and spinning of flax and hemp, and in malting. Here John Wesley, founder of the Methodists, was born, in 1703.

EQUADOR, REPUBLIC OF, ek'-wa-dor, S. America. (See ECUADOR.)

ER, er, "watch," or "weary," the eldest son of Judah.

ERARD, SEBASTIEN, ai'-rard, a celebrated French pianoforte-maker, the son of an upholsterer. He early went from the provinces to Paris, and there established a pianoforte manufactory, improving considerably all that related to that instrument, as likewise to the harp and organ. He also founded an establishment in London.

Born at Strasburg, 1752; died 1831.

ERASISTRATUS, e-ra-sis'-tra-tus, a Greek physician, said to have been the grandson of Aristotle. He was the court physician of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, and afterwards went to Alexandria, and studied anatomy. He was the first who systematically dissected the human body, and very nearly anticipated some of the most remarkable discoveries of modern medical science; and trusted more to diet, bathing, and exercise, for the recovery and preservation of health, than to bloodletting and drugs.

Died 257 B.C.

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS, e-ras'-mus, an illustrious Dutch writer, the illegitimate son of one Gerard, a native of Tergou, by the daughter of a physician. Erasmus was called Gheraerd, which he afterwards altered to the Latin name Desiderius, and the Greek Erasmus, all signifying amiable. When a boy he was a chorister in the cathedral at Utrecht. At an early age he lost both his parents, when his patrimony was left to the care of guardians, who, in order that they themselves might enjoy it, removed him from one convent to another, till at last, in 1486, he took the habit among the canons regular. The monastic life being disagreeable to him, he accepted an invitation from the archbishop of Cambray to reside with him as his private secretary. During his abode with this prelate he was ordained a priest; and in 1496 went to Paris, supporting himself by giving private lectures. In 1497 he visited England, and met with a liberal reception from the most eminent scholars, and applied himself to the study of the Greek language, of which he was before ignorant. His first literary works were philological; as his "Adagia," "De Copiâ Verborum," and "De Ratione Conscribendi Epistolas." His "Adagia" is a collection of proverbs, commented upon with great learning. In 1503 we find him at Louvain, where he studied divinity under Adrian Florent, afterwards Adrian VI. The next year he published his "Enchiridion Militis Christiani," a book of practical religion. In 1506 he took his doctor's degree at Turin, and went to Bologna, where he continued some time; thence he removed to Venice, and resided with the famous Aldus Manutius. From Venice he proceeded to Padua and Rome, where many offers were made him to settle; but having received an invitation from Henry VIII., he set out for England, and arrived there in 1510. He at first lodged with Sir Thomas More, and while there, wrote his "Praise of Folly," designed to show that fools are everywhere to be found, even in "high places," and at the court of Rome. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, now invited him to Cambridge, where he was made Margaret professor of divinity, and Greek professor. In this seat of learning a lodging was assigned him in Queen's College, in the grounds of which his walk is still shown. In 1514 we find him at Bâle, preparing for the press his "New Testament," and "Epistles of Jerome," which were published in 1516. This was the first time the New Testament was printed in Greek; and this is his greatest work. The Reformation now began under Luther; and though Erasmus approved of his principles and object, he was afraid to irritate the court of Rome. A friendly correspondence passed between these two great men; but afterwards a controversy ensued on free-will, and Luther treated Erasmus as a hypocrite. It is certain that Erasmus approved the Reformation in his heart, but had not courage to express himself openly; and the consequence was, that he was disliked by both parties. Indeed, he says of himself, "Even if Luther had spoken everything in the least objectionable manner, I had no inclination to die for the sake of truth." In 1522 appeared his "Colloquies," which gave great offence to the monks, who used to say that "Erasmus laid the egg which Luther hatched." His next controversy was with Scaliger and others, who, in their zeal for the purity of Latin composition, objected to the use of words not in the works of Cicero; whence they were called Ciceronians. Against these pedants Erasmus wrote an admirable dialogue, entitled "Ciceroninus," printed in 1528. The same year appeared his learned work, "De rectâ Latini Græcique Sermonis Pronuntiatione." His last publication was his "Ecclesiastes, or the Manner of Preaching," 1535. The inhabitants of Rotterdam still show the house where he was born, and there is a statue erected to his memory in the great square of that city. He was buried in the cathedral at Bale.

Born at Rotterdam, 1467; died at Bale, 1536.

ERASTUS, THOMAS, e-ras'-tus, a physician, and theologian. His real name was Lieber, which he translated into Greek. He studied divinity, philosophy, and literature at Bâle, and took the degree of M.D. from the University of Bologna. He afterwards was appointed first physician and councillor of state by the elector palatine Frederick III., and was professor of physic at Heidelberg and Bâle. He established a foundation for the maintenance and education of poor students of medicine. He wrote several medical works of value, but is remembered principally from the controversy associated with his name. His general principle was, that the censures of the church, and other inflictions, were not the proper means to be adopted for the punishment of crimes. Dathenus and Beza were his chief opponents. The name Erastian is used by Scotch controversialists to describe those who deny the power of an established church to alter its laws without the consent of the State.

Born at Baden, Switzerland, 1524; died at Bâle, 1583.

ERATH, a county of Texas, United States. Pop. 11,796.

ERATO, er'-a-to, in mythology one of the muses, who presided over lyric and tender poetry. She is represented as crowned with roses and myrtle, holding a lyre in her hand. She appears with a thoughtful and sometimes with a gay and animated look, and was invoked by lovers, especially in the month of April, which, among the Romans, was more particularly devoted to the tender passion.

ERATOSTHENES, er-a-tos'-the-nees, a native of Cyrene, intrusted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He first observed the obliquity of the ecliptic, and discovered the means of measuring the extent and circumference of the globe. He wrote on moral philosophy, and grammar, collected the information respecting places and countries scattered throughout the books in the Alexandrian library, and arranged the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies.

ERATOSTRATUS, er'-a-tos'-tra-tus, an Ephesian, who burnt the famous temple of Diana, the same night that Alexander the Great was born. His object was to transmit his name to posterity, by an action so uncommon.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ERCILLA Y ZUNIGA, air-seel'-ya e thoone'-ye-ga, a Spaniard, who was brought up at the court of Charles V., and joined the expedition against the Auracanians in Chili, South America. The scenes in which he was engaged suggested the composition of an epic poem, which he produced, and called "La Auracana." He wrote it on scraps of paper and bits of leather, during those intervals he was enabled to snatch from his military duties. It describes the perils of the contest in which he was engaged, with great spirit and vividness. He was, on his return, charged with high treason, and condemned to death, which he narrowly escaped, for he had actually ascended the scaffold before his innocence was proved. He afterwards travelled, and was appointed chancellor to the Emperor Rudolf II., but returned to Madrid in 1580, and died in great poverty.

Born at Madrid, 1530; died 1595.

ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN, airk'-man-sha'-tre-an, the joint name of two very popular authors, who wrote together a great number of tales and romances, chiefly illustrative of French and Alsatian life. Emile Erckmann studied in the college of Meurthe, and at Paris. He was intended for the law, but, with his friend Alexandre Chatrian, devoted himself to literature.

Born, Erckmann, at Phalsbourg, 1822; Chatrian, at Soldenthal, 1826.

ERCSI, or ERECSENY, erch'-se, a town of Hungary, on a height above the Danube. Manf. Oil, vinegar, and spirits. Pop. 3,300.

ERDORVICH, or ERDOVEGHE, er'-do-vitch, a town of Austria, in Sclavonia, near the Bahoney river. There are a Greek church, and numerous mills. Pop. 2,500.

ERDRE, airdr, a river of France, which, after a course of nearly 50 miles, through the Lower Loire, joins the Loire at Nantes.

EREBUS, er'-e-bus, in mythology a deity of the infernal regions, son of Chaos and Darkness. He married Night, by whom he had the Light and the Day. The poets often used the word Erebus to signify hell itself.

EREBUS, a volcano in the supposed continent discovered, in the Antarctic Ocean, by Sir James Ross, in 1841. Height, 12,400 feet. (See VICTORIA LAND.)

ERECHTHEUS, or ERICHTHONIUS, e-rek'-the-us, king of Athens, who erected a statue to Athena. (See ATHENS.)

EREKLI, or EREGLI, e-reg'-le, a seaport town of Asia Minor, on the Black Sea, 130 miles N.E. of Constantinople. It consists of an ancient and modern town, containing several mosques, baths, and a Greek church. On a height overlooking the town, are the ruins of an ancient castle. It has a good port and shipbuilding-yards. Pop. unascertained. Lat. 41° 15′ 30″ N. Lon. 31° 30′ E. —This town stands on the site of the ancient Heraclea, where the 10,000 Greeks, commanded by Xenophon, embarked on their return to Greece. It was founded by the Megareans, and was the port where the fleet of the Goths awaited the return of the second expedition, which, in the time of Gallienus, ravaged Mysia and Bithynia.

ERFURT, or ERFURTH, air'-foort, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the right bank of the Gera, branches of which traverse the town in the form of canals, 14 miles W. of Gotha. It has two citadels, the Petersberg and the Cyriaksberg, and is the capital of an extensive province, but is said to have been, in the 16th century, a place of much greater importance than it is now. It has an ancient and beautiful Gothic cathedral, numerous churches, a convent, orphans' asylum, an academy of sciences, and several literary institutions. The cathedral has a famous bell, called Grosse Susanna, weighing 14 tons, and contains some excellent pictures. There are two principal squares, one the great market, in which is a memorial of the elector Frederick Charles Joseph; the other, the fish-market. The orphan asylum, called Martinstift, in honour of Luther, was originally the Augustinian monastery in which he was a monk. His cell is still to be seen, as it appeared when he was its occupant, and contains both his bible and his portrait. Manf. Woollen, silk, linen, and cotton goods, shoes, tobacco, and leather. Pop. 44,000.—The town is supposed to have been founded in the beginning of the 5th century. Pop. 53,254.

ERGHEN, erg'-en, a river of Central Asia, rising in the Karakorum mountains on the N.E. borders of Little Tibet, and, after a course of 700 miles, under different names, falling into the west end of Lake Lob Nor.

ERIBOLI, LOCH, e-rib'-o-le, an arm of the sea, on the coast of Sutherland, Scotland, about 10 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 3.

ERIC, eer'-ik, is the Swedish synonyme for the English Henry. Of this name there are many kings of Sweden and Denmark. The following are the most deserving of notice.

ERIC VII., who succeeded Margaret in 1412. He married the daughter of Henry IV. of England, and made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but was taken prisoner in Syria, and paid a large ransom for his liberty. Soon after his return, the Swedes revolted, and were joined by the Danes; on which he withdrew to the isle of Gothland. In 1439 he was formally deposed, and afterwards settled in Pomerania, where he died in 1459.—This monarch compiled a "History of Denmark to the year 1288." He was Eric XIII. of Sweden.

ERIC XIV., son and successor of Gustavus Vasa, king of Sweden, made proposals for the hand of Princess Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England, and for that of Mary of Scotland, but being refused, he married the daughter of a peasant, who obtained an extraordinary influence over him, which the superstitious of the age attributed to witchcraft. This alienated from him the hearts of his subjects, and, together with his cruelties, occasioned a revolt. He was compelled to renounce his throne in 1568, and nine years afterwards was compelled to swallow poison. He was probably half insane in his love of cruelty, for he possessed intellectual tastes, and was an accomplished musician.

ERICHT, or ERROCHT, eer'-ikt, a lake in the N.W. of the district of Athol, in Perthshire, extending into Inverness-shire. It is 14 miles long, by 1 broad. It is 1500 feet above the sea, and never freezes. The waters ultimately reach the Tay. Near this place wandered the unfortunate Prince Charles Stuart, after his discomfiture at Culloden, in 1746, lurking in caves and among rocks, exposed to the rigours of the climate, sometimes alone, at others with a few faithful adherents, till he escaped the parties that were in search of him, lured by the offered reward.

ERICSSON, JOHN, er'-ik-son, a Swedish mechanician, who, early displaying considerable ability, was appointed an engineer cadet, and subsequently entered the army of his country. He was employed in the survey of Northern Sweden, and devoted much of his time to mechanical speculations, more particularly to his "flame engine." This was intended to work independently of steam, by condensing flame, and so obtaining the necessary power. Visiting England in 1821, he discovered that, when worked by mineral fuel, the experiment failed. In 1829 he competed for the prize offered by the Liverpool and Manchester Railway for the best locomotive, and his engine attained a speed of fifty miles an hour. He subsequently removed to the United States, and many useful inventions developed there made his name familiar to the world, among them the screw-propeller, which he was the first to adapt to steam navigation. His caloric engine, however, was that which attracted most attention, as likely to supersede the use of steam. It seemed, at first, to meet with some success in England, but was ultimately allowed to drop, Brunel and Faraday deciding against its practicability. A vessel called the Ericsson, was, however, built in the United States, and fitted with his caloric engine, and on her trial trip she made 12 miles an hour. Returning from this, however, a squall overtook her, and she sank. He built the Federal iron-clad steamer Monitor, that fought the Confederate ship Merrimac, in the battle of Hampton Roads, March 9, 1862.

Born in Vermland, 1803.

ERICHTHONIUS, er'-ik-tho'-ne-us, the fourth king of Athens, had the invention of chariots attributed to him, and the manner of harnessing horses to draw them. Died 1437 B.C. He was made a constellation after death under the name of Bootes.—A son of Dardanus, who reigned in Troy, and died 1374 B.C.

ERIE, eer'-e, a county of the state of New York, United States. Area, 876 square miles. Pop. 219,884. The capital is Buffalo.

ERIE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 324 square miles. Pop. 32,640. Capital, Sandusky City.

ERIE, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 74,688. Erie is the capital.

ERIE, a port of Pennsylvania, United States, on the S. shore of the lake of the same name. It has a very fine harbour, formed by an island 4 miles long, and protected by a breakwater. The town is connected by canal with the Beaver, and so with the Ohio, and great facilities for navigation and water power are by that means obtained. It is also the terminus of the Philadelphia and Erie Railway. Pop. 27,737.

ERIE, FORT, a strong fortification in Upper Canada, on the N. shore of Lake Erie. Lat. 42° 59′ N. Lon. 78° 20′ 30″ W.

ERIE, LAKE, a lake of North America. The most southern of the group of five lakes. It is 240 miles long, and from 30 to 60 miles wide, and separates Canada from the American State of Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, and receives at its south-western extremity, by the river Detroit, the waters of Lake Superior, Michigan, and Huron, and discharges at the north-east, by the river Niagara into Lake Ontario, which is 322 feet below, the difference of level causing the rapids and cataracts of Niagara. Erie is 565 feet above the level of the Atlantic, and the average depth is 200 feet. The chief harbours on the United States side are Port Erie, Cleveland, Sandusky City, and Toledo; and on the Canadian shore, Barwell and Stanley. It is connected by canal with the Hudson and Ohio, and with the Ontario by the Welland ship canal, which has greatly increased facilities for communication, as cargoes can now be sent to English ports without transhipment. Area, 11,600 square miles.

ERIGENA, JOANNE SCOTUS, er-ig'-e-na, a philosophical writer, either of Scottish or Irish birth, who is said to have travelled to Athens, where he acquired the Greek and Oriental languages. He resided many years at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France, with whom he lived on terms of the greatest familiarity. At the request of his patron, he translated the works of Dionysius into Latin, which drew upon him the resentment of the pope; to avoid whose fury he fled to England. His greatest work was the "Division of Nature; or, the Nature of Things," printed at Oxford in 1681. Some say that he was employed by Alfred in restoring learning at Oxford, and that he held a school at Malmesbury, where he was murdered by his pupils on account of his severity.

ERIGONE, e-rig'-o-ne, in Greek legend, a daughter of Icarius, who hung herself when she heard that her father had been killed by some shepherds whom he had intoxicated. She was made a constellation, now known under the name of Virgo.

ERINNA, e-rin'-na, a Grecian poetess, who was contemporary with Sappho, and wrote several pieces, fragments of which are extant, and were published in the Edinburgh edition of Anacreon of 1754. She obtained a great reputation, although she died at the age of 19.

Lived 600 B.C.

ERINNYS, e-rin'-nis, in mythology, one of the furies, or Eumenides. The word signifies the 'fury of the mind.' (See EUMENIDES).—A surname of Ceres.

ERIPHYLE, er-i-fi'-le, a sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Amphiaraus. (See ALCMÆON.)

ERIS, e'-ris, the goddess of discord, among the Greeks, the same as the Discordia of the Latins. (See DISCORDIA.)

ERISAY, er'-i-sai, an island of the Hebrides, Scotland, lying between Harris and North Uist.

ERISICHTHON, er'-i-sik'-thon, in Greek legend, a Thessalian, son of Triops, who derided Ceres, and cut down her groves. For this impiety the goddess afflicted him with continual hunger. To satisfy the cravings of his appetite, he squandered all his possessions, and at last devoured his own limbs, for want of food. His daughter had the power of transforming herself into whatever animal she pleased, and she made use of it to maintain her father, who sold her, in one shape, after which she assumed another, and became again his property.

ERISKAY. (See HEBRIDES.)

ERIVAN, ERIWAN, or ERUVAN, er'-e-van, a fortified town of Russian Armenia, the capital of a province on the Zenghi, 112 miles from Tiflis, and 3,312 feet above the sea level. On one side, the city surmounts a precipice 600 feet high, overhanging the river, and is encompassed by a double wall. It is commanded by a spacious castle built on a steep rock. The town has suffered severely from repeated sieges. Manf. Leather, earthenware and cotton stuffs. Pop. of the province, 583,957; of the town, 15,000.

ERKELENZ, er'-ke-lents, a town of Prussia, 24 miles N.E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. Manf. Linen, cloth, ribbons, hats, pins, and lace. There are three annual fairs, and a good trade is carried on. Pop. 2,000.

ERLACH, JOHN LEWIS, air'-lak, a noble Swiss, who distinguished himself in the service of France, and obtained several victories, for which, on the defection of Turenne, he was made commander-in-chief of the army by Louis XIV.

Born at Berne, 1595; died 1650.

ERLANGEN, air'-lang-en, a town of Bavaria, on the right bank of the Regnitz, 10 miles N. of Nuremberg. It is divided into the Old and New Town, the latter founded in 1686, and contains the Protestant university of Bavaria, founded in 1742. Manf. Woollens, hats, stockings, gloves, and leather. Pop. 14,876.

ERLAU, air'-lou, a town of Hungary, on both banks of the Erlau, 68 miles from Pesth. It is surrounded by walls, has churches for different religions, and several good edifices, particularly the cathedral, episcopal palace, and lyceum, with observatory. The citadel is strong, and stands on a lofty rock. Here also is an academy, with teachers in theology, philosophy, and law. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics. The best red wine in Hungary is produced in the vicinity. Pop. 19,000.

ERNE, ern, a river of Ireland, rising in Lough Cowna, county Cavan, and after a course of about 72 miles, during which it helps to form two lakes of the same name, distinguished as Upper and Lower, falling into Donegal Bay.

ERNÉE, air-nai, a town of France, on a river of the same name, department Mayenne, 16 miles N.W. of Laval. Manf. Needles and linen. Pop. 6,300.

ERNEST AUGUSTUS, King of Hanover, fifth son of George III. of Great Britain. Created Duke of Cumberland, 1799; married 1815, Frederica, daughter of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. Succeeded to the throne of Hanover, 1837.

Born 1771; died 1851.

ERNESTI, JOHANN AUGUSTUS, air-nes'-te, a German writer, was, in 1742, chosen extraordinary professor of ancient literature at Leipsic, and, in 1756, professor of rhetoric. Two years afterwards he took his doctor's degree, and obtained the divinity chair, which he held, with great reputation, till his death. He published several valuable editions of Latin and Greek authors, and may be considered as the founder of the new school of philological criticism of the Scriptures.

Born in Thuringia, 1707; died 1781.

EROS, é'-ros, a servant, of whom Antony demanded a sword to kill himself. Eros produced the instrument; but, instead of giving it to his master, killed himself in his presence.

EROS, in mythology, the god of love, son of Chronos, or Saturn. (See CUPID.)

EROSTRATUS. (See ERATOSTRATUS.)

ERPENIUS, or ERPEN, THOMAS, er'-pen, Dutch Oriental scholar, who was educated at Leyden, after which he travelled into several countries to perfect himself in the oriental languages. He returned to Leyden in 1612, and was chosen professor of the oriental tongues. He wrote "Grammatica Arabica," "Rudimenta Linguæ Arabicæ," "Præcepta de Lingua Græcorum Communi," "Grammatica Hebræa," "Orationes de Linguarum Hebreæ atque Arabicæ Dignitate." He also translated several Arabic works into Latin, with annotations, and the New Testament and Pentateuch into Arabic.

Born at Gorkum, 1584; died 1624.

ERRIS, er'-ris, a maritime district in the county of Mayo, Ireland, remarkable for the dreary wildness of its mountain scenery. Pop. about 20,000. (See MAYO.)

ERROMANGA, er-ro-man'-ga, one of the New Hebrides Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean, to the N.E. of New Caledonia. It is inhabited by a savage race of Papuans; and the island was the scene of the murder of John Williams, the missionary, in 1839. Lat. 18° 46′ S. Lon. 169° 1′ E.

ERSCH, JOHANN SAMUEL, ersh, German bibliographer, who studied at Halle and became librarian to the university of Jena, and afterwards principal librarian at Halle. He produced several valuable works on bibliography, and in 1818 assisted materially in the production at Leipsic of a universal cyclopedia of the sciences and arts.

Born in Lower Silesia, 1766; died at Halle, 1828.

ERSEK-UJOAR, er'-sek oo'-jo-ar, a town of Hungary, 22 miles from Neutra, with a Franciscan and normal school. Pop. 7,000.

ERSKINE, EBENEZER, ers'-kin, the founder of the Secession church of Scotland, was a descendant of the noble family of Mar, studied at Edinburgh, and was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Kirkcaldy, in 1702. He wrote many sermons and discourses, which, in their day, were highly esteemed. Having offended the church of Scotland by advocating popular rights in the settlement of ministers, he was, with three other ministers, deprived of his position in 1733, and that act led to the foundation of the United Presbyterian Church.

Born 1680; died 1756.

ERSKINE, JOHN, an eminent Scottish jurist, professor of Scots law in the university of Edinburgh, author of two famous works on the principles and institutes of the law of Scotland.

ERSKINE, JOHN, REV. DR., son of the above, studied at Edinburgh, for many years the colleague of Dr. Robertson, at Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh. He was a very popular preacher, and published essays, sermons, and pamphlets. In "Guy Mannering" Sir Walter Scott describes his style of preaching.

Born 1721; died 1803.

ERSKINE, THOMAS, Lord, was the third son of the tenth earl of Buchan (living in poverty in Edinburgh), and, in his 14th year, entered the navy, in which he served four years. In 1768 he quitted the sea, and entered the army, in which he remained for eight years, when he renounced the profession of war for that of the law. In 1775 he became a student of Lincoln's Inn, and, in 1778, was called to the bar, where his advancement was both rapid and brilliant. In 1783 he became member of parliament for Portsmouth; but his talents did not here appear to the same advantage as did his forensic abilities. He, however, in 1786, became attorney-general to the prince of Wales; but, in 1792, was forced to resign the appointment, for determining to defend Thomas Paine in his prosecution for the publication of "The Rights of Man." In 1802 he was made chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall; and in 1806, when the Grenville ministry was formed, became lord chancellor, being raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Erskine, of Restormel Castle, in Cornwall. In 1807 he retired, and in 1815 received the order of the Thistle. He was engaged in the defence of Queen Caroline. In the intervals of his leisure, Lord Erskine wrote a political romance, called "Armata," a preface to the speeches of Fox, and "View of the Causes and Consequences of the War with France," which passed through numerous editions. His works have been published in 5 vols. 8vo.

ERSTEIN, airs'-tine, a town of Germany, in Lower Alsace, on the Ill, 15 miles E. of Strasburg. Manf. Cotton, hosiery, cordage, tobacco, and earthenware. Pop. 3,700.

ERWIN DE STEINBACH, air'-va, a continental architect, who built Strasburg cathedral, with the exception of the tower, which was not finished until the 15th century.
Born at Steinbach, Baden; died 1318.

ERXLEBEN, JOHN CHRISTIAN POLYCARP, airz'-le-ben, a German naturalist, who studied physic at Gottingen, and there gave lectures on the veterinary art and natural history. He also wrote on those subjects. His "Principles of Natural History" is a valuable work.
Born at Quedlinburg, 1744; died 1777.

ERYCEIRA, FERDINAND DE MENESES, Count, air'-e-se-eer'-a, a Portuguese historian, who devoted himself to military service, and distinguished himself as an able leader at Tangier. He wrote "The History of Tangier," "History of Portugal," and "The Life of John I., King of Portugal."
Born at Lisbon, 1614.

ERYCEIRA, FRANCIS XAVIER MENESES, Count, great-grandson of the above, was also a soldier and an author. He wrote on the "Value of the Coins of Portugal;" "Reflections on Academical Studies;" "Parallels of Illustrious Men and Women;" a translation of the "Henriade."
Born at Lisbon, 1673; died 1743.

ERYMANTHUS, er'-i-man'-thus, a mountain, river, and town of Arcadia. On the first, according to Greek legend, Hercules killed a prodigious boar, which he carried on his shoulders to Eurystheus, who was so terrified at the sight, that he hid himself in a brazen vessel.

ERYTHRÆUM MARE, er'-i-thre'-um mair'-e, a part of the ocean on the coast of Arabia. As it communicated with the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, it has often been mistaken by ancient writers, who by the word erythrean understood indiscriminately either the Red Sea or the Persian Gulf.

ERZBERG, airz'-berg, a mining district of Styria, where, for upwards of 1,000 years, iron mines have been worked.

ERZERUM, ERZEROUM, or ERSERUN, erz'-room, the chief city of Armenia, in Asiatic Turkey, and the capital of a pachalic of the same name, 155 miles from Mount Ararat. It is built in a plain, and stands at an elevation of about 6,200 feet above the level of the sea. The town consists of the fortress and four suburbs; the former, which is surrounded by high walls, contains 15 mosques and some good houses. There are 24 mosques and several Armenian churches, and numerous bazaars and caravanseries in the suburbs. Manf. Morocco leather, sheepskins, iron, and copper wares. Pop. 60,000, of whom about 8,000 are Armenians, and 2,000 Persians.

ERZGEBIRGE, airts-ge(r)-beerzh-e(r)', "ore mountains," a chain of mountains extending along the confines of Saxony and Bohemia, from the valley of the Elbe to the Fichtelberg. The range is about 120 miles long, and the highest point is the Keilberg, 3,162 feet.

ERZINGAN, er'-zing-an, a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the right hand of the Euphrates, 82 miles S.W. of Erzerum. A famous breed of sheep is reared in the environs. Pop. about 12,000.

ESAU, é'-saw, the eldest son of Isaac and Rebecca. He sold his birthright to his brother Jacob, who also, by deceit, afterwards gained, instead of Esau, his father's blessing. Enraged at this, Esau would have slain Jacob, had the latter not fled into Mesopotamia. On his return, Esau met him, and behaved very generously to him. He was the father of the Edomites.

ESCALA, es-ka'-la, a port of Spain, on the Mediterranean, province of Gerona. Pop. 2,200. Lat. 41° 5′ N. Lon. 6° 54′ W.

ESCHENBACH, WOLFRAM VON, é'-shenbok, a German poet and minstrel of the middle ages, whose productions exhibit great elegance and vigour, and exercised a great influence over his countrymen. He received the honour of knighthood.
Born in the 12th century.

ESCHER, JOHANN HEINRICH ALFRED, Swiss statesman, who studied at Bonn and Berlin, and in 1842 was made doctor of law at Zurich. In 1844 he was elected member of the great council of the Canton; in 1848 as president of the council of regency, and in 1849 president of the National council. He attempted to expel the Jesuits, and to reorganize the schools.
Born at Zurich, 1819.

ESCHOLTZ BAY, é-sholtz, an inlet of Kotzebue Sound, on the N.W. coast of America, almost within the Polar circle. Lon. 161° W.

ESCHWEGE, aish'-we(r)zh-e(r), a walled town of Prussia, on the Werra, 27 miles S.E. of Cassel. Manf. Woollens and linens, and leather. Pop. 7,400.

ESCURIAL, or ESCORIAL, ais-koor-e-al', a small town of Spain, 24 miles from Madrid, celebrated for its monastery and palace, accounted by the Spaniards the eighth wonder of the world. The palace, which stands on a site elevated 2,700 ft. above the sea level, was built by Philip II. of Spain in memory of his victory of St. Quentin, gained over the French in 1557. It consisted of cloisters, a college, a library (containing many valuable Arabic manuscripts), shops of different artists, apartments for a great number of families, with extensive park and fine gardens, adorned with a great number of fountains. It stands in a dry, barren country, surrounded by rugged mountains, and is composed of grey stones, found in the neighbourhood. Its form is that of a gridiron, because St. Lawrence (to whom it is dedicated, on account of the battle of St. Quentin being fought on his fête day) was broiled on that instrument. The building forms a parallelogram 744 feet long by 580 feet wide, traversed by ranges of buildings representing the bars of a gridiron. The handle is formed by the royal residences. There is a fine chapel, 320 feet long and the same in height to the top of the cupola. The royal mausoleum is a beautifully decorated octagonal chamber. The Escurial occupied 23 years in building, and they reckon in it 800 pillars, 11,000 windows, and 14,000 doors. The building was much injured by lightning in 1862.

ESHER, é'-sher, a village of Surrey, 15 miles from London. The neighbourhood is interesting from the mansion, Esher Palace, once the residence of Cardinal Wolsey; and from Claremont House, built by Lord Clive, afterwards the residence of the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold, and later, of Louis Philippe, ex-king of the French, who died there.—A station on the South-Western Railway. Pop. 11,229.

ESK, esk, the name of several rivers in Scotland. 1. In Dumfriesshire, falling into the Solway Firth.—2. (North). In the county of Edinburgh, joining the sea at Musselburgh.—3. (North.) ESPARTERO, Joaquin Baldomero, as'-par-tair'-o, duke of Vittoria, a modern Spanish soldier and statesman. He was the son of a cartwright of La Mancha, and was designed, on account of the delicacy of his constitution, for the ecclesiastical profession, and studied at the university of Almagro, but was so captivated by the charms of a military life, that in 1808 he enlisted as a common soldier in an infantry regiment at Seville. He subsequently entered a military school at Cadiz, where he studied the art of war generally, with the science of engineering and fortification. In 1815 he joined an expedition to Peru, in South America, and there became captain of a regiment. He was now on the way to advancement. From his being successful in no fewer than seventeen consecutive actions, he was raised to the command of a battalion; and, in 1820 and 1822, successively became colonel, brigadier, and chief of the general staff. Subsequently, the successes of Bolivar defeated the efforts and blasted the hopes of the royalist Spanish generals, and Espartero was thrown into prison at Arequipa. From this situation he soon afterwards made his escape, and arrived in Spain in 1825. He now enjoyed repose for a few years, although still following his profession. In 1833 the civil war commenced, when he sought and obtained leave to proceed against Don Carlos. Throughout the stormy period which now ensued he took a leading part, and rose to the dignity of field-marshal and general-in-chief of the army of the North. In 1836 he acted with General Evans in the relief of Bilbao, and continued vigorously to oppose the efforts of the Carlists till 1839, when the supremacy of the queen was acknowledged. In that year he was created a grandee of the first class, and duke of Vittoria. In 1841 he became regent of the kingdom, but in 1843 was forced to quit his country, and take refuge in England. Here he took up his residence in London, and did not return to Spain till 1847. For some years he there lived in retirement, but in 1854 was again called to assume the reins of government, which he held till 1856, when he was forced to tender his resignation. In 1870 he was nominated one of the candidates for the throne of Spain, but declined the honour on account of his advanced age, and in 1875 he gave his adhesion to the young king Alfonso.
Born at Granatula, 1792.

ESPARZA, ais-part'-za, a city of the Republic of Costa Rica, Central America.

ESPEJO, ais'-pai-ho, a town in Spain, 20 miles S.E. of Cordova. There is an ancient castle of the duke of Modena Celi. Manf. Woollens, linen, wine, oil and earthenware. Pop. 5,300.

ESPREMENIL, JACQUES DUVAL D', es-prem-e-neel, a French statesman, who travelled, disguised as a Brahmin, through India, where he was a determined opponent of English influence. He was chief of the council at Madras in 1746, but when it was given up to the English in 1748 he returned to France.

Died 1767.

ESPREMENIL, JACQUES DUVAL D', son of the preceding, a French advocate, who accused Queen Marie Antoinette of complicity in the "diamond necklace" affair. He was deputy for Paris in the States General in 1789, and contended for a limited monarchy under Louis XVI. He retired from politics in 1791, but could not escape the guillotine. On his way to the place of execution, he said to his companion, "We have at this moment a terrible problem to solve; namely, to which of us two the shoutings of the mob are addressed." He was the author of "Remonstrances," published by the parliament, 1788; "Nullity and Despotism of the Assembly;" "Actual State of France," 1790.

Born at Pondicherry, India, 1746; died 1794.

ESPRONCEDA, JOSE DE, ais-prone-thai'-da, a Spanish poet of some reputation, but whose political predilections brought him, at an early age, into difficulties with the government of his country. He was twice imprisoned before he was eighteen, and, on the last occasion, fell in love with the daughter of a brother prisoner, when he was shipped to England with some other Spanish refugees. Here he made himself acquainted with the language, and devoted himself to the study of Shakspere and other poets. In 1829 he took part in the political disturbances in Paris, and fought at the barricades. On the death of Ferdinand, the king of Spain, he returned to Madrid, and entered the regiment of body-guards of the queen. In 1835 and 1836 he was fighting in defence of the barricades in the streets of Madrid; and, in 1841, became secretary to the embassy at the Hague. On his return to his country, he became a member of the Cortes. The poetry of Espronceda is estimated highly by his countrymen; but it consists only of a few short effusions.

Born near Almendralejo, Estremadura, 1810; died at Madrid, 1842.

ESPY, JAMES POLLARD, es'-pe, meteorologist. He was the son of a farmer in Pennsylvania, United States, and at an early age turned his attention to the subject of meteorology, author of a work on the philosophy of storms, and professor in the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia. His reports on meteorology presented to the Senate of the United States are of the highest scientific value.

Born 1784; died at Cincinnati, 1860.

ESQUIMAULT, HARBOUR OF, es'-que-molte, the principal harbour of Vancouver's Island. (See VANCOUVER'S ISLAND).

ESQUIMAUX, or ESKIMOS, es'-que-mo, an aboriginal people of N. America, inhabiting the coast of Labrador, Hudson's Bay, and the peninsula of Alaska. They are low in stature; their chief employment is hunting and fishing, and they observe some sort of sacrifices. They live upon the raw flesh of whales, bears, &c., and wear the skin of the latter animals, with the hairy sides next their bodies. Darkness pervades their regions from one to six months in the year, during which the earth is bound up in impenetrable frost, and they live in huts very cleverly constructed of snow and ice. On the return of the sun, they have, during the summer, continual day, and lead the life of hunters and fishermen. They appear to be a link between the Mongolian race of Asia and the Red Indians of America.

ESQUIMAUX, an island and harbour in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, N. America. They are on the Labrador coast. Lat. 54° 35′ N. Lon. 56° 21′ W.

ESQUIROL, JEAN ETIENNE DOMINIQUE, ais'-ke-rol, French physician, celebrated for his treatment of insanity. He took his doctor's degree in 1805, was appointed physician to the Salpêtrière at Paris in 1811; inspector-general of the university in 1823, in 1825 first physician to the Maison des Aliénés, and in the following year principal physician to the private lunatic asylum at Charenton. The revolution of 1830 deprived him of his public offices, and he retired into private life. He advocated the humane treatment of patients, and his writings on the subject are considered of the highest authority. His great work is on "Mental Maladies, considered in their Medical, Hygienic, and Medico-legal aspects."

Born at Toulouse, 1772; died 1840.

ESQUIROS, HENRI ALPHONSE, ais'-ke-ro, French poet and romancist, author of the "Gospel of the People," a democratic commentary on the life of Jesus, for the publication of which he was imprisoned and fined in 1841. He wrote while in confinement, "Songs of a Prisoner," and afterwards a history of the Montagnards. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly. At the coup d'état of 1851, he was expelled, and came to England. After the fall of the empire in 1870, he was appointed supreme administrator of the department Bouches du Rhône, but soon resigned that office, and edited a newspaper at Marseilles. Among his best known works are two romances, "Le Magicien," and "Charlotte Corday," "The Future Life from the Socialist Point of View," "England and English Life," and "The Netherlands and Dutch Life."

Born at Paris, 1814.

ESSAAD-EFFENDI, MOHAMMED, es-sa'-ad-ef-fen'-de, Turkish historian, appointed in 1825 historiographer to the Ottoman empire, and in 1831, superintendent of the official journal of the empire. In 1835 he was sent on an embassy to Persia. He also held the office of chief judge of Roumelia, and inspector-general of schools. Among other works he wrote a history of the destruction of the Janissaries by Sultan Mahmoud.

Born at Constantinople, 1790.

ESSEN, es'-sen, a town of Prussia, 20 miles N.E. of Dusseldorf. It is the seat of a mining board and military court. The town has only recently risen into importance by the establishment of the manufacture of the famous Krupp steel cannon, which gives employment to several thousand workpeople. The town is old, and there is a fine cathedral. In its neighbourhood are extensive coal-mines. Pop. 57,000.

ESSEQUIBO, es'-se-ke'-bo, a river of British Guiana, S. America, entering the Atlantic by an estuary 20 miles broad, in lat. 7° N., and lon. 58° 40′ W. It has many islands, and gives its name to a district of British Guiana, which extends along its banks. Its length has been estimated at 600 miles, and is navigable for large ships 60 miles from the sea.

ESSEX, es'-sex, a maritime county of England, bounded N. by the counties of Cambridge and Suffolk, E. by the German Ocean, S. by the river Thames (which separates it from the county of Kent), and W. by the counties of Hertford and Middlesex. The coast line, 85 miles long, is broken, and indented by arms of the sea, which form a series of islets and peninsulas. Extensive salt-marshes also border the coast, most part of which is protected by embankments from the inroads of the ocean, but there are cliffs of moderate height at the Naze. The centre and north of the county are richly wooded, and there are elevated districts, Langdon Hill, the highest point of the county, reaching 620 feet.

Rivers.—The principal are the Colne, the Blackwater, the Chelmer, the Crouch, the Ingerbourn, the Roding, and the Cam. Besides these, it is bounded by the Thames, the Stour, the Stort, and the Lea.

Pro.—Almost every diversity of soil is to be found within the limits of this county; it is, therefore, generally well adapted for agricultural pursuits, and its farming is placed among the best in England. Its principal crops are wheat, barley, oats, beans, peas, turnips, teazels, saffron, caraway, and hops. There are valuable oyster fisheries.

Area.—1,688 square miles.

Pop.—575,930.

Chief Towns.—CHELMSFORD, COLCHESTER, MALDON, HARWICH, HALSTEAD, and BARKING.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into East, West, and South Essex, each of which returns two members, and two are returned for Colchester, and one each for Harwich and Maldon.

ESSEX, a county of Vermont, United States. Area, 225 square miles. Pop. 7,500. Guildhall is the capital.

ESSEX, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. 11,032. Tappahannock is the capital.

ESSEX, the E. county of Upper Canada, in British N. America, between lakes Erie and St. Clair. Pop. 46,962.

ESSEX, THOMAS CROMWELL, Earl of, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney. Early in life he became clerk to the English factory at Antwerp: but, leaving that situation, he went into several countries as the secret emissary of the state. On his return to England, he was taken into the service of Cardinal Wolsey, who obtained him a seat in the House of Commons, where he defended his patron with great spirit. On the fall of the cardinal, Cromwell became the chief adviser of Henry VIII., was knighted in 1531, in 1534 was secretary of state and master of the rolls, and in 1536 keeper of the privy seal. He was very instrumental in the dissolution of the monasteries, and greatly promoted the Reformation. For these services the title of earl of Essex, with many manors and estates, chiefly the spoils of the Church, were conferred upon him. At length his affairs took an adverse turn. He had been so unfortunate as to advise the marriage of the king with Anne of Cleves, who, not proving agreeable to Henry, that capricious sovereign wreaked his vengeance on the adviser of the marriage, and caused him to be tried for high treason and heresy. To be so accused was certain death. Accordingly, he suffered decapitation on Tower-hill. He was a man of a liberal mind, and promoted more men of merit while he was in power than any of his predecessors.

Born at Putney, Surrey, about 1490; died 1540.

ESSEX, ROBERT DEVEREUX, Earl of, was the son of Walter, the first earl. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, at the age of 17 was introduced at court by his guardian Lord Burleigh, and in 1585 accompanied the Earl of Leicester, the favourite of Queen Elizabeth, to Holland, where he behaved with bravery at the battle of Zutphen. On his return to England, he was made master of the horse and knight of the garter, and rose rapidly in the royal favour. In 1589 he accompanied Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris in an expedition to Portugal, which gave great displeasure to the queen, whose dissatisfaction was further increased by his marrying a daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham and the widow of Sir Philip Sidney. In 1591, he commanded the forces sent to the assistance of Henry IV. of France, but was unsuccessful, and lost his only brother, to whom he was greatly attached. In 1596 he was appointed joint-commander with Lord Howard in an expedition against Spain, where he contributed to the capture of Cadiz, and also to the destruction of 57 ships of war belonging to the enemy. After this, he had the command of a fleet sent out to intercept the Spanish Plate fleet; but nothing was done except the taking of Fayal by a separate division of the squadron, commanded by Sir Walter Raleigh; and this occasioned a dispute between him and the earl. In the following year, Essex was made earl-marshal of England, and spoke vehemently against a peace with Spain, in opposition to Lord Burleigh, who supported the measure. On the death of that statesman, Essex succeeded him as chancellor of Cambridge; but about this time, at a private council held respecting the appointment of a proper person to govern Ireland, he had the imprudence to oppose her majesty with rudeness; on which she gave him a box on the ear. The earl instantly laid his hand on his sword, and swore that he would not endure such treatment, even from her father, and withdrew from the court. At length a reconciliation was effected, and he was sent to Ireland to subdue the province of Ulster, which had risen in rebellion. The ill success which attended him in this expedition, was the true beginning of his downfall, as it gave his enemies an opportunity of prejudicing the queen against him, with apparent justice, during his absence. On his return to England, however, he met with a better reception than he expected; but, soon after, fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned. In 1600 he regained his liberty; but instead of conducting himself with caution, he began to vent his indignation in bitter terms, and said that "the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcass." His enemies having intelligence of his actions and speeches, sent for him to attend the council, which he refused, and began to arm in his own defence. Some blood was shed before he surrendered; on which he was made prisoner, tried, and beheaded at the Tower. A story is told of the queen having given Essex, whilst in her favour, a ring, with the assurance that, on his sending it to her at any time when he might be in trouble, he should receive her pardon. This ring, it is said, he gave to the countess of Nottingham, his relation, and the wife of his inveterate enemy, the admiral, to carry to the queen; but that lady, in obedience to the commands of her husband, kept it, and the unhappy Essex suffered. On her deathbed the countess is stated to have confessed this fact to Elizabeth, who said, that "God might forgive her, but she never could." The foundation of this story is uncertain; but it has served to embellish a tragedy called "The Earl of Essex." (See ELIZABETH.)

Born at Netherwood, Herefordshire, 1567; died 1601.

ESSEX, ROBERT DEVEREUX, Earl of, son of the above, was educated under Sir Henry Savile at Merton College, Oxford, and was restored to his family honours by James I. He married Lady Frances Howard, daughter of the earl of Suffolk; but she, contracting an affection for the royal favourite, Robert Carr, afterwards earl of Somerset, instituted a shameful suit against her husband, and obtained a divorce. In 1620 Essex served under Sir Horatio Vere in the Palatinate, and afterwards under Prince Maurice in Holland. On his return to England, he appeared as a member in opposition to the court; and on the breaking out of the rebellion, had the command of the parliamentary army. He fought against the king at Edgehill, after which he took Reading, raised the siege of Gloucester, fought in the double battle of Newbury, and succeeded in covering London. In 1644 he marched into the West; but was so completely inclosed in Cornwall, that he and his principal officers were glad to escape by sea. By the Self-denying ordinance, in 1645, he was deprived of his command.

Born 1592; died 1646.

ESSINGTON, (See PORT ESSINGTON.)

ESSLINGEN, ess'-ling-en, a town of Wurtemberg, on the right bank of the Necker, 6 miles S.E. of Stuttgart. The Frauenkirche, erected in the 15th century, is a very beautiful Gothic building, with a spire 230 feet high. There are two town-houses and an old castle. Manf. Machinery, woollens, yarns, silver plate, lacquered and tin wares, paper, and a wine known as Esslingen champagne. Pop. 20,758. He resided for several years in England, France, and Italy, made a magnificent collection of works of art, established a splendid picture gallery at Vienna, and was the patron of Haydn and other musicians. In 1809 Napoleon offered him the crown of Hungary, which he declined.

Born 1765.

ESTERHAZY, PAUL ANTON D', prince, son of the above, was Austrian ambassador in England from 1815 to 1818, and again between 1830 and 1838. In 1848 he was for a time minister of foreign affairs, but when the struggle between Austria and Hungary broke out, he retired from public life.

ESTHER, est'-her, a Jewess of the tribe of Benjamin, and cousin to Mordecai. Her proper name was Hadassah, but the name Esther (the planet Venus) was given her on account of her great beauty. Ahasuerus, king of Persia, married her, after divorcing his queen, Vashti. His favourite minister, Haman, out of resentment to Mordecai, having plotted the destruction of all the Jews in the empire, she, in their behalf, supplicated the king, who revoked the decree, and ordered Haman to be hanged on the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai. In memory of this deliverance, the Jews celebrate the yearly feast of Purim. Historians are not agreed as to the king who is called Ahasuerus in Scripture; but he seems to have been the son of Darius Hystaspes. (See AHASUERUS and DARIUS.)

ESTHONIA, es-tho'-ne-a, a government of the Russian empire, bounded on the W. by the Baltic, N. by the Gulf of Finland, E. by Ingria, and S. by Livonia. It is level, with rocky shores, a sandy soil, and humid climate. About two-thirds of it are unproductive, or covered with pine forests. The Narva, Keyel, and Loksa are the principal rivers. Hemp, flax, hops, and tobacco are grown. Area, 7,597 square miles. Pop. 379,875; divided into the Esthlanders, a mixture of Swedes, Germans, and Russians, and the Esths, the aboriginal race, of Finnish descent. The chief town is REVEL.—After having been long an object of bloody contention between the Russians, Poles, and Swedes, this province was confirmed to the latter by the peace of Oliva in 1660; but it was subdued by Peter the Great in 1710, and finally ceded to Russia by the treaty of Nystadt in 1721.

ETEOCLES, e-té-o-klees, according to Greek legend, a son of Œdipus, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polynices, that they should both share the royalty, and each reign alternately a year. Eteocles, by right of seniority, first ascended the throne; but after the first year of his reign, he refused to resign in favour of his brother. Polynices resolved to punish him, and implored the assistance of his father-in-law, Adrastus, king of Argos, who assisted him with a large army. War commencing, and having been carried on with various success for some time, it was at last decided by the two brothers, that they should end their dispute by engaging in single combat. They both fell. Their uncle Creon ascended the throne of Thebes, and prohibited the interment of Polynices, but his sister, Antigone, secretly performed the funeral rite, for which she was buried alive.

ETHAN, é-than, "strong," a chief musician in the temple of Solomon.—Another of the name was one of the four sons of the Hebrew sage Mahol, and is in some places spoken of as the Ezrahite.

ETHELBALD, eth'-el-bald, king of Wessex, was the eldest surviving son of Ethelwolf. He married his stepmother, Judith of France, but was forced to abandon that connection, and she became the wife of Baldwin, count of Flanders, and the ancestress of Matilda, wife of William the conqueror, and, through her, of the kings of England. Ethelbald was engaged in military conflicts with the Danes, and distinguished himself by the common quality of bravery, but otherwise holds no remarkable place in history.

Died 860.

ETHELBERT, eth'-el-bert, king of Kent, who attacked Cealwin, king of Wessex, in 568, and was defeated in a great battle at Wiblandune, now Wimbledon in Surrey. In 570 he married Bertha, daughter of Caribert, king of France. By her means he was induced to embrace Christianity, which he had permitted to be preached to his subjects by Augustine, the monk. He founded the bishopric of Rochester, and in concert with the king of Essex, erected St. Paul's church, in London.

Born 552; died 616.

ETHELBERT, king of England, the second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald in 860. He was a virtuous prince, beloved by his subjects, and mostly engaged in repelling the incursions of the Danes.

Died 866.

ETHELDREDA, or ETHELREDA, ST., eth-el-dré'-da, a daughter of the king of the East Angles, who established a convent in the isle of Ely, on the site of the present Ely cathedral. Although the wife of the king of the East Angles, she retained her virginity, and was canonized for her saintly virtues. Her name has been popularly changed into St. Audrey.

Lived in the 7th century.

ETHELRED II., eth'-el-red, king of England, the son of Edgar, succeeded his brother, Edward the Martyr, in 979. His unmanly spirit submitted to pay a tribute to the Danes, by a tax levied on his subjects, called Danegelt. To free himself from this oppression, he caused the Danes to be treacherously massacred throughout the country, in one day. On this, Sweyn, king of Denmark, entered his kingdom, and compelled him to fly to Normandy; but Sweyn dying soon after, Ethelred returned.

Died 1016.

ETHELWOLF, eth'-el-woolf, king of England, son of Egbert, came to the crown in 837, a has rendered his reign famous for being that in which tithes were instituted. He was a mild and religious prince, and went to Rome with his youngest son, Alfred.

Died 857.

ETHEREGE, GEORGE, eth'-e-redj, an English dramatic writer of the reign of Charles II. In 1664 he produced the comedy of "The Comical Revenge; or Love in a Tub." Encouraged by the favourable reception of this piece, he brought out another in 1668, entitled "She Would if She Could." In 1676 appeared his "Man of Mode; or Sir Fopling Flutter." These productions raised him to a place among the best wits of his time, although they are more remarkable for spirit of dialogue than originality of invention. Their licentiousness, however, has long ago excluded them from public representation. In 1683 he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed envoy to Ratisbon. He died from a fall down a stair, after a convivial entertainment.

ETHIOPIA, é-thé-ó-pé-a, "blackness," a district of Arabia Felix, including the land of Midian. Also a large district of Africa, South of Egypt, and Libya, including the modern Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan and Abyssinia.

ETIENNE, St., ai'-te-en, a great manufacturing town of France, capital of the department of Loire, on both banks of the Furens, 30 miles S.W. of Lyons. There are an old and a new town. The most conspicuous public building is the hotel-de-ville, which contains an industrial museum. Manf. Ribbons of great beauty, which give employment to 30,000 looms; firearms, hardware goods, silks, velvets, embroidery, lace, muslins, leather, glass, and paper. In its vicinity are both coal and iron mines. About 600,000 tons of coal are annually raised, and the galleries are driven beneath the town itself. Pop. 114,962.—It is connected by railway with Lyons.

ETIENNE DE BAIGORRY, St., bai-gor'-re, a town of France, in the department of Basses Pyrenées, 27 miles S.E. of Bayonne. Pop. 2,500.

ETIVE, Loch, et-iv', an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, on the west coast of Scotland, in the north of Argyleshire. It is 20 miles long, with a varying breadth of from half a mile to 3 miles. It abounds with salmon, seals, and porpoises.

ETNA, or ÆTNA, et'-na, now known as Monte Gibello, a volcanic mountain of Sicily, on the E. coast of the island, and about 10 miles from Catania. The base is nearly 90 miles in circumference, and the height is 10,874 feet above the level of the sea. There are about 80 minor cones. This celebrated mountain is divided by the Sicilians into three parts or regions,—the lava or lower, the wooded or middle, and the upper. The lower contains vineyards, corn-fields, and pastures, and many towns, villages, and convents; the middle is crowded with forests of oak, chestnut, ash, fir, and pine, and with an infinite number of aromatic plants; the upper is entirely destitute of vegetation, and the summit is always covered with ice and snow, except here and there, where it is overspread with a thick layer of black ashes. Besides the fruits, which are the finest in the island, and the wood for fuel, which Etna affords, the inhabitants likewise derive a great profit from its snow. This is an indispensable necessary in Sicily and the S. part of Naples, and is in greater request than ice, because it affords a more cooling beverage.

Eruptions.—The first eruption of Etna on record is that mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, without fixing the period when it happened; but the second, recorded by Thucydides, was in the year 734 B.C. From this period to the year 1447 there were eighteen more eruptions. After this it ceased to emit fire nearly 90 years; when, in 1536, another took place. Others followed in 1554, 1567, 1603, 1669, 1673, 1682, and 1693, which last was very terrible, and attended with an earthquake that overturned the town of Catania. Smaller eruptions afterwards happened, in 1755, 1763, 1764, 1766, 1780, 1787, 1809, 1811, 1830, and 1832, the last of which destroyed the town of Bronté. There was a great and disastrous eruption in 1852, and other eruptions in 1865 and 1868. From the great crater at the top issues continually a sulphureous smoke; but eruptions hence are very rare, as the fire cannot rise to that height without extraordinary exertions, and the lava breaks out at some fissure where it finds the least opposition.

ETOILE, ai-tweel, an ancient French town, department Drôme, partly surrounded by ruinous walls. There was formerly a strong castle, used as a royal residence. Manf. Silk and red wine. Pop. 3,000.

ETON, é-ton, a town of Buckinghamshire, on the left bank of the Thames, opposite Windsor, with which it is connected by a bridge. It is 22 miles S.W. of London, is chiefly celebrated for containing a royal seminary of education, called Eton College, founded by Henry VI., in 1440. The average number of "boys" resident here is about 1,000, and they are principally composed of the sons of the aristocratic and wealthy. Pop. 2,806 exclusive of the scholars.

ETRURIA, e-troor'-e-a, a country of ancient Italy, known also as Tyrrhenia and Tuscia, and including the greater part of the northern half of the peninsula. The northern part is known as Etruria Circumpadana; the southern portion as Etruria Campaniana, and the central portion as Etruria Propria, or proper, to which in later times the name Etruria was limited. It includes the modern Tuscany, Lucca, and that portion of the Papal dominions north of the Tiber. Etruria Proper consisted of 12 sovereign cities, and attained to great power. In the 1st century B.C. it was entirely subdued by the Romans.

ETRURIA, a village of Staffordshire, near Newcastle-under-Lyne, famous as the place where Josiah Wedgwood established his pottery works. Manf. Pottery and iron. Pop. 3,000.—A station on the North Staffordshire railway.

ETSKA, ets'-ka, a town of Hungary, on the Bega Canal, in the midst of a fertile district. There are a Roman Catholic and a Greek Church. Pop. 3,300.

ETTEN, et'-ten, a village of the Netherlands, 7 miles S. of Breda. It has a trade in corn, cattle, and fuel. Two horse markets are held annually. Pop. 5,400.

ETTENHEIM, et'-ten-hime, a town of Baden, on the Ettenbach, 16 miles S.W. of Offenburg. Manf. Linen. Pop. 3,200.

ETTLINGEN, et'-ling-en, a town of Baden, on the Albe, 5 miles S.E. of Carlsruhe. There is a castle, with gardens. Manf. Paper, linen, and cotton goods, and gunpowder. Pop. 4,500.

ETTMULLER, Ernst Moritz Ludwig, et-muth'-ler, German philologist and antiquary, studied medicine at Leipsic, but devoted himself to investigations into the language and literature of his native country. He has published many works in the old German and Norse languages.

Born near Loban, 1802.

ETTRICK FOREST, a pastoral district of Selkirkshire, watered by the Ettrick river, and forming, originally, a part of the great Caledonian forest.

ETTY, William, R.A., et'-te, an eminent English artist, the son of a Yorkshire miller, and himself apprenticed to a printer. In 1806 he entered a student of the Royal Academy; but, after hard labour and disappointment, he was unable to get himself represented by any of his pictures on the walls of the academy till 1811, when "Telemachus rescuing Antiope" was permitted to appear. From this time he continued to plod, but not to attract, at his art; and, in 1816, was induced to visit Italy, for the purpose of study; but he returned, almost immediately, to work again in London. Labour, as usual, met its reward. In 1820 he commanded notice by his "Coral-Finders;" and the following year his "Cleopatra arriving in Cilicia" procured and established a reputation. He was now famous, and produced a great many works, and especially excelled in representing the nude female. His aim, in all his large pictures, was to paint some great moral on the heart; as, for example, in "Ulysses and the Sirens," he meant to show the importance of resisting sensual delights. The only picture which the nation possesses of his painting is "Youth at the Prow, and Pleasure at the Helm." In 1828 he was elected Royal Academician, and soon attained celebrity. His pictures were in great request, and obtained high prices. He painted altogether nearly 300 large pictures, besides numerous smaller works. His latter years were passed in retirement at York.

Born at York, 1787; died there, 1849.

EU, eoo, a town of France, department Seine Inférieure, 18 miles N.E. of Dieppe. There are a cathedral, a very fine Gothic church, and a palace, the Château d'Eu, a favourite residence of king Louis Philippe, who greatly embellished it, and formed a fine portrait gallery. This chateau was visited by Queen Victoria in 1843 and 1845. In the castle, William the Conqueror was married to Maud of Flanders. The forest of Eu extends for a considerable way on the east and south sides of the town. Pop. 3,600.

EU-HO, or YUN-LIANG, a large river of China, which falls into the Gulf of Pechelee, in lat. 38° 59′ N., lon. 117° 22′ E, after a course of 140 miles. It has many considerable affluents.

EUBŒA, u-bé'-a, the largest island in the Ægean Sea, formerly distinguished by the name of Negroponte. It is separated from the continent by the narrow strait of Eubœa, crossed by a bridge at its narrowest point. The island is 105 miles long, with a breadth of 33 at its extreme points. It is intersected by a chain of mountains, rising in the centre at an elevation of about 4,500 feet. There are extensive forests of fir-trees, the climate is salubrious, and the soil fertile. Wine, corn, cotton, wool, pitch, and turpentine, are produced, and cattle and goat rearing is extensively carried on. The chief towns are Chalcis, on the north side, and Carystos on the south. Pop. 95,136.—The island was subject to the Athenians until they were subjugated by Philip of Macedon, and was subsequently a portion of the Roman empire. It came into possession of Venice in 1204, and was taken by the Turks in 1470, and retained until 1821. It now forms a portion of the kingdom of Greece.

EUBULUS, u-bu'-lus, a Greek comic writer, many of whose plays contain parodies of Euripides and other tragic poets.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

EUCLID, u'-klid, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, who immortalized his name by his books on geometry, in which he digested all the propositions of the eminent geometricians which preceded him, as Thales, Pythagoras, and others. Ptolemy became his pupil, and his school was so famous, that Alexandria, where he taught, continued for ages the great university for mathematicians. His "Elements of Geometry" have gone through innumerable editions, and have been used in every country where mathematics are taught.

Born about 300 B.C.

EUCLID, or EUCLIDES, a native of Megara, and a disciple of Socrates. When the Athenians had forbidden all the people of Megara, on pain of death, to enter their city, Euclides disguised himself in woman's clothes to introduce himself into the presence of Socrates. He was the founder of the school called the Megaric, distinguished by its dialectic subtlety. He wrote six dialogues, which are lost.

Died about 424 B.C.

EUDES, JEAN, eoode, French monk and orator, who travelled through France as a reforming missionary, and established, in 1642, the religious society named the "Eudistes." He wrote "The Life and Kingdom of Jesus."

Born 1601; died 1680.

EUDOCIA, u-do'-she-a, a learned Athenian lady, whose original name was Athenais. She was the daughter of Leontius, the philosophical sophist, who left her only a small legacy, bequeathing the rest of his property to his two sons. Conceiving herself ill used, she went to Constantinople to lay her complaint before the emperor Theodosius II. Here she became the favourite of Pulcheria, sister of that emperor, and embraced the Christian religion. In 421 she was married to the emperor, who afterwards (under the influence of Pulcheria, who had quarrelled with Eudocia about theological doctrines) neglected her and divorced her in a fit of jealousy. She went to Jerusalem, where she built churches, and led a life of great devotion, always protesting her innocence of the crime laid to her charge by Theodosius. She wrote some Greek poems, and paraphrases on some of the prophets. She is said (but on doubtful authority) to have written a life of Christ, composed of lines taken from Homer.

Born 393; died 460.

EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA, widow of the emperor Constantine Ducas, on whose death, in 1067, she assumed the imperial diadem, and married the general Romanus Diogenes. When her son Michael ascended the throne, he shut her in a convent, where she amused herself in writing on the pagan mythology. She left a treatise on the genealogies of the gods and heroes, which was printed in Villoison's "Anecdota Græca," 1781.

EUDOCIA, FEODOREVNA, first wife of Peter I., czar of Russia, and daughter of the boyard Feodor Lapukin. Peter married her in 1689, but a few years afterwards he sent her to a nunnery, on account of her complaints of his infidelity.

EUDOXUS, OF CNIDUS, u-dox'-us, an eminent astronomer of Caria, in Asia Minor. He studied under Plato, and afterwards went to Egypt, where he resided thirteen years. He then opened a mathematical school at Athens. It is said that he passed a great part of his time on a high mountain, where he made celestial observations. None of his writings remain, and his reputation rests upon the testimony of Greek and Latin authors.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

EUFALA, u-fa'-la, a town of Alabama, in the United States, on the right bank of the Chattachoochee. Cotton is largely exported. Pop. 3,000.

EUGÈNE, FRANÇOIS, oo'-zhain, Prince of Savoy Carignan, general and statesman, was the son of the count of Soissons, by Olympia Mancini, a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. He was intended for the church, but the death of his father changed this design, and determined him to follow the military profession. His mother being banished to the Netherlands by Louis XIV., and his family otherwise wronged by that sovereign, he went to Vienna, where the emperor gave him a regiment of dragoons, and he served in Hungary with great reputation against the Turks, especially at the famous siege of Vienna. In 1691 he, at the head of the imperial army, entered Piedmont, where he relieved

Coni, which was at that time besieged by the French, and took Carmagnole. In 1697 he commanded the imperialists in Hungary, and, the same year, defeated the Turks at the battle of Zenta. On the death of the king of Spain, in 1701, the "war of the Spanish succession" commenced, and Prince Eugène achieved new laurels. At the close of the campaign of 1702, he returned to Vienna, and was made president of the council, and associated in the command of the allied army with the duke of Marlborough. In 1704 he had a principal share in the famous battle of Blenheim. In 1707 he was repulsed at Cassano by Vendôme; but he soon recovered his reputation in a bloody action near Turin, which was then besieged by the French, whose trenches he forced, and gained a complete victory. The same year he entered France, and laid siege to Toulon, but did not succeed in taking the place. In 1708 he shared in the victory of Oudenard and in the capture of Lille. In 1709 he fought at Malplaquet, where he was severely wounded, but would not quit the scene of action. In 1712 he visited London, to induce the English ministers not to make a separate peace; but his arguments were ineffectual, and England signed the treaty of Utrecht. Now left to carry on the war alone, he was successfully opposed by Marshal Villars, with whom he entered into a negotiation, which was followed by the peace of Radstadt in 1714. In 1716 a war broke out between the emperor and the Turks, on which the prince was again intrusted with the command in Hungary, where, in that year, he defeated the grand vizier at Peterwaradin, this splendid victory being followed by the no less great exploit of the capture of Belgrade. It was here, with 40,000 men, he defeated a relieving army of 150,000 Turks. Peace being concluded at Passarowitz, in 1718, he retired into private life; but in 1733, when the election for the crown of Poland was disputed, he was again employed. This campaign, however, was short, and unproductive of any remarkable action, although successful in its results. During the few years of repose which the peace of Passarowitz brought this warrior, he worthily employed himself in public affairs and in the arts of peace. The emperor Charles VI. found in him as faithful a counsellor as he was a skilful captain; and in the days of his misfortune, he would cry, "Alas! the fortune of the empire has departed with Prince Eugène!" The prince was of the middle height, but stoutly built, and was exempt from those excesses which have so often sullied the characters of great men. Napoleon places him in the same rank of generals as Turenne and Frederick the Great, and considered the plans of his campaigns as conveying a perfect knowledge of the art of war. His political writings are valuable as illustrating the history and manners of the time.

Born at Paris, 1663; died at Vienna, 1736.

EUGÉNIE, MARIE DE GUZMAN, ex-Empress of the French, daughter of the Count de Montijo, descended by the father's side from an ancient and noble Spanish house, and through her maternal grandfather, Mr. Kirkpatrick (at one time English consul at Malaga) with an old Scotch family. She was educated partly in England and partly in Madrid, and being at Paris in 1851, her beauty attracted the attention of Napoleon III., who married her on the 30th of January, 1853. One son, the Prince Imperial, born March 16, 1856, is the issue of this marriage. The Empress is a devoted adherent of the Church of Rome, and is credited with having urged on the Franco-German war of 1870, which resulted in the defeat of the French and the deposition of the Emperor. She escaped to England in a private yacht, and took up her residence at Chiselhurst, where she was joined by the Emperor, who remained there until his death. The ex-Empress subsequently removed her residence to Farnborough, living there in great retirement and exciting very little public observation. (See NAPOLEON III.)

Born at Granada, 1826.

EUGENIUS I., u-jé'-ne-us, a pope and saint, succeeded Martin in 654. He is praised for his liberality and piety. Died 657.

EUGENIUS II., succeeded Pascal I. in 824, and decreed that in every country parsonage a master should be kept to read and explain the Scriptures. He, however, defended image-worship.

Died 827.

EUGENIUS III., Pope, ascended the Papal chair in 1145. Rome was at that time in a turbulent state, and finding that he could do little good, Eugenius retired to Pisa, and thence to Paris.

Died at Pisa, 1153.

EUGENIUS IV. (GABRIELE CONDULMERO), succeeded Martin V. in 1431, in which year the council of Bâle assembled. This pope and the members of that assembly differed in their judgment, when he issued a bull of excommunication against the council. In 1438 he called a council at Ferrara, to bring about a reconciliation between the Greek and Latin churches. At this council appeared the emperor Paleologus, with several Greek bishops; but the plague breaking out at Ferrara, the council was removed to Florence, where in 1439 a sort of union was agreed to, but was soon broken. Another council at Bâle deposed Eugenius, and elected Amadeus VIII., duke of Savoy, who took the name of Felix V.

Born 1383; died at Rome, 1447.

EUGENIUS, ST., bishop of Carthage, who, having incurred the hatred of the Vandals, was in 484 banished to the deserts of Tripoli. He afterwards went to Europe, and founded a monastery at Vienne, in Languedoc, where he passed the remainder of his life.

Died 505.

EUGENIUS, an obscure grammarian, who was proclaimed emperor in Dauphiné, by Count Arbogast, after the murder of Valentinian II., in 392. He crossed the Alps, and made himself master of Milan in 394; but was defeated and slain by the emperor Theodosius.

Lived in the 4th century.

EULE, eoole, a town of Bohemia, on the right bank of the Sazawa, near its junction with the Moldau. In early times the gold washings were very productive, and small portions of gold are still obtained. Pop. 2,200.

EULER, LEONARD, oo'-ler, a Swiss mathematician, who received his education in the university of Bâle, with a view to the church, but principally devoted himself to mathematical studies under the famous John Bernouilli. In 1727 he followed his friends Hermann and Daniel Bernouilli to Petersburg, where, in 1733, he became professor of physics in the Academy of Sciences. In 1735 he impaired his sight by intense application to the solution of a difficult problem. His memoir on "Fire" obtained the prize from the French Academy of Sciences, in 1738, and in 1740 he divided another, on the Flux and Reflux of the Sea, with Maclaurin and Daniel Bernouilli. In 1741 he went to Berlin, at the invitation of the king, to assist in establishing the academy there. When introduced to the queen-dowager, she expressed her surprise at the paucity of his conversation; upon which he replied that he had just come from a country where those who spoke were hanged.

He continued at Berlin till 1766, when he returned to St. Petersburg, where he soon after entirely lost his sight. Still he continued his favourite pursuits. He also received another prize from the French Academy, for three Memoirs on the Inequalities in the Motions of the Planets; which were followed by two others for solutions of questions on the Theory of the Moon. In 1772 appeared his Lunar Tables. Besides the above works he wrote a great number of papers in the Memoirs of several academies; "Opuscula Analytica;" "Introduction to the Analysis of Infinitesimals," &c. In 1760, when the Russians invaded Brandenburg and advanced to Charlottenburg, they plundered a house belonging to Euler. When this was told to General Tottleben, he immediately caused reparation to be made to the mathematician, and the empress Elizabeth of Russia presented him with 4,000 florins. He attacked some of the theories of Leibnitz, and undertook to defend revelation against freethinkers.

Born at Bâle, 1707; died 1783.

EUMÆUS, u-mé'-us, in Homeric legend, a herdsman and steward of Ulysses, who recognized his master, at his return home from the Trojan war, after twenty years' absence, and assisted him in removing Penelope's suitors.

EUMELUS, u-mé'-lus, according to Homer, son of Admetus, king of Pheræ, went to the Trojan war, and had the fleetest horses in the Grecian army. He distinguished himself in the games appointed in honour of Patroclus.

EUMENES I., u'-me-nees, king of Pergamus, succeeded his uncle Philetærus, 263 B.C. He was possessed of good abilities, but died in a fit of drunkenness.

Died 241 B.C.

EUMENES II., nephew of the preceding, succeeded his father, Attalus, 197 B.C. He assisted the Romans against Antiochus the Great. Like his father, he was greatly attached to learned pursuits, and enriched the famous library of Pergamus, which had been founded by his predecessors, in imitation of the Alexandrine collection of the Ptolemies.

Died 159 B.C.

EUMENES, a Greek commander, and accounted the most worthy of all the officers of Alexander to succeed him after his death. He conquered Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealousy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He then joined his forces to those of Perdiccas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. He was put to death by order of Antigonus, who, however, honoured his remains with a splendid funeral, and conveyed his ashes to his wife and family in Cappadocia.

Died 315 B.C.

EUMENIDES, u-men'-e-dees, a name given to the Furies by the ancients, who considered it unlawful to utter the true name Erinnyes. Various fabulous accounts have been given of their origin. They were originally many, but later writers limit them to three,—Tisiphone, Megara, and Alecto, to which some add Nemesis, and were supposed to be the ministers of the vengeance of the gods. They therefore appeared stern and inexorable, always employed in punishing the guilty upon earth, as well as in the infernal regions. They were also called Furiæ and Erinnyes, and were generally represented with a grim aspect, bloody garment, and serpents wreathing round their head instead of hair. They held a burning torch in one hand, and a whip of scorpions in the other, and were always attended by Terror, Rage, Paleness, and Death. In Athens, their worship was conducted in silence.

EUMOLPUS, u-mol'-pus, a king of Thrace, who was made priest of Ceres by Erechtheus, king of Athens. The priesthood remained in the family of Eumolpus for 1,200 years. The priests, known as the Eumolpidæ, celebrated the festivals at Eleusis.

EUNAPIUS, u-nay'-pe-us, a physician, sophist, and historian, who wrote a history of the Cæsars, of which few fragments remain. His "Lives of the Philosophers" of his age is still extant. It is composed with fidelity and elegance, precision and correctness.

Born 347.

EUNOMIUS, u-no'-me-us, founder of the Arian sect of the Eunomians, was first a lawyer, then a soldier, afterwards a priest, and in 360 became bishop of Cyzicum. He engaged in controversies respecting the Trinity, and suffered much persecution from the orthodox party; but at length obtained permission to end his days in his native place. Scarcely any fragments of his writings remain.

Died 394.

EUNUS, u'-nus, a Sicilian slave, who in 136 B.C. inflamed the minds of the people by pretended inspiration and enthusiasm. Oppression and misery compelled 2,000 slaves to join his cause, and he soon found himself at the head of 50,000 men. He assumed the title of King Antiochus, and gained several victories over the Romans, but was defeated by Calpurnius Naso, and he and the greater number of his followers were impaled on crosses.

Died 132 B.C.

EUPATOR, u'-pa-tor, a surname given to many of the Asiatic princes, such as Mithridates, &c.

EUPATORIA, or KOSLOV, u-pa-tor'-e-a, a town of Russia, in the government of Taurida, on the W. coast of the Crimea, 65 miles S. of Perekop. It has a magnificent mosque belonging to the Tartar inhabitants, built in 1552. The harbour is shallow, and only partially sheltered. There is an Artesian well, 460 feet deep. Pop. 7,800, mostly Tartars and Jews.—In September, 1854, the allied English and French armies landed near here, and the town soon after was occupied by a small detachment. The Turks subsequently occupied it, and in 1855 it was attacked by the Russians, who, however, were repulsed by the Turks and the Anglo-French ships of war, lying in the neighbouring roadstead.

EUPEN, oi'-pen, a manufacturing town of Prussia, on the Weeze, near the Belgian frontier. There are three Roman Catholic and one Protestant church. Manf. Woollens are extensively made, the manufacture having been introduced by French refugees, after the peace of Luneville, in 1801; paper, leather, and machines. Pop. 15,000.

EUPHORBUS, u-for'-bus, in Homeric legend, a famous Trojan, and the first who wounded Patroclus, whom Hector killed. He perished by the hand of Menelaus, and the latter hung his shield in the temple of Juno at Argos. Pythagoras, the founder of the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, affirmed that he himself was once Euphorbus, and that his soul recollected many exploits which had been done while it animated that Trojan's body. As a further proof of his assertion, he showed at first sight the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno.

EUPHORION, u-for'-e-on, a Greek poet of Chalcis, in Eubœa. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing.

Born 274 B.C.; died 221 B.C.

EUPHRATES, or EL-FRAT, u-frat'-tees, one of the most considerable rivers of Asia, rising in the mountains of Armenia, from two principal sources, the Kara-Su and the Murad, the former rising 25 miles N.E. of Erzeroum, the latter about 70 miles farther east; they unite in lat. 38° 58′ N.; lon. 38° 30′ E. At Korna, about 130 miles from its mouth, it is joined by the Tigris; and these united streams form one of the noblest rivers in the East, known as the Shatt-el-Arab, falling into the Gulf of Persia, about 50 miles from Bassora. The total length is about 1,600 miles, the Tigris included, and the area drained is computed at 108,000 miles.

EUPHROSYNE, "the joyous one," in mythology, one of the three Graces.

EUPOLIS, u'-po-lis, a comic poet of Athens, who severely condemned the vices and immoralities of his age. He produced his first drama at the age of 17. It is supposed that he was killed in the battle of Cynossema.

EURE, oor, a river of France, rising in the department of Orne, and falling into the Seine, near Pont-de-l'Arche, after a course of 124 miles.

EURE, a department of France, comprising the E. part of Normandy, and situate on the estuary of the Seine, S. of the department Seine Inférieure. It is generally level, and produces corn, hemp, flax, fruits, especially apples and pears, and timber. It has extensive pastures, and large numbers of cattle, sheep, and horses are raised. The chief rivers are the Seine, and its affluents the Eure and the Rille.

Minerals.—Iron and millstones.
Manf.—Woollens, cotton, glass, paper, iron, copper, and zinc wares.
Area.—2,262 square miles.
Pop.—364,291.
Divisions.—There are five arrondissements: Evreux, Louviers, Les Andelys, Bernay, and Pont-Audemer; and 700 communes.
Chief Towns.—EVREUX, the capital; LOUVIERS, BERNAY, and PONT-AUDEMER.

EURE-ET-LOIR, a department of France, situate to the W. of Paris. It consists of a part of the old provinces Orléannois and Isle-de-France. The surface, as in the adjacent department of the Eure, is in general level, and a large quantity of corn is raised. It has excellent pastures, and numerous herds, flocks, and horses are reared. There are no navigable rivers, but the streams are valuable for water-power.

Minerals.—Iron.
Manf.—Paper, cottons, and coarse cloths.
Area.—2,248 square miles.
Pop.—280,037.
Divisions.—There are five arrondissements: Chartres, Château-Dun, Dreux, and Nogent-le-Rotron. CHARTRES is the capital.

EURIPIDES, u-rip'-i-dees, a Greek tragic poet, who studied at Athens under Anaxagoras the philosopher, and Prodicus the rhetorician. He was twice married, but was unfortunate in both wives, which is supposed to have suggested some of the severe remarks which are found levelled against the female sex, scattered over his works. His first play was the "Peliades," performed 456 B.C. In 441 B.C. he gained the first prize for tragedy, and he continued to write for the Athenian stage until 408 B.C., when he went to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. Here he enjoyed all the tranquillity he sought; but as he was walking one evening in a wood, he was assaulted by hounds and torn in pieces. The Athenians, out of respect for his talents, went into mourning, and asked for his body; but the Macedonians would not part with it, but erected over it a magnificent tomb at Pella. Only 19 out of 75 (or, according to some authorities, 92,) of his tragedies are extant.

Born 480 B.C.; died 407.

EURIPUS, or EURIPOS, u-ri'-pus, a narrow strait, separating the island of Eubœa from the coast of Bœotia. The flux and reflux of its tide continuing regular for 18 or 19 days, and remarkably settled throughout the remainder of the month, was a matter of deep inquiry among the ancients; and it is said that Aristotle threw himself into it, because he was unable to discover the causes of that phenomenon. (See ARISTOTLE.)

EUROPA, or BASSAS DA INDIA, u-ro'-pa, an island in the Mozambique channel, on the east coast of Africa. It is of circular form, and about 4 miles in diameter, easy of access, and abounds in turtle. Lat. 22° 22′ S. Lon. 40° 24′ E.

EUROPA, in mythology, the daughter of Agenor, king of the Phœnicians, and the nymph Mella, and the sister of Cadmus. She was carried away to Crete by Zeus, who assumed the shape of a bull, but afterwards transformed himself into a beautiful youth. The result was the birth of three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. Europa afterwards married Asterius, king of Crete.

EUROPE, u'-rope, the smallest but most important division of the earth, lying to the W. of Asia, from which it is divided, from north to south, by the Kara river, the Ural mountains and river, the Caspian Sea, the Caucasian mountains, the Black Sea, the Bosphorus, the Sea of Marmora, and the Dardanelles. Until recently, the Sea of Azof was considered to be a portion of the boundary, excluding Circassia, but modern geographers agree in fixing the south-eastern boundary on the Caucasian range which stretches between the Caspian and the Black Seas; on the N. is the Arctic Ocean; on the W. the North Atlantic; and on the S. the Mediterranean. From the mouth of the Kara river, in the extreme N.E., to Cape St. Vincent in the S.W., the continent measures 3,400 miles; and from Cape Nordkyn, in Lapland, to Cape Matapan, in Greece, the most southerly point of the continent, 2,400 miles. Europe extends through about 35° of latitude, and 70° of longitude. None of the great divisions of the earth are so broken in outline, the western half of the continent being a cluster of immense peninsulas, enclosing great ocean inlets; large islands of irregular shape, and an immense number of small islands, lying near the coasts, especially of the Scandinavian, or north-western peninsula. The coast line is estimated at 19,500 miles, exclusive of the circumferences of the smaller islands. The southern and western and the north-eastern portions of the continent differ greatly in character, the former being traversed by immense mountain ranges, and the latter an almost unbroken plain, diversified only by undulations of moderate elevation. The plain occupies about two-thirds of the entire area, commencing at the foot of the Pyrenees, and terminates in the Ural mountains, on the east. It comprehends the western part of France, Holland, Belgium, the greater part of Denmark, the N. provinces of Germany, and Russia. The other plains are those of Bohemia and Hungary, the latter with an area of 40,000 square miles. The great mountain ranges and elevated table-lands of Spain, the Alpine ranges, the Italian mountains, the Carpathian, Balkan, and Caucasian ranges mark the southern limits of the great plain; and on the north-west the Scandinavian mountains form a lofty barrier against the North Atlantic and Arctic Oceans. At the Straits of Gibraltar, Europe and Africa are but 19 miles apart, and the south-western extremity of the island of Sicily is only about 100 miles from Cape Bon, the north-eastern extremity of Tunis, in Africa.

Mountains.—The principal ranges are the Scandinavian, separating Sweden from Norway in the N., and extending from the Naze (the most southern point of Norway) to the North Cape; the Alps, the Pyrenees, the Apennines, the Carpathians, and the Balkan, in the S. Between Europe and Asia, on the E., is the great Uralian chain, and, on the S., the Caucasian, culminating in Mount Elburz, 18,493 feet above the level of the sea, and the highest mountain of Europe, a distinction claimed for Mont Blanc, in the Alps, until the establishment of the Caucasus as the boundary between Europe and Asia. The mountains of Great Britain constitute a separate system. (See the separate headings.)

River Systems.—The great mountain ranges of the Pyrenees, the Alps, and the Carpathians, form the chief watersheds whence the most important rivers rise, except in the case of the Volga, the largest of European rivers, which is formed by the union of many streams, some of which have their sources on the western slopes of the Ural mountains, but others rise at a moderate elevation above the sea level. From the northern slopes of the Alpine region, the Rhine, Elbe, and Weser flow into the North Sea; from the southern side the Rhone and the Po reach Mediterranean. The Danube, the Dnieper, and Dniester discharge into the Black Sea; the Volga into the Caspian; the Dwina, Vistula, and Oder into the Baltic; the Seine into the English Channel; the Loire and Garonne, rivers of France, into the Bay of Biscay. Of the rivers of the Spanish peninsula, to the south of the Pyrenees, the Douro, Tagus, Guadiana and Guadalquivir flow westward to the Atlantic, and the Ebro into the Mediterranean.

Lakes.—The lakes may be divided into three groups, the Alpine, Scandinavian, and Russian. The chief Alpine lakes are Constance, Leman (the Lake of Geneva), Maggiore, Como, and Garda. The Scandinavian lakes extend across Sweden from west to east, the largest being Mälar, Wener, and Wetter. The Russian lakes are to the east and north of the Gulf of Finland, and include Ladoga (the largest in Europe), and Onega, or Peipus.

Seas, Gulfs, Bays, and Channels.—The Mediterranean, Baltic, Black Sea, Sea of Azof, Sea of Marmora, Irish Sea, North Sea, German Ocean, and White Sea. In the Mediterranean are the gulfs of Lyons and Venice, or Adriatic Sea; in the Baltic are the gulfs of Bothnia, Finland, and Riga,—the Skager Rack in the North Sea, and the Cattegat. The Bay of Biscay is in the Atlantic, and the principal channels are the English and St. George's.

Straits.—Dover, Gibraltar, Messina, Bonifacio, Constantinople, Dardanelles, Yenikale, and the Great and Little Belts.

Capes.—Nordkyn in Lapland, N. Cape on the island of Magerœ, the Naze, the Land's End, Capes Wrath, Clear, Ortegal, Finisterre, Rocca, St. Vincent, Tarifa, and Matapan. Cape North is about 4 miles further N. than Nordkyn; but it is not on the continent.

Islands.—The principal are Great Britain and Ireland, in the Atlantic, and the largest in Europe; Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Majorca, Minorca, Ivica, Malta, Elba, Candia, and Eubœa, in the Mediterranean; Zealand, Funen, Rugen, Laaland, Falster, Bornholm, and Aland, in the Baltic; Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla, in the Arctic regions; and Iceland, which geographically belongs rather to America, but which, having been discovered and settled by Europeans several centuries before the discovery of the continent of America, is generally considered to belong to Europe.

Climate.—Temperate. On the S., the continent is within 12° of the tropics; and on the N. it nowhere reaches the line of perpetual congelation. On its W. coasts it is warmer than on its E.; and, under the same latitudes, the E. coast of N. America is much colder than the W. coast of Europe. Between the extreme north and the extreme south of Europe, there is an average difference of about 30° of temperature.

Vegetation.—The most extensive forests are those of Russia, Norway, Sweden, and Germany; and the principal trees of which they consist are the oak, elm, beech, lime, fir, birch, and chestnut. The kingdom of European vegetation, however, might be divided into four zones; the first, or most northern, being that of the birch and fir, which extends south to the 62° in Russia; the second, that of the oak and the beech, extending from this limit to the 48th parallel; the third, that of the vine and chestnut, occupying the region between this parallel and the mountain-chains of the south; the fourth, that of the olive and evergreen woods, comprehending the southern peninsulas.

Pro.—The principal objects of culture are wheat, rye, oats, barley, and potatoes, in the north and middle region. The apple, pear, plum, cherry, and berries of various kinds, are also cultivated. Rice, the olive, the orange, and the lemon grow to the S. of the great mountain range; and in the extreme S., the date-palm, sugar-cane, and cotton-plant are cultivated. The vine is cultivated as high as 51°, and the apple to 55°.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, tin, copper, quicksilver, lead, iron, zinc, coal, salt, and marble. In the precious metals Europe is not rich; but with the useful minerals, as coal, iron, tin, and copper, it is abundantly supplied. Nearly a third of the iron made use of in Europe is supplied by England, and almost all the tin; and Sweden produces the finest iron in the world.

Zoology.—The wild animals are comparatively few. they consist of the bear, wild boar, wolf, lynx, elk, reindeer, chamois, ibex, and wild ox. In the great forests of Germany the wolf, wild boar, and brown bear are still plentiful; and the forests of Russia and Poland afford shelter to the elk. The chamois and ibex inhabit the mountains of the Alps, and the wild ox is still found in the woods of Russia. The domestic animals are everywhere the same, and consist of the horse, ox, dog, pig, and sheep. In Italy, the buffalo is used as a beast of draught. The camel is found in the S. of Russia, and the ass is common, generally in the S. countries. The birds, though mostly destitute of that gorgeous richness of plumage which characterizes those of tropical regions, are compensated by a rare brilliancy of song. Fish abound in the seas and rivers, and are of great value. Serpents and lizards are chiefly found in the S.

Pop.—As enumerated, 319,830,046, of different races possessing distinct characteristics. They may be broadly described as the Teutonic in the N., the Greek-Latin in the S., and the Sclavonic in the E. Besides these, there are the Finnish family, in the N. of Russia, and, in remote descent from them, the Magyars in Hungary; the Celtic, in Wales, Ireland, and the highlands of Scotland; the Basque, in Spain; the Turks, in Turkey; and the Tartar, or Mongolian race, in the N. and S.E. of Russia.

Language.—The Italian, French, Spanish, and Portuguese, which are partly derived from the Latin; the German, Flemish, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, and English, which, in a greater or lesser degree, proceed from the Teutonic; the Sclavonic, which predominates in the language of Poland, Russia, Bohemia, and a great part of Turkey in Europe; the Celtic, of which there are dialects in Wales, Scotland, Ireland, the N.W. of France, and Lapland; the modern Greek, and some others.

Political Divisions.—Four EMPIRES—Russia, Austria-Hungary, Germany (a confederative empire, including the kingdoms of Prussia, Bavaria, Wurtemburg, and Saxony; the grand duchies of Baden, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Hesse, Oldenburg, Saxe-Weimar, and Mecklenburg-Strelitz; the duchies of Brunswick, Saxe-Meiningen, Anhalt, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and Saxe-Altenburg; the principalities of Waldeck, Lippe, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Reuss-Schleiz, Schaumburg-Lippe, and Reuss-Greiz; the free towns of Hamburg, Lubeck, and Bremen, and the provinces of Alsace-Lorraine); and Turkey, with the tributary principalities of Servia, Montenegro, and Roumania.

Thirteen KINGDOMS—Belgium, Denmark, Great Britain and Ireland, Greece, Holland, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Sweden and Norway (besides the four included in the German empire).

Four REPUBLICS—Andorre, France, San Marino, and Switzerland.

History.—According to the mythology of the poets, Europe received its name from Europa, who was carried there by Jupiter. Bochart derives the name from the Phœnician urappa, which he makes equivalent to the Greek leuko-prosopos, "of a white, or fair, aspect;" and considers it as applying to the continent of Europe, from the fairer visages and complexions of its inhabitants. M. Gebelin, on the other hand, deduces the word from the Phœnician ereb, "west," as indicating the country lying in that direction with reference to Asia. The first inhabitants of Europe came from Asia; and during the period when large and powerful empires flourished in that quarter of the globe, Europe remained, for a length of time, plunged in barbarism. Greece was the first country which emerged from this barbaric state, and she soon attained a very high degree of civilization, spreading, at the same time, her colonies over southern Italy, as well as on the coasts of Gaul and Spain. Rome, founded in the 8th century B.C., now appeared, and, by degrees, conquered the whole of Italy, finally extending her dominion over nearly all Europe, with the exception of its more northern nations. After the fall of the Roman empire, the barbarians, come, for the most part, from Asia, overran Europe, and, for many ages after their advent, there existed on the continent a hideous anarchy. The empire of the Visigoths was formed in Spain, that of the Franks in Gaul, the Lombards in Italy, the Saxons in the north of Germany, the Avari in the south, and, afterwards, the Saxons and Angles, or Anglo-Saxons, in Britain. The Greek empire at Constantinople, the only remnant of the Roman domination, subsisted, nevertheless, in Eastern Europe. About the year 800, a great conqueror and administrator, Charlemagne, moulded, for a time, the heterogeneous mass into one vast empire, embracing the greater part of western Europe. His successors, however, were unable to hold together what the genius of their ancestor had formed; and, from the ruins of his large possessions, arose the separate kingdoms of France, Germany, Italy, Lorraine, Provence, Burgundy, &c. In the 10th century, the great nations of the North came forth from their obscurity, and Russia, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark took rank as European powers, at the same time that the Moors, who had invaded and held the fairest portions of the Spanish peninsula from the 8th century till this period, began to retire before the Christian kings of Leon, Castile, Aragon, and Portugal. At length, in the 15th century, on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, 1453, all the great states of Europe may be considered to have been founded. The United Netherland provinces detached themselves from the Spanish crown in the 16th century; and it was not till the 18th that the Prussian monarchy was formed. The old German empire established in 911 was dissolved in 1804. Poland, formed into a kingdom about 992, was made an integral part of the Russian empire by a ukase issued in 1832, Prussia and Austria having previously appropriated some provinces. The general war, which broke out on the French revolution of 1789, changed, for a time, the aspect of the continent, Napoleon I. being triumphant everywhere. After the fall of his empire, however, the old order of things was in a great measure re-established. Greece separated from the Turkish empire in 1827; the kingdom of the Netherlands was divided in 1831, into the kingdom of Belgium and that of Holland; and the empire of Austria, as a consequence of Napoleon III.'s alliance with Italy, in 1859, relinquished Lombardy to the French emperor, who, in his turn, transferred it to the kingdom of Sardinia. The principality of Roumania was established in 1861. In 1871, the German empire was formed by a confederation of all the German states except Austria. By the treaty of Berlin, in 1878, some of the Turkish provinces were made independent or semi-independent states.

EUROTAS, u-ro'-tas, in Greek legend, a son of Lelex, father to Sparta, who married Lacedæmon. He was son of one of the first kings of Laconia, and gave his name to a river, called, by way of eminence, Basilipotamos, 'the king of rivers.' It was worshipped by the Spartans as a powerful god. Laurels, reeds, myrtles, and olives, grew on its banks in great abundance. It rises in the Morea, and being joined by several other streams, becomes the Basili, and falls into the Gulf of Kolokythi.

EURYALUS, u-ri'-a-lus, the name of several ancient persons, the most remarkable of whom is a Trojan, who came with Æneas into Italy. He rendered himself famous by his immortal friendship with Nisus. (See NISUS.)

EURYBIADES, u-ri-bi'-a-deez, a Spartan commander of the Grecian fleet, at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis, against Xerxes. He was on the point of striking Themistocles, when the latter was advising an attack on the Persian fleet; upon which the Athenian cried,—"Strike, but hear me." (See THEMISTOCLES.)

EURYDICE, u-rid'-i-se. In Greek legend, the wife of the poet Orpheus, who, as she fled before Aristæus, was bit by a serpent in the grass, and died of the wound. Orpheus was so disconsolate, that he ventured to descend into Hades, where, by the melody of his lyre, he obtained from Pluto the restoration of his wife to life, provided he did not look behind him before he came upon earth. He violated the conditions, from his eagerness to see his wife, and Eurydice was taken from him for ever.

EURYNOME, u-rin'-o-me, in Greek mythology, one of the Oceanides, mother of the Graces.

EURYSTHENES, u-ris'-the-nees, a son of Aristodemus, who lived in perpetual dissension with his twin brother Procles, while they both sat on the Spartan throne. It was unknown which of the two was born first; the mother, who wished to see both her sons raised to the throne, refused to declare it, and they were appointed joint kings of Sparta, by order of the oracle of Delphi, 1102 B.C. The descendants of Eurysthenes were called Eurysthenidæ, and those of Procles, Proclidæ. Eurysthenes had a son called Agis, who succeeded him. His descendants were called Agidæ. There sat on the throne of Sparta 31 kings of the family of Eurysthenes, and only 24 of the Proclidæ. The former were the more illustrious.

EURYSTHEUS, u-ris'-the-us, a king of Argos and Mycenæ, whose birth was hastened by Juno two months, that he might come into the world before Hercules, the son of Alcmena, as the younger of the two was doomed, by order of Jupiter, to be subservient to the will of the other. This natural right was cruelly exercised by Eurystheus, who imposed upon Hercules the most dangerous enterprises, well known by the name of the twelve labours of Hercules. (See ALCMENA.)

EURYTANIA, u-ri-ta'-ne-a, a district of Greece, in the province of Ætolia. The capital is KARPENISI. Pop. 22,000.

EUSDEN, LAURENCE, use'-den, an English poet, who in 1718 obtained the laureateship, which made him several enemies, particularly Pope, who placed him in the "Dunciad." He became rector of Coningsby, in Lincolnshire.

Died 1730.

EUSEBIUS, u-se'-be-us, succeeded Marcellus as bishop of Rome, and died the same year. He was strongly opposed to the readmission of lapsed Christians to communion. His opinions on this subject gave great offence at Rome, and the emperor Maxentius banished the pope to Sicily. He was by birth a Greek.

Died 310.

EUSEBIUS, of Cæsarea, an ecclesiastical historian, and one of the most learned of the church fathers, who, in the persecution by Diocletian, assisted the suffering Christians by his exhortations, particularly his friend Pamphilus, whose name, out of veneration, he assumed. He was chosen bishop of Cæsarea about 315, and was at first the friend of Arius, because he considered him as persecuted; but on perceiving the dangerous extent of his opinions, he abandoned him, and assisted at the council of Nice, which he opened with an address: he was also at that of Antioch. The emperor Constantine had a particular esteem for him, and showed him several tokens of favour. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," "The Life of Constantine," a history of the world, and many other works, the principal of which is one entitled, "Evangelical Preparation."

Born in Palestine, 264; died 340.

EUSEBIUS, of Emisa, was a pupil of the preceding. He declined the bishopric of Alexandria, but afterwards accepted that of Emisa. His great learning, especially in mathematical science, caused him to be suspected of magical practices; and Jerome and others accused him of Arianism. Some of his homilies, eloquent productions, are extant.

Died at Antioch, 360.

EUSEBIUS, of Nicomedia, patriarch of Constantinople. He was related to the emperor Julian, and was appointed bishop of Beryta (Beyrout), in Syria, and afterwards of Nicomedia. He placed himself at the head of the Arian party (sometimes mentioned in ecclesiastical history as Eusebians) and became patriarch of Constantinople in 337.

Died 342.

EUSKIRCHEN, oos'-kirk-en, a town of Prussia, 16 miles S.W. of Cologne. It is surrounded by dilapidated walls. Manf. Linen and woollen cloth and potass. Lead, iron, and copper, are worked in the vicinity; and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,200.

EUSTACHIUS, BARTOLOMMEO, u-stai'-she-us, a distinguished Italian anatomist, who settled at Rome, where he held a professorship, and made several discoveries relative to medical science. The most important of these was the passage from the throat to the external ear, since known by the name of the Eustachian tube. He formed some anatomical tables, and was the first to illustrate anatomical writings with engravings; and Boerhaave, in 1707, published his "Opuscula Anatomica."

EUSTATHIUS, u-stā'-the-us, Greek commentator, archbishop of Thessalonica. His learning was extensive, and he is best known by his Commentaries on Homer, Pindar, and Dionysius the geographer.

Died at Thessalonica, 1198.

EUSTATIUS, or EUSTATIA, ST., one of the Dutch islands, in the West Indies, 12 miles N.W. of St. Christopher. It rises out of the ocean, in the form of a huge volcanic pyramidal rock, tapering to its summit, and, in proportion to its size, is one of the finest and best cultivated islands of all the Caribbees. Area, 190 square miles. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 17° 31′ N. Lon. 63° 5′ W.—The chief town, of the same name, is on the south-west side of the island. St. Eustatia became a Dutch island by the right of possession or occupancy. It was first settled about the year 1600; and though taken from them subsequently, it was confirmed to them by the treaty of Breda. In the year 1781 it was taken by the English, but restored at the peace, in 1783. It was again taken by the English in 1801, but was once more restored to its former owners in 1814.

EUTERPE, u-ter'-pe, in mythology, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over music, and was looked upon as the inventress of the flute. She is represented as crowned with flowers, and holding a flute in her hands.

EUTIN, eoo-tin, capital of the principality of Lubeck, in the grand duchy of Oldenburg, Germany. It is pleasantly situated near a lake of the same name, 17 miles N. of Lubeck. There are a large and strong castle, a handsome town church, other good public buildings, and fine gardens. Manf. Stoves, leather, and soap. Several fairs are held annually. Pop. 3,000.

EUTROPIUS, FLAVIUS, u-trō'-pe-us, a Latin historian, secretary to Constantine. He wrote an epitome of the history of Rome, from the age of Romulus to the reign of the emperor Valens, to whom the work was dedicated. Of all his works, the Roman history alone is extant. It is composed with conciseness and precision, but without elegance.

Lived in the 4th century.

EUTYCHES, u'-ti-kees, a monk, who lived near Constantinople, and who is said to have founded the sect called Eutychians, in the East. He was involved in controversies, and pronounced a heretic in consequence of his views as to the union of the divine and human natures in Christ.

Lived in the 5th century.

EUTYCHIUS, u-ti-ki'-us, a physician and divine, who, after practising physic for many years, was ordained, and in 938 became patriarch of Alexandria. He wrote in Arabic, "Annals from the Creation to 900." He also wrote a "History of Sicily," the MS. of which is in the public library at Cambridge.

Born at Cairo, 876; died 950.

EUXINE SEA. (See BLACK SEA.)

EVADNE, e-vad'-ne, in Greek legend, a daughter of Iphis, or Iphicles of Argos, who slighted the addresses of Apollo, and married Capaneus, one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. Her husband was struck with thunder by Jupiter for his blasphemies and impiety, and his ashes separated from those of the rest of the Argives, when she threw herself on his burning pile, and perished in the flames.

EVAGORAS, e-vag'-o-răs, a Greek historian, who wrote a "History of Egypt," the "Life of Timagenes," "De Artificio Thucydides Oratorio," "Lexicon in Thucydidem."

Lived in the 1st century A.D.

EVAGORAS, king of Cyprus, who re-took Salamis, which had been taken from his father by the Persians. He made war against Artaxerxes, the king of Persia, with the assistance of the Egyptians, Arabians, and Tyrians, and obtained some advantages over the fleet of his enemy. The Persians, however, soon repaired their losses, and Evagoras saw himself defeated by sea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be stripped of all his dominions, except the town of Salamis. He was assassinated soon after this fatal change of fortune, by a eunuch.

Died 374 B.C.

EVANDER, e-van'-der, in Greek legend, a heroic adventurer, who went from Arcada to Italy, and drove the aborigines from their ancient possessions, and reigned in that part of the country where Rome was afterwards founded. He gave Æneas assistance against Rutuli, and distinguished himself by his hospitality. It is said that he first brought the Greek alphabet into Italy, and introduced there the worship of the Greek deities. He was honoured as a god after death, and his subjects raised him an altar on Mount Aventine.

EVANGELIST ISLANDS, e-van'-ge-list, a group of four rocky uninhabited islands, off the coast of Patagonia, South America, at the western entrance of the Straits of Magellan. Lat. 52° 24′ S. Lon. 75° 7′ W.

EVANS, DE LACY, Lieutenant-General Sir, G.C.B., ev'-ans, entered the British army in 1807, and, after serving several years in India, returned and fought in the Peninsular campaigns. In 1814 he served in America at the capture of Washington, the attack on Baltimore, and the operations before New Orleans. He also fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, where he had his horse shot under him. In 1830 he was returned to the House of Commons as member for Rye, and, in 1833, as Liberal member for Westminster, which he represented until 1841, when he was defeated, but re-elected in 1846, and retained the seat until 1865. In 1835 he volunteered to command the British Legion in Spain, and for his valour throughout the campaigns in which he served against the Carlists, he was invested with the order of the Bath and the Cross of San Ferdinand and Charles III. of Spain. In 1854 he became commander of the second division of the Army of the East, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of the Alma. At Inkermann he rose from a bed of sickness to join his division; but when he saw the manner in which General Pennefather was fighting his men, he refused to take the command, but left his share of the merit entirely to that officer. He returned to England in 1855, and received the order of the Grand Cross of the Bath, was thanked by the House of Commons, had the degree of D.C.L. conferred upon him by the University of Oxford, and received from the Emperor of the French the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour. He was unquestionably one of the ablest generals in the British army.

Born at Moig, Ireland, 1787; died 1870.

EVANS, MARIAN, English novelist and poetess, better known by the name of George Eliot. She first became known by her translation of Strauss's "Life of Jesus," and Feuerbach's "Essence of Christianity." "Scenes from Clerical Life," appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, and in 1859 she published "Adam Bede," which was immediately recognised as a work of great genius. "The Mill on the Floss," "Romola," "Felix Holt," "Middlemarch," "Daniel Deronda," and other works followed in quick succession, and several volumes of poems have also been published. Acknowledged to stand, by her command of earnestness, pathos and humour, and her power of depicting character, in the very first rank of writers of the nineteenth century. Later in life she married, and was subsequently known as Mrs. Cross, but she did not long survive.

Born 1820; died 1880.

EVANSON, EDWARD, ev'-an'-son, an English divine, successively preferred to the livings of South Mimms, Tewkesbury and Longdon, where his expressed sentiments on the Trinity and his alterations of the Common Prayer gave such offence to the parishioners that a prosecution was instituted against him, which failed, on account of some irregularity in the proceedings. In 1778 he resigned his livings and went to Mitcham, where he undertook the education of some pupils.—He wrote the "Dissonance of the four generally-received Evangelists;" "Letter to Bishop Hurd on the Grand Apostacy;" "Reflections on the State of Religion in Christendom;" and some other works.

Born at Warrington, Lancashire, 1731; died 1805.

EVANSVILLE, ev'-ans'-veel, a city of Indiana, United States, on the right bank of the Ohio, 156 miles S.W. of Indianopolis, at the termination of the Wabash and Erie Canal, by which communication is afforded with the inland lakes and Gulf of Mexico. A very large trade is carried on, and coal and iron ore abound in the vicinity. Pop. 29,280.

EVARISTUS, ST., ev-a-ris'-tus, elected Pope in 100; built many churches, and divided Rome into parishes.

EVAUX, ai'-vo, an old village of France, department Creuse. There are an antique church, and the remains of Roman baths. There are hot springs much frequented. Pop. 2,600.

EVE, eev, "life," the first woman, the original mother of all mankind.

EVELYN, JOHN, ev'-lin, an English author. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford; in 1640 entered as a student of the Middle Temple; in 1642 served in the Royal Army under Prince Rupert, but in the following year retired to the Continent, where he lived eight years. By marriage with the daughter of Sir Richard Browne, he became possessed of Sayes Court, a manor in Kent, where he led a retired life till the Restoration, to which he, in some measure, contributed. At the establishment of the Royal Society, he became one of its first members. In 1662 appeared his "Sculptura; or, the History and Art of Chalcography and Engraving in Copper." This curious and valuable work has been since reprinted. In 1664 came out his "Sylva; or, a Discourse of Forest Trees," which has gone through many editions, and is a great repository of all that was, in the author's time, known of the forest trees of Great Britain. He was appointed a commissioner for the sick and wounded seamen, one of the commissioners for rebuilding St. Paul's, and afterwards had a place at the Board of Trade. In the reign of James II. he was made one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord privy seal, and after the Revolution was appointed treasurer of Greenwich hospital. In 1697 appeared his "Numismata, or Discourse of Medals." Two years later, he succeeded to the family estate at Wotton, Surrey. He was buried there, and Mr. Evelyn has the honour of being one of the first who improved horticulture, and introduced exotics into this country. Of his garden at Sayes Court a curious account may be seen in the "Philosophical Transactions." On his tombstone, he had it recorded, "That all is vanity which is not honest; and that there is no solid wisdom but real piety." He wrote several books besides the above, and of his "Memoirs" Sir Walter Scott says, "We have never seen a mine so rich." These "Memoirs," in the form of a diary, extended over seventy years, but were not published till 1818.

Born at Wotton, 1620; died 1706.

EVELYN, JOHN, son of the above, wrote a Greek poem, prefixed to his father's "Sylva," and translated the work of Renatus on gardens into English, and the "Life of Alexander" from Plutarch. He was also the author of a "History of the Grand Vizer," a few poems in Dryden's collection.

Born 1654; died 1698.

EVENUS, e-ve'-nus, a river of Ætolia, flowing into the Ionian Sea. It received its name from Evenus, who, being unable to overcome Idas, who had promised him his daughter Marpessa in marriage, if he surpassed him in running, grew so desperate that he threw himself into the river, which afterwards bore his name.

EVEREST, ev'-er-est', the loftiest mountain in the world. (See HIMALAYAS and NEPAUL.)

EVERETT, ALEXANDER HILL, ev'-e-ret, American author and diplomatist, who graduated with the highest honours at Harvard College when only fourteen years of age, but afterwards entered into the office of John Quincy Adams, as a student of the law. In 1809 he went to Russia as an attaché of the mission of Mr. Adams, and spent two years in St. Petersburg, studying political economy, and making himself acquainted with the modern languages. On returning to America, he connected himself, in Boston, with both law and literature. From 1818 to 1824 he served as chargé d'affaires in the Netherlands, where he pursued his literary studies, and, in 1821, published a work entitled "Europe; or, a General Survey of the Principal Powers, &c.," which was highly spoken of. In the following year he issued another, which entered into a consideration of the Godwin and Malthusian theories of population. In 1825 he became American minister at the court of Spain, which he held for nearly five years, during which he continued to devote himself to his studies, and produced a political work on America, whilst, at the same time, contributing to the "North American Review," then under the editorship of his brother, and of which he afterwards became proprietor and editor. In 1841 he was chosen president of Jefferson College, Louisiana, and, in 1846, minister plenipotentiary to China, where he died. He was the author of several able works on politics and political economy, and published also a small volume of poems.

Born at Boston, 1792; died at Canton, 1847.

EVERETT, EDWARD, D.C.L., brother of the above, studied divinity at Harvard with a view to the office of pastor, and became, before he was twenty, minister of a large Unitarian congregation at Boston. In 1815 he relinquished the pulpit for the professorial chair of the Greek Language and Literature in Harvard College. Previous to his entering upon his duties, he visited Europe, and for two years settled at Gottingen, studying German, and making himself acquainted with the best modes of instruction adopted in the German universities. After a sojourn of five years, during which he visited various European countries, he returned to America, and entered upon his university duties with large stores of accumulated learning and knowledge. In 1820 he added to the duties of his chair those of editor to the "North American Review," which he continued to perform for four years. In 1824 he was elected to the House of Representatives, and, in 1835, became governor of Massachusetts. In 1841 he was appointed minister to the English court, which post he held for about five years, and while in this country received the doctrinal degree from the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. On his return he was elected president of Harvard University, and in 1852, Secretary of State. In 1853 he was elected a member of the Senate for Massachusetts. Throughout his career Mr. Everett evinced an ardent attachment to literary pursuits, and published two volumes of orations, delivered on various occasions. He also appended to the works of Daniel Webster, a life of that statesman.

Born at Dorchester, near Boston, 1794; died 1865.

EVERGHEM, ev'-er-gaim, a town of Belgium, East Flanders, 3 miles from Ghent. Pop. 8,000, engaged in shipbuilding and other trades.

EVERTON, ev'-er-ton, a suburb of Liverpool. (See LIVERPOOL.) Pop. 109,788.

EVESHAM, eev'-sham, a municipal and parliamentary borough and market-town of Worcestershire, beautifully situated in a fertile valley on the right bank of the Avon, 15 miles S.E. of Worcester. This town is of great antiquity, and has three parish churches, a corn-exchange erected in 1868, a free grammar-school, a charity-school, and an almshouse. A bell-tower, 110 feet high, was erected by Bishop Lichfield, in the 16th century. It formed part of a magnificent abbey, of which very little else now remains. It is a well-built town, and there is a convenient harbour on the Avon for barges. Manf. Agricultural implements. Pop. 5,112.—A station on the Great Western and Midland Railways.

EVIAN, ai'-ve-ahn, a town of France, department Haute-Savoie, on the shore of the Lake of Geneva. There are a Gothic parish church and two convents. Three annual fairs are held. The chalybeate springs of Amphion are in the vicinity. Pop. 2,200.

EVIL-MERODACH, é-vil-mer'-o-dak, son of Nebuchadnezzar, and father of Belshazzar. He reigned from 561 B.C. to 559 B.C., when he was murdered. He is recorded to have released Jehoiachin, king of Judah, after a captivity of thirty-seven years, and to have treated him with kindness.

EVORA, ai-vor'-a, a town of Portugal, capital of the province of Alemtejo, beautifully situated to the south of the Tagus, and about 80 miles E. of Lisbon. It was once strongly fortified, but the walls are now in a ruinous condition. The Gothic cathedral was founded in 1186, and the choir was rebuilt in the Italian style in 1721. The town is the see of an archbishop, and there is an extensive library. The town was the Roman capital of Lusitania, and there are the remains of a temple of Diana, aqueduct, and a brick tower covered with cement, almost in perfect condition, although nearly 2,000 years old. Manf. Ironware and leather. A fair is held annually. Pop. 12,000.

EVREMOND, ST., aivr'-mont, CHARLES MARGOTELLE DE ST. DENIS, Seigneur de, a French writer, who relinquished the law for the military profession. He served under Condé, as lieutenant of the Guards, and in the civil wars of France, fought at the battles of Rocroi and Nordlingen. He attended Mazarin in the negotiation with Spain; but having betrayed some confidential secrets, in a correspondence with the marquis de Crequi, was obliged to quit France in 1661. Accordingly, he found a refuge in England, where he was in great esteem with Charles II. In 1689 permission was granted to him to return to his country; but he preferred ending his days in the land of his adoption. He was remarkable for wit and for attractiveness of manner. He died at the age of 90, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Normandy, 1613; died 1703.

EVREUX, ev'-re(r), a city of France, and the capital of the department of Eure, on the Iton, 60 miles N.W. of Paris. There are a cruciform cathedral, built in the 11th century, the abbey church of St. Thaurin, who was the first bishop of Evreux, with a shrine executed in the 13th century; a bishop's palace, built in 1484, and a clock-tower erected about the same time. The environs are very attractive. Manf. Woollens, bed-ticking, leather, and vinegar. Pop. 8,600. The town is memorable for the number of sieges it has sustained. It was sacked by Rollo the Norman in 892, and from the 12th to the 14th century was frequently taken and retaken in the wars between the French and English.

EVRON, aiv'-rohn, a town of France, department Mayenne, in a swampy situation, 17 miles N.E. of Laval. There are a very interesting church and chapel, and the buildings of a Benedictine abbey, founded in the 7th century. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics. Pop. 5,000.

EWALD, GEORG HEINRICH AUGUST VON, ai'-vahld, German Orientalist. He was educated at the university of Göttingen, very early devoted himself to those studies with which his name is associated, and when only 20 years of age was a professor at the college of Wolfenbüttel. He afterwards filled the chair of philosophy at Göttingen and then simultaneously that of oriental languages and theology. Suspended from his functions in 1837 for political reasons, he came to England, but in the following year went to Tübingen as professor of theology. In 1841 he was raised to the rank of noble by the king of Wurtemberg, and in 1848 returned to Göttingen. Upon the annexation by Prussia of the kingdom of Hanover, Professor Ewald became a member of the German parliament, and distinguished himself by his devotion to the deposed dynasty and his opposition to Prussian policy. He was the author of a large number of critical works, the Hebrew language and Biblical history having especially engaged his attention, and he wrote on Arabic, Persian, Aramaic, and Sanskrit literature. He possessed remarkable mental energy, and maintained a marked individuality as theologian and critic, refusing to be identified with any particular school of theology, each of which he occasionally denounced with great eloquence.

Born at Göttingen, 1803; died 1875.

EWALD, JOHANN, Danish poet, who, when young, entered the military service of Frederick the Great, but soon deserted to the Austrians, and distinguished himself by his courage, but refused promotion because he would not become a Catholic. He returned to his native city, Copenhagen, and at first studied theology, but soon gave all his attention to poetry. An ode on the death of Frederick V. of Denmark, in 1767, attracted attention, and was quickly followed by poems, songs, tragedies, and operas, which established his reputation; but his irregular conduct and unhappy temper estranged his friends, and his life was passed in poverty. Some of his national poems and songs rank among the treasures of Danish literature.

Born at Copenhagen, 1743; died 1781.

EXCIDEUIL, egs-se-duh'-y(uh), an old town of France, department of Dordogne, on the Loue, 20 miles N.E. of Périgueux. There are the remains of fortifications and a monastery. Manf. Leather, pottery, and iron. Pop. 2,200.

EXE, ex, a river of England, rising in Exmoor, Somersetshire, and, after a course of about 50 miles, partly through Devonshire, receiving several smaller streams, falling into the sea at Exmouth.

EXELMANS, REMY JOSEPH ISIDORE, Compte, ecks-el-ma(h)n, French general, who entered the army in 1791, and rose to be aide-de-camp to Murat. While serving in Spain, he was taken prisoner and sent to England, where he remained three years. He was with Napoleon in the Russian campaign, and was made a general of division. On the fall of the emperor he was banished, but permitted to return to France in 1819, and in 1831 King Louis Philippe restored him to his titles and rank. Louis Napoleon made him grand chancellor of the legion of honour and marshal of France. He was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse.

Born at Bar-le-Duc, 1775; died 1852.

EXETER, ex'-e-ter, a city, episcopal see, municipal and parliamentary borough, river port, and county in itself, the capital of Devonshire, pleasantly situate on the left bank of the river Exe, 10 miles from its mouth. The ground which it occupies is in the form of a parallelogram, and was formerly surrounded with walls, which have now mostly disappeared. The cathedral, which was erected between 1112 and 1478, is a large and magnificent edifice. It consists of a nave with two aisles, a choir with aisles, a N. and S. transept, surmounted by handsome Anglo-Norman towers. To the E. of the cathedral is the bishop's palace, which, with its gardens, is inclosed by a lofty wall. There are 28 churches and episcopal chapels, several chapels, an ancient guildhall, with a remarkable portico, a grammar-school, and many good public buildings, and the Albert memorial museum, completed in 1868. In the N.W. corner of the city stood the castle, Rougemont, of which but the outer walls now remain. Across the Exe is a stone bridge. An arm of the sea formerly flowed near the walls, but its navigation was ruined by one of the earls of Devon, who constructed weirs and dams in it. It has been restored by a canal 5 miles long, terminating near the head of the estuary of the Exe, by means of which vessels of 400 tons can reach a ship-basin adjoining the town, 917 feet long, and about 100 feet broad. There are fine orchards and nurseries in the vicinity. The city was at one time surrounded with walls and strongly fortified. The bishopric was established in 1050 by Edward the Confessor. Two members are returned to parliament. Manf. Woollens, paper; and there are several breweries and iron-foundries. Pop. 37,608.—A station on the Great Western and London and South-Western railways.

EXETER, the chief town of Rockingham county, New Hampshire, United States, 50 miles N. of Boston. It is pleasantly situated on a river of the same name, the falls of which give good water power. Manf. Cotton goods, morocco, leather, and paper. Pop. 4,000.

EXIN, or KEYNIA, ax-in, a town of Prussia, in the province of Posen. There are two churches and a Carmelite monastery. Four annual fairs are held, and a trade in horses and cattle carried on. Pop. 2,500.

EXMOOR, ex'-moor, an extensive waste in the north-east of Devonshire and south-east of Somersetshire, consisting of ranges of hills, rising in some parts to a considerable elevation. The highest point, Dunkerry Beacon, is 1,668 feet above the sea level. There is a famous native breed of small hardy ponies. Of late years iron-mining has been carried on. Area, 30 square miles. The Exe has its source in it.

EXMOUTH, ex'-mouth, a town and watering-place of Devonshire, on the left side of the mouth of the Exe, 10 miles S.E. of Exeter. There are a fine promenade on the sea wall, baths, libraries, and a ball-room. Pop. 6,245.

EXMOUTH, EDWARD PELLEW, Viscount, a distinguished British naval commander. He entered the navy at the age of 13, and first brought himself prominently into notice in 1776, at the battle of Lake Champlain, N. America. Having risen successively through the ranks of lieutenant and post-captain, in 1793 he was appointed to the command of the Nymphe frigate, of 36 guns, and falling in with the Cleopatre, French frigate, he captured her, after a desperate fight, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. Continuing in active service, in 1799 he was appointed to the command of the Impetuous, of 78 guns, and was engaged in various services on the French coast. In 1802 he was named colonel of the marines; and, in the same year, was chosen member of parliament for Barnstaple, in Devonshire. In 1804 he commanded the Tonnant, of 84 guns, and received the rank of rear-admiral of the red. He was also made commander of the East Indies, on which he resigned his parliamentary seat. In 1808 he was raised to the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. In 1810 he blockaded Flushing, and, shortly afterwards, was appointed to the commander-in-chiefship in the Mediterranean. Here he co-operated with the British forces on the eastern part of the coast of Spain with great skill. The value of his services was recognised in 1814, when he was raised to the peerage as Baron Exmouth, of Canonteign, Devonshire, and received a pension of £2,000 a year. In the same year he was promoted to the rank of full admiral, and, subsequently, made a K.C.B. and G.C.B. In 1816 he proceeded to Algiers, to chastise the Dey for having violated a treaty concluded for the abolition of Christian slavery. His plan of attack is considered to be one of the boldest ever adopted by a naval commander. He entered the harbour with his ship, the Queen Charlotte, and being admirably supported by the other ships of his fleet, set fire to the war ships of the Algerines, bombarded the city, and forced the Dey to yield to all his demands. On this occasion the admiral was wounded. For this service he was thanked by both houses of parliament, and raised to the rank of viscount. On the death of Admiral Duckworth, in 1817, he was appointed to the chief command at Plymouth; but, after 1821, retired from public service.

Born at Dover, 1757; died 1833.

EXPILLY, LOUIS ALEXANDRA, eqs'-pel-ye, French bishop of Finisterre, became a member of the National Assembly in 1791, and was executed, with 25 of his colleagues, for having appealed to the department which he represented against the Convention.

Born 1742; died 1794.

EXUMAS, ex'-u-mas, islands of the Bahama group, comprising Great Exuma, Little Exuma, and a chain of islands called the Exuma Keys, which reach along one edge of the Great Bahama bank. Little Exuma is a port of entry, and salt-making is a prominent industry in both islands. Pop. 2,000. Lat. of the principal island, between 23° 21′ and 22° 31′ N. Lon. between 74° 28′ and 74° 48′ W.

EXUPERIUS, ex-u-peer'-e-us, bishop of Toulouse, and a saint of the Roman calendar. He expended all his own wealth and sold the sacred vessels to maintain the poor in the time of famine.

Died about 417.

EYCK, HUBERT VAN, ike, an eminent artist, and founder of the Flemish school of painting. One of his finest works, in which he was assisted by his brother, is the "Adoration of the Lamb," in the church of St. Bavon, Ghent. He painted in distemper and in oil.

Born at Maaseyck, 1366; died 1426.

EYCK, JOHN VAN, brother of the above, painted history, portraits, and landscapes; but is chiefly known as the inventor of a method of mixing oils for painting. He is sometimes called John of Bruges, from the city where he first flourished.

Born 1390; died 1441.

EYE, i, a municipal and parliamentary borough of Suffolk, 20 miles N. of Ipswich (the latter including 11 parishes). It is an ancient borough, and has a Gothic church, a grammar-school, a gaol, guildhall, and house of industry. Manf. Iron and flax. Pop. 2,396.—A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

EYGUIERES, i'-gwe-aire, a town of France, department Bouches-du-Rhone, 20 miles E. of Tanacon. Manf. Coarse woollens. There are stone and lime quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,600.

EYLAU, i'-lou, a town of Prussia, on the Pasmer, 22 miles S. of Konigsberg Manf. Woollens and linen, hats and leather. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,000.—Here the Prussians and Russians were defeated by the French, on the 7th and 8th of February, 1807.

EYRE, EDWARD JOHN, air, Australian explorer and colonial governor, settled as a sheep-farmer in Australia, at a very early age, and having made some preliminary explorations, performed in 1840 a memorable journey overland from Adelaide to West Australia, around the head of the Great Bight, suffering terribly from the want of provisions and water. In 1846 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of New Zealand, held similar appointments in St. Vincent and Antigua between 1853 and 1860, and in 1864 was appointed governor-in-chief of Jamaica, from which he was removed in 1865 in consequence of the course he pursued in suppressing the outbreak in that year.

Born 1817.

EYTUH, or ETA, e-ta' a town of British India, in Mynpoorie, in the North-West Provinces. It is the principal place of a district of the same name, and is encompassed by mud walls.

EZCARAY, az-ka-ray', a town of Spain, on the left bank of the Oja, in the province of Logrono. Manf. Woollens, pottery, soap, tiles, and bricks. Pop. 3,000.

EZEKIEL, e-ze'-ke-el, ("strength of God"), the third of the greater prophets. He was the son of Buzi, and a descendant of Aaron. In 597 B.C. he was carried captive to Babylon, where he wrote his prophecies, the style of which is bold, vehement, and tragical.

Lived in the 7th and 6th centuries, B.C.

EZRA, ez'-ra, ("help"), son of Seraiah, a priest of the Jews, and a descendant of Aaron. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar. Artaxerxes Longimanus, however, sent him to his own country with a colony of the Jews, and all the sacred vessels and ornaments of the temple, which he had in charge to rebuild. On his arrival at Jerusalem, 478 B.C., he set about the reformation of abuses, particularly one of strange marriages. He restored the whole canon of the Old Testament. There is in the Bible a book under his name, and in the Apocrypha two others. Josephus says that he died at Jerusalem; but others assert that he returned and ended his days in Persia.

FAABORG, fol'-borg, a town of Denmark, in the island of Funen, 22 miles S.W. of Odensee. There is a large export trade in grain. Pop. 3,200.

FABBRONI, GIOVANNI, fab-bro'-ne, Italian writer on chemistry, physiology, agriculture, economical and historical subjects.

Born at Florence, 1752; died 1822.

FABER, JOHN, fa'-ber, a German divine, who was created doctor at Cologne, and in 1526 was appointed confessor to Ferdinand, king of the Romans. He, subsequently, was presented to the see of Vienna, and was called the mallet of heretics, owing to the zeal which he showed against Luther. —His works were printed at Cologne, in 3 vols. folio.

Born at Habbron, 1500; died 1542.

FABER, JOHN, engraver, son of a Dutch engraver, of the same name, who had settled in England. His mezzotinto engravings from the portraits of the Kit-Cat club, and the "beauties" of Hampton Court are much esteemed by connoisseurs.

Died 1756.

FABER, GEORGE STANLEY, Rev., English divine, who studied at University College, Oxford, and so highly distinguished himself that before he was 21 he was elected fellow of Lincoln College. He was the Bampton lecturer for 1801, and in 1805 was appointed vicar of Stockton-on-Tees, Durham. In 1832 he obtained the mastership of Sherborn Hospital, near Durham. His writings, displaying great erudition and vigour of style, are highly valued. Among them are "Horæ Mosaicæ," "The Difficulties of Infidelity," "The Primitive Doctrine of Election," and "The Genius and Object of the Patriarchal, the Levitical, and the Christian Dispensations."

Born 1773; died 1854.

FABIAN, ST., fa'-be-an, ascended the papal chair in 236, and erected churches, and sent bishops into Gaul to propagate Christianity. He suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Decius.

Died 250.

FABIAN, ROBERT, an English chronicler, who was a tradesman in London, and served the offices of alderman and sheriff. He was buried in the church of St. Michael, Cornhill. His "Chronicles of England and France" was first printed in London in 1516.

Born 1450; died 1512.

FABII, fa'-be-i, a noble and powerful family at Rome, who, it is affirmed, derived their name from faba, "a bean," because some of their ancestors cultivated that pulse. Historians say that all the males of the family, amounting to 306, were slain, save one, in a general engagement near the Cremera, against the Veientes, 477 B.C. From this one, whose tender age had detained him at Rome, arose the noble Fabii. The family was divided into different branches,—the Ambusti, the Maximi, the Vibulani, the Buteones, the Dorsones, and the Pictores, Labeones, Girgites; the three first of which are frequently mentioned in the Roman history, but the others, seldom.

FABIUS, fa'-be-us, an illustrious Roman, who was master of the horse in the war against the Samnites, and charged the enemy, and obtained a victory. Having done this in the absence of the dictator, and contrary to his orders, he was condemned to death, but was rescued by the people. In 303 B.C. he served the office of censor, and obtained the name of Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace in elections. He was six times consul.

Died 292 B.C.

FABIUS MAXIMUS, QUINTUS, surnamed Cunctator, a Roman distinguished for his prudence, valour, and generosity. He was consul the first time 233 B.C., when he gained a great victory over the Ligurians. When Hannibal, the Carthaginian, defeated the Romans at the battle of Thrasymene, he was nominated pro-dictator to oppose that general. He succeeded in surrounding Hannibal, whom he harassed and finally wore out by marches and counter-marches without coming to a direct engagement. For this "Fabian policy" he was recalled by the senate, who refused to confirm an agreement which he had made for the ransom of prisoners. On this, Fabius sold his estates to raise the money. When the time of his dictatorship expired, he advised his successor, Paulus Æmilius, not to hazard an engagement, which, however, was neglected, and thus was lost the famous battle of Cannæ. Fabius was now looked upon as the only refuge of the Romans, and he quickly recovered Tarentum, which had been betrayed to Hannibal. He was five times consul. In his advanced years, he was superseded by Scipio. He lived to be nearly 100 years old, and his death was lamented by the people as a common loss.

Died 203 B.C.

FABRE, JEAN CLAUDE, fabr, a French priest of the Oratory at Paris, who compiled two dictionaries, translated Virgil into French, and continued Fleury's "Ecclesiastical History."

Born 1668; died 1753.

FABRETTI, RAFFAELLE, fa-brat'-te, Italian antiquary, papal treasurer, and for 13 years attached to the embassy in Spain, of which he explored the antiquities. He was afterwards keeper of the archives in the Castle of St. Angelo at Rome. He wrote extensively on archæological subjects, and made a valuable collection of inscriptions.

Born at Urbino, 1618; died 1700.

FABRI, HONORÉ, fa'-bre, a learned French Jesuit, who wrote "Physics seu Rerum Corporearum Scientia," 6 vols. 4to; "Synopsis Optica," 4to; "De Plantis, de Generatione Animalium, et de Homine," 4to, &c. He is said by some to have discovered the circulation of the blood before Harvey.

Born at Bellay, 1607: died at Rome, 1688.

FABRIANO, fa'-bre-a'-no, a city of Italy, province of Macerata, 33 miles S.W. of Ancona. It has a Gothic cathedral. Manf. Paper and parchment. Pop. 7,500.

FABRIANO, GENTILE DA, Italian painter, who studied at Florence, and afterwards went to Venice, where he painted a picture of the defeat of Barbarossa, by the fleet of the republic, which so pleased the senate that the painter was raised to the patrician rank, and received a pension. On the invitation of Pope Martin V. he went to Rome, and assisted in the decoration of the church of San Giovanni Laterano.

Born 1370; died at Rome, 1450.

FABRICIUS, CAIUS, fa-brish'-e-us, a celebrated Roman, who, in his first consulship, obtained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honoured with a triumph. Two years after, he went as ambassador to Pyrrhus, and refused, with contempt, the presents offered him. Pyrrhus admired the magnanimity of Fabricius, but his admiration was increased when he made a discovery of the perfidious offers of his physician, who had pledged himself to the Roman general for a sum of money to poison his master. To this greatness of soul was added the most consummate knowledge of military affairs, and the most perfect simplicity of manners. Fabricius wished to inspire a contempt for luxury among the people. He lived and died in the greatest poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters, when they had arrived at years of maturity.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

FABRICIUS, or FABRIZIO, GIROLAMO, an Italian physician and anatomist, usually called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth. He professed anatomy with extraordinary reputation at Padua, attracting a large number of students, among them the celebrated Englishman, Harvey. The Venetian senate created him a knight of the order of St. Mark, and gave him an annual stipend of a thousand crowns. He retired from practice with an ample fortune.

Born 1537; died 1619.

Born at Leipsic, 1668; died at Hamburg, 1736.

FABRICIUS, JOHAN CHRISTIAN, Danish entomologist, who studied at Copenhagen, Edinburgh, Leyden, and, under Linnæus, at Upsala. In 1775 he was appointed professor of natural history at Kiel, and afterwards professor of rural and political economy. Besides works of great value on his special subject of study, he wrote political and economical treatises.

Born at Tondern, 1745; died at Kiel, 1807.

FABRIZIA, fa-brit'-ze-a, a town of Italy, near the eastern slope of the Apennines, 16 miles S.E. of Monteleone. Pop. 5,000.

FABRONI, ANGELO, fa-bro'-ne, a learned Italian, who was educated first at Faenza, and afterwards at Rome, where he obtained a canonry. He was afterwards appointed prior of the Church of St. Lorenzo at Florence, where he remained till called to be curator of the university of Pisa. He is generally known by his biographies of Italian literati of the 17th and 18th centuries, of which work he published 18 volumes, and left another ready for the press. Besides this, he wrote separate biographies of Cosmo, Lorenzo, Leo, and other eminent persons of the house of Medici, with many panegyrics on learned men. He also conducted the "Giornale di Litterati," and published some religious pieces.

Born at Marádi, 1732; died at Pisa, 1803.

FACCIOLATI, JACOPO, fac-che-o-la'-te, Italian philologist and critic, professor of theology and philosophy at Padua, who assisted greatly by his lexicons and editions of philological works, and the elegance of his own Latin style, in reviving the study of ancient literature.

Born near Padua, 1682; died 1769.

FADD, fad, a small town of Hungary, on the Danube, 2 miles from Tolna. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic Church. Pop. 4,000.

FADLALLAH, or CHODSA RASCHID ADDIN FADLALLAH, fad-lal-la, a Persian historian. He was vizier to the sultan Cazan, who reigned at Taurus, and at whose command he compiled a history of the Moguls, which he finished in 1294. He added a supplement to this work by the order of Cazan's successor. The first part was translated into French by La Croix.

Lived in the 13th century.

FAEMUND, fa'-mund, a lake in the province of Aggerhaus, Norway, near the Swedish frontier. It is 42 miles long, but not more than 3 in average breadth.

FAENZA, fa-aint'-za, a town of Italy, 20 miles S.W. of Ravenna. It was known anciently by the name of Falentia, and became noted in modern times for its pottery-ware, especially the famous "majolica," or "faience," the manufacture of which has now greatly declined in importance. It has a citadel, several churches with fine paintings, and a cathedral, which stands in a large square, and has, near it, a beautiful fountain. Manf. Earthenware, paper, silk twist, and linen. Pop. 35,703.

FAGEL, GASPAR, fa'-gel, Dutch statesman, who, in 1672, after the murder of Jan de Witt, was appointed to the office of grand pensionary. He was a steadfast adherent of Prince William of Orange, and an opponent of the designs of France.

Born at the Hague, 1629; died 1688.

FAGIUS, PAUL, fa'-je-us, a German Protestant divine, whose real name was Buchlein. For some time he exercised the office of a schoolmaster, but afterwards entered into orders. In 1541 the plague broke out at Isna, where he resided at the time, and remained in the place, comforting and administering to the sick. In 1543 he and Bucer went to England, where Archbishop Cranmer employed them in a new translation of the Scriptures. In Mary's reign his body was taken up and burnt. He wrote several books on the Hebrew language, and the Targums.

Born at Heidelberg, 1504; died at Cambridge, 1550.

FAGNANO, fan-ya'-no, a village of Italy, on the right bank of the Olona, 20 miles N.W. of Milan. There are a castle and a handsome modern church with a fine tower. Manf. Silk. Pop. 3,500.—Here, in 1799, a battle was fought between the Austrians and the French.

FAGON, GUY CRESCENT, fa'-gawng, physician to Louis XIV., who defended the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and collected numerous plants to enrich the royal gardens, of which he was superintendent.

Born at Paris, 1632; died 1718.

FAHLCRANZ, KARL JOHANN, fahl'-krantz, Swedish landscape painter, famous for his delineation of northern scenery.

Born at Sprengel, 1774; died 1861.

FAHLIYAN, fah-le-yan', a town of Persia, in the province of Fartestan, formerly of greater importance than at present. A canal, 14 miles long, supplies the town with water.

FAHLUN, or FALUN, fa'-loon, a town of Sweden, capital of a district or laan of the same name, on both sides of the stream which unites the lakes Varp and Rum, 130 miles N.W. of Stockholm. The town is celebrated for its copper-mines. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, ribbons, tobacco, and spirits. Pop. 5,200.

FAHRENHEIT, GABRIEL DANIEL, fa'-ren-hite, and experimental philosopher, who improved the thermometer, by making use of mercury instead of spirits of wine, and formed a new scale for the instrument, grounded on accurate experiments. The English have generally adopted his scale, but the French prefer Réaumur's. In 1724 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Dantzig, 1686; died 1740.

FAI-FO, fi-fo, a seaport in the empire of Anam, near the mouth of a river in the China Sea, and 15 miles S. of Turon. It has a Buddhist temple. A trade in sugar and cinnamon is carried on. Pop. 15,000.

FAILSWORTH, fails'-werth, a town of Lancashire, 5 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cotton-spinning. Pop. 7,907.

FAIRBAIRN, SIR WILLIAM, fair'-bairn, machinist and civil engineer, who, having worked as a journeyman for several years, set up a business for himself at Manchester in 1817. He was among the first, if not the first, to construct sea-going vessels of iron. He was also continually engaged in experimenting on the qualities of iron, and did much to advance mechanical knowledge in the department of engineering. He assisted materially in designing and constructing the famous tubular bridge across the Menai Straits. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, member of various foreign societies, LL.D. of Edinburgh, president of the British Association in 1861, a chevalier of the French legion of honour, and was created a baronet in 1869. He wrote many treatises on engineering subjects.

Born at Kelso, 1789; died 1874.

FAIRFAX, fair'-fax, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 468 square miles. Pop. 16,025. The capital is Fairfax Court House.

FAIRFAX, EDWARD, an English poet, who translated Tasso's poem of "Godfrey of Bouillon" into English verse, and wrote a curious book, entitled "Demonology," in which he avows his belief in witchcraft. He passed his life in the enjoyment of competence, near Knaresborough, Yorkshire.

Died about 1632.

FAIRFAX, THOMAS, Lord, general of the parliamentary army in the civil war, was the eldest son of Ferdinand, Lord Fairfax. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and began his military career under Lord Vere, in Holland. When hostilities commenced between the king and parliament, he took a decided part in favour of the latter, being, like his father, a zealous Presbyterian. He had a principal command in the northern counties of England, where he and his father were defeated in several engagements; but afterwards Sir Thomas had better fortune, and distinguished himself so greatly at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, that he was appointed general of the army, in the place of the earl of Essex, and Cromwell became his lieutenant-general. In 1645 he defeated the king's forces at Naseby, after which he marched into the west, where he took Bath, Bristol, and other important places. In 1647 he was made constable of the Tower, and the following year succeeded to the title, by the death of his father. He then proceeded into the eastern counties, and took Colchester, after a brave resistance by Sir George Lisle and Sir Charles Lucas, whom his lordship, after the surrender, caused to be shot. On his return to London, he was named one of the king's judges, but refused to act, though he took no steps to prevent the death of the king, and, at the time of execution, was kept in prayer by Major Harrison. In 1650 he resigned his commission, and lived in retirement till the Restoration, when he made his peace with Charles II., upon whom he waited at the Hague. He wrote an account of his public life, and some minor works in prose and poetry.

Born at Denton, Yorkshire, 1611; died at Bilburgh, near York, 1671.

FAIRFIELD, fair'-feeld, a county of Connecticut, United States. Area, 630 square miles. Pop. 112,042. The chief towns are Fairfield and Danbury.

FALAISE, fa-lais', a town of France, in the department Calvados, on the Auté, an affluent of the Dive, 22 miles S.E. of Caen. The castle, which stands on a precipitous cliff (whence the name, falaise), is in ruins, with the exception of a tower. There are three suburbs, one, Guilray, of considerable size. Manf. Lace, hosiery, and cotton yarn. A large cattle and horse fair is held yearly. Pop. 7,600.—In the castle here, William the Conqueror was born in 1024.

FALCES, fal'-sais, a town of Spain, province of Navarre, 25 miles S.W. of Pampeluna. An ancient castle is on a hill above the town. Manf. Oil. There is a trade in grain, flax, hemp, cattle and fruit. Pop. 4,500.

FALCONBERG, MARY, Countess of, fal'-kon-berg, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and wife of Thomas, Viscount Falconberg. She was a woman of considerable talents, a member of the Church of England, and contributed to the restoration of Charles II. (See CROMWELL.)
Died 1712.

FALCONE, ANCILLO, fal-co'-nai, Italian painter, famous for battle pieces. At the time of Masaniello's outbreak at Naples, he and his students formed a secret band for the purpose of attacking the Spaniards. When the insurrection was suppressed he fled to France, but afterwards returned to Naples. His pictures, nearly all representing warlike scenes, are greatly valued.
Born at Naples, 1600; died 1663.

FALCONER, HUGH, fal'-ko-ner, botanist and palæontologist, who took the degree of M.D. at Edinburgh in 1829. He entered the service of the East India Company, and distinguished himself by his scientific researches, and by introducing tea cultivation into Bengal. Between 1843 and 1848, he was employed in the British Museum. He again visited the East.
Born at Forres, 1808; died in London, 1865.

FALCONER, WILLIAM, a Scotch poet, who was born of humble parents, and bred to the sea. In 1751 he published a poem on "The Death of the Prince of Wales;" but his reputation rests on "The Shipwreck," a poem in three cantos, which is highly descriptive and pathetic. It was suggested by a shipwreck, suffered by himself, in a voyage from Alexandria to Venice, when only he and two others of the crew were saved. Falconer also wrote "An Ode to the Duke of York," which obtained him the post of purser to the Royal George. He likewise compiled a useful work, entitled "The Marine Dictionary," and published a poem against Wilkes and Churchill, under the title of "The Demagogue." In 1769 he sailed from England, in the Aurora, for the East Indies; but, after her departure from the Cape of Good Hope, the ship was never heard of.
Born at Edinburgh, 1732.

FALCONIA, PROBA, fal'-ko-ne-a, a Latin poetess, who composed a cento from Virgil, containing the sacred history from the creation, and the history of Christ in verse.
Lived in the 4th century.

FALKIRK, fal'-kirk, a Parliamentary burgh of Stirlingshire, Scotland, near the great canal between the rivers Forth and Clyde, 24 miles from Edinburgh. It has a spacious church, rebuilt in 1810, but containing some old monuments, and several other places of worship, a large exchange, county buildings, post-office, and prison. There is an equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington in the principal street. No manufactures of importance are carried on; but there is a good weekly market, and it has a considerable trade in corn, cotton, leather, and other commodities. Three fairs, the greatest in Scotland, are held, under the name of the Trysts of Falkirk. These fairs are exclusively for cattle, sheep, and horses. Pop. 25,143.—Here Wallace was defeated in a battle by Edward I.; and here, also, the royal army was defeated by the adherents of the house of Stuart, in 1746.—A station on the North British and Caledonian Railway.

FALKLAND, falk'-land, a royal burgh of Fifeshire, Scotland, 22 miles N. of Edinburgh. Pop. 1,283, many employed as linen-weavers.—A palace was erected here; and James V. died in it in the year 1542. It is now mostly in a ruinous state.

FALKLAND ISLES, a group of islands in the South Atlantic Ocean. They are about 200 in number, but the two largest, East and West Falkland, comprise about half the entire area. The next most important are Great Swan, Keppel, Pebble, Eagle, and Jasa. The islands afford good pasturage, and about 10,000 sheep are bred. Area, 6,500 square miles. Pop. 900. Lat. between 51° and 52° 30′ S. Lon. between 57° 40′ and 61° 20′ W.—These islands were discovered by Davis in 1592, and came into the possession of the British in 1771. Since that time, however, their possession has been disputed; but since 1833 they have held uninterrupted possession of them.

FALKLAND, HENRY CARY, Viscount, was lord-deputy for Ireland, from 1622 to 1629. His administration, however, was by no means popular. —He wrote "A History of that most unfortunate Prince, Edward II."

Died 1633.

FALKLAND, LUCIUS CARY, Viscount, was the eldest son of the preceding, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Cambridge. He married a lady of small fortune, which greatly displeased his father, when he retired to a country house, and devoted himself to the study of Greek. In 1639 he took part in the expedition against the Scots, and in the following year he entered parliament as member for Newport, in the Isle of Wight, and distinguished himself by his patriotic speeches. On the breaking out of the civil war, he joined the court party, but by no means could reconcile the integrity of his own high principles with the duplicity which marked the conduct of Charles I. In the midst of the troubles which distracted the kingdom, he lost the buoyancy of his spirits, and would frequently ejaculate to himself, in a mournful tone, "Peace! peace!" which, however, he was not destined to live to see. At the battle of Newbury, he volunteered into the cavalry commanded by Lord Byron, and fell, shot through the body, which was not found till the following day. Lord Clarendon, in his "History of the Rebellion," says that this nobleman "was a person of such prodigious parts of learning and knowledge, of that inestimable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity." Notwithstanding the apparent excess of this panegyric, Falkland seems to have deserved it; for he was an ornament to the nation, and the envy of the age. One of his sayings was, "I pity unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day." He is represented among the statues in the lobby of the House of Commons.

Born at Bunford, Oxfordshire, 1610; died 1643.

FALKOPING, fal'-ko-ping, a town of Sweden, 38 miles from Mariestad, near which, in 1388, Margaret, queen of Denmark, defeated and made prisoner Albert, king of Sweden.

FALL RIVER, favl, a seaport and manufacturing town of Massachusetts, United States, near the mouth of a river of the same name, which discharges into Narraganset Bay. There is a good harbour. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and ironware. Pop. 48,961.—It is connected with New York and Boston by railway and steamboat.

FALLMERAYER, JACOB PHILIPP, favl-me-ra'-er, German traveller and historian, who served when young in the Bavarian army against Napoleon. In 1826, he was appointed professor of history and philology at Landshut. He afterwards made three journeys to the East. In 1848 he sat as deputy in the Frankfort parliament. He was a great linguist, and wrote several valuable historical and philological works.

Born in the Tyrol, 1791; died 1862.

FALLOPIUS, GABRIEL, fal-lo'-pe-us, an eminent physician and anatomist, who discovered the tubes of the uterus which bear his name. He was professor of anatomy, first at Pisa, and afterwards at Padua, where he was also superintendent of the botanical garden.

Born 1523; died at Padua, 1562.

FALLOUX, FREDERIC ALFRED PIERRE, Compte de, fal-loo', French author and statesman of the Legitimist party. After the revolution of 1848, he was a prominent member of the Constituent Assembly, and was minister of public instruction under the prince-president Napoleon, but after the coup d'état, of 1851, he retired from public life. In 1857 he was chosen member of the French Academy. He was the author of several historical and political works, among them a history of Louis XVI. and of Pope Pius V.

Born at Angers, 1811.

FALLS, fawlls, three towns of the United States, two of them in Pennsylvania, and one in Ohio. None of them has a population above 2,500.

FALMOUTH, fal'-mouth, a seaport and municipal and parliamentary borough of Cornwall, at the mouth of the river Fal, 11 miles S. of Truro. It has a good harbour and a fine and spacious roadstead. The town consists principally of one street, nearly a mile along the beach. There are two castles on the coast, one of which, Pendennis, commands the entrance of the harbour; and the other, on the opposite side, is St. Mawes Castle. A considerable fishery of pilchards is carried on. Pop. 4,373. Lat. 50° 9′ N. Lon. 5° 4′ W.—A station on the South Devon railway.

FANG-KI, fang-ki', a small island off the S. coast of China, in the province of Quang-tong. Lat. 21° 18′ N. Lon. 110° 35′ E.

FANNAN ISLES, or SEVEN HUNTERS, fan'-nan, a group of uninhabited islands in the Hebrides, Scotland. They are a great resort of sea-fowl, and sheep are pastured on them.

FANNIN, fan'-nin, a county of Georgia, United States. Pop. 5,700.

FANNIN, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 930 square miles. Pop. 25,501. Bonham is the capital.

FANNIUS, fan'-ne-us, surnamed Strabo, was twice consul of Rome, and rendered himself remarkable by a law, which prohibited any person from spending more than a certain sum daily.

FANNIUS, son of the above, was distinguished for his eloquence. He was consul in the 631st year of Rome.

FANNIUS, Roman writer, who wrote a history of Nero's cruelties, the loss of which is greatly regretted by Pliny the Younger.
Lived in the 2nd century.

FANO, fa'-no, a seaport-town of Italy, on the shore of the Adriatic, 6 miles S.E. of Pesaro. It contains a cathedral dedicated to St. Fortunato, and several churches, with valuable paintings; also an academy, a library, and a large opera-house. The town is surrounded by walls and ditches. There are the remains of a Roman triumphal arch of white marble. The harbour, once important, is now nearly choked up with sand. Manf. Principally silk twist. Pop. 21,234.

FANO, or FANNO, one of the Ionian islands, at the entrance of the Adriatic, 14 miles from Corfu.

FANOE, fa'-ne(r), an island of Denmark, near North Jutland. It is 10 miles long and 3 broad. Pop. 2,800, mostly engaged in fishing.

FANSHAWE, SIR RICHARD, fan'-shaw, statesman and poet, who was educated at Cambridge, and in 1635 was sent ambassador to Spain, whence, in 1641, he returned, and acted steadily for the royal cause. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and closely confined for a considerable time; but, at last, recovered his liberty, and went to Breda, in Holland, where he was knighted by Charles II. in 1656. At the Restoration he was made master of requests, and sent to Portugal to negotiate the marriage with the king and the infanta Catharine. In 1664 he was sent ambassador to Spain, where he died. He translated into English the "Pastor Fido," or Faithful Shepherd, of Guarini, also the "Lusiad" of Camoens. His letters during his embassies in Spain and Portugal were printed in 1702.
Born in Hertfordshire, 1608; died at Madrid, 1666.

FANTEE, or FANTI, fan-tee', a maritime district of Ashantee, West Africa. The Fantees were once the most numerous and powerful people on the Gold Coast of Africa. Their power has since 1811 been almost entirely broken, and they are now protected by the establishments of British forts on Cape-Coast Castle.

FAOUET, fa-ou-ai', a town of France, department Morbihan, on the Ellé. Manf. Paper Prussian blue, and potato-flour. Pop. 2,900.

FARADAY, MICHAEL, far'-a-dai, a distinguished English chemist and natural philosopher, who was, at first, apprenticed to the trade of bookbinding, but whose mechanical genius and talent for investigation procured him the ultimate patronage of Sir Humphry Davy. Through his interest he was taken into the laboratory of the Royal Institution of London, where he was enabled to pursue his studies. He travelled with Davy on the continent, as assistant and amanuensis, and in 1827 succeeded him as professor of chemistry at the Royal Institution. In the same year he published his work on "Chemical Manipulations," and from that time continued a regular contributor to the "Philosophical Transactions," spreading his investigations over the wide field of electricity. He succeeded, if not in discovering, at all events in establishing, the laws of electro-magnetism, and has, perhaps, done more than any other man towards the elucidation of electric phenomena. On this subject he published three volumes, entitled "Experimental Researches in Electricity," in which are included his researches into the magnetic nature of oxygen gas, light, and other important subjects. A true philosopher, he rejected all posts of honour, confining himself to his sphere in the Royal Institution, where the charm of his lectures was a continual attraction to those who delighted to follow him through the paths of magnetic science. In private life his character was irreproachable, and characterized by great goodness and humanity. In 1832 he received the degree of D.C.L., received a pension in 1858, and was granted the use of a house at Hampton Court in 1858.
Born in London, 1791; died 1867.

FARADEESE, far'-a-deese, a town of North Africa, 30 miles S. of Tunis. In the 18th century the inhabitants were famous as the greatest pirates and the most skilful mariners of the country.

FARAFEH, far'-a-fe, an oasis of the Libyan desert, in Africa, comprehending several villages and a town, with vestiges of Greek and Roman edifices. The inhabitants manufacture coarse woollen cloths and earthen vessels. Lat. 27° N. Lon. 28° 23′ N.

FARAHABAD, far-a-ha-bad', a town of Persia, on the south coast of the Caspian Sea, at the mouth of the Tejan. Manf. Sugar, cotton, and silk.

FARDELLA, MICHAEL ANGELO, far-dail'-la, professor of natural history and astronomy at Padua, who wrote several books on his favourite sciences.

Born at Sicily, 1650; died at Naples, 1718.

FAREHAM, fair'-ham, a market-town of Hampshire, on a creek at the N.W. end of Portsmouth harbour. It is resorted to for sea-bathing. Manf. Ropes and earthenware, and it has shipbuilding docks, and a trade in corn, coals, and timber. Pop. 7,023.—A station on the London and South-Western railway.

FAREL, GUILLAUME, far'-el, a Protestant divine, who studied at Paris; but having embraced the Reformed religion, he left France and settled at Geneva, where he laboured with great zeal against popery, and was there the chief person in establishing the Reformation. He was banished thence, with Calvin, in 1538, for refusing to submit to the synod of Berne. Farel then settled at Neufchâtel. His zeal as a missionary was indomitable, and he willingly suffered persecution and imprisonment.

Born in Dauphiné, 1489; died at Neufchâtel, 1565.

FAREWELL, CAPE, fair-wel', the south point of West Greenland. Lat. 59° 49′ N. Lon. 43° 54′ W.

FARGEAU, far'-go, a town of France, department Yonne, on the Loing, 26 miles S.E. of Auxerre. There are the remains of a fine old chateau, once the residence of Mademoiselle Montpensier, built in the 15th century, but nearly destroyed by fire in 1752. Manf. Leather, iron, glass, and pottery. A large amount of firewood is supplied to Paris. Pop. 2,800.

FARIA Y SOUSA, MANOEL, fa-ré'-a soo'-sa, a Portuguese historian and poet, who in 1631 was appointed secretary to the Spanish embassy at Rome, where his acquirements attracted the notice of Pope Urban VIII., and the principal learned men of the city. He wrote a "History of Portugal" to the reign of Henry Cardinal, a "History of the Portuguese Dominions in Europe, Asia, and Africa," and some other works.

Born 1590; died at Madrid, 1649.

FARIGLIANO, fa-re-le-a'-no, a small town of Northern Italy, on the right bank of the Tanaro, 21 miles N.E. of Ceni. There are an ancient parish church, and a monastery. Manf. Silk. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,000.

FARINDOLA, far-in-do'-la, a small town of Italy on the left bank of the Salino, 6 miles S.W. of Civita-di-Penne. An important fair is held annually. Pop. 3,200.

FARINELLI, far'-e-nel'-le, a distinguished Neapolitan vocalist, whose real name is said to have been Carlo Broschi. He studied under Prossora at Rome, whence he went to Vienna, where he became a great favourite with Charles VI., who loaded him with riches and presents. In 1734 he visited London, and, by the captivating power of his melody, drew all who could afford to hear him. So great was the attraction of his voice, that Handel was forced to dismiss a rival company, over which he was presiding, notwithstanding his own immense popularity. His influence over the musical sympathies of his audiences seems never to have been equalled.

Born at Naples, 1705; died 1782.

FARINI, CARLO LUIGI, fa-ré'-ne, Italian author and statesman, who first studied at Bologna, but having taken part in political movements was compelled to leave the Papal States, and went to Turin, but on the accession of Pio Nono was permitted to return, and held office in the Reformed ministry. When the French occupied Rome he went to Piedmont, and in 1851 was minister of public instruction in the cabinet of King Victor Emmanuel, and afterwards a member of the supreme council. In 1861 he was minister of commerce, and in 1862 president of the cabinet. He wrote "The Roman State," and completed Botta's "History of Italy."

Born in Ravenna, 1812; died 1866.

FARKASD, far'-kasd, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Waag, 19 miles S.W. of Neutra. Pop. 3,300.

FARMER, HUGH, far'-mer, a learned dissenting divine, who wrote "An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of our Lord's Temptation in the Wilderness," in which he considered that event as a divine vision, representing the different scenes of our Saviour's future ministry. In 1771 he published his "Dissertation on Miracles." His next publication was an "Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament," which he maintains to have been natural diseases. His last performance was entitled "The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient Heathen Nations, asserted and proved."

Born at Shrewsbury, 1714; died at Walthamstow, 1787.

FARMER, RICHARD, a divine and antiquary, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1760, and the same year was appointed classical tutor. In 1767 he took the degree of B.D., and became one of the preachers at Whitehall. In the preceding year he published his "Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare," in which he proved that all the knowledge of ancient history and mythology possessed by the immortal bard was drawn from translations. In 1775 Mr. Farmer was chosen master of his college, and took his degree of D.D. He also became chancellor and prebendary of Lichfield, librarian to the university of Cambridge, and prebendary of Lichfield, which last appointment he resigned in 1788, when he was appointed canon residentiary of St. Paul's. He collected ample materials for a history of Leicester; but these, with the plates, he gave to Mr. Nichols, for the use of his history of that county.

Born at Leicester, 1735; died 1797.

FARMING'S ISLAND, in the North Pacific, taken possession of by the English in 1861. There is a harbour named English harbour, and a small settlement was formed at English Point. Lat. 30° 49′ N. Lon. 159° 20′ W.

FARNABY, THOMAS, far'-na-be, an eminent English schoolmaster, who, after a variety of fortune, settled in London, where he acquired great reputation as a teacher. In 1616 he was admitted to the degree of M.A. at Cambridge. In the civil war he was imprisoned for his loyalty. He published Juvenal and Persius; Seneca's "Tragedies;" Martial; Lucan's "Pharsalia;" and other classical authors, with notes; "Index Rhetcricus et Poeticus;" "Florilegium Epigrammatum Græcorum;" and "Systema Grammaticum."

Born in London, about 1575; died 1647.

FARNBOROUGH. (See MAY, Sir ERSKINE.)

FARNE or FERN ISLANDS, farn, on the coast of Northumberland, 17 in number, lying off the E. coast, opposite Bamborough. There are two lighthouses and the tower of a priory of St. Cuthbert.

In 1838, the Forfarshire steamer was wrecked on these islands; when the keeper of the lighthouse, and his heroic daughter, Grace Darling, in the midst of the storm, proceeded to the wreck in an open boat, and saved nine persons. (See DARLING.) In 1843, the Pegasus was also wrecked here, and 60 persons perished.

FARNESE, far-nai'-se, an eminent Italian family, several members of which attained great distinction. The name has been given to many famous works of art, especially the Farnese bull and the Farnese Hercules. The family, which was rich and powerful as far back as the 13th century, became extinct in 1731.

FARNESE, ALESSANDRO. (See PAUL III., Pope.)

FARNESE, PIETRO LUIGI, the first duke of Parma and Placentia, son of the above, said to have been the offspring of a secret marriage before taking orders, but by some writers supposed to have been illegitimate. He was assassinated by his subjects, on account of his oppressive conduct.

Born 1490; died 1547.

FARNESE, ALESSANDRO, a Roman cardinal, was the eldest son of the above. Charles V. said, that if all the members of the sacred college were like Farnese, it would be the most august assembly in the world.

Born 1520: died 1589.

FARNESE, ALESSANDRO, third duke of Parma, and nephew of the preceding. He distinguished himself as an able general in the service of Philip II. against the Netherlanders, and, afterwards, in the Catholic army in France, in support of the league against Henry IV. He was wounded at the siege of Caudebec, and died soon after.

Born 1546; died at Arras, 1592.

FARNEWORTH, ELLIS, farn'-worth, an English divine, who obtained the rectory of Carsington, in Derbyshire. He translated the "Life of Pope Sixtus V." from the Italian, 1754, folio; Davila's "History of the Civil Wars of France," in 1757, 2 vols. 4to; the "Works of Machiavel," 1761, 2 vols. 4to; and Fleury's "History of the Israelites," 12mo.

Died 1763.

FARNHAM, farn'-ham, a town of Surrey, on the left bank of the Wey, 10 miles S.W. of Guildford. The castle of the bishop of Winchester is a quadrangular structure, restored in 1684, and occupying the site of a strongly-fortified castle built in the reign of Stephen. A new town-hall was erected in 1860. The town has belonged to the bishops of Winchester more than a thousand years. The chief trade is in hops, a fine kind of which grows in the neighbourhood. Pop. 4,461.—A station on the London and South-Western railway. The ruins of the old Abbey of Waverley are near the town.

FARNWORTH, farn'-worth, a township of Lancashire, 3 miles S.E. of Bolton. There is a public park of 11 acres. Manf. Paper, cotton, iron, bricks, and tiles. Pop. 20,701.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

FARO, far'-o, an island of Sweden, in the Baltic. Ext. 10 miles long, with an average breadth of 3. Lat. 58° N. Lon. 19° 22′ E.—On its E. side there is a village of the same name.

FARO, an episcopal city and seaport of Portugal, capital of the province of Algarve, in a sandy plain at the mouth of the Fermoso. The harbour is almost blocked up, but the roadstead affords convenient anchorage. It has a cathedral, military hospital, and an arsenal, and is surrounded by walls. There is a good trade in the export of oranges, figs, anchovies, and cork, and there is a profitable fishery. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 37° N. Lon. 7° 52′ W.

FARO CAPE, the N.E. extremity of the island of Sicily, helping to bound the narrowest part of the Strait of Messina. Lat. 38° 15′ N. Lon. 15° E.—The FARO CHANNEL is a name sometimes given to the Strait of Messina.

FAROE, or FAROER ISLANDS, far'-o, a group in the Northern Ocean, lying between Iceland and Shetland, belonging to Denmark, and consisting of 22 islands, of which 17 are inhabited, occupying a length of 70 miles, and a breadth of 45. The principal island is STROMOE. Each is a lofty mountain, rising out of the waves, divided from the others by deep and rapid currents. The highest summits reach the elevation of between 2,000 and 3,000 feet. Some of the islands are deeply indented with secure harbours; all are steep, and most of them exhibit tremendous precipices. The soil is shallow, but remarkably fertile; barley is the only corn grown, and yields an immense crop; and the grass affords abundant pasturage for sheep, from which the Danish name, Faar-Oen, "sheep islands," is taken. No trees above the size of a juniper or stunted willow are to be seen. Vast quantities of sea-fowl frequent the rocks, the taking of which furnishes a perilous employment for the inhabitants. Exp. Salted mutton, butter, tallow, goose-quills, feathers, eider-down, knit woollen waistcoats, caps, and stockings. Area of the group, 500 square miles. Pop. 11,220, of Norwegian origin, and belonging to the Lutheran church. The islands belonged to England between 1807 and the treaty of Vienna in 1814. Lat. between 61° 25′ and 62° 25′ N. Lon. between 6° and 8° W.

FARQUHAR, GEORGE, far'-quar, comic dramatist, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and quitted that seat of learning for the boards of the Dublin theatre. Here, while playing Guyomar, in the "Indian Emperor" of Dryden, he was so unfortunate as to stab a brother actor, when he relinquished the stage and proceeded to London, where he received from the earl of Orrery a lieutenancy in his lordship's regiment. He now commenced writing for the theatre, and in 1698 appeared his first dramatic piece, entitled "Love in a Bottle," which met with success. This was followed, in 1700, by the "Constant Couple, on Trip to the Jubilee." The same year he was in Holland, of which country he has given a humorous description in his Letters. In 1701 appeared the comedy of "Sir Harry Wildair," and the year following, his "Miscellanies." In 1703 he brought out "The Inconstant, or the Way to Win Him." His next piece was the popular play of "The Recruiting Officer." His last comedy was "The Beaux Stratagem," and is his best production. It was written in his last illness, and had a great run, during which the author died. Farquhar's comedies are lively, natural, and full of business; but they are also extremely licentious. Gibber, in his "Lives," thus speaks of him and his comedies:—"He seems to have been a man of genius rather sprightly than great, rather flowery than solid. His comedies are diverting, because his characters are natural, and such as we frequently meet with; but he has used no art in drawing them, nor does there appear any force of thinking in his performances, or any deep penetration into nature; but rather a superficial view, pleasant enough to the eye, though capable of leaving no great impression on the mind."

Born at Londonderry, 1678; died 1707.

FARRANT, RICHARD, far'-rant, English musical composer, a gentleman of the chapel royal in 1564, and afterwards organist and chapel-master. Very little is known of his personal history, but several of his anthems are highly esteemed by musicians, and frequently sung in cathedral services.
Died 1585.

FARRINGDON (or FARINGDON) GREAT, far'-ring-don, an ancient town and parish of Berkshire, 32 miles N.W. of Reading. It has a spacious church in the Gothic style. Pop. 2,943.—A station on the Great Western railway.

FARS, or FARISTAN, fars, a province of Persia, bounded N. by Irak, E. by the province of Kerman and Lar, W. by Kuzistan, and S. by the Persian Gulf. It is about 420 miles long, and 360 broad. The southern parts are hot and sandy, the northern full of mountains, on which are found the most beautiful falcons in Persia, with a great number of wild hogs and wild cats. The centre is fertile. Salt lakes are numerous.

Pro.—Principally rice, fruit, corn, dates, tobacco, opium, cotton, attar of roses, wine, and silk. Large herds of cattle are reared, and the horses, asses, and camels are of excellent breeds.
Minerals.—Iron, lead, marble, emeralds, naphtha, and salt.
Manf.—Woollens, cottons, and silks. Quantities of skins are exported.
Chief Towns.—SHIRAZ, Jehroom, DARABJERD, Babahan, and BUSHIRE.
Pop.—1,700,000.
Lat.—Between 27° 30′ and 31° 30′ N Lon. Between 49° 30′ and 55° E.

FARSAN ISLANDS, far'-san, two islands on the east side of the Red Sea. They are connected by a shoal, over which camels pass. The western island, Keeber, is 31 miles long; the other, Seggeer, 18 miles. Lat. 16° 30′ N. Lon. 42° 45′ E.

FARSUND, far'-sund, a small seaport of Norway, 47 miles S.E. of Christiansund, on the North Sea. Dried fish, herrings, and millstones are the chief exports. Pop. 1,100. Lat. 38° N. Lon. 7° 30′ E.

FASANO, fai-sa'-no, a town of Italy, 33 miles S.E. of Bari, in the midst of olive plantations. Manf. Oil. Pop. 17,877.

FASTOLFF, SIR JOHN, fas'-tolf, a famous English general, who served with great reputation in France, where he obtained several high posts while the English held possessions in that kingdom. In 1440 he returned to his own country, and distinguished himself as a friend to the poor, and an encourager of learning. He was a considerable benefactor to the university of Cambridge, and to Magdalen College, Oxford. Though there be a strong similarity in the names, he is not to be taken for Sir John Falstaff, the knight so humorously rendered by Shakspeare.
Born at Yarmouth, 1377; died 1459.

FATATENDA, fa-ta-ten'-da, a large town of West Africa, on the right bank of the Gambia. Lat. 13° 22′ N. Lon. 14° 10′ W.

FATCHIU, fatch-e-oo', an island of the Japanese dominions, in the Strait of Corea, in the Pacific. Lat. 34° 20′ N. Lon. 120° 15′ E.

FATIMIDES, fat'-i-mides, the designation of a race of kings who assumed the title of caliphs, and reigned over Egypt and the north of Africa, from about the close of the 9th to the end of the 12th century.

FATSA, fat'-sa, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, on the Black Sea. It contains an old palace, and some ships are built in the neighbourhood. The ruins of the ancient Polemonium are two miles to the east.

FATSIZIO, fat-se'-ze-o, an island of Japan, 21 miles long and 8 broad, containing a town of the same name. To this island state criminals are banished.

FAUCHER, LEON, fo-shair', French journalist and statesman, successively editor of the Temps, the Constitutionnel, and the Courrier Français. In 1846 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies for Rheims, and distinguished himself by his advocacy of the principles of free trade. Under Louis Napoleon, when president, he was first minister of public works, and then of the interior, but retired from public life after the coup d'état. He contributed to the reviews many vigorous papers on economical subjects, and the industrial resources of England.
Born at Limoges, 1803; died 1854.

FAUCHET, CLAUDE, fo'-shai, a French antiquary, whose works are, "Gaulish and French Antiquities;" "The Liberties of the Gallican Church;" "The Origin of Knights, Armorial Bearings, and Heralds;" "Origin of Dignities and Magistrates in France;" all printed together in Paris, in 1610.
Born 1529; died 1601.

FAUCHET, CLAUDE, a French priest, who became vicar-general to the archbishop of Bruges and preacher to Louis XVI. That monarch, however, was disgusted with his excessive vanity and theatrical mode of action, which, it is said, made Fauchet a violent revolutionist. He took a leading part in storming the Bastille, and preached a thanksgiving sermon on the occasion. In another address, he designated Jesus Christ as the first sans culotte of Judea. He entered among the Illuminati, and, in 1791, became what was called the constitutional bishop of Bayeux. He was also deputy for the department of Calvados, to the Legislative Assembly, and, afterwards, a member of the Convention, but, like many others, ended his career at the guillotine. His works are, "A Panegyric on St. Louis," pronounced before the French Academy; "A Funeral Oration for the Duke of Orleans," "Eulogium on Benjamin Franklin," "Discourse on Universal Manners," &c.
Born 1744; died 1793.

FAUCIGNY, fo-se'-ne. (See SAVOIE HAUTE.)

FAULHORN, fold'-horn, a mountain of the Alps, Switzerland, 30 miles from Berne. It lies between the valley of the Grindelwald and the lake Brienz. Height, 8,140 feet. There is an inn near the summit.

FAUNA, faw'-na, a deity among the Romans, whose marriage with Faunus procured her the name of Fauna, and her knowledge of futurity, those of Fatua and Fantidica. It is said that she never saw a man after her marriage with Faunus, and that her uncommon chastity raised her to be ranked among the gods after death.

FAUNALIA, faw-nai'-le-a, festivals at Rome, in honour of Faunus.

FAUNI, faw'-ni, rural deities of the Italian mythology, represented as having the legs, feet, and ears of goats, and the rest of the body human. They were called satyrs by the Greeks. The peasants offered them a lamb or kid with great solemnity.

FAUNICH, LOCH, faw'-nik, a lake of Ross-shire, Scotland. Ext. 12 miles long, by 1 broad.

FAUNUS, faw'-nus, an ancient king of Italy, whose bravery has given rise to the tradition that he was son of Mars. His great fondness for agriculture made his subjects revere him as one of their country deities after death. He was represented with all the equipage of the satyrs, and was consulted to give oracles. He is said to have reigned in Italy above 1,300 years B.C.

FAUQUIER, faw'-quere, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 23,000. Warrenton is the capital.

FAURIEL, CLAUDE CHARLES, French historian and philologist, when a young man was appointed to a political office under Fouché, but soon resigned it, and devoted himself to the study of classical and Oriental literature. In 1836 he was appointed professor of the Sorbonne. He was far in advance of contemporary writers on all subjects of literary history or philology. His best known works are the history of Gaul under the German domination, and his history of Provençal poetry.

Born at St. Etienne, 1772; died at Paris, 1844.

FAUST, or FUST, JOHN, foust, a goldsmith of Mentz, who is said by some to have been the inventor of printing. He is, however, supposed only to have assisted Guttenburg, and his son-in-law, Schoeffer, in bringing this noble discovery to perfection. The first production, by the new process of metallic types, was produced in 1459, and was entitled "Durandi Rationale Divinorum Officiorum," by Faust and Schoeffer. This was succeeded by the "Catholicon Joannis Januensis." The greatest work, however, of all was the Bible, in 1462; previous to which they had executed two beautiful editions of the Psalter. The story of Faust's being arrested as a magician at Paris, on account of the exactness of the copies of the Bible which he took thither for sale, is not entitled to credit.

FAUST, DR. JOHN, a half traditional German philosopher, who, educated at Wittemberg, thence proceeded to Ingoldstadt, where he studied, with great success, medicine, and, it is said, astrology and magic, also; expending, in prosecuting his chemical experiments, a considerable fortune left him by an uncle. His countrymen, in their ignorance, imagined him one having dealings with supernatural powers; and this view of Faust subsequently formed a fertile theme for the dramatist, poet, and musician, as well as for the sculptor and painter. The English dramatist Marlowe wrote a splendid tragedy on the subject, and Goethe in his "Faust" has depicted, with a rich imagination, the doctor and his sprite attendant, Mephistopheles. Much doubt has been expressed as to whether such a person as Faust actually lived; but Melancthon and Luther both speak of him as a real person.

Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

FAUSTA, FLAVIA MAXIMIANA, faws'-ta, the second wife of Constantine the Great. By her accusations the emperor put his son Crispus, by a former wife, to death; but her infidelity becoming notorious, she was suffocated in a bath.

Died 327.

FAUSTINA, ANNA GALERIA, the Elder, faw-sti'-na, was the daughter of Annius Verus, and the wife of the emperor, Antoninus Pius. Notwithstanding her debaucheries, the emperor would not divorce her.

Died 141.

FAUSTINA, ANNA, daughter of the above, was the wife of Marcus Aurelius, and exceeded her mother in dissoluteness.

Died 175.

FAUSTINUS I., emperor of Hayti. (See SOULOUQUE.)

FAUSTITAS, faw'-sti-tas, a goddess among the Romans, supposed to preside over cattle.

FAUSTULUS, faws'-tu-lus, a shepherd ordered to expose Romulus and Remus. He privately brought them up at home.

FAVARA, fai-va'-ra, a town in the south of Sicily, 4 miles S.E. of Girgenti. There are rich sulphur mines in the vicinity. Pop. 15,994.

FAVART, CHARLES SIMON, fav'-ar, a French dramatist, who first established the comic opera, and, as stage manager, introduced appropriate costumes. He was the author of about 60 pieces, some of which attained great popularity. He married Mdlle. Durouceray, a singer and dramatic writer of considerable talent. Favart's memoirs and correspondence, full of amusing and interesting gossip, were published by his grandson in 1809.

Born in Paris, 1710; died 1793.

FAVERGES, fai-verge', a town of France, department Haute Savoie, 14 miles S.E. of Annecy. There is an old castle, now used as a silk factory. Manf. Silk goods, iron, brass, and agricultural implements. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,000.

FAVERSHAM, fav'-er-sham, a municipal borough and seaport of Kent, 8 miles N.W. of Canterbury, opposite the isle of Sheppy. It has an assembly-room, guildhall, church, gaol, and theatre. Near it are gunpowder-mills, and it has an oyster-fishery. There are the remains of an abbey, founded by king Stephen, who, with his queen was buried here. Pop. 8,627.—A station on the London, Chatham, and Dover railway.

FAVIGNANA a town on the above island. There are two castles. The vicinity is fertile and produces good wine. Pop. 3,900.

FAVRE, GABRIEL CLAUDE JULES, French politician and advocate, distinguished for the boldness with which, as an advocate, he defended political prisoners at Lyons, and elsewhere, and avowed his republican principles. He was secretary to the provisional government of 1848, stoutly opposed Louis Napoleon, and refused to take the oath of fidelity after the coup d'état of 1851. In 1858 he defended Orsini, charged with conspiracy to murder the emperor. After the downfall of the empire he was minister of war, and carried on the negotiations with Bismarck for the surrender of Paris. He resigned office in 1871.

Born at Lyons, 1809.

FAWCETT, WILLIAM, faw'-set, an English general. He paid unremitting attention to his duty, and, in his leisure hours, studied the French and German languages. While a lieutenant of the Guards, he translated from the former the "Reveries, or Memoirs upon the Art of War, by Field-Marshal Count Saxe," published in 4to in 1757. He also translated from the German, "Regulations for the Prussian Cavalry," published the same year. This work was followed by "Regulations for the Prussian Infantry," to which was added "Prussian Tactics," published in 1759. On General Elliot being ordered to Germany, in the "Seven Years' War," Mr. Fawcett accompanied him as aide-de-camp. Subsequently he was attached, in the same capacity, to the marquis of Granby. He was soon after promoted to a company in the Guards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, made him flattering offers to induce him to enter his service, which, however, he declined. His services and high character were duly valued by his king and country, and he was made knight of the Bath, colonel of the 3rd regiment of dragoon guards, and governor of Chelsea Hospital, in the chapel of which he was buried with great pomp.

Born near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1728; died 1804.

FAWKES, GUIDO, or GUY, fawks, the most active and daring conspirator in the "Gunpowder Plot," which was designed, in 1605, to blow up king, lords, and bishops, in the house of parliament assembled. He was of a respectable Protestant family in Yorkshire; but became a Catholic at an early age, and entered into the Spanish army in Flanders, and in 1596 was at the taking of Calais by the archduke Albert. Little more is known of his history, beyond his connection with the conspirators, who had pledged themselves by an oath to blow up the House of Lords, on account of James I. having given an assurance to his council, "that he had never any intention of granting toleration to Catholics." Fawkes had undertaken to fire the powder which had been concealed under the devoted house; but about 12 o'clock, on the night of the 4th November, was caught in the cellar, with matches and a dark lantern, ready to perform the deed for which he and seven others suffered on the scaffold.

Born 1570; died 1606.

FAWKES, FRANCIS, an English poet and divine, who took his degree in arts at Jesus College, Cambridge. On entering into orders, he settled at Bramham, Yorkshire, but afterwards obtained the vicarage of Orpington, in Kent, which he exchanged for the rectory of Hayes. He published a volume of poems and translations of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, and Theocritus. His version of the "Argonautics" of Apollonius was published in 1780. Mr. Fawkes also lent his name to an edition of the Bible with notes. It was in translation, however, that he excelled. The odes of Anacreon, Dr. Johnson says, are finely translated.

Born in Yorkshire, 1721; died at Hayes, Kent, 1777.

FAXARDO, fax-ar'-do, a town on the east coast of the island of Porto Rico, near the mouth of a small river of the same name. Pop. 3,000.

FAY, ANDRAS, fay, Hungarian poet, author of popular fables, poems, and dramas. At one time he took a prominent part in politics, but declined to follow the energetic policy of Kossuth, and retired into private life.

Born at Kohany, 1786; died 1864.

FAYAL, fay-al', one of the Azore islands. Ext. 27 miles long, and 9 broad. It is fertile and diversified, rising in the centre to a mountain 3,000 feet high. It is, with the exception of St. Michael, the most frequented island of the group. Area, 37 square miles. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 38° 30′ N. Lon. 28° 41′ W.

FEALE, feel, a river of Ireland, rising in the mountains of Cork and Limerick, and, after a course of 30 miles, falling, by a tidal estuary, called Cashin, into the Shannon, 11 miles above Kerry Head.

FECAMP, fai'-kawn(g), a seaport-town of France, in the department of Seine-Inférieure, 21 miles N.E. of Havre, at the mouth of a stream of the same name, which discharges into the English Channel. There is a very handsome church of Notre Dame, in the early pointed style, erected in the 14th century. The harbour is good and much frequented by English colliers and Baltic timber vessels. Manf. Cottons, woollens, lace, linen, leather, and sugar; and there are tanneries, sawmills, and shipbuilding-docks. It is the seat of a chamber of commerce, and has a school of navigation. Pop. 12,500.

FECKENHAM, JOHN DE, the last abbot of Westminster. On the commencement of the Reformation he opposed it with spirit, and was sent to the Tower, where he continued till Queen Mary's accession, when he was made abbot of Westminster. Queen Elizabeth, whose life he had saved by his remonstrances with Mary, when the latter designed her death, would have made him archbishop of Canterbury, if he would have conformed; but he refused. He sat in her first parliament, and protested against the Reformation; for which he was committed to the Tower. He continued in confinement till 1563, and was then delivered to the care of the bishop of Winchester. He was a learned and liberal man, charitable to the poor, and the author of some controversial pieces.

Born at Feckenham, Worcestershire; died in the castle of Wisbeach, 1585.

FEDOR, or FEODOR, IVANOVITCH, fai'-dor, the last czar of the dynasty of Ruric on the throne of Russia. He began his reign in 1584, and being weak, both in body and mind, assigned the government of his affairs to Godoonoff, who seems to have managed them with dexterity and vigour. In his reign the peasants of Muscovy were converted into serfs, and attached to the land. Previously they had enjoyed personal liberty. The conquest of Siberia was achieved by Godoonoff, and many remarkable diplomatic relations with foreign courts were effected; so that this reign may be deemed by no means the least remarkable in the Muscovite annals.

Born 1557; died 1598.

FEDOR, ALEXIEVICH, czar of Russia, and eldest brother of Peter the Great. He ascended the throne when only 19 years of age, and evinced a strength of will and determination of character, which, had he lived, might have anticipated the reforms which his younger brother was subsequently destined to effect among the people over whom he was called to reign. His sway is rendered memorable, on account of his calling into his presence the Muscovite nobles, who desolated the country with broils about their claims of family precedence, and, throwing the rolls of the "Razriad," or "Arrangement," into the fire. The genealogical records, which did not relate to claims of precedence, were preserved and properly arranged, in accordance with his will.

Born 1657; died 1682.

FEEJEE ISLANDS. (See FIJI.)

FEHERVAR (SZEKES), fa-har'-var'-ud-kes, an ancient royal free town of Hungary, 40 miles S.W. of Pesth. FELDMANN, LEOPOLD, fald'-man, German comic dramatist. He was of Jewish race, and apprenticed to a shoemaker. When only 15 years of age, he wrote a play, "The False Oath," which was produced on the stage. He followed his trade at Pappenheim and Munich, for a few years, but resolved to depend entirely on literature. He travelled and contributed to magazines and newspapers, and in 1850 was appointed histrionic teacher at the national theatre of Vienna. He has written many comedies, which have been very successful.

Born at Munich, 1803.

FELDSBERG, or VELTSPURG, a town of Austria, near the frontiers of Moravia, 39 miles N.E. of Vienna. The older part is surrounded by walls, and there is an extensive suburb. There are two churches, one a very fine building in the Ionic style, with two towers and a dome, and adorned with paintings. There are also a town-house, monastery, and hospital. The splendid palace of the Prince of Lichtenstein, with gardens and park, is to the east of the town. Pop. 2,600.

FELICE, FORTUNÉ BARTHÉLEMY DE, fai-le'-chai, an Italian writer, originally a professor of sciences at Rome and Naples. Compelled to quit Rome in consequence of an intrigue with the countess of Panzutti, he for a long time wandered in Italy and Switzerland, finally taking up his residence at Berne, where he continued his scientific labours, and connected himself with Haller. Here he embraced Protestantism and married. Subsequently he formed, at Yverdun, in the canton of Vaud, a large printing establishment, whence issued a number of good books, he, at the same time, successfully directing an academy. His first publications were translations from the English and French, into Italian and Latin, of those scientific works which he wished to make known to Italy; among others, those of Newton, Descartes, Maupertuis, and D'Alembert. From 1758, he edited, with Tscharner, some literary and scientific journals, which were held in high estimation, as also several other writings of great merit. Finally he published, from 1770 to 1780, in 48 vols. 4to, and 10 vols. of plates, the Encyclopædia, known as that of Yverdun. In this great work, of which Diderot's formed, in some measure, the base, he had, as collaborateurs, Euler, Haller, Lalande, and other German, French, and Italian writers. Besides the works here named, his country owes to him the production of other instructive and well-digested volumes.

Born at Rome, 1723; died at Yverdun, 1789.

FELICUDI, fai-le-cu'-de, a small island off the N. coast of Italy, evidently an extinct volcano. There is a remarkable cavern, one of the chambers in which is 160 feet long, 120 broad, and 50 feet high. Pop. 800.

FELIX, ANTONIUS, fe'-lix, "happy," governor of Judæa. St. Paul, when brought before him, delivered an admirable discourse, which made him tremble. In 62 Nero recalled him on account of his rapacity.

FELIX I. succeeded Pope Dionysius in 269, and was martyred in the persecution under Aurelian. He wrote an epistle against Sabellius and Paul of Samosata, which is extant.

Died 274.

FELIX II., antipope. He was placed in the papal chair in 355, by the emperor Constantius, during the exile of Liberius, on the return of whom he was expelled. Constans would have had the two popes reign together, but the people exclaimed, "One God, one Christ, and one bishop!" Felix was exiled in 358, but became pope again the same year.

Died 365.

FELIX III. succeeded Simplicius, in 483. He had a violent dispute with the emperor Zeno in behalf of the Western church.

Died in 492.

FELIX IV., a native of Benevento, ascended the chair after John I., in 526. He governed the church with zeal and piety, and introduced extreme unction.

Died 530.

FELIX, bishop of Urgella, in Catalonia. He espoused the notion of his friend Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, that Jesus Christ was the son of God only by adoption. For this, Charlemagne caused him to be deposed and banished to Lyons.

Died 815.

FELTRE, Henri Jacques Guillaume Clarke, Duc de, feltr, entered the French military service in 1781, and, by the time he was twenty-seven years of age, had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, chiefly by the patronage of the duke of Orleans. In 1793 he was made general; and, in 1795, was sent on a secret mission to Vienna, and to the seats of war in Italy, for the purpose of watching the ambitious movements of Napoleon I. In a short time, however, he was fascinated by the rising star of that great man, entered his service, and, throughout his varying fortunes, continued with him till his fall. In 1807 he was made minister of war, an office which he retained, through much ill-will and clamour, till 1814. In 1809 he was made duke of Feltre. After the fall of the emperor, he served Louis XVIII.; but his merits, however appreciated by the sovereign, were not proof against the continual attacks of other courtiers, and he was sent into a kind of honourable exile, to Rouen, with the command of the 3rd division.

Born at Landrecies, 1765; died at Rouen, 1818.

FEMERN, fai'-mern, an island of Denmark, in the Baltic, to the N.E. of Holstein, from which it is separated by a strait named the Femern Sound. Level, but fertile in corn, and cattle are abundant. Fishing, navigation, agriculture, and stocking-weaving are the particular pursuits of the inhabitants. The chief town is Burg. Area, 63 square miles. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 26° 10' N. Lon. 11° 12' E.

FENELON, Francis de Salignac de la Mothe, fai'-nai-lawng, archbishop of Cambray, completed his studies at the Plessis College, and when young, distinguished himself as a preacher. In 1686 he was employed by Louis XIV. as a missionary in Poitou, to convert the Protestants, and, by his persuasive eloquence, made many friends. In 1689 he became tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, grandsons of the king, which office he discharged so well, that he was preferred, in 1694, to the abbey of St. Valery, and in the following year to the archbishopric of Cambray. About this time he fell into trouble, on account of his book entitled "The Maxims of the Saints," which was charged with favouring the mystical principles of Madame de Guyon. Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, who was a violent enemy of that celebrated mystic, attacked the archbishop, and by his influence with the king, obtained an order for him to be banished to his diocese. The book was also condemned at Rome, by Pope Innocent VIII., and to this censure, Fénélon submitted with profound deference, and even read the decree from the pulpit. He spent the remainder of his days in his diocese, and never recovered the king's favour, owing, in a great measure, to his composing, for his royal pupil, the duke of Burgundy, "Telemachus" (his best known work) in which Louis imagined he discovered some passages reflecting on himself. The good archbishop, however, bore his exile with the serenity of conscious integrity. His charities were unbounded, and so revered was his character, that the duke of Marlborough, and other generals of the allies, when possessed of that part of Flanders, exempted his lands from pillage or exaction. Besides the above works he wrote "Dialogues of the Dead," "Dialogues on Eloquence," a "Treatise on the Education of Daughters," a "Demonstration of the Existence of God," "Temporal Power of the Mediæval Popes," and "Spiritual Works." Fénélon is inferior, in force and sublimity, to his countryman Bossuet, but no author has, perhaps, surpassed him in the grace and charm of his style; he has been one of the most successful of writers to reproduce, in modern times, the noble simplicity of the ancients. As a man and Christian, he practised virtue as he taught it, and caused the name and essence of religion to be loved and respected. Many of his works are lost; for, on the death of the duke of Burgundy, Louis XIV. caused several of his writings to be burned, which were found amongst the prince's papers.

Born in the old province of Perigord, 1651; died 1715.

FENELON, Abbe de, grand-nephew of the above, was chaplain to Maria Leczinska, wife of Louis XV., and undertook the direction of an establishment charitably founded for the support of the little Savoyards in Paris. In spite, however, of his virtues and benevolence, he was arrested and brought before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to death. All the Savoyards in Paris hastened to the Convention to demand pardon for him, whom they called their "good father." Their prayers were in vain; he was executed.

Born at St. Jean des Tallais, 1714; died 1790.

FENESHELLE, fai'-nes-halle, a town of Northern Italy, 32 miles W. of Turin. It is situated in a narrow pass, and is very strongly defended. Pop. 2,000.

FENTON, Elijah, fen'-ton, an English poet, who was, for some time, usher of a school in Surrey, and afterwards master of one at Sevenoaks, in Kent. In 1710 he became secretary to the earl of Orrery, and tutor to his son. He afterwards lived with Lady Trumbull as tutor to her son. He wrote some poems; the "Life of Milton;" the tragedy of "Marianne;" and assisted Pope in his translation of the "Odyssey."

Born at Shelton, Staffordshire, 1683; died 1730.

FENTRESS, fen'-tres, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 5,941.

FERDINAND, fer'-di-nand, a name derived from the German verdienen, "to merit," and which has been borne by several emperors of Germany, kings of Spain, Naples, and Sicily.

Germany.

FERDINAND I., emperor of Germany, succeeded his brother Charles V. in 1556, at which time Ferdinand was king of the Romans, and of Hungary and Bohemia. He made peace with the Turks, and died in 1564, leaving the character of a wise and humane prince.

Born 1503; died 1564.

FERDINAND II., grandson of the preceding, was the son of the archduke Charles of Styria, and was elected king of Bohemia and of Hungary. In 1619 he succeeded Matthias as emperor. The Bohemian states having chosen the electoral palatine Frederick to be their king, the latter raised an army of Protestants against the emperor, and thus was commenced the struggle known as the "Thirty Years' War," lasting from 1618 to 1648. Ferdinand defeated Frederick at Prague in 1620, and deprived him of his estates. A second league was then formed against the emperor by the Protestant princes, headed by Christian IV. of Denmark, who was defeated by Tilly, and forced to sign a treaty of peace at Lubeck, in 1629, which put an end to the war. Another league was now formed, of which Gustavus Adolphus was at the head, who defeated the Imperialists in different battles, but was himself slain at Lutzen, in 1632. A partial peace was afterwards made between the emperor and some of the Protestant princes, but it was soon broken, and the war renewed.

Born at Gratz, 1578; died 1637.

FERDINAND III., the son of the preceding, was made king of Hungary in 1625, of Bohemia in 1627, and succeeded his father in 1637. Sweden and France being in alliance, gained several advantages over the Imperialists, which terminated with the peace of Westphalia in 1648.

Born 1608; died 1657.

Spain (Castile, Leon, Aragon, &c.)

FERDINAND I., king of Castile and Leon, called the Great, was the second son of Sancho II., king of Navarre. By the death of Bermudo, in 1037, he became king of Leon. He then made war against the Moors, from whom he took several cities, and pushed his conquests as far as Portugal. He next declared war against his brother, Garcias III., king of Navarre, in which that prince lost his kingdom and his life.

FERDINAND II., son of Alphonso VIII., king of Leon and Castile, gained great advantages over the Portuguese, and made their king, Alphonso Henriquez, prisoner, whom he used with moderation.—In the reign of this prince the military order of St. James was instituted, for the purpose of defending the dominions of the Christian powers against the Saracens.

Died 1188.

FERDINAND III., son of Alphonso IX., obtained the crown of Castile by the abdication of his mother, Berengere, in 1217, and that of Leon by the death of his father, in 1230. He took many places from the Moors; but while he was projecting an expedition against Morocco, died. He was canonised by Pope Clement X., and is regarded as the founder of the university of Salamanca.

FERDINAND IV. succeeded to the throne of Castile in 1295, at the age of ten years, under the guardianship of his mother, who governed the kingdom with great prudence.—In 1309 Gibraltar was taken from the Moors by the Spaniards. This prince, in a fit of anger, caused two noblemen to be precipitated from a high rock. Just before undergoing this fate, they told him that he would appear before God in thirty hours from that time. Their prediction was verified, and thence he obtained the name of the "Summoned."

Died 1312.

FERDINAND V., called the Catholic, son of John II., king of Aragon, married Isabella of Castile, sister of Henry IV., and thereby united the two kingdoms of Castile and Aragon. He declared war against Alphonso, king of Portugal, and defeated him at Toro, in 1476. He next completed the conquest of Grenada, and in 1502 expelled the Moors from Spain. The most remarkable event which signalised his reign, was the discovery of America by Columbus. He also made himself master of part of Navarre, and by the brilliancy of his successes, placed himself generally at the head of European princes. In 1481 the tribunal of the Inquisition was reorganised in Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella. Notwithstanding his great successes, he has been reproached for his instability and craft, which procured for him the surname of the "Crafty," in addition to that of the Catholic, for his victories over the Moors. In all his enterprises he was ably seconded by his consort Isabella, his minister Cardinal Ximenes, and his general Gonsalvo de Cordova. (See Isabella and Columbus.)

Born 1452; died 1516.

FERDINAND VI., son of Philip V. and of Mary of Savoy, ascended the throne in 1745. This prince distinguished his reign by acts of beneficence, restoring liberty to prisoners, proclaiming pardon to smugglers and deserters, and assigning two days in a week to render justice to his subjects. He took part in the war of 1741, and signed the peace in 1748, by which means one of his brothers secured the crown of the Two Sicilies, and the other the dukedom of Parma and Placentia. He re-established his marine, and reformed and promoted arts and agriculture.

Died at Madrid, 1759.

FERDINAND VII., king of Spain, was the son of Charles IV. and the princess Maria Louisa of Parma. During his minority, Spain was governed by Godoy (see Godoy), who vainly endeavoured to acquire the same influence over his mind that he had gained over the minds of his parents. In 1801 he married Maria Antoinetta Theresa, a princess of Naples, possessed of great beauty and accomplishments. She, however, died, in 1806, not, however, without suspicions of foul play, when Napoleon I. began to form his designs upon Spain. With the view to disconnect Ferdinand from the projects of Godoy, the French emperor proposed a matrimonial alliance between him and the daughter of Lucien

Bonaparte, which was entertained by Ferdinand, but prevented by Godoy, who informed Charles IV. of the design, and so exasperated the king against the prince, that he was imprisoned in the Escurial. Soon afterwards a public reconciliation took place, when the French army entered Spain, and the public indignation rose to a high pitch against Godoy, whose dismissal from the councils of his sovereign was loudly demanded. Charles became alarmed, and abdicating his throne, Ferdinand was proclaimed his successor, and immediately assumed the reins of government, in 1808. Meanwhile the French advanced towards Madrid, when Ferdinand sent a deputation requesting the preservation of amity with Napoleon; but that sovereign replied that Charles IV. was his friend and ally, and he could not recognize the right of any other claimant to the Spanish throne. Shortly afterwards, under pretence of having an interview with Napoleon at Bayonne, he was made a prisoner, when the French emperor demanded his renunciation of the Spanish crown. Charles IV., with his queen and minister Godoy, resumed possession of the throne and government, whilst the Spaniards, in all directions, were rising in arms. Napoleon now persuaded the royal family to take refuge in Bordeaux, and there formally abdicate the crown. So soon as this was accomplished, Joseph Bonaparte, the brother of Napoleon, was proclaimed king, whilst Ferdinand was placed in confinement at Valency, where he and his family remained till 1813, when he was restored to the exercise of his regal rights. On returning to his kingdom he was received with open arms by his people; but on arriving at Madrid, he dissolved the Cortes, and assumed the powers of an absolute monarch. The Inquisition was re-established, and those liberals who had fought for the expulsion of the French from the Spanish soil, were persecuted with the utmost rigour, despoiled of their property, forced to flee, or submit to the axe of the executioner. These measures exasperated the people, who, in 1820, rebelled against Ferdinand and re-established the Cortes, who endeavoured to stay the progress of the revolution, and adjust the affairs of the kingdom. In 1823 France again declared war against Spain, and the duke of Angoulême, at the head of an army of 100,000 men, entered the country, with the avowed purpose of restoring Ferdinand to all his absolute powers. The object was effected, but Ferdinand was not permitted to govern entirely by his own will. His despotic disposition was checked on one side by the dread of the liberals, and on the other by doubts of the friendship of the more violent absolutists, who deemed even the rule of Ferdinand too moderate to satisfy their tyrannical propensities. In this position he continued to reign, though hardly to govern, till 1833, when he died, and was buried with great pomp in the vaults of the chapel of the Escurial. In 1829 he had married MARIA CHRISTINA, by whom he had two children, Isabella II. and the Duchess de Montpensier.—By his will he left the crown to his daughter Isabella, under the regency of her mother, Maria Christina, to the exclusion of Don Carlos, his brother. A long and disastrous civil war was the consequence. (See CARLOS and ISABELLA.)

Born 1784; died 1833.

PORTUGAL.

FERDINAND, king of Portugal, succeeded his father, Peter, in 1367. On the death of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, he assumed the latter title, which produced a war between him and Henry of Transtamara, who ravaged Portugal, and forced Ferdinand to make peace and marry his daughter. This marriage he afterwards disowned, and entered into an alliance with John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who laid claim to the Castilian throne. This war proved very disastrous to the Portuguese, and Ferdinand was obliged to sue for peace. Another war was entered into, in which he was supported by the English, and was for a time successful, but was at last under the necessity of making peace.

Died 1383.

FERDINAND, infante of Portugal, son of John I., passed into Africa, at the age of 14, to attack the Moors, and laid siege to Tangier. He was, however, made prisoner by the Moors, and spent the remainder of his life in captivity. This prince's misfortunes have formed the subject of a great number of legends and tales.

Died 1443.

NAPLES AND SICILY.

FERDINAND, king of Naples (not of Sicily), succeeded Alphonso in 1458. In his reign, a civil war raged in his kingdom; but, uniting his arms to those of Scanderbeg, prince of Albania, he was enabled to defeat his barons in 1462. His rule, however, was again disturbed by them; when, in 1480, on the occasion of the marriage of his niece, he had many of the leading barons arrested in Naples, where they were thrown into prison, and numbers of them strangled. He was detested for his debaucheries and cruelties; yet he enacted many good laws, and restored the university of Naples.

Died 1494.

FERDINAND II. ascended the throne at an early age, and entered into a war with the French, who, however, forced him to withdraw from Sicily. His reign was short, and marked by no event of general public importance.

Died at Naples, 1496.

FERDINAND III. is the same as Ferdinand the Catholic. (See FERDINAND V. of Spain.)

FERDINAND IV. of Naples, and I. of the Two Sicilies, son of Charles III. of Spain, ascended the throne in 1759. In 1768 he married Maria Carolina, daughter of the empress Maria Theresa, and henceforth his queen was the predominating influence in the state. On the breaking out of the French revolution, in 1792, the French demanded that Naples should renounce all connection with Great Britain; but, on the death of Louis XVI. of France, Ferdinand joined the coalition, and participated in the general war against France, from 1793 to 1796. Two years of peace now intervened; when the victory of Nelson, at Aboukir, once more brought Ferdinand into the field against the French, who defeated him, drove him from his kingdom, and proclaimed the Parthenopean Republic, in 1799. In the same year, however, the capital was retaken by the royalist army. In 1806 he lost his dominions again, Napoleon conferring the crown, first on his brother Joseph, and afterwards on Murat; Ferdinand, however, by the aid of the English, continuing to reign in the island of Sicily. In 1814, the congress of Vienna finally established Ferdinand as king of the Two Sicilies. In 1820 a revolutionary movement commenced, under the auspices of a secret society called Carbonari, which proclaimed a constitution similar to that of Spain, and convoked a parliament at Naples. Another revolt broke out at Palermo, which was not suppressed without much bloodshed. This state of things excited the interest of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, who would not acknowledge the new system of government established at Naples; and resulted, in 1821, in an Austrian army crossing the Po, and moving on Naples. The Neapolitans resisted, but were defeated; and the Austrians entered the city. Ferdinand, who had quitted his capital, now returned to it, and the government again became and continued absolute throughout the remainder of his reign.

Born 1751; died 1825.

FERDINAND II., nicknamed "Bomba," king of the Two Sicilies, was grandson of the above, and son of Francis I. and Isabella of Spain. He succeeded his father on the throne of Naples and Sicily in 1830. On his accession, by the introduction of a few liberal measures, the announcement of an amnesty for political offenders, and the promise to heal the wounds of this unhappy country, he was received with quite an ovation of joy and gratitude. These feelings were not destined, however, to last long. No sooner did he feel himself securely fixed in his seat, than he, like his father, placed himself in the hands of the clergy, more especially the Jesuits, to whom he at first allowed the monopoly of instruction; and thus they soon obtained supreme power. This they shared to some extent with the police, the latter seizing on all the highest posts in the government, without, however, being able to hinder conspiracies and risings amongst the people. The whole reign of Bomba is but a long recital of these. Three attempts at insurrection were made in the year 1833; others, more serious, took place in 1837, 1841, 1844, and 1847. The king now instituted a procedure of torture, and put a price on the heads of those who were suspected of designs against his authority; many lost their lives, and numerous families were forced into exile. This rigorous rule served only to exasperate the people, and hasten the events of the revolution of 1848. In that year, when the thrones of Europe seemed trembling in the balance, the rebellion in Sicily, and the popular manifestation at Naples, forced the king to promulgate and swear to a constitution. Public opinion also forced him to send a corps d'armée to the support of the revolution in Lombardy; but, after having succeeded in repressing the revolutionists at Naples, he recalled the troops, and employed them to extinguish the insurrection in Calabria. Emboldened by his success, he treated with contempt the parliament, which had been assembled by virtue of the new constitution, and in the early part of 1849 declared it dissolved. He then turned his attention to his revolutionary subjects in Sicily, and at the same time undertook his unfortunate campaign against the Roman republic. Sicily being now conquered by Filangieri, and Rome occupied by the French, who had driven out the republicans, Ferdinand II.'s tyranny knew no bounds. The picture of his rule, as drawn by Mr. Gladstone, in 1851, in his famous "Letters to Lord Aberdeen," struck no one as an exaggeration. Vexatious and arbitrary proceedings substituted for the law; the civil code mutilated and defaced; education at a stand-still; literature and science humiliated; a rigorous and puerile censorship of the press; relations with other countries rendered difficult, or altogether interdicted; punishments multiplied; the most honourable citizens exiled,—such is the history of the last years of Bomba's reign. The use that he made of his absolute power, seemed to the most absolute of European sovereigns a stigma and disgrace to all government, and grave complaints were made at the congress of Paris, 1856, and even warnings addressed to him by the diplomatists at his court. In vain, however, all this,—he protested against the slightest interference in the internal affairs of his kingdom; and although France and England proceeded, in 1856, to the extremity of jointly recalling their ambassadors, it had no effect in causing a more gentle rule of the Neapolitans on the part of the king.

Born at Palermo, 1810; died at Naples, 1859.

AUSTRIA.

FERDINAND I., emperor of Austria, son of Francis I., by his second marriage with Maria Theresa, of Naples. In 1831 he married Caroline, daughter of the king of Sardinia. He ascended the imperial throne in 1835, and continued to pursue the policy of his father, leaving the chief direction of affairs in the hands of Prince Metternich. In his reign, the republic of Cracow was annihilated, and a portion of it added to the empire. During the revolutionary year of 1848, he dismissed Metternich, and declared that the new minister should be responsible, and caused him to prepare a constitution. The concessions not being sufficient, Vienna revolted in May, the emperor retiring to Innspruck, whence he was induced to return at the pressing solicitations of the Viennese. The city rising again in October, Ferdinand established himself at Olmutz, and on December 2, 1848, abdicated, having no children, in favour of his nephew, Francis Joseph I. He was a weak man, not without a certain kindness of heart, which displayed itself on many occasions.

Born at Vienna, 1793; died at Prague, 1875.

TUSCANY.

FERDINAND III., grand duke of Tuscany, succeeded his father, 1790. He was deprived of his dominions in 1799 by the second coalition against the French republic, but afterwards received as compensation the duchy of Salzburg, in Germany, with the title of elector, which he afterwards exchanged for the grand duchy of Würzburg. The first peace of Paris (1814) restored to him his hereditary dominions.

Born 1769; died 1824.

FERDOUSI, or FERDUSI, fer-doo'-se, a celebrated Persian poet, whom Mahmoud commissioned to write the "Châh Nâmeh," or History of the Persian Kings. The bard was employed thirty years in executing this immense work, which contains no less than 120,000 verses; and he was to receive a thousand pieces of gold for every thousand couplets. Whilst, however, he was giving himself up to the execution of his task, his enemies at court managed to damage him in the estimation of the king, and forced him, by their calumnies, to fly the kingdom. He retired to Bagdad, where his great reputation, which had preceded him there, obtained for him the protection of the caliph. After several years' exile, Ferdousi was recalled to his country, and passed there the remainder of his days. The "Châh Nâmeh" was published in London, in Persian, in 1829, and was afterwards translated into English, in 1831. It has also been translated into French.

Born at Rizvan, near Thous, about 940; died about 1020.

FERE, LA, fair, a fortified town of France, in the department of Aisne, on an island in the Oise, 14 miles N.W. of Laon. It is fortified, and has an arsenal and a school of artillery. Manf. Chemicals and woollen goods. Pop. 4,900.—This town was taken by the Spaniards in 1530, by the allies in 1814, and by the Prussians in 1815.

FERE CHAMPENOISE, LA, shamp'-nwawse, a town of France, in the department Marne, 20 miles S. of Epernay. Pop. 2,800.—In 1814 the French were here defeated by the allies.

FERE EN TARDENOIS, a town of France on the Ourcq, department Aisne, 25 miles

S.W. of Laon. Manf. Cotton and woollen thread, hosiery, and beet sugar. There are the ruins of a strong castle. Pop. 2,300.—The town was taken by the Huguenots in 1567; by the Leaguers in 1589, and the Spaniards in 1652.

FERENTINO, fai-ren-tē'-no, a town of Italy, the ancient Ferentium, 6 miles N.W. of Frosinone. Parts of the ancient massive walls still remain. Pop. 8,300.

FERETRIUS, fe-ré'-tre-us, in mythology a surname of Jupiter, from ferendo, because he had assisted the Romans, or from feriendo, because he had conquered their enemies under Romulus. He had a temple at Rome built by Romulus. It was there that the spoils called opima were always carried.

FERGUS, fer'-gus, a river of Ireland, running through the county of Clare, and, after a course of 27 miles, entering the Shannon by a wide estuary, 10 miles S. of Ennis.

FERGUS I., king of Scotland, was the son of Fergus, king of the Irish Scots, and was invited to Scotland to repel the Picts, and for this was chosen king. He was drowned on his passage to Ireland.

Died 357.

FERGUSON, ADAM, LL.D., fer'-gus-on, Scotch historian and moral philosopher, was the son of the Rev. Adam Ferguson, minister of Logie Rait, Perthshire, and was educated at the Universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. In 1744, he entered the 42nd regiment as chaplain, the duties of which office he discharged till 1757, when he was appointed keeper of the Advocate's Library, Edinburgh. In 1759 he was chosen professor of natural philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and in 1764 professor of moral philosophy. From 1773 to 1775, he travelled on the continent with the earl of Chesterfield, and in 1778 received the appointment of secretary to the commissioners sent to America to endeavour to effect an amicable compromise with the Congress representing the different States. In 1784 he resigned his professorship of moral philosophy in favour of Dugald Stewart. Subsequently he retired to St. Andrews, where he passed the remainder of his days.—His chief works are, "An Essay on the History of Civil Society;" "Institutes of Moral Philosophy;" "Principles of Moral and Political Science;" and the "History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic." This last is a work of great merit.

Born at Logie Rait, 1724; died 1816.

FERGUSON, ROBERT, an English nonconformist, who was ejected, in 1662, from the living of Godmersham, in Kent, and afterwards distinguished himself by his political intrigues. He joined the Duke of Monmouth, whom he is supposed to have betrayed, but was never long attached to any party. He wrote the "Interest of Reason in Religion," 8vo; a "Discourse concerning Justification," &c.

FERGUSON, JAMES, a Scotch philosopher and astronomer, whose father was a day-labourer in a village in Banffshire, and who was enabled to send him to school only for three months at a small village in the north of Scotland. When about nine years of age, he was placed out as a servant to a farmer, who employed him as a shepherd; in which situation he acquired a surprising knowledge of the stars. His abilities being discovered by some neighbouring gentlemen, one of them took him to his house, where he learned decimal arithmetic and the rudiments of algebra and geometry. From a description of the globes in Gordon's grammar, he made, in three weeks, one of these instruments, sufficiently accurate to enable him to work problems. He afterwards made a wooden clock and a watch, which induced the country gentry to employ him in repairing and cleaning their clocks; and, having a taste for drawing, he earned something by designing patterns for ladies' work. He next began to paint portraits with Indian ink, by which he supported himself creditably some years. In 1743 he went to London, where he continued to draw portraits, and published some astronomical tables and calculations. He also gave lectures in experimental philosophy, which he repeated with success throughout the kingdom. In 1754 he published a brief description of the solar system, with an astronomical account of the year of the crucifixion of Christ, 8vo; also an "Idea of the Material Universe, deduced from a Survey of the Solar System." His greatest work, however, is his "Astronomy explained upon Sir Isaac Newton's Principles, and made easy to those who have not studied Mathematics." It first appeared in 1756, 4to, and has frequently been reprinted. On the accession of George III., to whom he had read lectures, Mr. Ferguson obtained a pension of £50 a year. In 1763 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, without paying the admission-fee, or the annual subscriptions; the same year appeared his "Astronomical Tables and Precepts." In 1767 he published "Tables and Tracts relative to several Arts and Sciences," 8vo. Besides these, he published "Select Mechanical Exercises;" the "Young Gentleman and Lady's Astronomy;" an "Easy Introduction to Astronomy;' an "Introduction to Electricity;" the "Art of Drawing in Perspective made easy;" and several tracts and papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

Born near Keith, Banffshire, 1710; died 1776.

FERGUSON, WILLIAM, a Scotch artist, distinguished as a painter of dead game and still life.

Died 1690.

FERGUSSON, ROBERT, a Scotch poet, who was educated at the University of St. Andrews for the ministry; but habits of dissipation disqualified him for that profession, and he obtained a place in the sheriff clerk's office at Edinburgh. He contributed to the pages of Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine, and was greatly admired by Burns, whose own genius was stimulated to poetical composition by the perusal of his effusions. He died at a very early age in the lunatic asylum of Edinburgh, and was buried in the Canongate churchyard. The epitaph on the tomb is by Burns.

Born at Edinburgh, 1751; died 1774.

FERGUSSON, JAMES, a Scotch author and architect, was designed for a mercantile life, but, after passing a couple of years in a counting-house in Holland, and a like period in another in London, he went, in 1829, to India. Here he resided for ten years, during which period, as managing partner in a large firm in Calcutta, he amassed a fortune sufficiently large to enable him to return to England, where he began to devote himself to literary and scientific pursuits. His work entitled "Ancient Topography of Jerusalem," appeared in 1847; but it had been preceded by the "Ancient Architecture of Hindostan." Both were illustrated. These works were considered as exquisite specimens of artistic skill, "enhanced in value by the faithfulness with which every scene and place was recorded.' In 1848 they were succeeded by an "Historical Inquiry into the True Principles of Beauty in Art, more especially with reference to Architecture," work highly extolled at the time of its appearance. In 1851 he produced "The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis restored," which contains many things of general interest, relating to one of the most wonderful discoveries ever made in the history of the world. The Assyrian Court at the Crystal Palace was planned and produced under the superintendence of Mr. Fergusson. In 1851 he illustrated, by a model, a new system of fortification, and subsequently issued "The Peril of Portsmouth; or, French Fleets and English Ports," which was designed to subvert the approved systems of military engineers. A sequel to this work appeared, with notes on Sebastopol, which showed that the subject was well understood by its author. After this, Mr. Fergusson became for a short time general superintendent of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

Born at Ayr, Scotland, 1808.

FERIA, fa-ré'-a, a town of Spain, 35 miles S.E. of Badajos, near the left bank of the Guadajira. There is an old ruinous castle. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, wine and oil. Pop. 2,000.

FERISHTA, fe-rish'-ta, or Mahomet Kasim, Persian historian, who wrote a history of the Mahometan power in Persia, which has been twice translated into English.

Born 1570; died 1626.

FERMANAGH, fer'-ma-na, an inland county of Ireland, in the south-west of the province of Ulster, bounded N. by the counties of Tyrone and Donegal, E. by the former and the county of Monaghan, and S. by the counties of Cavan, Connaught, and Leitrim. It is diversified with hill and dale, presenting wild uplands and beautifully rich vales. A large portion of the surface may be termed mountainous, and it is generally bare of wood.

Rivers.—The principal is the ERNE, with its tributaries the Colebrooke, Woodford and Arney.

Pro.—Oats, wheat, barley, flax, turnips, and potatoes. Agriculture, however, is generally backward, except in the N. The chief occupation of the inhabitants consists in rearing black cattle, and in the manufacturing of linen.

Area.—714 square miles.

Pop. 84,633, of whom nearly two-thirds are Catholics, and the greater part of the remainder Episcopalians.

Chief Towns.—ENNISKILLEN, Lisnaskea, and Lowthers-town.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county and 1 for Enniskillen.

FERMAT, PIERRE DE, fair'-ma, a distinguished French mathematician, poet, and civilian, who wrote poetry in the Latin, French, and Spanish languages. He made many important geometrical discoveries. He was universally respected for his talents, and became a counseller in the parliament of Toulouse. His prose works were collected and published under the title of "Opera Varia Mathematica," in 1670, and also in 1679.

Born at Toulouse, 1599; died 1665.

FERMO, fair'-mo, a town of Italy, on a rock, 4 miles from the Adriatic, and 32 miles S.E. of Ancona. It is fortified, has a cathedral, a small university, and a theatre. In the vicinity are the ruins of the old Roman colony Firmum. There is a trade in corn and wool. Pop. 17,924.

FERMOSELLE, fair-mo-sail'-yai, a frontier town of Spain, 28 miles S.W. of Zamora. Manf. Linen, wine, oil, and brandy. Pop. 3,300.

FERMOY, fer-moi', a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, on the right bank of the Blackwater, which is crossed by a bridge of thirteen arches, 19 miles N.E. of Cork. Fermoy was an insignificant village, but in 1791, on the introduction of stage coaches, it rose in importance, and a new town was projected, which has advanced rapidly. It has now barracks with accommodation for 3,000 men, court-house, bridewell, hospital, a handsome church, and a large Roman Catholic establishment, including a church, two convents, a college, and episcopal residence. Its trade principally consists of rural produce. Pop. 6,454.—A station on the Great Southern and Western of Ireland railway.

FERN ISLANDS. (See FARN ISLANDS.)

FERNAN, NUNEZ, a town of Spain, 11 miles S. of Cordova. It is well built, with wide streets and good public buildings. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, earthenware, tiles, wine, oil, and soap. Pop. 5,600.

FERNANDEZ, JUAN, fair-nan'-daiz, a Spanish navigator, who, in 1572, discovered the island which bears his name. (See JUAN FERNANDEZ.)

FERNANDEZ, NAVARETTE, surnamed El Mudo, or the Dumb, was one of the most distinguished of the pupils of Titian, and became painter to Philip II. of Spain, who employed him mostly in adorning the Escurial. His principal works are a "Martyrdom of St. James," a "Nativity of Christ," "St. Jerome in the Desert," and "Abraham with the Three Angels." This last is esteemed his greatest work. He painted with great ease, and, on account of his colouring, was named the Spanish Titian.

Born at Logrono, on the Ebre, 1526; died at Segovia, 1579.

FERNANDEZ. (See JUAN FERNANDEZ.)

FERNANDO DE APURE, fair-nan'-do dai a'-poo-rai', a town of Venezuela, South America, on the right bank of the Apure, near its junction with the Portuguesa. There is a large trade in the produce of the vast herds of cattle which pasture on the adjacent plains. Pop. 6,000.

FERNANDO DE NORONHA, dai no-ronh'-a, the largest island of a group in the South Atlantic Ocean, belonging to the empire of Brazil. It is 8 miles long, by about 2 broad, mountainous, rugged, and covered with wood. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 3° 50′ S. Lon. 32° 28′ W.—No females are permitted to land on this island, which has long served as a place of banishment from Brazil.

FERNANDO PO, fer-nan'-do po, an island in the Bight of Biafra, on the W. coast of Africa. It is 45 miles long, with an average breadth of 15. Mountainous in the interior, and presenting a rich and varied aspect of beauty and fertility. A large portion of its surface is covered with dense forests of valuable timber, whilst the land gradually rises from the steep and rocky coasts, into two peaks, attaining an elevation of upwards of 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. The streams and brooks are numerous and clear, and the sugar-cane grows wild in abundance. Yams are also abundant, and furnish the natives with a principal article of food. The animals are monkeys, squirrels, antelopes, a kind of porcupine, land crabs, and snakes, the latter in great numbers and very large. Birds are numerous and of beautiful plumage, and fish, at some seasons, are plentiful. The climate, however, is unhealthy. Inhabited by a race of negroes superior to those of the Continent. Pop. 36,000, officially returned. Lat. between 3° 10′ and 3° 44′ N. Lon. between 8° 22′ and 8° 54′ E.—This island was discovered in 1471, by the Portuguese, who, in 1778 ceded it to Spain. The English made an unsuccessful attempt to form a settlement there in 1827.

FERNANDO, SAN. (See SAN FERNANDO.)

FERNEL, JOHN FRANCIS, fair'-nel, physician to Henry II. of France, published a number of works on medical subjects, which have been frequently reprinted.

Born at Mont Didier, in Picardy, 1506; died 1558.

FERNEY, or FERNEX, fair'-ne, a village of France, on the frontier of Switzerland, at the foot of the Jura Mountains, 5 miles from Geneva. Pop. 1,500.—Here Voltaire took up his residence in 1759, and established a manufactory of watches. He lived at this place till near the close of his career, and the house in which he resided still exists.

FEROE ISLANDS. (See FARO ISLANDS.)

FERONIA, fe-ro'-ne-a, a goddess of the Roman mythology, who presided over the woods and groves. It was usual to make a yearly sacrifice to her, and it is said that those who were filled with the spirit of this goddess, could walk barefooted over burning coals without receiving any injury.

FEROZABAD, fe-ro-za-bad', a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, 24 miles E. of Agra. Pop. about 12,000.

FEROZABAD, a town of Persia, province of Fars, 64 miles S. of Shiraz. There are a large temple and other remains of antiquity, and the town is surrounded by ancient walls.

FEROZEPOOR, or FEROZEPORE, fe-ro-ze-poor', a town of British India, on the left bank of the Sutlej, 66 miles W. of Loodiana. There are a strong castle and good bazaars. Pop 39,570; of district of same name, 650,519.

FEROZEPOOR, a town of British India, North-West Provinces, 5 miles S.W. of Delhi. Pop. 8,000.

FEROZESHAH, fe-ro'-za'-shah, a village near the left bank of the Sutlej, British India, 10 miles S.E. of Ferozepoor. The place is only memorable as the scene of a great victory by the British under Sir Hugh Gough, in the Sikh war of 1845.

FERRANDINA, fair-ran-de'-na, a town in the S. of Italy, in the province of Basilicata, on the right bank of the Basento, 35 miles S.E. of Potenza. Pop. 6,000.

FERRARA, fair-rar'-a, a province of Italy, S. of the Po. It consists chiefly of swamps and lakes; but there is good pasturage in some districts. Area, 1,180 square miles. Pop. 237,083.

FERRARA, a city of Italy, chief town of the above province, situate in a marshy plain near a branch of the Po, 28 miles N.E. of Bologna. The streets are long, wide, and straight; the principal square is the Piazza Nuova. The town is strongly fortified, and the old castle of the dukes of Este (occupied by the Papal legates when the town was included in the States of the Church) is also fortified and surrounded by a ditch. The churches and convents are very numerous. The most remarkable are the churches of Santa Maria degl' Angeli and of San Benedetto, in each of which there are paintings of great value, and many interesting monuments; the cathedral is an ancient fabric in the form of a Greek cross; and there are several academies, museums, and a university originally founded in the 13th century, and reopened in 1824, after a suspension of 30 years. It has a great reputation as a school of medicine and jurisprudence. The library is rich in rare books and manuscripts. Here Ariosto lies buried in a Benedictine convent, and Tasso was confined as an idiot in the hospital of St. Anna. Pop. 74,015.

History.—Ferrara was, under the line of Este, the capital of a sovereign duchy, with a population estimated at 100,000. It afforded an asylum to Calvin, Marot, and other reformers. Founded in the 5th century by the inhabitants of Aquileia, which had just been destroyed by the Huns, it was at first a place of little importance. After having been subject to the emperors of the West, the Heruli and the Ostrogoths, and to the Byzantine emperors, it fell, in the 8th century, into the hands of the Lombards, and was subsequently included in the gift which Pepin made to Pope Stephen II. Under the papal rule, Ferrara became a seignory of the Church, and comprised within itself nearly the extent of the whole Legation. After passing through various hands, it came, in 1208, into the possession of the house of Este, the princes of which made it their residence, and the capital of their states. From that period the importance of the place may be dated, and it soon became one of the principal seats of learning in Italy, and famous for a school of painters. In literature, Ferrara is connected with the names of Tasso, Ariosto, and Guarini. Re-established in their states in 1317, by the pope, the Venetians for a time having seized them, the lords of Ferrara acknowledged themselves vassals of the Vatican. In 1471 the lordship of Ferrara was erected into a duchy, and after that time till 1597 it remained, with a few interruptions, in spite of the efforts of Pope Julian II., in the possession of the Este family. The ducal line now being extinct, Clement VIII., as suzerain, took possession. In 1796 the French entered the place, and made it the capital of a department. In 1814 the Church again recovered it, but in 1860 it became a part of the new kingdom of Italy.

FERRARI, GAUDENZIO, Italian painter. He studied under Andrea Scotto and Perugino, and was a friend of Raffaelle. He produced a large number of works in fresco and oil, distinguished by vigorous drawing and admirable colouring.

Born at Valdugia, 1484; died 1549.

FERRAZANO, fair-ratz-a'-no, a town of Italy, 2 miles S.E. of Campobasso. Iron and sulphur mines are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

FERREIRA, ANTONIO, fair'-rai-eer-a, a Portuguese poet, who was educated at Coimbra, and held the office of judge at Lisbon. He wrote, with considerable success, elegies, odes, comedy, tragedy, and also epics. His best piece is "Inez de Castro," one of the first complete tragedies of modern times. His works were collected at Lisbon, 1598, and his comedies were reprinted in 1621. He was, in his time, the chief of the classical school, and seems to have deserved his title of the Portuguese "Horace."

Born at Lisbon, 1528; died 1569.

FERRERAS, DON JOHN DE, fair-rair'-as, a learned Spanish divine, who was a member of the Spanish Academy at its commencement, and contributed largely to the dictionary produced by that body. He also wrote a "History of Spain," and other works, highly esteemed for their minuteness and accuracy. As an historian of Spain, this writer is much more to be depended on than Mariana, whose pages, however, are more elegant and fascinating.

Born at Labaneza, 1652; died 1735.

FERRET COL, fer'-rai, a pass over the Pennine Alps, between Orsières, in Switzerland, and Cormayeur, in Piedmont, commanding most magnificent views. It is 7,640 feet above the level of the sea.

FERRIER, SUSAN EDMONSTON, fer'-ri-er, was the daughter of a writer to the signet in Edinburgh, who held an appointment in the Court of Session as the colleague of Sir Walter Scott. Her early introduction to the best literary society of Edinburgh gave a bias to her tastes, and she became the authoress of three excellent novels, entitled the "Marriage," the "Inheritance," and "Destiny, or the Chief's Daughter." At the conclusion of the "Legend of Montrose," Sir Walter Scott thus compliments the abilities of this lady:—"I retire from the field, conscious that there remains behind, not only a large harvest, but labourers capable of gathering it in. More than one writer has already displayed talents of this description; and if the present author, himself a phantom, may be permitted to distinguish a brother, or, perhaps, a sister shadow, he would mention, in particular, the author of the very lively work entitled 'Marriage.'" —Miss Ferrier was a frequent guest at Abbotsford, and helped to cheer the melancholy hours which clouded the last moments of the life of the great novelist.

Born in Edinburgh, 1782; died 1854.

FERRIER, JAMES FREDERICK, philosophical writer, was a nephew of the above. He studied at Oxford, and was admitted to the Scotch bar in 1833. In 1842 he was elected professor of history in the university of Edinburgh, and in 1845 became professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews. He married the daughter of Professor Nelson. He is best known by his "Institutes of Metaphysics."

Born at Edinburgh, 1808; died at St. Andrews, 1864.

FERRIERE, fer-re-air', the name of several vilages and parishes in France, none of them with a population above 3,500.

FERRINTOSH, fer-rin'-tosh, a village and barony of Scotland, formerly in Ross-shire, but now forming a part of Nairnshire. It was formerly famous for its whiskey, manufactured free of duty; a privilege withdrawn from it by the government in 1785.

FERRO, or HIERRO, fair'-ro, the most westerly and smallest of the Canary Islands. The inhabitants raise corn, sugar, fruits, and legumes, and feed a great number of cattle. Area, 82 square miles. Pop. 4,500. Lat. of W. extremity, 27° 42' N. Lon. 18° 9' W.—The western extremity of Ferro was heretofore, by common consent, accounted the place of the first meridian; but national partialities induced the moderns generally to adopt the capital of their own particular countries as the place from which to reckon the longitude.

FERROL, fair'-role, an important and strongly fortified seaport on the north-west coast of Spain, at the influx of the river Juvia into the extensive inlet called the Bay of Corunna, 4 miles N.E. of Corunna. The town is of comparatively recent erection. It was only in 1752 that it was determined to establish here dock-yards, arsenals, and manufactories. The town is divided into the Old and New Towns and Esteiro. The New town is also known as Centro. The harbour, for depth, capacity, and safety, is not equalled by many in Europe, and is entered by a strait, and defended by the castles San Felipe and Palma. The basin in which the ships are laid up is of great extent and solid workmanship. The marine barracks is a vast and beautiful building, affording accommodation for 6,000 men. The arsenal is the finest in Spain. The establishments are all naval, and there is an academy for the Guardas Marinas, a mathematical school for marine artillerists, and a nautical as well as a pilot school. Manf. Hats, leather, paper, hardware, and naval stores. There is a trade in brandy, vinegar, fish, and corn. Pop. 23,848. Lat. 43° 29' 30" N. Lon. 8° 13' W.

FERRY PORT ON CRAIG, a village and seaport of Scotland, at the mouth of the river Tay, 11 miles N.E. of Cupar. There are extensive works in connexion with the North British railway, to facilitate the embarking and disembarking of trains on their way to Broughton Ferry, on the opposite side of the river. Pop. 2,300, mostly engaged in the manufacture of linen and the salmon-fishery.

FERTE BERNARD, LA, fair'-tai bair'-nar, a town of France, in the department Sarthe, on the Huine, 25 miles N.W. of Le Mans. There are an old Gothic church, and a town-house, once a fortress. Pop. 2,500. Manf. Linen fabrics and cotton yarns.

FERTE, SOUS JOUARRE, LA, a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, 37 miles N.E. of Paris. There are the remains of an old castle and of a fine château. Manf. Linen, paper, leather, ultramarine, and pottery. A very large number of millstones are exported. Pop. 4,400.

FERTE, GAUCHE, LA, a French town, department Seine-et-Marne, 45 miles N.E. of Paris. Manf. Serge, leather, paper, and tiles. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

FERTE, MILON, LA, a French town, department Aisne, on the Ourcq. It is fortified, and there are the ruins of a strong castle. Bleaching is carried on. Pop 2,000.

FERTE, MACE, a town of France, department Orne. Manf. Cotton goods, tape, lamp-cottons, combs, snuff-boxes, leather, and tiles. Pop. 7,300.

FERTE, ST. AUBIN, LA, a French town, department Loiret, on the left bank of the Cosson, 14 miles S.E. of Orleans. There is a castle, some parts of which are ancient. Pop. 2,500.

FESA, fai'-sa, a town of Persia, in the province of Fars, 80 miles S.E. of Shiraz. Manf. Silken, cotton, and woollen fabrics; with a trade in tobacco. Pop. 18,000.

FESCENNIA, fes-sen'-e-a, a town of Etruria, where the Fescennine verses were first invented. These verses were a sort of rustic dialogue spoken extempore, in which the actors exposed, before their audience, the failings and vices of their adversaries, and, by a satirical humour and merriment, endeavoured to raise laughter and ridicule. They were proscribed by Augustus as of immoral tendency.

FESCH, JOSEPH CARDINAL, fesk, a distinguished Corsican, and the half-brother of Letitia Ramolini, the mother of Napoleon I. After suffering considerable privations in the revolutionary period of France, he suddenly found his fortunes changed by the elevation of his nephew to the command of the Army of Italy. He became one of its commissioners, or factors; but, in 1802, was appointed archbishop of Lyons. In the following year, he was sent ambassador to the Holy See; and, from the court which he paid to the pope, he received a cardinal's hat, and the consent of that dignitary to visit Paris to crown Napoleon. After the coronation, he, in 1805, became grand aumonier, and received the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour. In 1809 he rejected the archbishopric of Paris, on account of the severity with which the pope was treated by the emperor; and, in 1810, actually openly rebuked Napoleon before the council of Paris. For this he was driven into exile, and took refuge in Rome, where he passed the remainder of his days.

Born at Ajaccio, 1763; died at Rome, 1839.

FESSLER, IGNAZ AURELIUS, fas'-ler, Hungarian historian. He held appointments at various times under the emperor Joseph II., the king of Prussia, and the emperor of Russia and was professor of Oriental languages at several universities. He was a writer of remarkable powers, and produced lives of Attila and Mathias Corvinus, a history of Hungary, and an Autobiography extending over 70 years.

Born 1756; died at St. Petersburg, 1839.

FESTENBERG, or TWARDAGORA, fes'-ten-berg, a town of Prussia, 25 miles N.E. of Breslau. Manf. Cloth, worsted, and tobacco. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

FESTUS, PORCIUS, fes'-tus, a pro-consul and governor of Judæa, before whom St. Paul was accused by the Jews; but, the apostle appealing to the emperor, Festus sent him to Rome.

FESTUS, SEXTUS POMPEIUS, Latin grammarian, whose age is not accurately ascertained; but he is believed to have lived in the 3rd century. He compiled an epitome of the great work of Verrius Flaccus, on the signification of words, and is classed by Scaliger amongst the best or most useful etymologists for understanding the language of ancient Rome.

FETHARD, fe'-thard, a market-town of Tipperary, Ireland, 9 miles E. of Clonmel. It was formerly a place of considerable importance, and parts of the old wall are still standing. Four cattle fairs are held. Pop. 2,200.

FETLAR. (See SHETLANDS.)

FEUERBACH, PAUL JOHANN ANSELM RITTER VON, foir'-bak, an eminent German writer on criminal law, who became successively professor at the universities of Giessen, Jena, Kiel, and Landshut. Although he wrote a number of able papers on criminal jurisprudence, his fame did not become established till he produced his "Review of the Fundamental Principles and Ideas of Penal Law." This work, in conjunction with another which appeared shortly afterwards, exercised a great influence on German criminal legislation, and placed Feuerbach in an eminent position in the eyes of his countrymen. In 1808 he became a privy councillor in Bavaria; in 1817 second president of the court of appeal at Bamberg; and in 1821 first president of appeal at Anspach. To these offices his sphere of action was entirely confined throughout the rest of his life.

Born at Jena, 1775; died 1833.

FEUERBACH, LUDWIG ANDREAS, German philosophical writer, fourth son of the preceding. He studied theology at Heidelberg, and philosophy at Berlin, under Hegel. Having previously published some treatises on the history of philosophy, he produced, in 1841, his famous work on "The Nature of Christianity," the teaching of which is of an atheistic character. It has been translated into English by Miss Evans. (See EVANS.)

Born at Anspach, 1804; died 1872.

FEURS, feoor, an old town of France, department Loire, near the right bank of the river of that name. There is an acidulated mineral spring in the vicinity. Pop. 2,800.

FEVEDA, fai-vai'-da, an island of British Columbia, N. America, in the Gulf of Georgia, Oregon territory, between Vancouver's Island and the mainland, 32 miles long, with an average breadth of 2. There is a small but good harbour. Lat. 49° 41′ N. Lon. 124° W.

FEVERSHAM. (See FAVERSHAM.)

FEVRE, TANNEGUI LE, or Tanaquil Faber, faivr, a learned critic, pensioned by Richelieu, at 2,000 livres, to inspect the books printed at the Louvre; but on the death of the cardinal his salary was stopped. He then removed to Saumur, where he embraced the reformed religion, and obtained the classical professorship. He was the father of the celebrated Madame Dacier, and published several comments on Greek and Latin authors; two volumes of Letters; "Lives of the Greek Poets," in French; "Greek and Latin Poems;" a "Method of Education."

Born at Caen, 1615; died 1672.

FEZ, fez, a city of Morocco, Africa, and capital of a province of the same name, situate about 85 miles S. of the Mediterranean. It is situate in the hollow part of a valley, and the gardens, orchards, and orange-groves seen around it, form a most delightful amphitheatre. On a height above the rest of the city, and separated from it by a branch of the Seba river, stands New Fez, founded in the 13th century, and forming a well-built town, surrounded by beautiful gardens, and, by its situation, commanding the old. It is chiefly inhabited by Jews. The finest edifice is the mosque El Caroubin, built during the most flourishing period of Fez, with 300 pillars, and numerous fountains. It has also a tower containing globes and astronomical instruments. There are altogether about 100 mosques. The city contains nearly 200 caravanserais, or inns, called fondaques, which are tolerably convenient. They are two or three stories high, with galleries towards the court, which is always in the centre, and by which light is admitted into the apartments. The principal houses have cisterns under them; they have also flat and terraced roofs, elegantly constructed, on which carpets are spread for their inhabitants to enjoy the coolness of evening. All the magnificence is in the interior. The hospitals, once numerous, have now in a great measure fallen to decay. The shops make no handsome appearance, and should rather be called stalls; there being just room for a sedentary Moor, who never stirs, but has his baskets heaped around him. The markets are much crowded, being the resort of all the wandering Arabs, who here purchase their foreign and manufactured articles.

Manf.—Morocco leather, carpets, silk, woollens, jewellery, earthenware, and saddlery.
Pop.—About 50,000.
Lat. 34° 6′ N. Lon. 5° W.
History.—Fez was founded in the early part of the 9th century by a Mahometan prince, Muley Esdras, and soon became a magnificent city, resorted to as a "holy place." The mosque of Muley is still a sanctuary for criminals. In the 16th century the royal residence was transferred to Morocco, and Fez fell into decay. The small red cap, so generally worn by Mahometans, known as a "fez," takes its name from this place, where it was first manufactured.

FEZZAN, or FESSAN, fez-zan', a territory of North Africa, situate to the south of Barbary, and bounded on the N. by Tripoli, and on all its other sides by the Sahara, or Great Desert. It consists of an extensive valley, bounded by an irregular circuit of mountains on all sides except the west, where it opens into the desert. One of the ranges of these mountains is called the Black Mountains, and is composed of basalt, nearly black, and of a shining or polished appearance. There are no rivers properly so called; water, however, is plentifully found at a depth of from 10 to 12 feet. There are a few small lakes, which are sometimes covered with a thin crust of carbonate of soda. The capital is MURZUK.

Zoology.—The most common wild animals are the lion, leopard, hyæna, jackal, wild cat, antelope, and a beautiful species of deer, of a white colour, streaked with different hues of brownish red. The domestic animals are goats, horned cattle, horses, and camels.

Climate.—The heat of summer is very great, and the south wind, intensely dry, and impregnated with fiery particles, is scarcely supportable, even by the natives. The winter, on the other hand, is cold; which is painfully felt, even by the natives of a northern climate.

Pro.—Wheat is raised; but maize and barley are the grain on which the country chiefly depends for subsistence. Dates are abundantly produced, and form a large portion of the food of the inhabitants; figs, pomegranates, and legumes are also abundant.

Manf.—None, and shoemakers and smiths are the only artisans.

History.—For many centuries the Fezzan was governed by its own princes, who afterwards became tributary to the pashas of Tripoli. In 1842, the district was conquered by the Turks, and it was made a Turkish pashalic. Fezzan derives its chief importance from the favourable situation, which renders it a grand depot for the immense interior commerce which is carried on between Northern and Central Africa. The communication of Egypt and of Barbary with the vast countries situated to the east and south of the Niger, centres almost entirely in Mourzook. Of the caravans to the south, the principal is that to Bornou, with which Fezzan maintains a regular and extensive communication. A great part of the caravan trade, however, has been lost; and, in consequence, the country has grown poor, and the inhabitants but few in number. The goods sent thence southward consist of various European articles, fire-arms, powder, sabres, knives, glass, paper, beads, imitations of coral, and toys of a great variety of kinds; also tobacco and snuff.

Pop.—Variously estimated; probably about 100,000.

Lat. Between 24° and 31° N. Lon. between 12° and 18° E.

FICHTE, JOHANN GOTTLIEB, feesht-e(r), a German philosopher, who studied at Jena, and in 1793, after several years of private tuition and struggles, became professor of philosophy at that university, and thence promulgated his system, known as the "Doctrine of Science." Shortly afterwards, a suspicion of irreligious tendencies fell upon him, when he retired to Prussia, and, after living some time in Berlin, received the appointment in 1805 of professor of philosophy at Erlangen. Here he continued for some time highly esteemed, but in 1814 he visited Berlin, where, in the military hospital of that city, his wife caught a fever, and communicated it to him. She recovered, but he died. The writings of Fichte have exercised a powerful influence on the course of modern philosophical thought, and his principal works have been translated into English.

Born in Upper Lusatia, 1762.

FICHTE, IMMANUEL HERMANN, philosophical writer, son of the preceding. In 1836 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Bonn, and, in 1842, at Tübingen. He was the author of numerous treatises.

Born 1797; died 1876.

FICHTELBERG, or FICHTELBERGE, feesht-tel-berg, a mountain range of Bavaria, stretching for about 50 miles between Baireuth and Asch, on the frontier of Bohemia, and attaining, in the Ochsenkopf, an elevation of 3,397 feet.

FICINO, MARSILIO, fi-see-no, a learned Italian, whose father was physician to Cosmo de Medici, by whom Marsilius was greatly esteemed, on account of his attachment to the doctrines of Plato. Under the patronage of Cosmo he made rapid progress in all kinds of learning, and was chosen first president of an academy founded by him at Florence. After this, he published a complete version of Plato's works in the Latin language, and translated Plotinus, Iamblichus, Proclus, and other Platonists. Lorenzo the Magnificent was also a liberal patron of Ficinus, and thus Platonism revived with great splendour in Italy. At the age of forty-two he entered into orders, and obtained some considerable preferment through the means of the high patronage with which he had been honoured. There is a monument to his memory in the cathedral of Florence.

Born at Florence, 1433; died 1499.

FICULLE, fe-sool'-lai, a town of Italy, 2½ S.W. of Perugia. Pop. 2,500.

FIDES, fi'-dees, in mythology, the goddess of faith and honesty, worshipped by the Romans. Numa was the first who paid her divine honours.

FIDIUS DIUS, fid'-e-us di'-us, a divinity by whom the Romans generally swore.

FIELD, NATHANIEL, feeld, a dramatic author, who is supposed to have been a member of Shakespeare's company, and to have been one of the players of the Globe and Blackfriars theatres. He wrote "A Woman's a Weathercock," "Amends for Ladies," and, in conjunction with Massinger, "The Fatal Dowry."

FIELDING, HENRY, feel'-ding, a celebrated English author, perhaps the most eminent of English annalists, son of lieutenant-general Fielding, and great-grandson of William, third earl of Denbigh. After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, he went to Eton, whence he was sent to Leyden, where, for two years, he devoted himself to the investigation of civil law, and then returned to England. The narrowness of his father's circumstances, and the largeness of his family, prevented him from providing in a suitable manner for his son, who, in his twenty-first year, went to London, and began writing for the stage. His first piece was entitled "Love in several Masques," and met with a favourable reception; as did his next performance, called "The Temple Beau." Some of his future dramatic efforts, however, were not so successful, and he had the courage to prefix to one of them, "As it was damned at the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane." A long list of his plays are now, by the generality of readers, entirely unknown. In 1734 he was fortunate enough to marry Miss Charlotte Cradock, a lady of some wealth, and, by the death of his mother, came into the possession of £200 a year. His extravagances, however, were such, that, at the age of thirty, he had reduced himself to his former condition; on which he entered the Temple, and studied the law with considerable ardour, still exercising his pen for immediate support, as assistant editor of a periodical paper called "The Champion," and by occasional contributions of a poetical kind. About this time he produced the "History of Jonathan Wild," a notorious character, whose story Fielding wrought up into an entertaining romance. This has been pronounced, perhaps, the most ingeniously-arranged description of a tissue of blackguardisms which has ever been given to the world. In 1742 appeared his "Joseph Andrews," a novel full of humour and admirable delineations of human nature, intended originally as a humorous sequel to "Pamela," but which attained a great and enduring popularity by its own merits. It is in this novel that the famous "Parson Adams" appears. During the rebellion of 1745 he published some patriotic pieces, for which he was made a Middlesex justice, in which situation he gained considerable reputation, by his "Inquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robberies," and his "Proposal for the Maintenance of the Poor." In 1749 he published his principal work, the novel of "Tom Jones," which exhibits a great knowledge of life, and is equally rich in comic delineation and pathetic expression. His "Amelia" followed in 1751, and is more correct in sentiment, though deficient in humour and variety. For this novel he received £1,000. A complication of complaints had now produced a dropsy, and after undergoing the operation of tapping, he went with his family to Lisbon, where he ended his days.

Born at Sharpham, Somersetshire, 1707; died at Lisbon, 1754.

FIELDING, SARAH, was the third sister of the above novelist, and accounted a woman of considerable learning. She wrote the novels of "David Simple" and "The Cry;" and translated Xenophon's "Memoirs of Socrates" into English; "The Lives of Cleopatra and Octavia;" "The History of the Countess of Delwin;" "The History of Ophelia;" and several other works. She lived and died unmarried at Bath.

Born 1714; died 1768.

FIELDING, SIR JOHN, the half-brother of Henry, the novelist, and his successor as a justice for Middlesex, was blind from his childhood, yet discharged his office with great credit, and in 1761 received the honour of knighthood. He laboured to reform the vicious, and published some tracts on police; a "Charge to the Grand Jury of Westminster," &c.

Died 1780.

FIELDING, COPLEY VANDYKE, an English painter, belonging to a family of artists, and first exhibited his pictures in 1810, at the Artists' Exhibition in Spring Gardens. He early became a teacher of his art, and from his great success in this vocation, secured a wide circle of friends and patrons. It is as a water-colour painter that he is best known and most admired. For many years he held the office of president of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours.

Born 1787; died at Worthing, Sussex, 1855.

FIENNES, WILLIAM, Lord Say and Sele, fé-en, was educated at New College, Oxford, and in 1624 was made a viscount. In the Rebellion he sided with the parliament, and became "very active" with Hampden and Pym, for which he was declared an outlaw by the king, after whose execution he retired to the Isle of Lundy, on the coast of Devon, where he continued till Cromwell's death. At the Restoration he was made privy seal and chamberlain of the household. His lordship wrote some pamphlets against the Quakers. Clarendon pronounces him "a man of close and reserved nature, of great parts, and the highest ambition."

Born in Oxfordshire, 1582; died 1662.

FIENNES, NATHANIEL, second son of lord Say and Sele, was also educated at New College, Oxford, after which he went to Geneva. On his return he was intrusted with the government of Bristol, but surrendered it to Prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to death by a council of war. His father's interest, however, saved his life. Cromwell, with whom he was in great favour, made him one of his lords. He was a distinguished leader of the independent party, and printed some speeches and pamphlets. Lord Clarendon says of this person, "If he had not encumbered himself with command in the army, to which men thought his nature not so well disposed, he had been second to none in those councils after Mr. Hampden's death."

Born 1608; died 1669.

FIESCHI, or FIESCO, GIOVANNI LUIGI, fe-ais'-ke, a noble Genoese, who, out of hatred to Andrew John Doria, and his nephew Gianettino, formed, in 1547, a conspiracy, with the assistance of France and Pope Paul, to revolutionise Genoa. The plot was so far successful that the Doge had fled, his nephew was killed, and the fleet was captured; but in the darkness of the night Fieschi, while endeavouring to step from one galley to another, fell into the sea and was drowned. The conspirators, disheartened, gave up the enterprise, and the family of Fieschi was proscribed.

Born 1523; died 1547.

FIESCHI, JOSEPH MARCO, a Corsican, and the author of one of the most terrible conspiracies of which history has preserved the remembrance In 1835, whilst Louis Philippe was king of the French, he made an attempt to destroy that sovereign and the princes of the royal family. Preparing an "infernal machine," in a house on the boulevard du Temple, he, on the 28th of July, on the occasion of a grand review, discharged it as the king and staff were passing his windows. Eighteen persons lost their lives, among whom was Marshal Mortier, duke de Treviso; twenty-two others were severely wounded, the king escaping only by a miracle. The assassin was taken and condemned to death, with Pépin and Morez, his accomplices. This man had formerly been a shepherd, then a soldier, and had been, prior to this, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for robbery.

Born in Corsica, 1790; died 1836.

FIESOLE, fe-ai'-so-lai, a town of Italy, situate on a steep hill, 3 miles from Florence. The very old church of St. Alexander is supposed to have once been a pagan temple. In its neighbourhood are excellent freestone quarries. Pop. 2,500. Under the name of Fæsulæ, it was one of the twelve Etruscan cities, and submitted, with the rest of Etruria, to the Roman power, and was colonised by Scylla. About the beginning of the 11th century, it was destroyed by the Florentines, and many of its inhabitants transported to the city of Florence. The old wall, composed of immense blocks of stone, remains.

FIESOLE, FRA GIOVANNI DA. (See ANGELICO.)

FIF, or FUF, fif, a town of Arabia, capital of the district of El Aksa. It is protected by a lofty earthen wall. Pop. 15,000.

FIFENESS, fife'-ness, a cape of Scotland, on the E. coast of the county of Fife. It projects into the North Sea, in lat. 56° 17′ N., and lon. 2° 36′ W. Beyond it are the Carr Rocks, a dangerous ridge, extending for some distance into the sea, and on which an iron beacon has been erected.

FIFESHIRE, fife'-sheer, a maritime county of the east of Scotland, bounded N. by the river Tay and counties Perth and Kinross, E. by the German Ocean, S. by the Firth of Forth, and W. by an isolated portion of Perth and Clackmannan. It has 85 miles of coast line, is diversified by hill and dale, having the Lomonds (1713), and Largo Law (1020 feet) for the highest summits.

Rivers.—The Tay, Forth, Eden, and the Leven.

Pro.—The usual cerealia, and the "Howe of Fife" is especially productive. Large numbers of cattle are reared, and they are of a superior breed.

Minerals.—Copper and iron ore have been found, and the sulphuretted ore of zinc. Coal is also extremely abundant, and lime, which is sometimes of sufficient hardness to admit of a fine polish. Carnelians and agates, and other kinds of stones, have also been discovered.

Manf.—Linen, floorcloth, and malt liquors, and the coal and limeworks and fisheries employ large numbers of the inhabitants.

Area.—563 square miles.

Pop.—171,960.

Chief Towns.—CUPAR, the county town; Dunfermline, St. Andrews, Kirkcaldy, East and West Anstruther, Burntisland, Crail, and Dysart.

Parliamentary Representation. — One member is returned for the county.

FIGLINE, or FIGHINE, fee'-le-ne, a town of northern Italy, 17 miles S.E. of Florence, near the left bank of the Arno. There is a fine church on one side of a large and elegant square. Manf. Silk, considered to be the best in Tuscany. Pop. 9,000.

FIGEAC, feezh'-ak, a town of France, in the department of Lot, on the right bank of the Sellé, 32 miles N.E. of Cahors. It is situate in a deep valley, encompassed by beautiful heights, clothed with the vine. There are two beautiful Gothic churches. The town owes its origin to a Benedictine abbey founded by Pepin in 755. Manf. Linen and cotton goods; there are also dye-works and tanneries. Pop. 5,300.

FIGUEIRA, fe-gai-eer'-a, a town of Portugal, in the province of Douro, at the mouth of the Mondego, 24 miles S.W. of Coimbra. It is a favourite bathing-place, and has an active trade in wine, oil, fruits, and salt. There is a safe harbour, defended by a fort. Pop. 5,000.

FIGUERAS, fe-gair'-ass, a town of Spain, in the province of Gerona, near the French frontier. On an eminence, in the vicinity, is the strong and magnificent castle of San Fernando, with accommodation for 20,000 men. It has also a large and ancient parish church, several convents, a college, various schools, hospitals, a prison, a theatre, and a cavalry barracks. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, leather, soap, corks, brandy, oil, and wine. Pop. 11,739.

FIJI, or FEEJEE, or VITI, fee'-jee, an archipelago in the Southern Pacific Ocean, since 1874 a colony of Great Britain. The islands of the group number altogether about 255, of which about 80 are inhabited, and only two are of considerable size. Of the remainder many are mere rocky islets. The largest is Viti-levu, or Big Viti, which is estimated to have an area of 4,112 square miles; and the next in point of size, Vanua-levu, 2,432 square miles. The other principal islands are Tavinni, (218 square miles), Kadavu (124 square miles), Agau, Ovalau, Rabi, Moala, Gamia, Loma Loma, and Vatu Lele. The islands are of volcanic origin, have hot springs, are subject to earthquakes, and are in some parts difficult of access from the presence of coral reefs. The surface is hilly, rising to 3,000 and 4,000 feet in some parts, and very productive. In some parts there are thick forests, and in other parts long stretches of grassy country. The only important river is the Kaileou, in the island of Vanua-levu, which is navigable 60 miles from its mouth. The rivers are subject to heavy floods, which carry down mud and gravel, which are deposited at their mouths, forming low swampy banks. The villages are generally fortified with palisades; and the people enclose and cultivate land. The capital is Suva, on the south coast of Viti-levu.

Pro.—The vegetation is tropical. Cocoanut palms, very fine yams, bananas, bread fruit, oranges, shaddocks, and pine-apples are indigenous products; and within the last few years white settlers have successfully introduced the cultivation of coffee, sugar, tobacco, and especially cotton.

Minerals.—The mineral resources of the islands have not been fully investigated, but copper and antimony are known to exist.

Climate.—Tropical, the hot moist season extending from November to April, and the cool dry season from May to October. The trade winds, and the exposure of the islands to refreshing sea breezes, make the climate healthy, and adapted to Europeans.

Area of the entire group, 8,030 square miles.

Pop.—128,415, of whom about 70,000 are in Viti-levu and 35,000 in Vanua-levu. There are about 3,000 white settlers, chiefly from New South Wales, Queensland, and other British colonies. The natives are tall and muscular, with dark complexions and woolly hair, and about one-third are nominally Christians, mostly Wesleyans and Roman Catholics; but they retain many savage characteristics, and as lately as about 1860 cannibalism prevailed. In 1875 nearly one-third of the native population was swept away by an epidemic of measles.

Lat.—Between 15° 30′ and 20° 30′ S. Lon. between 177° and 178° W.

History.—The group was discovered by Tasman, in 1646, and visited by Captain Cook. In 1804 some escaped convicts from New South Wales reached the islands, and their influence was soon felt in the outbreak of quarrels, resulting in some of the chiefs calling in the aid of the Tonga Islanders, with whom came a party of missionaries, who soon gained converts among the chief men. In 1853, Thakaumba, or Cakobau, chief of Bau, was chosen king by the majority of the islanders, and as the American government was pressing for the settlement of a debt contracted by some of the natives, he offered to cede Fiji to Great Britain in return for the payment of the amount due to America. His offer was at the time rejected; but disastrous maladministration followed, and English merchants of influence made such strong representations as to the commercial advantage which might accrue from the cession of the islands, that a renewed offer was accepted, and on September 30, 1874, the islands were annexed to Great Britain.

FILANGIERI, GAETANO, fe-lan-je-air'-e, an Italian political writer, who studied the law, but never practised it. He was a son of the Prince of Araniello. In 1777 he entered into the service of the court, was appointed a gentleman of the bedchamber, and an officer in the marine. In 1780 he published the first volume of his work on the "Science of Legislation," which made him famous throughout Europe, and the 8th volume in 1791. It was never completed. In 1787 he obtained a place in the Royal College of Finance, which he designed to reform, but was taken ill, and died in the following year.

Born at Naples, 1752; died 1788.

FILANGIERI, CHARLES, an Italian general, son of the above, having lost his father at an early age, was forced by the troubles of his country, in 1799, to leave it, and set out, on foot, with his younger brother, for France. Arriving in Paris in a state of utter destitution, the name of their father procured for them at the hands of Bonaparte, then first consul, admission to the school of the Prytaneum. Charles afterwards served in Napoleon's army, being present at Austerlitz, and afterwards distinguished himself as one of the first officers in the Neapolitan service. He subsequently served in Spain, and received for his signal acts of bravery, advancement and honours from Murat. He does not appear to have been much employed from 1820 till the accession of Ferdinand II., in 1830, to the throne of the Two Sicilies. He then had the direction of the artillery and engineers confided to him, and in 1848 was appointed to the command of the army sent into Lombardy. (See FERDINAND II.) He was now the docile instrument of Bomba, and, at the head of the expedition directed against Sicily, took possession of Messina after a bombardment of four days and a terrible slaughter. The same fate was in preparation for Palermo, but the English and French admirals seeing humanity so shamed in these proceedings, demanded and obtained an armistice for the suffering Sicilians. Six months later, however, hostilities again commenced, the submission of the island was completed, and Filangieri was appointed governor, with the fullest powers.

Born at Naples, 1782.

FILELFO, FRANCIS, or PHILELPHUS, fe-lel'fo, an Italian philosopher, and one of the restorers of letters. After studying at Padua, he opened a school of rhetoric at Venice, the state of which appointed him chancellor, and ambassador to Constantinople. Here he made himself acquainted with the Greek language, and, on returning to Venice, he took with him many Greek manuscripts. In 1428 he removed to Bologna, where he was appointed professor of moral philosophy; but in 1429 he went to Florence. A difference having occurred between him and Cosmo de' Medici, he was forced to retire to Sienna, and afterwards to various other places. He was a man of learning and abilities, but restless and quarrelsome.

Born at Ancona, 1398; died at Florence, 1481.

FILEY, fī'-le, a seaport and watering place in the E. Riding of Yorkshire, on a tongue of land running into the North Sea. There is a fine cruciform church. The harbour is good, and the fisheries productive. Pop. 1,900. It has a station on the Midland and North-Eastern railways.

FILICAJA, VINCENZO, fe-le-kä'-zha, Italian lyric poet, the descendant of an old but poor Florentine family. In 1683 he celebrated the deliverance of Vienna from the Turks in some fine odes, which made him famous, and attracted the attention of Queen Christina of Sweden, who became his patroness. He afterwards wrote vigorous patriotic sonnets and heroic odes. He was raised to the dignity of judge and senator, and in 1702 appointed to a very important judicial office in Florence.

Born at Florence, 1642; died 1707.

FILIPEPI, SANDRO, or ALESSANDRO, fē-lē'-pep'-e, usually called Botticelli, from the name of a goldsmith to whom he was apprenticed. Having studied painting under Filippo Lippi, he rose to be one of the greatest painters of his time. He executed many works for the churches of Florence, some of which exist in the Florentine Academy. His chef-d'œuvre was a picture representing the adoration of the kings, in which the likenesses of Cosmo, Julian, and Cosmo's son, Giovanni Medici, were taken for the kings. He also painted, for the Sistine chapel at Rome, three grand works from the history of Moses and the Israelites. He subsequently illustrated Dante's "Inferno," and attempted to engrave his own designs, in which he failed. In his later years he was dependent on the charity of Lorenzo de' Medici.

Born at Florence, 1473; died 1515.

FILIPPO D'ARGIRO, SAN, fe-lip'-po-dar-zhē'-ro, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Demona, 30 miles N.W. of Catania. There are the ruins of a Saracenic castle. Pop. 7,300.

FILIYAS, fil-e-yas', a river of Asiatic Turkey, falling into the Black Sea, after a course of 75 miles.

FILLAN, or FAOLAN, ST., fil'-lan, surnamed the Leper, a Scotch saint, who had a church at the east end of Loch Erne, in Perthshire, where a well was long supposed to possess the power of healing. Sir Walter Scott, in the introduction to "The Lady of the Lake," refers to "The witch-elm that guards St. Fillan's spring." An old church, dedicated to this saint, is at Ballyheland, in Queen's County, Ireland.

FILLAN, ST., a Scotch abbot of the 8th century, who had a church in that part of Perthshire known as Strathfillan, which takes its name from him. In the 14th century a priory was erected there, chiefly at the expense of Robert Bruce, who attributed his victory at Bannockburn to the possession of an armbone of the saint. Another relic, the silver head of his crozier, which was supposed to possess miraculous powers, is now preserved in the family of a Scotch farmer in America, the descendants of the original custodians.

FILLANS, JAMES, fil'-lans, a Scotch sculptor, who, from the humble occupation of a herder of sheep, became a weaver in Paisley, and next a stonemason. Whilst engaged in these occupations, he laboured privately to improve himself in the art of drawing, and also obtained a local celebrity by modelling in clay. He settled in London, and was introduced to Chantrey by Allan Cunningham. Among other works he produced a colossal statue of Sir James Shaw for the town of Kilmarnock.

Born at Wilsontown, Lanarkshire, 1808; died at Glasgow, 1852.

FILLMORE, MILLARD, fil'-more, President of the United States. He was the son of poor English parents, and was apprenticed to a draper, and afterwards to a wool carder. Having obtained employment in a lawyer's office, he studied hard, and in 1823 was admitted to the bar. He rose rapidly in reputation; in 1832 he became a member of Congress, and in 1848, Vice-President of the United States, succeeding to the presidency on the sudden death of General Taylor in 1850. In 1856 he was again nominated, but was not returned. He retired from active participation in public affairs and retired to Buffalo.

Born in the State of New York, 1800; died at Buffalo, 1876.

FILLMORE, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 1,600 square miles. Pop. 28,000. Minnesota City is the capital.

FILMER, SIR ROBERT, fil'-mer, an English writer, who was the author of the "Anarchy of a Limited and Mixed Monarchy;" "Patriarcha," in which he proves that government was monarchical in the patriarchal ages; but the arguments which, according to Hallam, "are singularly insufficient," were admirably answered by Mr. Locke in his book on government. He also wrote the "Freeholder's Grand Inquest."

Died 1688.

FINALE BORGO, fi-nä'-lai, a town of Italy, 32 miles S.W. of Genoa. It is surrounded by walls, is well built, has a collegiate church, a handsome town-house, and other good public buildings. Manf. Hemp, flax, silk, leather, and bronzes. There is a large trade in cattle and fruit, particularly oranges, and four fairs are held annually. Pop. 1,900.

FINALE MARINA, a town and seaport near the above. It is defended by an old castle and several forts. There are a very fine collegiate and several other churches, a college, two palaces, and many other handsome edifices. Ship-building is carried on. The harbour is not well sheltered. Manf. Leather, soap, paper, and refined wax. Pop. 3,300.

FINALE DE MODENA, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Panaro, 23 miles N.E. of Modena. The town is surrounded by walls. Manf. Linen and silk. There is a well-frequented annual fair. Pop. 12,567.

FINANA, fin'-yä-na, a town of Spain, near the left bank of the Almeria. The church is a large and handsome building. Manf. Wine and oil. There is a trade in silk, wool, grain, and cattle. Pop. 3,300.

FINCHLEY, finch'-le, a village of Middlesex, noted for its common, and a large and beautiful public cemetery, 7½ miles N. of London. Pop. 11,190.

FINDEN, WILLIAM, fin'-den, an English line-engraver, who evinced a highly-finished taste, and, by study and intelligence, rose rapidly to eminence as an engraver of steel-plates. From the excellence of his line, he was chosen to engrave the portrait of George IV. seated on a sofa, and painted by Lawrence. For this work he received

2,000 guineas, although the plate was not of a large size. He also engraved the "Village Festival," by Wilkie, and the "Highlander's Return," by the same artist. Having now risen into great popularity, he commenced publishing works of art on his own account, and formed an extensive engraving establishment, which he carried on in conjunction with a younger brother, also a good engraver. The result of this was the production of engraved serials; among the most popular of which were the "Byron Gallery" and the "Gallery of British Art." But whatever may have been the successes of Mr. Finden in this line, they could only have been transitory, as the great expense necessary to support his establishment proved ultimately ruinous in a pecuniary point of view. The last work upon which he engaged himself was Hilton's "Crucifixion," undertaken for the Art Union, which he finished with a broken spirit shortly before his death.

Born 1788; died 1852.

FINDHORN, find'-horn, a river which rises in Inverness-shire, and, after a course of 90 miles, falls into the Moray Firth. Here, in 1829, the "Moray Flood" took place, and inundated a large portion of the surrounding country. There is a small seaport of the same name at the mouth of the river.

FINDOE, find'-o, a small island off the W. coast of Norway, one of a group in the Bukke fiord, 15 miles N.E. of Stavanger. It contains a church and a monument said to commemorate a victory over the Scots.

FINESTRAT, fin'-e-strat, a town of Spain, province of Alicante, 3 miles from the sea. Manf. Linen, esparto, soap, wine, and oil. Pop. 2,700.

FINGAL, fin'-gawl, a district of Ireland, in the county of Dublin, between Dublin and Drogheda, where are settled the descendants of some Finns, or Norwegians, who still retain a dialect and other features of their origin.

FINGAL, a personage celebrated in the poems of Ossian, who was his son. He was prince of Morven, a province of ancient Caledonia, and struggled against the power of the Romans, who were, in his time, the rulers of England. He also undertook warlike expeditions to the Orkneys, Ireland, and even Sweden, and was a prince of a highly chivalric character. Indeed, as painted by Ossian, he was a great hero, and the father of his people.

Lived in the 3rd century.

FINGAL'S CAVE, a curious cavern, formed of basaltic columns, situate in the isle of Staffa, one of the Hebrides, on the W. coast of Scotland. (See STAFFA.)

FINISTÈRE, fin'-is-tair, a department of France, consisting of the W. extremity of the old province of Brittany, which projects considerably into the Atlantic, in which it includes numerous small islands. It is 68 miles long, and 56 broad. The coasts are rugged and much indented; but the surface is little elevated, although traversed by the mountains of Arrée and Noires, whose highest points do not reach 1,000 feet above the level of the sea.

Rivers.—Aulne, Elorn, Ellé, and Odet.

Pro.—Corn, rye, hemp, flax, tobacco, and potatoes. Large quantities of cider are produced from the orchards, and the domestic animals are generally of excellent breeds. The horses are also excellent, and the asses are of a large size, and are annually disposed of to other departments, to the extent of from 10,000 to 12,000. The coast fisheries are extensive, and the sardines are valuable.

Minerals.—Iron, zinc, silver, bismuth, and lead. The mines of this last are at Poullaouen and Huelgoat, and are considered the most productive in France.

Manf.—Sailcloth, linen, soap, candles, oil, ropes, leather, paper, and tobacco.

Area.—2,648 square miles.

Pop.—681,564.

Divisions.—The department is divided into five arrondissements, Quimper, Brest, Châteaulin, Morlaix, and Quimperlé, named from the chief towns; and 285 communes. QUIMPER is the capital.

FINISTERRE, CAPE, "land's end," the N.W. point of Spain. Lat. 42° 54′ N. Lon. 9° 20′ W.

FINKENWARDER, fin'-ken-var-der, an island in the Elbe. It is surrounded by a wall 20 feet high. Pop. 1,800, mostly engaged in boat-building, fishing, and agriculture.

FINLAND, GRAND DUCHY OF, fin'-land, an extensive country in the N. of Europe, situate to the E. of Sweden, and forming a portion of the Russian empire. It is bounded W. and S. by the Gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, N. by Lapland, E. by the governments of Olonetz and Archangel. It is 750 miles long, with a breadth averaging 185. The surface is in general flat, and in the interior may be described as a table-land, with an average height of from 400 to 600 feet above the level of the sea. The coast is generally low, but towards the south there are numerous rocky islands, presenting bold masses of granite cliffs, which render the navigation of their neighbourhood extremely dangerous.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers are mostly small, and the longest of them are in the N.; but the lakes are numerous, the largest of which are LADOGA, SAIMA, Puruvesi, Payane, and Enara. The S. part of the country is nearly covered with water, being nothing more than a compound of lakes and marshes.

Climate.—Healthy on the coasts. In the S. and W. the winters are comparatively temperate; but in the N. and E. the cold is intense, and of long continuance.

Pro.—Barley and rye. The potato was introduced in 1762, since which period it has been extensively cultivated. Although the pasturage is poor, cattle and horses are reared in considerable numbers. Many of the heights are bare, but those of moderate elevation are mostly covered with pine-forests.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, marble, granite, slate, and sulphur.

Exp.—The principal are timber, pitch, potash, tar, resin, butter, and skins, with the produce of extensive fisheries.

Area.—140,000 square miles.

Pop.—2,142,093, chiefly composed of Finns and Laps.

Lat.—Between 59° and 70° N. Lon. between 21° and 33° E.

Religion.—The predominant church is the Lutheran, but there are many adherents of the Greek church. There are three dioceses.

Divisions.—There are 8 governments, Abo, Nyland, Tavastehuus, Wiborg, Kuopio, St. Michel, Wasa, and Uleaborg. HELSINGFORS is the capital.

History.—Up to the 12th century the Finns were pagans, and lived under their own kings or rulers. About the middle of that period they were conquered by the Swedes, under whose dominion they mostly lived till 1809, when, by the treaty of Frederikshamn, their country was ceded to Russia. (See ABO, HELSINGFORS, &c.)

FINLAND, GULF OF, one of the great arms of the Baltic Sea, extending E. and N., between lat. 59° and 61°, and between lon. 22° and 30° E. It is 260 miles long, with a width varying between 25 and 90. It receives the waters of Lakes Ladoga and Onega, and has numerous islands, the principal of which is Cotlin-Ostrof, or Kotlinoi, upon which Cronstadt is erected.

FINLAY, GEORGE, fin'-lai, historian, a Scotchman who resided for many years at Athens, and wrote several valuable works on Greek history.

Died 1875.

FINMARK, fin'-mark, an extensive province of Norway, forming the most northern portion of continental Europe, and lying between Russian Lapland and the Arctic Ocean. The interior is traversed by a range of snow-covered mountains, about 4,000 feet in elevation. The country is generally sterile; but yielding crops of rye and potatoes. Area, 20,000 square miles. Pop. 24,075, principally Lapps.—The chief town is HAMMERFEST.

FINN, fin, a river of Ireland, which, after a course of 24 miles, runs into Loch Foyle near Lifford.

FINSBURY, fins'-ber-e, a parliamentary borough of Middlesex, formerly extending over the greater part of North London outside the city. It was greatly circumscribed by the "Redistribution Act" of 1885, and by it limited to the district of the Holborn Union, with three sub-divisions.

FINSTER-AAHORN, fin'-stair-a'-horn, a mountain of Switzerland, the culminating point of the Bernese Alps, between Bern and Valais. (See ALPS.)

FINSTERWALDE, fin-star-val'-de, a town of Prussia, on a stream which flows into the Black Elster, 40 miles N. of Dresden. Manf. Cloth and machinery. Pop. 7,400.

FINTONA, fin-to'-na, a market-town of Ireland, county Tyrone. Manf. Linen, sewed muslin, and agricultural implements. Pop. 1,500.

FIORA, fe-or'-a, a river of Italy, rising near Mount Amiata, and, after a course of 40 miles, entering the Mediterranean Sea 20 miles from Civita Vecchia.

FIORD, fe'-ord, the termination of a great number of Scandinavian geographical names, and means an arm of the sea or strait.

FIORENZUOLA, fe'-o-raind-zoo-o'-la, a town of Italy, on the right bank of the Arda, 15 miles S.E. of Piacenza. There are a richly-decorated collegiate church, a convent, a palace, and a remarkable tower. There are three important annual fairs. Pop. 6,300.

FIRAN, fe'-ran, a small island in the Red Sea, 18 miles from the coast of Arabia, famous for a pearl fishery.

FIRANDO, or FIRATO, fe-ran'-do, an island of Japan, having on its E. side a town of the same name, where, in the early part of the 17th century, the Dutch erected a trading depôt. Lat. 33° 10' N. Lon. 129° E.

FIRDUSI, ABUL KASIM MANSUR, fir-doo'-se, Persian epic poet, who wrote the famous "Book of Kings," which ranks among the great epics of the world.

Born 940; died 1020.

FIRISHTA, MAHOMET KASIM HINDU SHAH, fer-ish'-ta, Persian historian, who, at an early age, went with his father to Ahmednuggur, where he was highly educated, and saw military service. He wrote a history of the Mahometan power in India, which ranks as a standard authority, and has been translated into English.

Born at Ashabad, 1570; died 1612.

FIRMILIAN, fir-mil'-yan, a bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, who was the friend of Origen, and took part with St. Cyprian in the dispute concerning the re-baptizing of converted heretics. He presided at the first council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata.

Died in 269.

FIRMIN, THOMAS, fir'-min, a benevolent Englishman, noted for his extensive charities. He began business as a linendraper in London, and amassed a considerable fortune. His piety and benevolence procured him the esteem of many of the most eminent men of his time, especially archbishop Tillotson, who particularly courted his friendship. He erected a warehouse for the employment of the poor in the linen manufacture, and when the French Protestants landed in England, set up another for their use at Ipswich. He was one of the governors of Christ's and St. Thomas's hospitals, to which he was a liberal benefactor, as he was to almost every charitable institution brought under his notice. He published, in 1678, "Some Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, and especially in and about the City of London, and for the Prevention of Begging." Donaldson, in his "Agricultural Biography," says of this pamphlet, "The author's views were sufficiently benevolent, but not very enlarged."

Born at Ipswich, Suffolk, 1632; died 1697.

FIRMINY, feer'-me-ne, a town of France, department of Loire, 6 miles S.W. of St. Etienne. Manf. Glass, hardwares, and ribbons. Near it are some coal-works. Pop. 13,707.

FISCHART, JOHANA, fee'-shart, German humorous and satirical author, an advocate, and at the time of his death bailiff of Forbach. He was the German Rabelais, with considerable poetic power, and lashed the ecclesiastical, political, and social follies of his time with inexhaustible wit and satirical humour.

Born 1545; died 1590.

FISCHA, an ancient market town of Austria, on the right bank of the Fischa, at its junction with the Danube, 12 miles S.E. of Vienna. Manf. Cotton. Pop. 1,200.—There is an old castle, and the Templars had an establishment here.

FISCHER, KARL VON, fish'-er, a distinguished German architect, who, after studying at Mannheim and Vienna, and visiting Italy, went, in 1809, to Munich, and became professor of architecture in its academy. Here he superintended the erection of several mansions of great merit, but his greatest work is the "Hof Theatre," which is still one of the chief ornaments of Munich. This building was commenced in 1811, and opened in 1818; and although, in 1823, it suffered considerably by fire, it was rebuilt in accordance with the original designs of Fischer. He is considered the founder of the Munich school of architecture.

Born at Mannheim, 1782; died at Munich, 1820.

FISCIANO, feesh-e-a'-no, a town of Italy, 7 miles N.E. of Salerno. Pop. 7,700.

FISH, SIMON, fish, an English lawyer, who, on account of his active support of the principles of the Reformation, was obliged to fly to Germany, where, in conjunction with William Tyndale, he wrote the "Supplication of Beggars against Monks and Friars." This piece so pleased Henry VIII., that Fish had liberty to return. He also translated from the Dutch a little book, entitled "The Sum of the Scriptures."—The "Supplication of the Beggars" was a satire upon the Popish clergy, which was answered by Sir Thomas More in his "Supplications of Souls in Purgatory." Fish died of the plague.

Died 1531.

FISH RIVER, a river of Florida, U.S., falling into Mobile Bay, in lat. 30° 30′ N.; lon. 87° 50′ W.

FISH RIVER, GREAT, a river of S. Africa, which rises in the Sneenberg, or Snowy Mountains, and after an estimated course of 400 miles, falls into the Indian Ocean, in lat. 30° 30′ N.; lon. 27° 20′ E.

FISHER, JOHN, fish'-er, an English prelate, who was educated at Cambridge, and became confessor to Margaret, countess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. By his advice the countess founded St. John's and Christ's colleges, Cambridge. In 1501 he was chosen chancellor of this university, and became a liberal encourager of learning. In 1502 he was the first Margaret professor of divinity, and in 1504 was appointed to the bishopric at Rochester, from which he would never remove to a better see. He was a zealous opponent of the Reformation, and could not be induced by Henry VIII. to concur with that monarch's divorce of Queen Catharine. Great efforts were made to bring him to acknowledge the king's supremacy, which proving ineffectual, he was sent to the Tower. While in confinement the pope made him a cardinal, which so enraged the king, that he caused him to be tried for high treason, when he was condemned and beheaded.—He wrote a "Commentary on the Penitential Psalms," a "Defence of the King's Book against Luther," a "Funeral Sermon for the Lady Margaret," &c. A collective edition of his works was published at Wurtzburg in 1695.

Born at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1459; died 1535.

FISHER, MARY, a member of the Society of Friends, who conceived the idea of going to Constantinople to convert the grand seigner. The sultan, Mahomet IV., heard her patiently, and then caused her to be sent back to her own country, where she married a preacher of her own sect. This couple afterwards went to Languedoc, to preach the tenets of Quakerism amongst the Protestants there.

Lived in the 17th century.

FISHER'S ISLAND, a small island belonging to the state of New York, United States, 12 miles E. of Long Island. It is 7 miles long by 1 broad.

FISHGUARD, or FISGARD, fish'-gard, a seaport of Pembrokeshire, S. Wales, 14 miles N.W. of Haverfordwest. It has a valuable fishery, and a trade in oats, butter, and slates. Its harbour is one of the best in St. George's Channel. Pop. 1,600. —Here a detachment of French, amounting to about 1,200, landed in 1797, and were taken prisoners by the inhabitants.

FISHKILL, fish'-kil, a town in the state of New York, United States, on the Hudson, 78 miles from Albany.

FISMES, feem, a town of France, department Marne, 39 miles N.W. of Chalons. Manf. Pottery, tiles, bricks, and a liquor used for colouring champagne. Church councils were held here in 881 and 935. Pop. 2,700.

FITERO, fe-tair'-o, a town of Spain, on the left bank of the Alhama, 15 miles S.W. of Tudela. There are a fine Gothic church and a large monastery. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, soap, earthenware, and oil. There are thermal springs and gypsum quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 2,200.

FITZ, fits, a name which is derived from an old French word signifying son, and which, in England, has been added to the name of the father, in order to distinguish the son. It has also been, in several instances, applied as a prefix to the names of the illegitimate sons of the kings of England.

FITZGERALD, LORD EDWARD, fits-jer'-ald, was the son of James, first duke of Leinster, and Lady Emily Lennox, daughter of the duke of Richmond. Entering the English army, he fought in the American war, but in 1790 quitted the service, and took his place in the Irish parliament. When the French revolution broke out, he supported its principles, and in 1793 hastened to Paris. Here he married Pamela, the daughter, it is said, of Louis Philippe Joseph, the duke of Orleans, and Madame de Genlis. On his return to Ireland, Fitzgerald was desirous of effecting a separation of that country from England, and induced the French Directory to furnish him with a fleet and troops. A landing was attempted on several occasions; but all efforts only proved the futility of the scheme, and Fitzgerald was seized, tried, and condemned to death. He died of his wounds before the time fixed for his execution.

Born 1763; died 1798.

FITZHERBERT, MARIA, fits-her'-bert, was the youngest daughter of Waller Smythe, Esq., of Brambridge, and was twice a widow before she was 25 years of age. In 1785 she became acquainted with George IV., then prince of Wales, and was, in the same year, deceived by the stratagem of a pretended attempt at suicide, privately married to him at Carlton House, in the presence of the famous duchess of Devonshire, who lent her own wedding ring for the ceremony. This marriage was invalid by the law of the land, and the prince again married with the princess Caroline of Brunswick. This alliance proving unhappy, Mrs. Fitzherbert again lived for several years with the prince as his wife. His gross irregularities, however, drove her into retirement, and she went to Brighton, where she lived, not only in the enjoyment of the affection and respect of a large circle of friends, but retaining the good opinion of George III. and William IV.

Born 1756; died at Brighton, 1837.

FITZJAMES, JAMES, fits-jaims', known in history as the duke of Berwick, was the illegitimate son of James II. by Arabella Churchill, sister to the duke of Marlborough. He entered early into the French service, and at the age of 15 was wounded at the siege of Buda. In 1688 he was sent to Ireland, where he distinguished himself at the siege of Londonderry and at the battle of the Boyne. He was afterwards employed on various services, for which he was rewarded with the rank of marshal of France. He gained the victory of Almanza over the English and their allies, which fixed Philip V. on the throne of Spain. He was killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Philipsburgh.

Born at Moulins, 1671; died 1734.

FITZROY, ADMIRAL ROBERT, R.N., fits'-roi, an English meteorologist and naval officer, who, from 1826 to 1830, was employed in surveying the S. American coasts of Patagonia, Terra del Fuego, Chili, and Peru. Another expedition was planned, and in 1831 he sailed again, and surveyed the southern shores of S. America, circumnavigated the globe, and returned after an absence of four years. In 1841 he became member of parliament for the city of Durham, and in 1843 was appointed governor and commander-in-chief of the colony of New Zealand. In 1846 he was replaced by Sir George Grey, and, on his return to England, wrote a pamphlet in justification of the course of policy he had pursued in the colony. In 1850 he published "Sailing Directions for S. America, &c.," accompanied by charts, which show the results of his surveys. In 1857 he became rear-admiral, and in 1863 vice-admiral. He held the office of superintendent of the meteorological department of the Board of Trade, and established a system of storm warnings, which attracted great attention. He committed suicide while in a state of mental derangement.

Born 1805; died 1865.

FITZROY, a town of Victoria, Australia, is situated on the N.E. side of Melbourne, adjoining the municipality of Collingwood. It is a distinct municipality, under the government of a mayor and councillors. The jurisdiction of the municipality of Fitzroy extends over 820 acres, upon which are erected 3,820 dwellings, including many fine terraces and palatial residences. There are four banks, one local and three branch banks, a local gas works, supplying an extensive district; and private enterprise has furnished comfortable public baths, and a new municipal hall, in the Corinthian style. In the Town Hall recently erected, a free library has been projected and opened, and a Philharmonic Society has been initiated. The population of the municipality is 23,118.

FITZSTEPHEN, WILLIAM, fits-sté-fen, a monk of Canterbury, who wrote the life of his master, Thomas à Becket, in which he gives a curious description of London, and which is the earliest extant.

Died 1191.

FIUME, fe-oó'-mai, a seaport of the Austrian empire, in the crown land of Croatia, at the extremity of the Gulf of Quarnero, on the Adriatic, where the Fiumara river discharges into the Gulf of Quarnero, with a commodious harbour, 40 miles S.E. of Trieste. There are an old and a new town, containing many handsome buildings. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, rosoglio, paper, and chemicals, and ship-building is carried on. Pop. 20,981. Lat. 45° 20′ N. Lon. 14° 26′ E.

FIUME-FREDDO, a town of central Italy, 10 miles S. of Paolo. There are a handsome church, two monasteries, and a nunnery. A large fair is held annually. Pop. 4,500.

FIUMICELLO, fe-oó'-mai-chel'-lo, a suburb of Brescia, Italy. It is beautifully situated, and contains many handsome villas. Pop. 2,800.

FIUMICINO, fe-oó'-mai-ché'-no, a small seaport of Italy, at the mouth of the right branch of the Tiber, 16 miles S.W. of Rome. It is handsomely built, and much resorted to by pleasure seekers from Rome.

FIVES. (See LILLE.)

FIVIZZANO, fé'-vit-za-no, a town of northern Italy, 35 miles N.E. of Pisa. It is surrounded by walls, and has a fine open square, with fountains, and a handsome church. Pop. 14,679.

FIXLMILLNER, PLACIDUS, fix'-el-mil'-ner, Austrian astronomer. He was a Benedictine monk, and for many years professor of the canon law at a school at Krémsmünster. He erected an observatory, compiled accurate tables of the motions of the planet Mercury and of Uranus.

Born 1721; died 1791.

FIZEN, fi'-zen, a province of Japan, including more than 1,000 small islands, of which FIRANDO is the most important.

FLACCUS, CAIUS VALERIUS, flak'-kus, a Roman poet. A poem of his on the Argonautic expedition is extant.

Died 88.

FLACCUS, or FRANCOWITZ, MATHIAS, a Lutheran divine, who assumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus, on account of his having been born in an ancient part of Illyricum. He became a disciple of Luther and Melanchthon at Wittemberg, where he taught the Hebrew and Greek languages, of which he was there appointed professor. He was the principal author of the "Centuriæ Magdeburgenses," and a great defender of the principles of Luther against those who were for moderate doctrines; on which account he settled at Magdeburg, and afterwards removed to other places. He wrote "Clavis Sacræ Scripturæ," 2 vols. folio; "Catalogus Testium Veritatis," folio; "De Translatione Imperii Romani ad Germanos;" and "De Electione Episcoporum, quod æque ad Plebem pertineat," 8vo.

Born at Istria, 1520; died at Frankfort, 1575.

FLADSTRAND, or FREDERIKSHAVN, flad'-strand, a fortified seaport of Denmark, in Jutland, 30 miles from Aalborg. It has a harbour and dockyard.

FLAHAULT-DE-LA-BILLARDERIE, AUGUSTE CHARLES JOSEPH, Comte de, fla-hawde(r)-la(r)-bee-yar de-ree, was descended from one of the ancient noblesse of France. During the French Revolution his father perished on the scaffold, when the survivors of his family took refuge in England. In 1798 he returned to France, and in the following year the young count received a commission in the cavalry corps when only 15 years of age, and accompanied the first consul to Italy. He made his first essay in arms in the campaign of Marengo, and, rising rapidly in his adopted profession, became successively aide-de-camp to Murat, to Berthier, and to Napoleon. He was present at Austerlitz, at Jena, and other battles, and, after the battle of Wagram, was created a colonel and baron of the empire. His intrepidity and daring in the Russian campaign gained for him the rank of general of brigade, and his gallantry at Nancy and Leipzic obtained for him the promotion to general of division. In 1814 he recognised the provisional government, but on the escape of Napoleon from Elba he returned to his post of aide-de-camp, and fought by the side of the emperor at Waterloo. The result of that great battle drove him into exile, when he retired, first to Switzerland, and afterwards to England, where he married the daughter of Lord Keith in 1817. The revolution of 1830 restored the comte de Flahault to his rank in the army, and he was elevated to the dignity of a peer. Attached to the Orleans family, and to the person of the duke of Orleans, he filled many diplomatic posts; amongst others, that of ambassador to Vienna, which he held from 1842 till 1848. On the re-establishment of the empire he was called to the senate, Dec. 31, 1852, and in 1860 he was appointed ambassador at the court of St. James's. His eldest daughter by lady Keith was married to the late marquis of Lansdowne.

Born at Paris, 1785; died 1870.

FLAMBOROUGH HEAD, a promontory on the Yorkshire coast, the termination of a range of chalk cliffs, and forming the northern boundary of Bridlington Bay; it is 451 feet high, with a lighthouse 214 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 54° 7′ N. Lon. 0° 5′ E.

FLAMEL, NICHOLAS, fla'-mel, a notary of Paris, who accumulated, by some unknown means, a vast property, which he appropriated to benevolent purposes and the endowment of hospitals and churches. The multitude ascribed his great wealth to his possessing the philosopher's stone; whilst others attributed to him the authorship of some works on alchemy. However this may be, he certainly founded no less than four hospitals in Paris.

Born 1330; died 1418.

FLAMINIA VIA, or FLAMINIAN WAY. (See ROME.)

FLAMINIUS, O., fla-mín'-i-us, a Roman consul, of a turbulent disposition, who was drawn into a battle near the Lake of Thrasymene, by the artifice of Hannibal. He was slain in the engagement, with an immense number of Romans.

Died 217 B.C.

FLAMININUS, TITUS QUINTIUS, a celebrated Roman, raised to the consulship, and sent against Philip, king of Macedonia, and against the Achaian league. He totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Locris, Phocis, and Thessaly tributary to the Roman power. He proclaimed all Greece independent, at the Isthmian games. This celebrated action procured him the name of father and deliverer of Greece. He was afterwards sent ambassador to Prusias, king to Bithynia, where, by his prudence and artifice, he caused Hannibal, who had taken refuge at this court, to dispatch himself, rather than be given up to his enemies the Romans. Flamininus was found dead in his bed.

Died 175 B.C.

FLAMSTEED, JOHN, flam'-steed, an English astronomer, who, when very young, discovered a strong predilection for mathematical learning, and, in 1669, calculated an eclipse of the sun which was to happen the next year. He also calculated some phenomena of the moon in relation to the fixed stars. He sent the same to the Royal Society, for which he received the thanks of that learned body. Soon after this, he visited London, and then went to Cambridge, where he entered himself of Jesus College. One of his best friends was Sir Jonas Moore, who introduced him to the king, and in 1675 procured for him the place of astronomer to the king. The same year he entered into orders, and in 1684 was presented to the living of Burslow, in Surrey, which he held until his death. In 1676 the royal observatory at Greenwich was completed, and he being the first resident, and astronomer royal, it was called Flamsteed House. His great work, entitled "Historia Cœlestis Britannica," was not published till six years after his death. In the "Philosophical Transactions" are many of his papers, and in Sir Jonas Moore's "System of Mathematics" is a tract by him on the Doctrine of the Sphere. It is to the mass of lunar observations made by Flamsteed, that Newton was indebted for the means of carrying out and verifying his discovery of gravitation; but it is to be regretted that a quarrel occurred between these illustrious men, owing to the publication by Newton of the results of Flamsteed's labours.

Born near Derby, 1646; died 1719.

FLANDERS, EAST and WEST, flan'-ders, two contiguous provinces of Belgium, bounded on the N.W. by the North Sea, and inclosed on its other sides by the provinces of Antwerp, Zealand, S. Brabant, Hainault, and the French department of the Nord.

FLANDERS, EAST, is divided from West Flanders by a line running almost due south from Sluys, a small town nearly opposite Flushing. The surface is level in the northern part, while to the south it consists of undulating plains. The soil is in general a heavy loam, and very fertile. The rivers are the Scheldt, and its affluents, the Lys and the Dender. Area, 1,146 square miles. Pop. 915,464. The chief towns are GHENT, ALOST, and DENDERMONDE.

FLANDERS, WEST, has a considerable tract of coast, in the central part of which is Ostend. This side faces the N.; but the W. boundary of the province adjoins the French territory. Its surface is in general level, except the sand-hills on the coast. The soil is also fertile and the agriculture good. The chief towns are BRUGES, COURTRAI, and OSTEND. Area, 1,257 square miles. Pop. 714,785.

FLANDERS, the former name of an extensive territory, including the Belgian provinces of the same name, a part of the province of Zealand in Holland, and some of the departments of the north-east of France. In the time of the Romans, the territory of Flanders was occupied by the Morini, and a portion of the Nervii, the Atuatici, and the Menapii. In the 7th century, the name of Flanders appears for the first time; but at this period it did not extend further than the territory of Bruges. By the treaty of Verdun, in 843, it was comprised in the kingdom of France. In 862, it was erected into a countship, subject to the kings of France, in favour of Baldwin, called Bras-de-fer, "Iron-arm," son-in-law of Charles the Bald, and it remained in the possession of this family till 1119. After the extinction of this dynasty, Flanders was possessed by Charles the Good, son of Canute, king of Denmark, up to 1127; then by Cliton, son of Robert II., duke of Normandy. Count Thierry of Alsace, son of Thierry, duke of Lorraine, succeeded Cliton, and transmitted the territory to his descendants. In the wars between France and England, Flanders often took part with the latter, although a vassal of the former power. After the death of Margaret II., countess of Flanders, who had first married Bouchard, lord of Avesnes, and then Guy de Dampierre, Flanders was inherited, 1280, by Guy de Dampierre, one of her sons. The revolt of Guy against Philip the Fair, in 1297, was followed by the conquest and annexation of his territory to the kingdom of France; but, in 1302, the Flemings rose, defeated Philip at Courtray, and succeeded in again being governed by their own counts. In 1337, under Louis I. de Dampierre, the Flemish towns, at the instance of the first Artevelde, acknowledged Edward III. of England as king of France, and thus gave rise to the "Hundred Years' War" between the two powers. In 1382 they revolted, under the leadership of Philip Von Artevelde, against Louis II., their count, and were crushed at the battle of Rosbecq. (See ARTEVELDE.) After the death of Louis II., in 1384, the French family of Valois-Burgundy replaced that of Dampierre, by the marriage of Philip I. of Burgundy with Margaret, daughter of Louis II. This period was one of great splendour and prosperity for Flanders; the populous cities of Ghent, Bruges, Ypres, and others, having acquired, by their industry and art, immense riches. Somewhat turbulent, however, and jealous of their liberty and privileges, they were oftentimes at variance with their lords. After the death of Charles the Bold, who was perpetually at war with Louis XI. of France, the countship of Flanders fell, in 1477, to his daughter Marie. The latter, marrying the Archduke Maximilian, brought Flanders and its dependencies to the house of Austria; and from this, wars ensued between France and that empire. In 1526, the treaty of Madrid, abolishing the vassalship of Flanders, broke the last tie which attached this country to France. The emperor Charles V. incorporated it in the seventeen provinces which formed the circle of Burgundy, and thence it became a portion of the Spanish Netherlands. The treaty of the Pyrenees, in 1659, restored to France some of the towns of Flanders and Artois; that of Nimeguen gave it the whole of Artois, and a large part of Flanders, as also a portion of Hainault, and the town of Cambray. The peace of Utrecht conferred the remainder of Flanders on the house of Austria, whence it passed to that of Lorraine-Austria, still remaining an integral part of the German empire. In 1792 the French invaded imperial Flanders, and occupied it till 1814, forming of it the two departments of Escaut (Scheldt) and Lys. In 1814 this portion of Flanders was given to the king of the Netherlands, who divided it into two provinces. Since the revolution of 1831, it has belonged to Belgium. The Flemings were formerly the principal manufacturers and merchants of Europe; and from them the English learned the art of weaving. Their table-linens, lace, and tapestry, are still of very superior manufacture.

FLATOW, a town of Prussia, 84 miles S.W. of Marienburg, situated between three lakes. Manf. Cloth and lace. There is a trade in grain, horses and cattle, and seven annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,750.

FLATTERY, CAPE, flat'-te-re, a headland at the south side of the entrance of the strait of Juan de Fuca, Washington Territory, United States, on the Pacific coast. Lat. 48° 24′ N. Lon. 124° 40′ W.

FLATTERY, CAPE, a headland on the east coast of Australia, colony of Queensland, about 30 miles N. of Endeavour Bay. Lat. 14° 52′ S. Lon. 145° 20′ E.

FLAVEL, JOHN, fla'-vel, Nonconformist divine, educated at University College, and ejected from Dartmouth by the Act of Uniformity, after which he exercised his ministry under great difficulties, chiefly in Devonshire. His theological writings are in high repute, and have been frequently reprinted both in this country and in America. A monument erected to his memory in St. Saviour's church, Dartmouth, was removed by order of the magistrates.

Born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, 1627; died at Exeter, 1691.

FLAVIAN, flai'-vi-an, patriarch of Antioch, in which see he was confirmed by the council of Constantinople in 382. This act, however, occasioned a schism, numerous bishops adhering to Paulinus, and others to Flavian. The prudence of the latter at length restored peace to the church. He was a zealous opposer of the Arians.

Died 404.

FLAVIAN, patriarch of Constantinople, to which he was elected on the death of Proclus, in 447. He condemned the Eutychian heresy, in a synod held at Constantinople; but the followers of Eutychius afterwards got Flavian banished to Lydia, where he died.

Died 449.

FLAVITAS, flav'-i'-tas, patriarch of Constantinople. When Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, died, the emperor Zeno was weak enough to leave a blank paper under the altar, in expectation that an angel would write upon it the name of a person to succeed him. Flavitas, by bribing the grand-chamberlain, gained admittance to the church, and inscribed his own name in the letter; on which he was chosen patriarch. He died about three months afterwards, and the cheat being discovered, the chamberlain was executed.

Died 490.

FLAVIUS, flai'-ve-us, the name of a plebeian family at Rome, from which came the emperors Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian.

FLAXMAN, JOHN, flax'-man, an eminent English sculptor, who from his boyhood discovered a remarkable genius for modelling in clay. At the age of 15 he became a student in the Royal Academy. In 1787 he visited Rome, where, during a residence of seven years, he executed his celebrated designs in outline from Homer, Æschylus, and Dante. These were engraved and published, as were some which he made from Hesiod. Whilst at Rome, he also executed the splendid group from Ovid's Metamorphoses, entitled "The Fury of Athamas," consisting of four figures, larger than life. For this work he received 600*l.*, a sum insufficient to defray even the cost. It was executed for the earl of Bristol. At this time he also produced his "Cephalus and Aurora." In 1794 he returned to England, and executed the monument for Lord Mansfield, now in Westminster Abbey; for this he received 2,500*l.* After this he produced a large number of fine works, and has been pronounced "the greatest of modern sculptors." He was elected a Royal Academician in 1800, and was appointed professor of sculpture in 1810.

Born at York, 1755; died 1826.

FLECHE, LA, flarsh, a well-built town of France, in the department of Sarthe, and situate in a pleasant valley watered by the Loire, 24 miles S.W. of Le Mans. This town was chiefly noted for its public seminary, which was broken up at the Revolution. It has still a military school, founded by Napoleon I., occupying a building formerly a palace, built by Henry IV., a town-hall, court-house, hospital, and the church of St. Thomas, a remarkable pile, whose old flèche, or spire, gave the place its name. Manf. Hosiery, gloves, linens, leather, glue, and wax. Pop. 6,500.

FLECHIER, ESPRIT, flai'-she-ai, a famous French bishop, who was greatly admired as a preacher at Paris, and whose funeral orations placed him on a level with Bossuet. In 1679 he published his "History of Theodosius the Great;" in 1685 he was made bishop of Lavaur, on which Louis XIV. said, "I should have rewarded you much sooner, but that I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses." Shortly after, he was promoted to the see of Nimes. As a bishop he was exemplary; and when a famine raged in 1709, his charity was unbounded, and manifested to all persons, without any respect to religious persuasion. His works are, "Miscellaneous Works," 12mo.; "Panegyrics of the Saints;" "Funeral Orations;" "Sermons;" "The Lives of Cardinals Ximenes and Commendon;" "Letters;" "Posthumous Works."

Born at Pernes, near Carpentras, 1632; died at Nimes, 1710.

FLECKNOE, RICHARD, flek'-no, dramatist, better known as the victim of Dryden's lashes in "Mac Flecnoe," than from any especial merits of his own. It is thought that he was an Irish priest, who came to London, and wrote several miscellaneous pieces, a "Short Treatise on the English Stage;" "Love's Dominion," a dramatic piece; "Ermina; or, the Chaste Lady;" and several other performances, which are now all but forgotten, even by the antiquarians in literature. Of his birth nothing is known.

Died 1678.

FLEETWOOD, or FLEETWOOD-ON-WYRE, fleet'-wood, a seaport town and watering-place of Lancashire, at the entrance of Morecambe Bay, 18 miles N.W. of Preston. There is a good harbour, and the town, which is rapidly increasing, is a favourite watering place. Steamers ply from here to the Isle of Man, Ireland, and Scotland.

Pop. 6,513. A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

FLEMING, flem'-ing, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 15,221. The capital is Flemingsburg.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, RICHARD, flem'-ming, an English prelate, who received his education at University College, Oxford, and, in 1408, obtained a prebend in the cathedral of York. He, for a time, zealously defended the doctrines of Wickliffe, but afterwards as strenuously opposed them. In 1442 he became bishop of Lincoln, and soon after was sent deputy to the council of Constance, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence. At his return, he executed the decree of that assembly for digging up Wickliffe's bones and burning them. He was afterwards raised to the see of York by the pope; but Henry VI. refusing to concur in his advancement, he was obliged to remain at Lincoln.

Born in Yorkshire; died at Lincoln, 1431.

FLEMMING, PAUL, German poet, studied medicine at Leipsic, and afterwards accompanied embassies to Russia and Persia. He then settled as a physician in Hamburg, where he passed the remainder of his life. His songs are remarkable for tenderness and elegance, and those of a patriotic nature, for spirit and vigour. He is considered to rank first among the German lyric poets of the 17th century.

Born at Schönburg, 1609; died 1640.

FLENSBORG, flens'-borg, a seaport of Prussia, in the duchy of Schleswig, on a bay of the Baltic, 20 miles N. of Schleswig. It is a place of great activity, with good shops and well-supplied markets. There is a good harbour. Its principal buildings are its churches, a school of navigation, and market-houses. Manf. Cloth, paper, soap, and tiles. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 30,956.

FLERS, flair, a town of France, department Orne, 35 miles N.W. of Alençon. Manf. Linen, ticking, and fustian. Pop. 8,000.

FLETCHER, RICHARD, fletch'-er, an English prelate, who, in 1583, was made dean of Peterborough; and, in 1586, attended Mary, queen of Scots, at her execution, with a view of converting her to the Protestant religion. In 1589 he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, whence he was translated to Worcester, and lastly to London. On the death of his first wife he married again, and this gave such offence to queen Elizabeth, that she suspended him from his episcopal functions.

Died 1596.

FLETCHER, JOHN, an English dramatic poet, who received his education at Cambridge, and wrote several plays in conjunction with Beaumont. Out of the fifty-two plays composed under the united names of Beaumont and Fletcher, it is stated that only in seventeen Beaumont had a share in the production. If such was the case, the friendship which could excite such generous conduct on the part of Fletcher was equally creditable to both. In addition to his other works, he assisted Ben Jonson and Middleton in "The Widow," and is believed to have been also a literary partner with Shakspeare, Massinger, and some other authors. He died of a plague, and was buried in St. Saviour's church, Southwark. (See BEAUMONT.)

Born 1576; died 1625.

FLETCHER, GILES, cousin to the above, and son of Sir Giles Fletcher. He wrote a poem "Christ's Victory and Triumph," to which, it is supposed, Milton was in some degree indebted.

FLETCHER, PHINEAS, brother of the preceding, was educated at Eton and Cambridge. In 1621 he obtained the living of Hilgay, in Norfolk, where he died in 1650. He is best known by a poem entitled "The Purple Island," which is an allegorical description of man, in the manner of Spenser, and displays great descriptive and imaginative power. He also wrote a work, now very rare, entitled "Locustes, or Apollyonists," a satire against the Jesuits.

Born 1584; died 1650.

FLETCHER, ANDREW, a Scotch political writer, was the son of Sir Robert Fletcher, of Saltoun, in Scotland. He was bred up under the care of Dr. Burnet, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and became commissioner for East Lothian in the Scotch parliament, in which he so strongly opposed the court measures, that he found it expedient to withdraw to Holland. In 1685 he landed in the west of England with the duke of Monmouth, but was dismissed for shooting a gentleman who had remonstrated with him for stealing his horse. One of Fletcher's biographers says, that "he was a man of breeding and nice honour, in whose constitution anger was extremely predominant." After this he suffered imprisonment in Spain, and was engaged in the Hungarian service against the Turks. At the revolution he returned to his own country, and was a member of the convention for settling the government of Scotland. His publications, which are wholly political, are filled with the boldest and most honest denunciations of the oppressive measures beneath which his country, in his time, groaned. It is in his letter to the marquis of Montrose, entitled "An Account of a Conversation," that occurs the celebrated saying, "I knew a very wise man that believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he did not care who should make all the laws of a nation."

Born 1653; died in London, 1716.

FLETCHER, ABRAHAM, an ingenious English mathematician, was bred to the business of a tobacco-pipe maker. He learned to read and write by his own application, and also taught himself arithmetic, mathematics, and botany. At the age of thirty he became a schoolmaster, to which he added the professions of astrologer and doctor, and acquired a fortune of £3,000. He published a compendium of practical mathematics, under the title of the "Universal Measurer," a book of merit.

Born in Cumberland, 1714; died 1793.

FLEURANCE, flur'-ance, a town of France, department Gers, on the left bank of the river Gers. There is a fine public promenade. A trade is carried on in grain, vegetables, and wine. Pop. 4,200.

FLEURUS, flur'-oos, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, near the Sambre, and 7 miles from Charleroi. Manf. Coarse woollens, flax, and leather. Pop. 2,200.—It is noted for four important battles having taken place in its vicinity. The first took place on August 30, 1622, between the Spaniards, under Gonzales de Cordova, the general of the Catholic league, the troops of the Protestant union, commanded by the Bastard of Mansfeld and the dukes of Brunswick and Saxe-Weimar; both sides claimed the advantage. The second was fought July 1, 1690; Montmorency, duke of Luxembourg, defeating the prince of Waldeck, one of the most able of the generals of the Augsburg league. The third was that in which General Jourdain defeated the imperialists under the prince of Coburg, June 26, 1794. The fourth, more commonly known as the battle of Ligny, took place on the 16th June, 1815. On that day Blucher was defeated by Napoleon. (See BLUCHER.)

FLEURY, ANDRÉ HERCULE DE, flur'-e, a cardinal and prime minister of France, was chaplain to Louis XIV., then became, in 1698, bishop of Fréjus, and was nominated by the old king, when near his death, as tutor to his successor, Louis XV. Fleury gained great influence over the mind of his pupil, and in 1726 succeeded the duke of Bourbon as prime minister, being in the same year also made a cardinal. He showed his wisdom in the internal administration of the kingdom, diminishing the taxes, and systematizing the finance department, but was not successful in maintaining the influence of France abroad. Stanislas, king of Poland, whose claims ought to have been supported, was abandoned in the war which he undertook to recover his crown. By the treaty of Vienna, 1735, Fleury, however, obtained from Austria the cession to Stanislas of the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, stipulating that these should, at the death of Stanislas, revert to France. In the War of Succession, 1740, the cardinal was not destined to see the arms of his country successful; but he did not live till the end of the conflict.

Born at Lodève, Languedoc, 1653; died 1743.

FLEURY, CLAUDE, French ecclesiastical historian, who was tutor to several members of the royal family, and afterwards prior of Argenteuil and confessor to Louis XV. He wrote a great work on ecclesiastical history, on which he laboured for thirty years, which is praised even by Voltaire and D'Alembert, and of which Frederick the Great, it is thought, wrote an abridgment. Other valuable historical works also proceeded from Fleury's pen.

Born at Paris, 1640; died 1723.

FLINDERS MATTHEW, flin'-ders, a distinguished English navigator, who early entered into the merchant service, but quitted it soon for the navy, which he joined as a midshipman in 1795. Having distinguished himself in an exploring expedition through Bass's Straits (see BASS), he was, on his return to England, promoted, and in 1801 sailed, as captain of the Investigator, for Australia, and, commencing at Cape Leuwen, surveyed the eastern coast, as far as Encounter Bay. He next sailed for Port Jackson, where having refitted, he explored Northumberland and Cumberland islands, and the great Barrier Reef of coral rocks. Thence he proceeded to Torres Straits, examined the Gulf of Carpentaria, thence to the island of Timor, and thence to Port Jackson, where he arrived in 1803. From the rotten state of his ship, he was no longer able to continue his survey; accordingly, he embarked for England in the Porpoise, for the purpose of laying the results of his investigations before the lords commissioners of the Admiralty. In this ship, however, he was wrecked on a coral reef, in sailing for Torres Straits; but, through his own intelligence and enterprise, not only saved the crew, but eventually was the means of rescuing them, when, in a vessel called the Cumberland, no larger than 29 tons, he set out for England. He crossed the Indian Ocean, and reached the Isle of France, where he and his people were made prisoners of war, notwithstanding that he held a French pass, enjoining that his ship should be respected wherever it should be found, on account of the scientific objects in which its captain was engaged. Here he was detained a prisoner for six years. At length he was restored to his liberty and his country, with all his plans and charts, excepting one of his log books, which had been either lost, kept, or destroyed. By this time the French had issued a volume and an atlas, marking a vast number of the parts surveyed by Flinders as those which had been visited by a navigator of their own nation. Flinders, however, was enabled to assert his own, although so broken in health, that he lived only to revise the last sheet of his work, when, on the very day that his book was published, he died. The work of Flinders is entitled "A Voyage to Terra Australia, in the years 1801, 1802, and 1803, in his Majesty's Ship Investigator, and subsequently in the armed Vessel Porpoise and Cumberland Schooner." (See AUSTRALIA and BROWN, Dr. Robert.)

Born at Donington, Lincolnshire, 1760; died 1814.

FLINDERS, a county of South Australia, being the termination of the peninsula which forms the western side of Spencer Gulf.

FLINDERS ISLANDS, a group of four small rocky islands off the N.E. coast of Australia, near the entrance to Bathurst Bay. Lat. 14° 11′ S. Lon. 144° 12′ E.

FLINSBERG, a Prussian town in the province of Silesia, on an elevated site 33 miles S.W. of Liegnitz. There is a slate quarry, and glass polishing is carried on. A mineral spring is in the vicinity, and there is a well-frequented bathing establishment. Pop. 1950.

FLINT, a seaport and Parliamentary borough of North Wales, the capital of Flintshire, is situate on the left side of the estuary of the Dee, 13 miles N.W. of Chester. It has the remains of an ancient castle. Vessels of 300 tons can reach the town. Pop. 5,126, chiefly employed in the coal and lead mines.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

FLINT, a river of Georgia, United States, uniting with the Chattahoochee and forming the Appalachicola, which flows into the Gulf of Mexico. The Flint has a course of 300 miles, 250 miles of which are navigable.

FLINT, TIMOTHY, Rev., American author, who was educated at Harvard College, and was afterwards minister of a Congregational church, a missionary and itinerant preacher. He wrote a history of his travels in the valley of the Mississippi; various novels and romances; a memoir of Daniel Boone, and contributed to American and English publications.

Born at Reading, Massachusetts, 1780; died at Salem, 1840.

FLINTSHIRE, flint'-sheer, a county of N. Wales, bounded N. by the Irish Sea, N.E. by the estuary of the Dee, E. by Cheshire, S.E. and S.W. by Denbighshire. It is the smallest county in Wales, and finely diversified by hills, declining into fertile vales, which are traversed by streams. The coast line, for the most part low and sandy, is 20 miles long. The only navigable river is the Dee. The Alyn and Clwyd are other streams. The celebrated vale of Clwyd occupies a portion of the county.

Pro.—Wheat and rye are the principal crops; and it has an excellent breed of cattle, which produce great quantities of milk, whence much butter and cheese are made.

Minerals.—Lead, copper, zinc, coal, limestone, &c. The lead-mines are extensive and valuable. There are more than 40 collieries and 45 lead-mines in the county.

Area.—244 square miles.

Pop.—80,373.

Chief Towns.—Flint, Mold, St. Asaph, and Rhyddlan.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

FLITSCH, or PLEIS, flitch, a market-town of Austria, on the right bank of the Isonzo, in the province of Carniola, 49 miles N.W. of Trieste. A fine old castle, a beautiful waterfall, and mines of antimony are in the vicinity. Pop. 2,100.

FLOBECQ, flo'-bake, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 20 miles N.E. of Tompai.

Manf. Linen, salt, oil, flour, and beer. Two fairs are held annually. Pop. 5,300.

FLODDEN, flod'-den, a village of Northumberland, 5 miles S.E. of Coldstream. In its neighbourhood a sanguinary engagement was fought in 1513, between the English and Scotch. The former were commanded by the earl of Surrey, and the latter by James IV., who was slain, with 10,000 of his followers, amongst whom were the flower of the Scotch nobility. A pillar of granite, called the King's Stone, commemorates the spot where the king fell.

FLONHEIM, a market-town of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the right bank of the Wisbach, 16 miles S.W. of Maine. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, a synagogue, and a townhouse. Pop. 1,650.

FLOOD, HENRY, flud, an Irish political orator, was the son of the Right Hon. Warden Flood, chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. He received his education at Dublin and Oxford, and in 1752 received the degree of M.A. at the latter university. In 1759 he entered the Irish parliament for the county of Kilkenny, and afterwards for the borough of Callan, where his eloquence acquired for him an uncommon popularity in his native country, which he lost when he obtained a seat in the British parliament, as member for Winchester. Mr. Flood published a Pindaric Ode to Fame, and translations from Demosthenes, Cicero, and Pindar, and several of his speeches have been also printed. He bequeathed the bulk of his property, after the death of his wife, to the university of Dublin, for the purpose of founding a professorship, purchasing manuscripts and books, and for granting premiums.

Born 1732; died 1791.

FLORA, flor'-a, the goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans, as Chloris was among the Greeks. She was worshipped among the Sabines, long before the foundation of Rome, and Tatius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and received from him the privileges of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying perpetual youth. She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty.

FLORAC, flo-rac', a town of France, department Lozère, near the confluence of the Tarnan and Tara. Seven annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,150.

FLORENCE, or FIRENZE, flo'-rence, a province of the kingdom of Italy, bounded on the N. and N.E. by the provinces of Modena, Bologna, Ravenna, and Forlì; E. by Urbino and Arezzo; S. by Arezzo and Siena, and W. by Lucca and Pisa. It is traversed by chains of the Apennines, and the surface is beautifully diversified, including the charming valley of the Arno; and on the north-west are plains, with the lakes Fucecchio and Bientina. The climate is generally mild and healthy.

Pro.—Wheat, maize, beans, olives, oranges, citrons, figs, and the vine is extensively cultivated. In the mountain districts there is excellent pasturage for sheep.

Minerals.—Copper, lead, mercury, marble, alabaster, and building stone.

Area.—2,262 square miles.

Pop.—774,309.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are five administrative districts,—Florence, San Miniato, Pistoja, Rocca, and San Casciano. The chief towns are FLORENCE, PISTOJA, and PRATO.

FLORENCE, the capital of the above province and of the recent grand duchy of Tuscany, one of the finest cities of Italy, and, indeed, of Europe, stands in a beautiful valley intersected by the Arno, and occupies both sides of the river, which is crossed by four bridges, one of which, the Ponte Santa Trinità, is much admired for its airy lightness. The town is surrounded by walls and defended by two castles. The handsomest square is the Piazza del Granduca, lined with elegant buildings, and adorned with statues. The cathedral, or Il Duomo, is of great extent and magnificence. The building was begun in 1298, and was not completed till the middle of the 15th century. Among the architects employed were Arnolfo de Cambio, Giotti, and Brunelleschi, the last of whom designed the splendid cupola, which Michael Angelo took as a model for that of St. Peter. Adjoining the cathedral, but separate, is the beautiful bell-tower, 260 feet high, and near it the octagonal baptistry of San Giovanni, with the famous bronze gates by Ghiberti, called by Michael Angelo "the gates of Paradise." The church of San Lorenzo, rebuilt by Brunelleschi, in 1425, on the site of an older edifice consecrated in 393, contains the magnificent mausoleum of the Medicis, with the renowned statues of Julian and Lorenzo de Medici, by Michael Angelo. In the adjoining convent is the library of the same family, valuable chiefly for its MSS. The church of Santa Croce, built in the 13th century by Arnolfo, contains monuments to Dante, Galileo, Machiavelli, Michael Angelo, and Alfieri. The church of Santa Maria Nuova is another fine and interesting structure. The Palazzo Vecchio, or old palace, was the seat of the republican government. It has a bell tower 260 feet high. Il Bargello, once the palace of the podesta, or republican magistrate, is now used as a prison. In the chapel are portraits of Dante, Brunetti, Donati, and other eminent Florentines. Gli Uffizi is a splendid building near the Arno, famous as containing the superb Florentine Gallery, occupying a suite of 23 rooms, and containing the choicest treasures of art, and the great Magliabecchi Library. The Palazzo Riccardi contains a fine public library, and the Palazzo Strozzi is another great ornament to the city. The Palazzo Pitti, the grand ducal residence before the annexation of Florence to the kingdom of Italy, and now a royal palace, has a gallery of paintings and a large library. Piazza del Palazzo Vecchio is an open square, containing many statues, and on one side is the beautiful arcade, the Loggia de Lanzi, under the porticoes of which are noble groups of sculpture. Among the leading public institutions are the Academy della Crusca, established for preserving the purity of the Italian language; the medical college and hospital of Santa Maria Nuova; the Academy of Fine Arts, and the Museum of Natural History; and an academy of agriculture. There are two fine market places, the Mercato Vecchio (or old market), and the Mercato Nuova (new market). The Boboli Gardens, laid out in 1550, are a delightful place of resort. Four large blocks of buildings for dwellings for the working classes, and containing about 1,000 rooms, have recently been erected.

Manf.—Satin, taffetas, silks, woollens, damask, straw hats, jewellery, and mosaics of precious stones.

Lat.—43° 46′ N. Lon. 11° 15′ E.

History.—Florence owes its origin to a colony of Roman soldiers, who, after the battle of Perugia, received a portion of territory in the neighbourhood of Fiesole. In the middle ages it was one of the greatest of the Tuscan republics, and figured conspicuously in the great contests between Emperors and Popes. In 1348 occurred the great plague made famous by Boccaccio, in which 100,000 lives were lost. Under the sway of Napoleon I. it was united to the French empire as capital of the department Arno. It was afterwards the capital of the grand duchy of Tuscany, and on the formation of the kingdom of Italy was at first chosen as the capital, but in 1871, Rome superseded it in that dignity. It was the birthplace of many celebrated men: among whom may be named Petrarch, Boccaccio, Guicciardini, Lorenzo de' Medici, Michael Angelo, Galileo, Benvenuto Cellini, and several others.

FLORENCE, the capital of Lauderdale county, Alabama, United States, at the head of the navigation of the Tennessee river, here half a mile wide, and crossed by a fine bridge. A considerable shipping trade is carried on. Pop. 2,000.

FLORES, flor'-es, an island of the Malayan Archipelago, S. of Celebes. It is 200 miles long, with an average breadth of 35. Hilly and volcanic. Prod. Cotton, bees'-wax, and sandal-wood. The trade is chiefly carried on with Singapore. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 8° to 9° S. Lon. 120° to 123° E.

FLORES, the most westerly of the Azore Islands, 30 miles long, with a breadth of about 8. It is mountainous, but fertile; producing wheat, rye, fruits, yams, and cedar-wood. Manf. Woollen cloths. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 39° 25′ N. Lon. 31° 12′ W.

FLORES, an island in the estuary of La Plata, South America, Uruguay, 20 miles below Monte Video. Lat. 34° 56′ S. Lon. 55° 55′ W.

FLORES, an island of North America, lying to the west of Vancouver's Island, in the Pacific, 15 miles long, and from 2 to 6 broad. Lat. 49° 20′ N. Lon. 126 W.

FLORES, a town of Brazil, on the right bank of the Parana, in the midst of a fertile district. Pop. 2,400.

FLORIAN, JEAN PIERRE CLARIS DE, flor'-e-an, a French writer, whose ready talent attracted the attention of Voltaire, who procured him the place of page to the duc de Penthièvre, whose friendship he obtained and who gave him a captain's commission in his regiment of dragoons. He devoted himself, however, principally to letters, and produced a number of works, chiefly of the romantic kind. His first was "Galatée," published in 1782, which was followed by his "Théâtre," containing "Les Deux Billets," "Le Bon Ménage," "Le Bon Père," "La Bonne Mère," and "Le Bon Fils." His "Voltaire et le Serf du Mont Jura" gained him the prize given by the French Academy, of which society he became a member. His "Estelle" is reckoned equal to "Galatée;" and his "Numa Pompilius," "Gonzalvo de Cordova," and his "Fables," which rank next to those of La Fontaine, are also highly esteemed. For his "Numa" he was sent to prison during the reign of Robespierre. In his confinement he began a poem on the story of "William Tell," and finished another, entitled "Ebrahim." He gained his liberty after the fall of Robespierre.
Born 1755; died 1794.

FLORIANUS, MARCUS ANTONIUS, half brother of the emperor Tacitus, assumed the purple after the death of the latter, and caused himself to be acknowledged by the senate. Probus, however, having been proclaimed by the legions of the East, Florian marched against him; but experiencing a check in one of his first encounters, his soldiers killed him. He reigned but two months.
Died 276.

FLORIDA, flor'-e-da, the most southerly of the United States of America, bounded N. by the states of Georgia and Alabama, E. by the Atlantic, S. by the Gulf of Mexico, and W. by the Mississippi. The greatest breadth is 360 miles, and the greatest length 400 miles. The south-eastern part consists of a large peninsula about 120 miles in average breadth. It almost entirely consists of what are called everglades, or swamps, hardly passable to any but the Indians who inhabit the islands scattered among them. The coast-line is more than 1,000 miles in length, but there are four good harbours. In the interior there is a chain of lakes, the extreme south of which is Lake Okechobee. There are several spacious bays and harbours: Chatham, Charlotte, Espiritu Santo, and Vascasana on the peninsula, and Appalachee, Pensacola, and others on the mainland.

Rivers.—The country is intersected by a number of navigable streams, the principal of which are the Appalachicola and the Suwanee, falling into the Gulf of Mexico, and the St. John's and Ocklockonne, flowing into the Atlantic.

Climate.—Hot, though various. In winter there is seldom frost, nor is the cold ever so severe as to injure the China orange-tree. In W. Florida the mercury seldom falls below 30° of Fahrenheit, and seldom rises above 94° in the shade. From the 1st of July to the middle of October, fevers are prevalent in both the Floridas.

Zoology.—The panther, wild cat, buffalo, fox, hare, goat, rabbit, otter, racoon, flying squirrel, armadille, opossum, guana, and several sorts of serpents. Birds exist in great variety, and are numerous. The rivers abound in fish, but are at the same time, infested with alligators.

Pro.—Cotton (especially the Sea Island variety, which is very abundant), coffee, rice, the sugar-cane, tobacco, the fruits of the tropical regions, a variety of different kinds of wood, and wheat, maize, barley, oats, corn, pease, buck, rye, and rice. Vast herds of cattle are reared on the grazing-lands.

Area.—60,000 square miles.

Lat.—Between 25° and 31° N. Lon. between 80° and 87° 44′ W.

Chief Towns.—TALLAHASSEE, the seat of government: St. Augustine, on the Gulf, formerly the Spanish capital, and one of the oldest settlements in America: PENSACOLA, Appalachicola, and Key West.)

History.—Florida was discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in the year 1497, but first described by Ponce de Leon, who landed at St. Augustine in 1512. Its conquest was accomplished by the Spaniards, under Fernando de Soto, in 1539. In 1763 it was ceded to Britain, but in 1781 was recovered by Spain, and confirmed to her by the peace of 1783. In 1821 it was purchased from Spain by the United States; in 1839 its constitution was formed, and in 1845 it was admitted into the Union, and sends two members to the House of Representatives.

FLORIDA, CAPE, the E. point of East Florida, with a lighthouse in lat. 25° 41′ N.; lon. 80° 3′ W.

FLORIDA, GULF OF, the channel between the peninsula of Florida and the Bahama islands, N. of Cuba, and through which the Gulf Stream finds a passage, running N.E. along the American coast. The channel is 200 miles long, 150 miles wide at the southern extremity, and 65 miles at the northern.

FLORIDA KEYS, or MARTYRS' ISLANDS, a number of rocks and sand-banks, bounded W. by the Gulf of Mexico, E. by that of Florida. On one of the islets is the arsenal of Key-west, belonging to the United States. Lat. between 24° and 25° N. Lon. between 80° and 83° W.

FLORIDA, a town in Montgomery county, New York, United States, on the Erie canal, 34 miles N.W. of Albany. Pop. 4,000.

FLORIDA BLANCA, JOSEFO MONINO, Count of, Spanish statesman, studied at Salamanca, and his abilities having attracted attention, was sent on an embassy to Pope Clement XIV. He was afterwards appointed Spanish minister of foreign affairs, created a count, and entrusted with many important administrative functions. He formed good roads, introduced post-coaches, organised a better administration of police, and promoted the arts and sciences. He supported an attack upon Algiers in 1777, and at the siege of Gibraltar in 1782. Under the succeeding monarch, Charles IV., he fell into disgrace, was imprisoned, and afterwards banished, and his estates confiscated.

Born at Murcia, 1728; died 1808.

FLORIDIA, flo-rid'-e-a, a town of Sicily, 7 miles N.W. of Syracuse, between two branches of the Anapo. Pop. 10,177.

FLORIO, GIOVANNI, flo'-re-o, a philological writer, and teacher of languages in the university of Oxford. After the accession of James I. he was appointed tutor in French and Italian to Henry prince of Wales, and gentleman of the privy chamber, and clerk of the closet to the queen. He died of the plague. His works exhibit much learning, but the titles are fantastic and the style pedantic. It is thought that Shakspeare satirised him in the character of Holofernes, in "Love's Labour Lost." He wrote a translation of Montaigne's Essays, a copy of which, with Shakspeare's autograph, is in the British Museum.

Born in London, 1552.; died at Fulham, 1625.

FLORIS, FRANS, flor'-s, a Flemish historical painter, surnamed the "Flemish Raphael." He was held in high estimation by Charles V. and Philip II. of Spain, and amassed a very large fortune. Amongst his best works are the "Twelve Labours of Hercules," and a "Last Judgment."

Born at Antwerp, 1520; died 1570.

FLORUS, LUCIUS ANNÆUS, flor'-us, a Latin historian, of the same family as Seneca and Lucan. He wrote an "Abridgment of the Roman History," in four books, which is concise and elegant.

Lived in the 2nd century.

FLOTTE, LA, flot, a maritime town of France, on the north side of the island Ré, in the Bay of Biscay, department Charente-Inférieure, 9 miles N.W. of Rochelle. There is a good harbour, and salt, wine, and vinegar are exported. Pop. 2,200.

FLOUR, ST., floor, a town of France, in the department of Cantal, situated at an elevation of 3,000 feet. At the foot of the rock is a suburb, which communicates with the town by a winding road. It has a cathedral, public library, and college. Manf. Iron-ware, cloth, and table-linen. Pop. 4,000.

FLOURENS, MARIE JEAN PIERRE, floor-ohn. French anatomist and physiologist, who obtained the degree of doctor of medicine at Montpellier when only 19 years old, and then went to Paris, where he associated with Cuvier and other eminent naturalists. He wrote many physiological works of great value. In 1832 he succeeded Cuvier as professor of natural history in the Jardin du Roi, and in the following year was appointed perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences. He was created a peer of France in 1846, and professor in the Collége de France in 1855.

Born at Maureilhan, 1794; died near Paris, 1867.

FLOYD, floyd, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 452 square miles. Pop. 24,418. The capital is Rome.

FLOYD, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 144 square miles. Pop. 24,500. Capital, New Albany.

FLOYD, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 14,677.

FLOYD, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 960 square miles. Pop 10,176. Prestonburg is the capital.

FLOYD, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 525 square miles. Pop. 13,255. Jacksonville is the capital.

FLUSHING, flush'-ing, a fortified seaport and the most important naval station of the Netherlands, on the south coast of the island of Walcheren, on the north side of the Western Scheldt, where that river disembogues itself into the North Sea. The approach to the harbour is between two jetties, which break the action of the sea. Inside the town are two basins, one of sufficient size and depth to contain a fleet of men-of-war. It has dockyards, a town-hall, and is the seat of an admiralty board. It has a large trade, and an extensive packet-boat communication. Pop. 36,000. Lat. 51° 12′ 26″ N. Lon. 3° E.—Flushing was the first town which, in 1572, declared against the Spaniards. In 1585, the Prince of Orange pledged it to Queen Elizabeth as a security for a loan which she had made to the Netherlanders in their struggle against Philip II. of Spain. The English held it till 1616. At the commencement of the 19th century it came into the possession of the French, and in 1809 was bombarded by the British under Lord Chatham, composing the Walcheren expedition, when it suffered severely. Admiral de Ruyter was born here. (See RUYTER, DE.)

FLUSHING, a small seaport opposite Falmouth, in the county of Cornwall, noted for the mildness of its climate, and much resorted to by invalids. It has docks for shipbuilding, and a large dry dock.

FLUSHING, a township of New York, United States, on Long Island, 9 miles from the city of New York. Pop. 6,683.

FLUVANNA, floo-van'-na, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 416 square miles. Pop. 10,802.

FO, or FOE, the founder of a religious sect, which, in the empire of China, reckons a great number of followers, whose tenets appear to be much the same as those of Buddha. He reformed the religion of the Brahmins, denied the distinction of castes, and the superiority of any one class of men, and taught a doctrine, of which the fundamental precepts are, not to lie, to do to others as we would be done by, to kill no living creature, to abstain from wine, to avoid all impurity, and to believe in future rewards and punishments. His doctrines only began to be prevalent in China 200 years B.C. His priests are called Bonzes, and live in monasteries, travelling also considerably about the empire, and living for the most part on alms.

Born at Benares, or in Cashmere, about 1027 B.C.

FOCHABERS, fok'-a-bers, a picturesque village on the right bank of the Spey, Morayshire, Scotland, 8 miles S.E. of Elgin. Gordon Castle, the seat of the Duke of Richmond, is in the vicinity. Pop. 1,227.

FOGARAS, fo-gar'-as, a market town of Austria, on the Alt, in Transylvania, 32 miles N.W of Kronstadt. There are an old castle, and handsome churches, with a Protestant gymnasium. Manf. Morocco leather. Pop. 4,200.

FOGGIA, fodj'-a, a walled town of Italy, capital of a province of the same name, 80 miles N.E. of Naples, 40 miles from Benevento. It is well built, most of the houses being reconstructed since an earthquake, which happened in 1731. The cathedral, then partially destroyed, has been rebuilt. There are several old churches, a fine custom house, and other good buildings. It has large storehouses for keeping corn. Pop. of the province, 370,947; of the town, 40,005.

FOGLIA, fo'-le-a, a river of Italy, rising in the eastern slope of the Apennines, about 3 miles W. of Sestino, and falling into the Adriatic.

FOGO. (See CAPE VERD ISLANDS.)

FOHI, fo'-he, the first Chinese emperor and legislator. He is said to have founded this kingdom 2,207 years B.C. Nothing certain is known of his reign; but there are attributed to him the institution of marriage, the invention of fishing, hunting, music, and writing. He acknowledged and worshipped a supreme deity.

FOHR, for, an island on the W. coast of Schleswig, in the North Sea. Area, 28 square miles. Pop. 5,000, mostly Frisians. Manf. Cheese and stockings. The chief place is Utyk, resorted to for bathing. Lat. 54° 43′ N. Lon. 8° 30′ W.

FOIX, fwaw, a town of France, on the Ariége, and in the department of the same name, 44 miles S.E. of Toulouse. There is an old castle, with three marble towers. There is a trade in leather, wool, iron, and cattle, and there are ironworks in the vicinity. Pop. 4,850. This was the capital of the old comte de Foix, part of the domain of Henry IV., and now forming the department of Ariége.

FOIX, GASTON III., Comte de, viscount de Béarn, succeeded his father, Gaston II., at the age of 12, and rendered himself remarkable for his valour, magnificence, and handsome person. He is accused, however, of possessing a violent temper, and having caused the death of his own son. This young prince, unjustly suspected of having attempted to poison his father, was imprisoned by the orders of Gaston, at the instigation of Charles the Bad, and left to perish of hunger, in his dungeon. The life of Gaston was passed in continual wars. In 1345 he was fighting against the English; in 1356 in Prussia; two years afterwards on the side of the court, against the revolt of the Jacquerie; in 1372 against count Armagnac; and, in 1375, against the duke de Berri. He was passionately fond of the chase, and wrote a book on the subject. Froissard lived for several years in his castle.

Born at Foix, 1331; died 1391.

FOIX, GASTON DE, a descendant of the above, was a son of Marie d'Orleans, sister of Louis XII. of France, who conferred on him the title of duc de Nemours. He greatly distinguished himself in the Italian wars, drove Pope Julius II. from Bologna, captured Brescia from the Venetians, and in 1512 gained a great victory over the Spaniards at Ravenna, in which, however, he lost his life at the early age of 23.

Born 1489; died 1512.

FOJANO, fo-ya'-no, a town of Italy, 43 miles S.E. of Florence. It is surrounded by a modern wall, and is well built. There are three parish churches, a Benedictine convent, and a large hospital. There is an important weekly market. Pop. 7,000.

FO-KIEN, fo'-keen, a maritime province of China, bounded on the S.E. by the China Sea, and inclosed on its other sides by the provinces Chekiang, Kiang-si, and Quang-tong. It is mountainous, with the river Min running through it, and entering the sea below the capital city, Foochow-foo. Pro. Black tea, sugar, camphor, tobacco, and indigo. Minerals. Iron and alum. Exp. Tea, porcelain, umbrellas, and other kinds of manufactured goods. Pop. about 26,000,000. Lat. between 24° and 28° N. Lon. between 116° and 121° E.

FOKSCHANI, foks-cha'-ne, a town of Wallachia, on the right bank of the Miklov, near the Moldavian frontier, 92 miles N.E. of Bucharest. It was nearly destroyed by the Russians in 1789, and burnt by the Turks in 1822. Pop. 3,000; of suburb, on Moldavian side of river, 20,000.

FOKTU, fok'-too, a town of the Austrian empire in Hungary, 9 miles W. of Kalocsa. There is a beautiful archiepiscopal summer residence. Pop. 3,100; Catholics and Protestants being about equal in number.

FOLARD, CHARLES, fo'-lar, a French officer, who, in 1702, became aide-de-camp to M. de Vendôme, who undertook nothing without consulting him. For his services, he was rewarded with a pension and the cross of St. Louis. He was wounded at the battle of Cassano, and taken prisoner at that of Malplaquet. Being exchanged he was sent to Malta, to assist in its defence against the Turks. He afterwards served under Charles XII. of Sweden, and was present at the siege of Frederickshall, when that prince was killed December 11, 1718. He then returned to France, and served under the duke of Berwick. He wrote "Commentaries upon Polybius," 6 vols. 4to; "A Book of New Discoveries in War," and "A Treatise on the Defence of Places."

Born at Avignon, 1669; died 1752.

FOLDVAR, fold'-var, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Danube, 50 miles S. of Buda. It is pleasantly situated partly on the side and partly on the crest of a hill, and was once strongly fortified. There is a Roman Catholic high school. The district in which it stands is fruitful in corn and wine. Pop. 12,000. It has an extensive sturgeon fishery, and is a steam-packet station.

FOLDVAR, a market town of Austria in Transylvania, 12 miles from Kronstadt. Pop. 2,100.

FOLDVAR TISZA, a small town of Hungary, on the Theiss. There is a trade in cattle, and wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 4,700.

FOLEY, JOHN HENRY, A.R.A., fo'-le, an eminent sculptor, who, from Dublin, went to London, in 1834, and became a student in the Royal Academy. His first exhibitions were "Innocence" and "The Death of Abel;" both of which, in 1839, appeared on the walls of the academy, and attracted much attention. Next year appeared his "Ino and the Infant Bacchus," which further increased his fame; and from that time he may be said to have taken his place amongst the best sculptors of the day. Besides those works already named, he produced "Lear and Cordelia," "Venus rescuing Æneas," "Prospero narrating his Adventures to Miranda," and several others, displaying a rich faculty of invention, and truly classic taste in execution. He also produced many portraits and monumental memorials, which greatly helped to extend his reputation. In 1850 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. Among his later works was a fine equestrian statue of Lord Hardinge, erected at Calcutta.

Born at Dublin, 1818; died 1874.

FOLIGNO, fo-leen'-yo, a town of Italy, on the Topino, 10 miles N. of Spoleto. It has a beautiful cathedral and other churches, with the Palazzo Communale. Manf. Woollens, parchment, wax candles, soap, paper, and playing cards. Pop. 22,648. This is the ancient Fulginum of Umbria. It suffered much damage from an earthquake in 1832.

FOLKES, MARTIN, fokes, an English philosopher and antiquary, who, after receiving a private education, was sent to Clare Hall, Cambridge. At the age of 23 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1723 was nominated one of the vice-presidents. In 1741 he succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as president of that learned body, and was, about the same time, elected a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. He was also created a doctor of laws by both universities. Mr. Folkes wrote, besides a number of papers in the Philosophical Transactions, "A Table of English Silver Coins, from the Norman Conquest to 1745." A second edition of this work appeared in 1763.

Born at Westminster, 1690; died in London, 1754.

FOLKSTONE, or FOLKESTONE, foke-stone, a seaport and municipal borough, and a favourite watering-place of Kent, with a spacious harbour and battery, 6 miles from Dover, of which cinque port it is a member. The old town stands on very uneven ground, at the foot of a range of hills; but a new town, containing many good houses and fine hotels, is rapidly rising into importance. The Custom House Buildings, an extensive edifice, was erected in 1854. The harbour-master's residence is a handsome structure in the Venetian style, with a campanile tower. The town-hall, in the Italian style, was built in 1860. There are very large and handsome hotels, and a large bathing establishment in the Italian style, opened in 1869. Besides the parish church of St. Mary and St. Eanswith, a venerable cruciform structure (recently restored), there are four other churches, and several places of worship for dissenters. This place is situate between two high cliffs, opposite Boulogne, with which it is connected by a line of steam-packets, and carries on a considerable trade. A viaduct carries the South-Eastern line of railway across the hollow in which the town lies. Pop. 18,887.—A station on the South-Eastern railway.

FOLLONICA, fol-lo-ne'-ka, a maritime village of Italy, on the Mediterranean, 12 miles from Piombino. It is an unhealthy place, and, on account of its malaria, is almost entirely deserted from July to October. The ore raised in the island of Elba is brought to Follonica to be smelted.

FONBLANQUE, ALBANY W., fon'-blank, journalist, was brought up to the legal profession, but was never called to the bar. He early began to direct his attention to political questions, and, on Leigh Hunt and his brother parting with the Examiner newspaper, it passed into the proprietorship of Mr. Fonblanque. In the columns of this journal his talents were fully recognized. In 1837 he published a selection of his papers from the Examiner, and entitled them "England under Seven Administrations," which were much admired. In 1852 he was appointed secretary to the statistical department of the Board of Trade, when his superintendence of the Examiner may be considered to have virtually ceased. He afterwards became head of the same department and comptroller of corn returns.

Born 1797; died 1872.

FOND DU LAC, fond'-doo-lak', a county of Wisconsin, United States. Pop. 46,859.

FOND DU LAC, chief town of the above county. It is pleasantly situated near the head of Lake Winnebago. There is a large trade in grain, provisions, and timber. Pop. 13,000.

FONDI, fon'-de, a town of Italy, 50 miles N.W. of Naples. It consists of only one street, and is built on the Via Appia, which remains here in its original state, and consists of large flags, skilfully fitted together without cement. The wines of Fondi are still in repute. Pop. 5,000.

FONNI, fon'-ne, a small town of the island of Sardinia, on the southern slope of Montespada. It is ill-built, contains an ancient church, and a Franciscan monastery. Manf. Linen and woollen cloth. There is a well frequented annual fair. Pop. 3,200.

FONSECA, fon-sa'-ka, a bay on the Pacific coast of Central America, between the states of San Salvador and Nicaragua.

FONTAINE, JEAN DE LA, fon'-tain, a French poet, who was educated first at Rheims, and afterwards under the fathers of the Oratory. He was a man of great simplicity of manners, credulous, fearful, and uncommonly absent. He lived for some time with the superintendent Fouquet, who allowed him a pension. Afterwards he was in the service of Princess Henrietta of England, and next lived with Madame de la Sablière. As an illustration of the laziness of his disposition, that lady on one occasion, having parted with her servants, said, "I have got rid of all my animals except three—my cat, my dog, and La Fontaine." He was married, but his wife had as little knowledge of the management of a household as himself. He wrote some licentious tales, which are little read; but his fables are very generally put into the hands of young people. They are natural, poetical, and entertaining. He also wrote "Les Amours de Psyché," a romance, some comedies, letters, &c., to be found in his miscellanies. In his later years, La Fontaine inclined seriously towards religion, and many of his more unworthy works, he, at the instance of his confessor, suppressed. As a fable-writer he is unsurpassed; and his writings in this path are remarkable for their great simplicity and exquisite beauty.

Born at Château-Thierry, 1621; died 1695.

FONTAINE, PIERRE FRANÇOIS LEONARD, an architect, who has been called the father of the modern French school, early began the study of his art, and, in 1785, carried away the second prize for architecture. He then became a pensioner of the society, to be maintained at Rome, and, having presented drawings of the "imperial city," as it was in the time of the Cæsars, he received an extraordinary prize of 3,000 francs. After the Revolution, and the elevation of Napoleon I. to the consulate, he and Percier, a brother architect, were employed to restore Malmaison. Under the imperial rule, he was further employed to restore all the palaces and complete the Louvre and the Tuileries, which, with numerous other works, occupied him and Percier throughout the whole of the rule of Napoleon I. On the fall of the empire, he was named architect to Louis XVIII., which place he held till 1848. He next became president of the Council of the Civil Buildings, and by his vast experience was thus enabled still to direct some of the works of France.

Born at Pontoise, 1762; died in Paris, 1853.

FONTAINEBLEAU, fon'-tain-blo, a town of France, in the department of Seine-et-Marne, 35 miles S.E. of Paris. Here is a celebrated royal palace, encompassed by parks and gardens, mentioned in history, ever since the 12th century, as the residence of the monarchs of France. It forms a vast but irregular pile of building, and was the scene of Bonaparte's first resignation of the imperial dignity in 1814; as it was also the place where Pope Pius VII. was detained for eighteen months. Enormous sums have been spent on the adornment of this château, and the park is laid out in the most magnificent style, with temples, statues, waterfalls and fountains. The forest surrounding the château covers an extent of 64 square miles. There are several fine public buildings in the town, including a hospital erected by Anne of Austria, and another by Madame de Montespan. The place is famous for the grapes grown in the vicinity, and considerable quantities of wine and fruit are sent to Paris. Manf. Porcelain. Pop. 8,900.

FONTANA, DOMENICO, fon-ta'-na, an Italian architect and mechanic, who was architect to Pope Sextus V., and raised the Roman obelisk from the dust in the front of St. Peter's, a work deemed impracticable, and which many others had attempted in vain. He erected the Lateran palace and the Vatican library, and the aqueduct known as Aqua Felue. He was removed from his position in 1592, and entered the service of the king of Naples, for whom he built a palace, formed the fine promenade along the bay, and executed other important works.

Born at Milo, 1543; died at Naples, 1607.

FONTANA, PROSPERO, an historical painter, who was preceptor to Ludovico and Annibale Caracci.

Born at Bologna, 1512; died at Rome, 1597.

FONTANA, LAVINIA, daughter of the preceding, was also an excellent painter of portraits, and was patronized by Pope Gregory XIII.

Died 1602.

FONTANA, FELICE, physiologist, who studied at Parma, Padua, and Bologna, and became professor of philosophy in the university of Pisa. The grand duke Leopold of Tuscany afterwards appointed him court physiologist, and entrusted him with the formation of the famous museum of natural history and physiology at Florence. Fontana also prepared a splendid collection for the museum of Vienna.

Born in the Italian Tyrol, 1730; died 1803.

FONTANES, LOUIS, marquis de, fon-tané', French author and politician. He was descended from an old Protestant family of Languedoc, and achieved a reputation in Paris, when a young man, by the publication of some elegant original poems, and versions of Pope's "Essay on Man," and Gray's "Elegy." He was afterwards a journalist on the popular side, and in 1802 was elected to the legislative body, of which he became president in 1804. In 1810 he entered the senate. After the fall of Napoleon, he attached himself to the Bourbons, and Louis XVIII. raised him to the peerage.

Born at Niort, 1757; died 1821.

FONTARABIA. (See FUENTERRABIA.)

FONTE MODERATA, fon'-tai, a Venetian lady, who wrote two poems; one entitled "Il Floridoro," the other on the "Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ." She also produced a work in prose, in which she asserts that women are not inferior in understanding to men.

Born at Venice, 1555; died 1592.

FONTENAY LE COMTE, or FONTENAY-VENDÉE, fon'-te-nai-le(r) konte, a town of France, in the department of Vendée, 28 miles N.E. of Rochelle. It has a beautiful Gothic church with a spire 312 feet high, a college, and a fountain, which is supposed to have given name to the place. Manf. Linen, leather, and woollen cloths. Pop. 6,000.

FONTENAY, THÉRÈSE DE CABARRAS, Marquise de, fon'-te-nai, a Spanish lady, who became first the wife of M. Devin, marquis of Fontenay, a councillor in Paris, and afterwards the wife of Tallien. She subsequently separated from Tallien, and became the wife of prince de Chimay, notwithstanding that her first husband was still alive. The Church, however, refused to ratify her marriage, and she continued to struggle against the feelings of society, in a vain endeavour to be received into it, until 1816, when she retired to a private retreat, where she passed the remainder of her days in tranquillity. She was very beautiful, and extremely engaging by her great wit.

Born at Saragossa, Spain, 1773; died at Chimay, 1835.

FONTENELLE, BERNARD LE BOVIERDE, fon'-te-nel, a celebrated French writer, whose father was a counsellor of Rouen, and mother a sister of Corneille. Young Fontenelle was educated at the college of the Jesuits, and bred to the legal profession, which, however, he abandoned for literature, and went to Paris in 1674. His first efforts were directed to the stage, and although they were directed by his uncle, Corneille, he did not succeed. In 1683 he published his "Dialogues of the Dead," which were well received. His conversations on the "Plurality of Worlds," which appeared in 1686, further added to his reputation; and the year following he published the "History of Oracles," taken chiefly from Van Dale. In 1688 he printed pastorals, which also became popular. He was admitted a member of the French Academy in 1691, and, in 1697, of the Academy of Sciences. He subsequently became secretary of the latter, and filled that office with honour from 1699 to 1741. In this capacity he wrote a history of the academy, and distinguished himself by the excellent eulogies which he composed upon its deceased members. Besides the above works he wrote a "History of the French Theatre," "Elements of the Geometry of Infinities," "Moral Discourses," &c., several operas, and even when more than 90 years of age, madrigals. Fontenelle is said, by some critics, to have been especially distinguished for the clearness and simplicity of his style, and to have possessed, in an eminent degree, the power of making scientific matters intelligible to all readers. As a man of the world, he shone by the sharpness of his wit and the smartness of his repartees; although he was also remarkable for his moderation and reserve in an age when there was not much of these qualities. Arsène Houssaye, in his sparkling work on the "Men and Women of the Eighteenth Century," says of him that "he always wanted a compliment; a slave to his vanity, he made himself the slave to the first comer. The roof which sheltered him in this world was never other than the roof of hospitality; he passed his days here and there; with Thomas Corneille, with M. Le Haguais, with M. Aube (you know him—that M. Aube celebrated by Rulhières). Again, he always dined out—with Madame de Tencin, with Madame d'Epinais, with Madame de Lambert, with Madame d'Argenton; in fine, everywhere except at home. This style of living could not fail of being economical. He, therefore, although a poet without patrimony, died with an income of 35,000 livres, without speaking of 75,000 livres in ringing coins, which, when about 87, he had concealed in his mattress, doubtless to repose upon in the other world." On seeing his hearse pass, Piron exclaimed "This is the first time that M. de Fontenelle has left home not to go and dine in the city." Had he lived another month he would have been 100 years old.

Born at Rouen, 1657; died at Paris, 1757.

FONTENOY, fon'-te-noi, a village of Belgium, in Hainault, 5 miles S.W. of Tournay. Pop. 800.—It is celebrated for a battle fought near it, May 11, 1745, in which the British, under the duke of Cumberland, and their allies were defeated by the French, who were commanded by Marshal Saxe.

FONTEVRAULT, fon'-tev-rolte, a small town of France, department of Maine-et-Loire, 8 miles S.E. of Saumur, famous for the great Benedictine abbey, founded in 1099, the old buildings of which are now one of the largest prisons in France, about 2,000 convicts being generally confined there. Several of the Plantagenet kings of England were buried there, and the tombs of Henry II. and his queen, Eleanor, of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and of Isabelle, the queen of John, are still preserved. Pop. 700.

FONZ, fonz, a town of Spain, province of Huesca, near the left bank of the Cinca. Manf. Linen, leather, soap, wine and oil. Pop. 2,800.

FOO-CHOO-FOO, or FOO-CHOW, foo-choo', a city and port of China, capital of the province of Fo-Kien, on the left bank of the Min. It stands in a large plain, surrounded by hills, and is surrounded with thick walls, 30 feet high, about 3 miles from the river, the suburbs occupying the intermediate space, and extending to a small island in the river, connected by a stone bridge. The streets of the town are narrow and excessively dirty, but there are several large and showy pagodas, and official residences. The entrance to the harbour is difficult, but there is good anchorage at Pagoda Island, 8 miles lower down the river. The river and a sheet of water, Li-hu, on the west side of the city, are crowded with floating habitations. Tea, timber, fruit, tobacco, and oil-cake, are exported. This is one of the five ports opened to foreigners by the treaty of 1843. Pop. 600,000. Lat. 26° 2′ N. Lon. 119° 25′ E.

FOO-KEE-HIEN, foo-ke-hï'-en, a town of China, on the left bank of the Yang-tze-Kiang, famous for the assemblage of students and literary men. Here the examinations for degrees take place.

FOOTA, foot'-a, a large territory of Senegambia, West Africa. The soil is very fertile and well cultivated, producing rice, cereals, cotton, and tobacco. There are extensive forests, abounding in wild animals. The people profess Mahometanism, but are little better than heathens. Their numbers are unknown.

FOOTE, SAMUEL, foot, an English dramatic writer and actor, whose father was justice of the peace for the county of Cornwall. Foote was educated at Worcester college, Oxford, whence he removed to the Temple, for the purpose of pursuing the law; but this he quitted for the attractions of the stage. His first performance was in 1744, in the character of "Othello." In 1747 he opened the "little theatre in the Haymarket," with a dramatic piece of his own, called "The Diversions of the Morning," which had a great success, and which was a representation of real characters, whose very voice, gait, and gestures were strikingly imitated. His next piece was called "An Auction of Pictures," in which he represented some of the most noted individuals of the day. He still continued to play at one or other of the theatres, and frequently produced new pieces. In 1760 he brought out the "Minor" at his own house in the Haymarket; but, in 1766, had the misfortune to break his leg, which was obliged to be amputated. The duke of York, out of compassion, now procured for him a patent for life for the theatre in the Haymarket. In 1776 he attacked the duchess of Kingston in a piece, which was suppressed by authority. Soon after this, a charge was brought against him, which broke his heart, although he was honourably acquitted by the jury. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Foote had an infinite fund of comic humour, both in writing and conversation; but he took unwarrantable liberties in mimicking persons merely on account of natural failings and peculiarities of manner. His farces have procured him the title of the English Aristophanes. Dr. Johnson said, that for loud, obstreperous, broad-faced mirth, he had no equal.

Born at Truro, 1720; died at Dover, 1777.

FORBACH, for'-bak, a town of France, department Moselle, 35 miles N.E. of Metz. It is built on the side of a hill, surmounted by the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Pipes, soap, leather, glass, and wire gauze. Pop. 4,800.

FORBES, WILLIAM, forbs, first Protestant bishop of Edinburgh. After studying at several universities, he went to England, where he was offered the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, which he declined. When Charles I., in 1634, erected Edinburgh into an episcopal see, he appointed Dr. Forbes to fill it; but the bishop enjoyed this dignity only three months. He wrote "Considerationes modestæ et pacificæ Controversiarum de Justificatione, &c."

Born 1585; died 1634.

FORBES, DUNCAN, an eminent Scotch judge, and an excellent writer, who was educated first at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Leyden. In 1708 he began to practise as an advocate at the Scotch bar, and was appointed sheriff of Midlothian. In 1717 he was appointed solicitor-general of Scotland, in 1725 lord advocate, and, in 1737, president of the Court of Session. In the rebellion of 1745 he zealously opposed the Pretender, but the ingratitude with which he was treated by the government, which even refused to reimburse some expenses which he had incurred, preyed upon his mind and brought on a fever, of which he died. He protested against the prisoners being taken out of Scotland to be tried by English juries, and proposed a subscription for their assistance. His lordship was a man of great piety and learning, and well versed in the Hebrew scriptures, as appears from his "Letter to a Bishop on Hutchinson's Writings and Discoveries," in 1732; "Thoughts concerning Religion, Natural and Revealed," 1735; and "Reflections on Incredulity;" the whole collected into one volume, 12mo, 1750. As a man, Forbes is highly spoken of. "I knew and venerated him," says Bishop Warburton, "one of the greatest men that ever Scotland bred, both as a judge, a patriot, and a Christian."

Born 1685; died 1747.

FORBES, EDWARD, an eminent naturalist, who from a child was a collector; so that by the time he was seven years of age he was possessed of a museum of natural curiosities. His health being delicate, he received only an imperfect education. At the age of 16 he went to London, intending to adopt art as a profession, and for some time he was connected with the studio of the late Mr. Sass, but, preferring the study of medicine, in 1832 went to the university of Edinburgh, where, under the instructions of Professors Jameson and Graham, he first became acquainted with the true principles of natural science. After being there some time, he attended lectures at Paris, made an excursion into Norway, and afterwards published his observations on the plants, rocks, and mollusca of that country, in a volume entitled "Notes of a Natural History Tour in Norway." He now became a contributor to the "Magazine of Natural History," whilst pursuing his studies both in zoology and botany. In 1836 he was chiefly instrumental in establishing the Edinburgh Botanical Society, to which he became the foreign secretary. In 1837 he visited the shores of Algiers and the Mediterranean, and the next year published his "Mollusca of the Isle of Man," and, in 1839, a paper on the "Mollusca of Algiers," and another on the "Distribution of the Pulmonifera of Europe." In 1841 appeared his "History of Star-Fishes," and in the same year he was appointed naturalist to her majesty's ship Beacon, commissioned to transport from Lycia the marbles discovered by Sir Charles Fellowes. In this voyage he discovered the great law that, among marine animals, zones of depth correspond to parallels of latitude. He subsequently became professor of botany in King's College, London, and, in 1844, became assistant secretary to the Zoological Society. He next became palæontologist to the Geological Society of Britain, and professor of natural history in the School of Mines, in Jermyn Street. In 1854 he was elected president of the Geological Society, and also professor of natural history in the University of Edinburgh. This was the highest object of his ambition, which, however, he seemed only to have attained to die.

Born at Douglas, Isle of Man, 1815; died at Edinburgh, 1854.

FORBES, JAMES, an Englishman engaged in the civil service of the East-India Company. He is noticed here on account of his work entitled "Oriental Memoirs, selected and abridged from a series of Familiar Letters, written during seventeen years' residence in India," published in 1813. This work is illustrated by coloured plates of animals and plants, executed with great spirit and beauty. Mr. Forbes was made a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies.

Born in London, 1749; died 1819.

FORBES, JAMES DAVID, natural philosopher, was the grandson of Sir William Forbes, an eminent Scottish banker. He studied at Edinburgh, and was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1830. In 1833 he was elected professor of natural philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and in 1860 resigned the chair to become principal of the United College in the University of St. Andrew. He studied the phenomena of heat and light, but his great reputation is chiefly established on his researches into the nature of glaciers. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, member of many British and foreign scientific associations, and received the degree of doctor from the University of Oxford, the royal and Rumford medals from the Royal Society of London, and two Keith medals from the Royal Society of Edinburgh. His principal works are accounts of his travels and researches in Norway and the Alps, and papers on the theory of glaciers, besides many contributions to scientific periodicals.

Born at Colinton, near Edinburgh, 1809; died 1868.

FORBES, SIR JOHN, a distinguished Scotch physician, who served for some time as surgeon in the navy, and graduated at Edinburgh in 1817. After practising some time as a physician at Penzance and Chichester, he settled in London, where his translation of the works of Avenbrugger and Laennec, on the use of the stethoscope, first brought him prominently into notice among the medical profession. In 1828 he published a work on the "Climate of Penzance," and was one of the original founders of the present British Medical Association. Subsequently, sir John became one of the editors of the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine," to which he contributed largely himself. He also became the editor of the "British and Foreign Medical Review," afterwards designated the "British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review." Whilst thus actively engaged, he was appointed physician in ordinary to her majesty's household, and physician extraordinary to his royal highness prince Albert. He was knighted in 1853. For his labours in medical science, the University of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws, and he was a fellow of the Royal Society. He was also one of the members of the committee of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. In 1849 he published "A Physician's Holiday; or a Month in Switzerland;" in 1852, "Memoranda of a Tour in Ireland;" and in 1855, "Sight-seeing in Germany and the Tyrol."

Born in Banffshire, Scotland, 1787; died 1861.

FORBIN, CLAUDE, Chevalier de, for'-ba, a French naval commander, who served in the East Indies, and was with admiral Duquesne at the bombardment of Algiers. He was also admiral to the king of Siam for two years, and greatly distinguished himself afterwards in Europe, in connection with Jean Bart, rising into favour with Louis XIV.

Born 1656; died 1733.

FORCADOS, for-ka'-dos, a river of Upper Guinea, Western Africa, considered the most accessible estuary on the coast. It falls into the Bight of Benin. Lat. 5° 22′ N. Lon. 5° 19′ E.

FORCALQUIER, for-kal'-ke-ai, a town of France, department Basses-Alpes, 25 miles S. of Digne. There are some interesting remains of an old Roman town. Manf. Silk, wool, serges, hats, and pottery. Pop. 2,900.

FORCE, JAMES, Duke de la, force, son of Francis, lord de la Force. He was still a child, in bed with his father and elder brother, when these latter were murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew; but being unperceived by the assassins, he escaped. He signalized himself under Henry IV., and afterwards joined the Protestants against Louis XIII. Subsequently, he made his submission to the king, and was appointed marshal of France, lieutenant-general of the army, and created a duke. He took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignan in 1630.

Born 1563; died 1652.

FORCELLINI, EGIDIO, for-sal-lé'-ne, Italian philologist, who assisted Facciolati in the production of the great vocabulary of the Latin language. (See FACCIOLATI.) He was director and professor of rhetoric at the seminary at Cenada.

Born near Padua, 1688; died 1768.

FORCHEIM, for'-kime, a town of Bavaria, province of Upper Franconia, at the confluence of the Wiesent and Regnitz, 29 miles S.W. of Baireuth. There is a mineral spring, and a bathing establishment in the vicinity. Manf. Glass, soap, leather, paper, potash, saltpetre, and iron. Pop. 3,200.

FORD, JOHN, ford, an eminent English dramatic poet. In 1602 he became a member of the Middle Temple, and adhered to his profession of the law. In his 18th year, he published a poem entitled "Fame's Memorial," an elegy on the death of the duke of Devonshire. Subsequently, he commenced writing for the stage, for which he wrote, either wholly or in conjunction with others, upwards of sixteen plays, among the best of which are "Love's Sacrifice," "Perkin Warbeck," and "The Lady's Trial." He delighted in exciting the emotion of terror. In Charle's Lambs "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets," the following excellent criticism appears, relative to this author: "Ford was of the first order of poets. He sought for sub-dimity, not by parcels, in metaphors or visible images, but directly where she has her full residence,—in the heart of man, in the actions and sufferings of the greatest minds. There is a grandeur of the soul, above mountains, seas, and the elements." Gifford also says, "I know few things more difficult to account for than the deep and lasting impression made by the more tragic portions of Ford's poetry." Of his death nothing is known. It is supposed, however, that, about 1640, he retired to his native place, and there ended his days.

Born at Ilsington, Devonshire, 1586.

FORD, RICHARD, an English writer and traveller, who, having graduated at Trinity College, Oxford, was called to the bar in Lincoln's Inn, but did not practise. In 1830 he visited Spain, where he resided for some time at the Alhambra, and, on his return, took up his residence in Devonshire, and became a contributor to the "Quarterly Review." In 1845 he published "The Handbook of Spain," which was highly commended. In 1846 appeared his "Gatherings from Spain," which was, on its appearance, pronounced "the best English book, beyond comparison, that has ever appeared for the illustration, not merely of the general topography and local curiosities, but of the national character and manners of Spain." In 1852 "Tauromachia; the Bull-fights of Spain;" 26 superb drawings by Luke Priee, with descriptions by R. Ford, was given to the public; but the work is rather pictorial than literary.

Born in London, 1796; died 1858.

FORDUN, JOHN DE, for'-dun, a Scotch historian, and priest in the church of Fordun, who wrote "Scotichronon," a history of Scotland, of which he only completed five books, bringing the history down to the death of David I. in 1153. Camden, speaking of Fordun's history, says "that all the Scotch historians who have wrote since Fordun's time have been very much beholden to his diligence; and yet there are very material differences betwixt his account of several things and theirs."

Died about 1385.

FORDYCE, DAVID, for'-dyce, a Scottish writer, who was educated at the university of Aberdeen, and became professor of moral philosophy in the Marischal College in that town. Though licensed as a preacher, he never became a stated minister. In 1750 he made a tour to Italy, and on his return, the following year, was drowned on the coast of Holland. He wrote "Dialogues concerning Education," 2 vols. 8vo; the "Elements of Moral Philosophy," which first appeared in Dodsley's "Preceptor;" "Theodorus, a Dialogue concerning the Art of Preaching;" the "Temple of Virtue, a Dream." His "Dialogues of Education" have considerable merit, written in some degree after the style of Shaftesbury, but without being tainted with the sophistries of that writer.

Born at Aberdeen, 1711; died 1751.

FORDYCE, GEORGE, an eminent Scotch physician, educated at the university of Aberdeen, where he obtained the degree of M.A. at the age of fourteen. In 1759 he settled in London, commencing lecturing on the materia medica and practice of physic, in which he acquired an unrivalled reputation. In 1770 he was chosen physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and, in 1776, a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1787 he was elected, speciali gratiâ, a fellow of the College of Physicians, a very unusual distinction. Dr. Fordyce is known by his "Essays on Fever," an "Essay on Digestion," "Elements of the Practice of Physic," and miscellaneous papers. He was also an excellent experimental chemist, and published "Elements of Agriculture and Vegetation." This work has always been esteemed as a very scientific treatise.

Born near Aberdeen, 1736; died 1802.

FORDYCE, JAMES, brother of David Fordyce, an eminent Scotch divine, who was educated at the university of Aberdeen, and who first settled as a minister at Brechin, and afterwards at Alloa. While here, he distinguished himself by some elegant pulpit compositions, particularly one preached before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on the folly, infamy, and misery of unlawful pleasures, for which the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D. About 1762 he removed to London, where he became assistant to Dr. Lawrence, of Monkwell Street, and afterwards his successor. Here he drew crowded audiences by his eloquence and the beauty of his sermons. In 1782 he resigned his appointment, and went to live first in Hampshire, and next at Bath, where he died. He published volumes of sermons and some poems.

Born at Aberdeen, 1720; died 1796.

FORELAND, NORTH, for'-land, a promontory of England, forming the N.E. extremity of the Isle of Thanet and of Kent. Here is a lighthouse above 184 feet high. Height of promontory, nearly 200 feet. Lat. 51° 22′ N. Lon. 1° 26′ E.

FORELAND, SOUTH, a cape of England, on the east coast of Kent, between Dover and Deal, and 16 miles S. of the North Foreland, the Downs lying between. It has two lighthouses with fixed lights, 380 and 275 feet above the sea level, to warn ships coming from the south of their nearing the Goodwin Sands. Lat. 51° 8′ N. Lon. 1° 22′ E.

FOREST, fo'-rest, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 376 square miles. Pop. 4,500.

FOREST CANTONS, in Switzerland, are the cantons of Lucerne, Schwytz, Unterwalden, and Uri, in the centre of which is the Lake of Lucerne.

FORFAR, the county town of Forfarshire, situate in the vale of Strathmore, near a small lake, 15 miles from Dundee. It is irregularly built, and has a spacious church, with a steeple 150 feet high; besides various other places of worship, a town and county hall, a market-place, and several public schools. Manf. Brown linens, to a very considerable extent, and a kind of shoes called brogues. It is one of the Montrose burghs. Pop. 14,470.—A station on the Caledonian railway.

FORFARSHIRE, or ANGUS, for'-farsheer, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by the counties of Aberdeen and Kincardine, E. by the German Ocean, S. by the Firth of Tay, and W. by the county of Perth. The surface is irregular and mountainous, being traversed by the Sidlaw and Catlaw Hills, the latter rising to 2,260 feet in elevation. The Grampian range touches on the north-west of the county. Numerous valleys are interspersed throughout the mountains, the most noted of which is that of Strathmore, which extends far beyond the boundaries of the county, and is equally distinguished by its fertility as its romantic beauty. Glen Isla, Glen Prosen, and Glen Esk, are other well watered and fertile valleys.

Rivers.—The Tay, the North and South Esk, the Isla, and the smaller streams of the Dean, Lunan, Dighty, and Noran.

Pro.—The usual cerealia. Agriculture is making rapid progress, and the fisheries are conducted with considerable activity, both on the coast and in rivers: considerable quantities of salmon are exported to London, packed in large wooden boxes, with pounded ice to preserve them.

Minerals.—Inexhaustible beds of limestone, veins of porphyry, large quantities of jasper of different colours, from bright yellow to deep red, susceptible of the highest polish: and all varieties of pebbles. It is said that the real topaz is found here; coloured crystals, called cairngorms, commonly five-sided prisms, and terminating in a pyramid of the same description, are a common object of search among the inhabitants, and are frequently found.

Manf.—Linens: this county being the principal seat of the coarser kinds of that manufacture in Scotland. Bleaching and spinning are extensively prosecuted; also tanning, brewing, leather and rope making, and shipbuilding. Several vessels are engaged in the whale-fishery.

Area.—892 square miles.

Pop.—266,374.

Chief Towns.—DUNDEE, FORFAR, ARBROATH, MONTROSE, BRECHIN, and KINIEMUIR.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county returns 2 members, and the boroughs 2.

FORIO, for'-e-o, a seaport town of Italy, on the west coast of the island of Ischia, at the northern side of the entrance of the Bay of Naples. There are three handsome churches, many pretty houses in the suburbs, and a good harbour. Pop. 5,800.

FORLI, for'-le, a province of Italy, bounded on the E. by the Adriatic. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 258,162.

FORLI, for'-le, a walled town of Italy, capital of the province of the same name, 14 miles S.W. of Ravenna. The public buildings include a noble cathedral, several fine churches; the Guerini palace, designed by Michael Angelo, the Communal Palace, and the citadel, now used as a prison. The churches are rich in fine pictures. Manf. Silk ribands, twist, woollens, and salt. It has, besides, nitre, wax, and sulphur-works. Pop. 40,449.—In 1797 this place was taken by the French. In 1831, Charles Napoleon Louis Bonaparte, elder brother of Napoleon III., died here, in arms against the pope.

FORLIMPOPOLI, for'-leem-po'-po-le, a town of Italy, 5 miles S.E. of Forli. There are an ancient castle, a cathedral, and two convents. Pop. 5,000. In 1815 Murat defeated the allies at this place.

FORMAN, SIMON, for'-man, physician and astrologer, apprenticed to a druggist at Salisbury, and afterwards a schoolmaster, and a "poor scholar" at Magdalen College, Oxford. Having obtained a degree at Cambridge he settled at Lambeth as physician and astrologer; and was consulted by many persons of rank, among them the notorious Countess of Essex. He died suddenly while crossing the Thames. He wrote about the philosopher's stone, magic, astrology, natural history, and medicine.

Born at Wilton, Wiltshire, 1552; died 1611.

FORMENTERA, for-men-te'-ra, in the Mediterranean, the most southern of the Balearic group. It is fertile, and much frequented by aquatic birds. There are stone quarries, and the fisheries are productive. The island is about 12 miles from E. to W., and 8 miles from N. to S. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 38° 38′ N. Lon. 1° 36′ E.

FORMEY, JOHN HENRY SAMUEL, for'-me, a Prussian writer, who was for some years pastor of a French church in Berlin, where he became professor of philosophy in the French college. On the restoration of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, he was appointed secretary to the philosophical department, and afterwards sole secretary. He was also made a privy councillor. Formey conducted, in conjunction with Beausobre, the "Bibliothèque Germanique." He also wrote "Le Philosophe Chrétien," "Pensées Raisonnables," "Anti-Emile," against Rousseau; the "History of Philosophy abridged," an "Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History" (these two have been translated into English), "Researches on the Elements of Matter," "Considerations on the Tusculans of Cicero," &c.

Born at Berlin, 1711; died there, 1797.

FORMIGA, for-mé'-ga, a town of Brazil, province of Minas-Geraes. Pop. 2,000.

FORMIGNY, for-meen'-ye, a small village of France, 12 miles from Bayeux, where, in 1450, a battle was fought between the French and English, who were defeated, and thereby forced to abandon Normandy.

FORMING'S ISLAND (See FARMING'S ISLAND.)

FORMOSA, RIO, for-mo'-sa, the principal of that succession of large estuaries which open into the Gulf of Benin, 4 miles wide at the mouth. Lat. 5° 40′ N. Lon. 4° 20′ E.

FORMOSA, one of the Bissagos Islands, in W. Africa, about 30 miles long and 18 miles broad. Lat. 11° 30′ N. Lon. 16° 10′ W.

FORMOSA (or TAI-WAN), an island in the China Sea, 90 miles E. of Canton, and separated from the Chinese coast by a channel of the same name. It is 237 miles long, and about 70 in average breadth. A chain of mountains, running its whole length, divides it into two parts, separating the wild Formosans in the east from the Chinese colonists in the west. It contains extensive and fertile plains, watered by a great number of rivulets from the mountains. TAI-WAN-FO is the capital.

Pro.—Corn and rice, most of the Indian fruits, many of those of Europe, tobacco, sugar, pepper, camphor, and cinnamon. The inhabitants rear a great number of oxen, which they use for riding, from a want of horses. They accustom them early to this kind of service, and, by daily exercise, train them to go as well as horses.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, cinnabar, and coal, which is largely shipped.

Pop.—The island is part of the province of Fukien, or Fuh-keen, the official return for which is 25,790,556.

Lat.—Between 22° and 25° 30′ N. Lon. Between 120° and 122° E.

History.—The Dutch built the fort of Zealandia, in the W. part of this island, in 1634. They were driven thence in 1661, by a Chinese pirate, who made himself master of all the W. part. In 1683 the whole island submitted to the emperor of China. In 1782 it was entirely overwhelmed, and almost totally destroyed, by a furious hurricane and inundation of the sea.

FORMOSUS, for-mo'-sus, Pope; bishop of Porto, in Italy, succeeded Stephen V. in 891. He condemned Photius, excommunicated the emperor Lambert, duke of Spoleto, and nominated in his place, Arnoul, king of Germania.—The fiery Stephen VI., his successor, had his body disinterred, in order to put him on his trial. He was restored to his grave in 898, under John IX.

FORNAX, for'-nax, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the baking of bread. Her festivals, called Fornacalia, were first instituted by Numa.

FORRES, for'-res, a town and royal burgh of Scotland, in Morayshire, near the mouth of the river Findhorn. There is an elegant town-house, in the Gothic style. At the west end of the town are the remains of an old castle, and to the eastward a remarkable sculptured pillar, 25 feet high, known as Sueno's, or "the Stan'in" stone. On a hill, near the town, is a tower, 66 feet high, erected to the memory of Nelson. Pop. 3,959.—A station on the Highland railway.

FORSKAL, PETER, for'-skal, a Swedish naturalist, who studied at Gottingen, and afterwards at Upsal, where he became a pupil of Linnæus. In 1761 he went, at the request of the king of Denmark, with Niebuhr and others, to Arabia, to make discoveries, but died at Jerim, in that country, in 1763. He printed a tract, entitled "Thoughts on Civil Liberty;" and from his papers, Niebuhr published "Descriptiones Animalium in itinere orientali," 4to; "Flora Ægyptiaco-Arabica," 4to; "Icones Rerum Naturalium quas in itinere orientali depingi curavit Forskal," 4to.

Born 1736; died 1763.

FORSTA, fors'-ta, a town of Prussia, on an island in the Neisse, 44 miles S. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Manf. Linen and cotton, and pottery. Pop. 8,800.

FORSTER, JOHANNA REINHOLD, fors'-ter, German naturalist, who, in 1748, entered the university of Halle, where he studied divinity, and thence went to Russia, in expectation of considerable preferment; but being disappointed, proceeded to England, where, for some time, he taught the French and German languages at Warrington. In 1772 he accompanied Captain Cook on his voyage round the world. On his return to England, in 1775, he was honoured by the university of Oxford with the degree of LL.D. Having published, contrary to the engagement entered into with government, a botanical account of plants discovered in this voyage, he was treated with such coolness, that he quitted England, and went to Halle, where he was made professor of natural history.—He was the author of "Observations made in a Voyage round the World," "History of Voyages and Discoveries in the North," "On the Byssus of the Ancients," several Papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c.

Born at Dirschau, 1729; died at Halle, 1798.

FORSTER, JOHANN GEORG ADAM, son of the above, accompanied his father in his voyage round the world. After his return, he became professor of natural history at Cassel, whence he removed to Wilna, in Poland, and next to Mentz, where he was appointed president of the university. He was nominated by the people of Mentz their representative at Paris, at the beginning of the Revolution. He wrote "A Voyage round the World;" a Defence of the same against Mr. Wales; "A Philosophical and Picturesque Journey along the Banks of the Rhine," and "A Journey through England."

Born at Dantzic, 1754; died 1794.

FORSTER, JOHN, English political and historical writer, was bred to the bar, but, by his devotion to literature, became an eminent author and journalist. For twenty-four years he was a constant contributor to the columns of the "Examiner," and for twelve of that period he had the sole charge of its editorial department. He was also a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," the "Foreign Quarterly," and other serials, and for a short time acted as editor of the "Daily News" after the retirement of Mr. Dickens. In 1856 he was appointed secretary to the Commissioners in Lunacy. He is best known by his works, entitled "The Statesmen of the Commonwealth of England," and "The Life and Times of Oliver Goldsmith." He also wrote the lives of Daniel De Foe and Churchill, and in 1858 published "Historical and Biographical Essays," principally composed of articles originally contributed to quarterly reviews, with new matter added thereto. Between 1871 and 1874 he published the "Life of Charles Dickens," and in 1876 the first volume of a new life of Swift, which he did not live to complete.

Born at Newcastle, 1812; died 1876.

FORSYTH, for-sith', a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 10,559. The capital is Cumming.

FORSYTH, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 18,070, Winston is the capital.

FORT BEND, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 850 square miles. Pop. 9,380. The capital is Richmond.

FORT MADISON, capital of Lee county, Iowa, United States, 12 miles above the lower rapids of the Mississippi. There is a good shipping trade in grain, pork, and lumber. Pop. 5,000.

FORT ROYAL, roy'-al, a fortified seaport-town, and capital of the island of Martinique. It stands on the west coast, on a bay of its own name. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 14° 35′ N. Lon. 61° 4′ W.

FORT WAYNE, capital of Allen county, Indiana, United States. It is a flourishing town, and one of the most important places in the state. There are fifteen churches. Pop. 26,880.

FORT (LE), FRANCIS, for, a soldier and statesman in the service of Peter the Great, who intrusted him with the siege of Azov, where he showed so much bravery, that the emperor made him his first minister of state, and commander of all his forces. Le Fort was intimately connected with Peter's reforms, accompanied him in his travels, and aided him effectually in civilising his subjects, and organizing an army, navy, and the finances.

Born at Geneva, 1656; died at Moscow, 1699.

FORTALEZA, or CEARA, fort-a-la'-za, a town of Brazil, capital of the province of Ceará, near the mouth of the river of that name. There is a shallow harbour, used by coasting vessels. The trade is chiefly in cotton, hides, and dates. Pop. 3,000.

FORTANETE, for-ta-na'-te, a town of Spain, province of Teruel, 33 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Cloth. There is an annual fair. Pop. 2,000.

FORTESCUE, SIR JOHN, for'-tes-kiu, an English judge, who was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, was called to the bar, and in 1441 was made serjeant-at-law, and the following year was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench. He was zealously attached to Henry VI., and accompanied him in his exile to Scotland. Henry made him chancellor, but he never exercised the office. He subsequently went to Flanders, and while abroad wrote his famous book entitled, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," which, however, was not published till the reign of Henry VIII. This admirable treatise, according to Henry, excels every work on the subject. He returned to England with queen Margaret, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Tewkesbury, in 1471. Edward IV. granted him a pardon, on which he retired to his seat at Ebrington, in Gloucestershire.

Born in Devonshire, 1395; died 1485.

FORTEVENTURA, or FUERTAVENTURA, foo'-air-ta-vain-too'-ra, one of the Canary Islands, in the E. part of the archipelago. It is hilly, deficient in water, but possessing tracts of great fertility. Area, 758 square miles. Lat. 28° 42′ N. Lon. 14° 1′ W.

FORTH, forth, a river of Scotland, rising on the N. side of the mountain Ben Lomond, in two main branches, the Duchray and the Avendhu, uniting at Aberfoyle, and gradually expanding in the lower part into an estuary called the Firth of Forth, which extends for many miles. Its chief tributaries are the Teith, the Allan, and the Devon.

FORTH, FIRTH OF. At its mouth this is 35 or 40 miles wide, from Fife Ness on the N., to St. Abb's Head on the S. shore, both washed by the German Ocean. It contains several islands, of which the chief are Inchgarvie, Inchcolm, and Inchkeith, the Bass, and the Isle of May; the largest of these is but a few miles in circuit. Lighthouses are erected on Inchkeith and on the Isle of May; and the ruins of castles or religious houses appear on all the different islands. The Forth possesses many good harbours, and St. St. Margaret's Hope, above Queen's Ferry, is one of the safest roadsteads in the island.

FORTH MOUNTAINS, a range in the county of Wexford, Ireland, celebrated for being the rendezvous of 15,000 insurgents, who, in 1798, met here previous to the attack and capture of the town of Wexford.

FORTIGUERRA, NICOLO, for-te-goo-ar'-ra, Italian poet, who was educated for the church, and, through the influence of his relative, Bishop Falvoni, received rapid preferment, rising to be prelate and papal chamberlain to Pope Clement XI. He wrote with amazing facility, and his chief work, "Il Ricciardetto," in the style of Ariosto, attained considerable popularity. It is more remarkable for extravagance and licentiousness than for higher qualities.

Born at Pistajo, 1674; died 1735.

FORTROSE, or FORTROSS, fort'-rose, a seaport, watering-place, parliamentary and royal burgh in the east of Ross-shire, Scotland. It was formerly a place of much greater importance, had a cathedral and bishop's palace (destroyed by Cromwell), and was considered the principal place for the study of divinity and the arts and sciences in the north of Scotland.

FORTUNA, for-tu'-na, in Greek mythology, daughter of Oceanus, according to Homer, or one of the Parcæ according to Pindar, was the goddess of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and pains, blessings and misfortunes. She was worshipped in different parts of Greece. Bupalus was the first who modelled a statue of Fortune for the people of Smyrna, and he represented her with the polar star upon her head, and the horn of plenty in her hand. The Romans held her in high esteem, and had no less than eight different temples erected to her honour in their city. She is generally represented blindfolded, and holding a wheel in her hand, as an emblem of her inconstancy. Sometimes she appears with wings.

FORTUNA, a town of Spain, 11 miles N.E. of Murcia. It is well built, and the streets are regular. There are thermal and mineral baths near the town. Manf. Esparto, linen, and saltpetre. Pop. 4,000.

FORTUNATÆ INSULÆ, for-tu-nai'-te in'-su-le, in Greek legend, islands at the W. of Mauritania, in the Atlantic Sea, supposed to be the Canary Isles of the moderns. They are represented as the seats of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death, and where the air was wholesome and temperate, and the earth produced an immense number of various fruits without the labours of men.

FORTUNE, ROBERT, for'-tune, a Scotch naturalist, born of humble parents, and who was sent to China for the purpose of obtaining new plants, with instructions to pay all possible attention to the horticulture and agriculture of the people of that country. This he accordingly did, and, in 1853, published the result in "Three Years' Wanderings in the Northern Provinces of China." He also published "Two Visits to the Tea Countries of China," and "A Residence among the Chinese;" all excellent works of their kind.

Born at Berwick, Scotland, 1813.

FORTUNE BAY, an inlet of the Atlantic, on the S. coast of Newfoundland. Lat. 47° N. Lon. 55° W.

FOSBROKE, THOMAS DUDLEY, fos'-brook, was educated at St. Paul's School and Pembroke College, Oxford, where he became an M.A. in 1792. In 1794 he was appointed to the living of Horsley, and in 1810 was made curate of Walford, and in 1830, vicar. His works are, a poem on the "Monastic Life, as it existed in England;" "British Monachism; or, Manners and Customs of the Monks and Nuns of England;" to which he added "Manners and Customs of Ancient Pilgrims, Anchorites and Hermits, and Women who had made vows of Chastity." These are his principal works, which give a comprehensive view of the manners and customs of monastic life. He also wrote several other works; among which we may notice his "Cyclopædia of Antiquity and Elements of Archæology."

Born in London, 1770; died at Walford, 1842.

FOSCALDO, fos-kal'-do, a town of Italy, at the foot of the Apennines, 4 miles N.W. of Paolo. Great numbers of silkworms are reared. Pop. 7,000.

FOSCARI, FRANCESCO, fos-kar'-e, a doge of Venice, of great military ability, who conquered Brescia and Bergamo. In these wars he lost three sons, and a fourth was charged with having received bribes from the enemy, for which he was tortured in the presence of his father, and then banished. He was summoned from his exile on an unfounded charge of having murdered Donati, a member of the famous Council of Ten, again tortured and banished. He was recalled and tortured a third time for having asked the duke of Milan to intercede with the Senate on his behalf. He was again banished and died of grief. His father was deposed, and, at the age of 87, left the palace in disgrace. When he heard the bells pealing in honour of his successor, he burst a blood-vessel and expired. He held the office of doge for thirty-four years. Byron's tragedy on the subject is well known.

Born 1370; died 1457.

FOSCOLO, UGO, fos'-ko-lo, Italian author and politician, who received his education at Venice and Padua, and before he was 20 produced a tragedy called "Il Tieste." Soon afterwards he obtained employment as secretary to Battaglio, who was sent as ambassador to Bonaparte, to propitiate him to favour the independence of the republic of Venice. The ambassador was unsuccessful in his mission, and Foscolo went to Lombardy, where he devoted himself to the cultivation of literature, and produced his celebrated political "Letters of Ortis," which established his fame. He now enrolled his name in the list of the first Italian legion that was formed, and was in Genoa during the siege of 1799. He continued with the Italian army till 1805, when he was sent with the troops professedly designed for the invasion of England; but he soon afterwards quitted the army, and in 1809 became professor of literature in Pavia. The language of his introductory lecture, however, offended Bonaparte, and the professorship was suppressed. In 1812 he produced his "Ajax," which being supposed to convey a satire on Napoleon I., he deemed it prudent to withdraw to Florence. Afterwards, it is asserted, he engaged in a conspiracy to eject the Austrians from Italy, and was forced to take refuge in Switzerland, whence he went to England, where he was received among the literary and fashionable circles. He continued to apply himself to literature, and published—"Essays on Petrarch," "Disputations and Notes on Dante," and was a contributor to the "Edinburgh Quarterly," and other reviews. Among his earlier works are an Italian version of Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," and various beautiful poems, which place him in the foremost rank of Italian poets.

Born at Zante, 1777; died at Turnham Green, near London, 1827.

FOSSANO, fos-sa'-no, a town of northern Italy, province of Cuneo, on the left bank of the Stura. It is surrounded by old walls, and there are a fine cathedral and royal college. Manf. Silks, woollens, paper and leather. Pop. 17,627.

FOSSE (DE LA), CHARLES, foss, a French painter, and pupil of Le Brun, who, after studying in Italy, returned to Paris, and gained a great reputation by several public works. A pension was granted him, and he became rector of the Academy of Painting, in Paris. The duke of Montague invited him to England, and employed him in ornamenting his house at Bloomsbury, afterwards the British Museum.

FOSSE, fos, a town of Belgium, 8 miles S.W. of Namur. There are quarries and coal-mines in the neighbourhood. It was once a fortified place of importance, but the walls were destroyed by the French in 1675. Pop. 2,400.

FOSSOMBRONE, fos-som-bro-ne', a small town of Italy, in the province of Pesaro-Urbino, on the left bank of the Metauro, 11 miles E. of Urbino. In the cathedral of St. Aldebrando are inscriptions and other relics of the old Roman city, Forum Sempronii, which occupied the site. There is a handsome modern bridge over the river. Manf. Silks, carpets, and woollen cloths. Pop. 4,500.

FOSTER, JOHN, an English essayist, who was bred a manufacturer; but disliking that occupation, he devoted himself to study at the Baptist College at Bristol, and in 1792 commenced preaching among the Baptists in various parts of the country. Forced to discontinue preaching, from a glandular affection of the neck, he retired to Stapleton, near Bristol, where he devoted himself to literature, and became one of the principal contributors to the "Eclectic Review." He is best known to the world, however, by his "Essays on Decision of Character;" "On the Application of the Epithet Romantic;" and "On the Evils of Popular Ignorance." These works have received a well-merited praise, not only for the admirable precision of the style in which they are written, but for the depth and originality of the thoughts with which they abound. The essay on "Popular Ignorance" especially has been greatly admired, and has passed through many editions. "I have read with the greatest admiration," says Sir James Mackintosh, "the essays of Mr. Foster. He is one of the most profound and eloquent writers that England has produced."

Born near Halifax, 1770; died 1843.

FOTHERGILL, JOHN, foth'-er-gil, an eminent English physician, who, having served his time to an apothecary, went to Edinburgh, where, in 1736, he took his doctor's degree. In the same year he became a pupil in St. Thomas's Hospital, and, in 1740, went abroad. On his return he settled in London, and, in 1748, acquired a great reputation by a tract entitled "An Account of the Sore Throat attended with Ulcers." This disease was at that time very prevalent and fatal. In 1754 he became a member of the Edinburgh College of Physicians and, in 1763, a fellow of the Royal Society. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and when the differences broke out between England and her American colonies, he laboured to prevent hostilities, and had conferences with Dr. Franklin for that purpose, but without effect. His works, consisting chiefly of medical pieces, have been printed in three vols. 8vo, with his life prefixed. He was at the expense of printing Purver's translation of the Bible, and of an edition of Percy's "Key to the New Testament," for a seminary of Quakers in Yorkshire.

Born in Yorkshire, 1712; died 1780.

FOTHERINGAY, foth'-e-rin-gai, a village of Northamptonshire, on the Neve, 27 miles N.E. of Northampton. There are a handsome church, in which several of the Plantagenets were interred, and a grammar school founded by Queen Elizabeth. Pop. 300.—In the castle of this place Richard III. was born; and Mary, queen of Scots, was imprisoned and executed here. James I. razed it to the ground.

FOU SCHAN, fod'-shan', a town of China, on an island 21 miles N.E. of Canton. Manf. Silks, cottons, porcelain, sugar, and ironmongery. Pop. 200,000, many of whom live in boats.

FOUAH, foo'-ah, a town of Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the Rosetta branch of the Nile. Manf. Linen, leather, and culinary utensils.

FOUCAULT, NICHOLAS JOSEPH, foo-kolt', a French antiquary, who discovered, in 1704, the ancient town of the Viducassians, near Caen, of which he gave an account to the Academy of Inscriptions. He also discovered the MS. of "Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum."

Born at Paris, 1643; died 1721.

FOUCAULT, JEAN BERNARD LEON, French natural philosopher. He began life by studying medicine, but the discoveries by Daguerre of the mode of taking sun-pictures urged him to the investigation of the phenomena of light, and he was the first to make electric light available for photographic purposes. In 1851 he discovered the mode of ascertaining the rotation of the earth by means of a pendulum which created so much sensation in the scientific world, and among the public generally. He made other important discoveries, and in 1864 was elected a foreign member of the Royal Society of London, and in 1865, member of the French Académie des Sciences. He was attacked with paralysis in 1867.

Born at Paris, 1819; died 1868.

FOUCHÉ, JOSEPH, duke of Otranto, foo'-shai, was inspector of schools at Martinière when the revolution of 1789 broke out. He threw himself with ardour into the struggle against the king, and was, in 1792, appointed a member of the National Convention. In November of the next year, he accompanied Collot d'Herbois (see that name) to Lyons, and was overwhelmed with accusations in regard to the frightful cruelties practised there by his colleague and himself. After the fall of the Convention, he was protected by Barras, and, on the 13th Thermidor, year 7, he was made police minister. In this post he displayed great activity and acuteness, and rendered important services to Bonaparte on the 18th Brumaire (1799). The latter, however, had not much confidence in his minister's integrity, and dismissed him from office in 1802, restoring him, however, his portfolio in 1804, which he preserved till 1810. In this year he was superseded, although the reasons of his fall have never been clearly understood. In 1809 he had received the title of Duke of Otranto, and large grants from the revenues of Naples. After the Russian campaign, he was appointed by the emperor to the government of the Illyrian provinces —a very difficult task. He there showed great moderation, and was successful in his mission. During the "hundred days," he again administered the police, and subsequently was appointed, after Waterloo, president of the provisional government, and, in that capacity, treated with the allied powers. Louis XVIII. retained him for a short period at the head of the police, but afterwards sent him ambassador to Dresden. He was subsequently exiled, and died at Trieste, leaving a large fortune. The general opinion of Fouché is that he was an able, but unscrupulous minister, whose ruling motive was self-interest, but who preferred, when possible, moderate measures. His character is well expressed in his famous comment on the execution of the Duke d'Enghien, "It is much worse than a crime: it is a blunder." His "Memoirs" appeared in Paris in 1824, but were declared not to be trustworthy by his family.

Born at Nantes, 1763; died at Trieste, 1820.

FOUCQUET, CHARLES LOUIS AUGUSTUS, foo'-kai, count of Belleisle, secured, by his gallant conduct at the siege of Lisle (where he commanded a regiment of dragoons) the favour of Louis XIV., after whose death he was disgraced and confined in the Bastile. In the war of 1733 he was appointed to command in Germany, and became the confidant of Cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created marshal of France, and, the year following, attended the diet of Frankfort, as plenipotentiary from the court of Versailles. In 1743 he was taken prisoner near Hanover, but soon obtained his liberty.

Born 1684; died 1761.

FOUGÈRES, foo'-zhair, a town of France, department of Ille-et-Vilaine, on the right bank of the Couesnon, 28 miles N.E. of Rennes. The old quarter retains traces of antique architecture, but the newer part is well built. There is a picturesque old castle, and in the vicinity is a forest, containing many Druidical remains. Manf. Lace, flannel, canvas, glass, and paper. Pop. 14,325.

FOUGEROLLES, foo'-zhai-role, a town of France, department Haute-Saône, 20 miles N.E. of Vesoul. Manf. Straw hats and cherry-brandy. Pop. 5,600.

FOULAHS, or FELLATAHS, foo'-las, the name of a race of negroes, who are very widely diffused throughout W. Africa. Their original country is supposed to be the mountainous tract near the sources of the Senegal, bearing the name of Fooladoo; but, through conquest and emigration, they spread through the neighbouring regions, and indeed more or less over most parts of Africa. Their most populous and powerful kingdom is that of Foota Jallo, situate to the S. of Gambia. They possess also Brooks, situate on the higher parts of the Senegal, conterminous with Fooladoo; Bondou and Foota Torra, between the Senegal and Gambia; the kingdom of the Seratic, on the lower part of the Senegal; Masina, on the Niger, between Bambarra and Timbuctoo; and Wassela, to the south of the upper part of the Niger. The Foulahs are easily distinguished by form and features from the other negro tribes. They differ also from the Moors, in the mildness of their manners and character.

FOULD, ACHILLE, foold, French statesman and financier, was the son of a rich Jewish banker, but adopted the Protestant faith. After receiving a liberal education, improved by travel, he entered political life in 1842 as deputy for Tarbes, the chief town of the department of Hautes-Pyrénées, and devoted himself to questions of finance, and his great capacity in this department was soon recognized. After the revolution of 1848 he represented the department of the Seine, and, under the presidency of Louis Napoleon, he was minister of finance; and he fulfilled his important functions to the general satisfaction of capitalists. Under his wise supervision many objectionable imposts were removed; and his administration greatly increased the commercial prosperity of France. He was appointed minister of state, which office he retained till 1860. The financial crisis of 1861 again called him into power, and the confidence inspired by his name was now justified by the manner in which he steered the state through its difficult position. After restoring the monetary affairs to a healthy condition, he retired from his post, but was induced to resume it. M. Achille Fould received the decoration of various foreign orders, and was also commander of the Legion of Honour.

Born in Paris, 1800; died at Tarbes, 1867.

FOULIS, ROBERT, foo-lis', Scotch printer, originally a barber, who studied hard at Glasgow university, and entered business as a bookseller and printer, in conjunction with his brother Andrew, who had studied for the church. The brothers became famous for the beauty and correctness of their editions of classical authors, and other works of almost unrivalled excellence. In 1753 Robert founded an academy for instruction in painting and sculpture, which involved considerable pecuniary loss.

Born at Glasgow, 1707; died at Edinburgh, 1776.

FOULNESS, foul'-ness, an island of England, in the North Sea, off the coast of Essex, 9 miles from Rochefort. Pop. 665.

FOUNAI, foo'-nai, a manufacturing and trading town of the island of Kin-siu, Japan, 125 miles N.E. of Nagasaki.

FOUNTAIN, foun'-tain, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 390 square miles. Pop. 20,228. Covington is the capital.

FOUNTAINE, SIR ANDREW, antiquary, born at Narford, Norfolk, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he studied the Anglo-Saxon language, and wrote a piece inserted in Dr. Hickes's "Thesaurus," entitled "Numismata Anglo-Saxonica et Anglo-Danica." He had also a taste for the fine arts, and made a noble collection of antiques and curiosities. He drew the designs for the "Tale of a Tub," by Swift, with whom he was very intimate, as he was with other wits of the age, and is commended by Montfaucon for his antiquarian knowledge. William III. conferred the honour of knighthood upon him, and in 1727 he was appointed warden of the Mint.

Died 1753.

FOUQUÉ, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH KARL, Baron de la Motte, foo'-kai, German author, son of a Prussian general. He served in the campaign of 1792 and 1813. He published many romances and poems founded on the old northern legends; the best known of which is the charming story "Undine." In early life he made translations from Cervantes and other Spanish authors.

Born at Brandenburg, 1777; died at Berlin, 1843.

FOUQUIERES, JAMES, foo'-ke-air, a Flemish painter, the disciple of Velvet Breughel, and so excellent in painting landscapes, as to be ranked with Titian

Born at Antwerp, 1580; died 1659.

FOUQUIER - TINVILLE, ANTOINE QUENTIN, foo'-ke-air-tin'-veel, one of the most infamous of the French revolutionists. He became an associate of Robespierre, by whom he was appointed public accuser during the reign of terror, and in that office displayed the most sanguinary nature. He spared none. The young, the aged, the rich, the poor, without regard to guilt or innocence, were hurried by him to the scaffold with perfect indifference, on one occasion no less than eighty persons being devoted by him to death within four hours. At length, however, his iniquitous career was stopped; he had himself to appear before the tribunal where he had condemned so many others, and was guillotined, dying in a cowardly manner.

Born near St. Quentin, 1747; died 1795.

FOURCHAMBAULT, foor'-sham-bolt, a manufacturing town of France, department Nievres, on the left bank of the Loire, which is crossed by a suspension bridge. There are extensive iron-smelting furnaces and forges, employing about 3,000 workmen.

FOURCROY, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS DE, foor'-kroi, a distinguished French chemist and natural philosopher, who, having chosen the medical profession for his occupation, devoted himself to the study of those sciences which are more immediately connected with it, especially chemistry. In 1784 he was appointed professor of this science at the Jardin du Roi, and became associated with Berthollet, Lavoisier, and others in researches which led to vast improvements, whilst they suggested a new chemical nomenclature, entitled "Méthode de Nomenclature Chimique." On the breaking out of the Revolution, he became entangled in the politics of the period, and was elected a deputy from Paris to the National Convention. In 1794 he became a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and next year was received as one of the Council of the Ancients. In 1799 Bonaparte gave him a place in the Council of State, when the affairs relating to public instruction were placed under his management. In this important trust he ably acquitted himself. In the various departments of chemical science and natural philosophy, he produced many valuable works.

Born at Paris, 1755; died 1809.

FOUR EVANGELISTS, e-van'-je-lists, a group of four islands at the entrance of the Straits of Magellan. There are eight others near, which with them compose a group called the Twelve Apostles. Lat. 52° 34′ S. Lon. 75° 5′ W.

FOURIER, FRANÇOIS MARIE CHARLES, foor'-e-ai, the founder of the system of Communism known as Fourierism. He showed great talent when young, and entered with success on a commercial career. In 1808 he began the publication of the series of works in which his system is developed.

Born at Besançon, 1772; died at Paris, 1837.

FOURIER, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH, Baron, French natural philosopher, historian and politician, received his education at a military school, and, in 1789, was appointed professor of mathematics in the school where he had studied. At the breaking out of the Revolution he became a member of the Committee of Public Safety at Auxerre, and was twice delivered from imprisonment by his fellow-townsmen. In 1794 he became one of the subordinate professors in the Polytechnic school, and subsequently accompanied the French expedition to Egypt. On his return, he was appointed prefect of the department of Isère. He was created a Baron in 1808. He afterwards became prefect of the Rhone, which post he resigned in 1815. He was subsequently appointed secretary to the Academy of Science conjointly with Cuvier, and president of the council of the Polytechnic school. He contributed to the splendid "Description de l'Egypte," and wrote the historical introduction. While prefect of the Isère, he succeeded in draining great marshes, which had previously resisted all efforts, and in 1807 received a special honour from the Academy of Science for an essay on the propagation of heat through solid bodies.

Born at Auxerre, 1768; died, 1830.

FOURMIES, foor'-me-ai, a manufacturing town of France, department Nord, 9 miles S.E. of Avesnes. Manf. Lace, thread, cotton, woollens, glass, and iron. Pop. 15,052.

FOURNI ISLANDS, foor'-ne, a group of about twenty small islands, in the Greek Archipelago, off the eastern coast of Asiatic Turkey. The largest is not more than 5 miles in circuit.

FOVEAUX STRAIT. (See NEW ZEALAND.)

FOWEY, fo'-e, a river of England, in Cornwall, rising between Bodmin and Launceston, and, after a course of 30 miles, falling into the English Channel near Fowey.

FOWEY, or FOY, a seaport-town of Cornwall, on the Fowey, which forms a spacious and secure harbour, defended by forts. On the west side is St. Catherine's castle, and on the opposite side the ruins of the old church of St. Saviour. The church is a spacious and lofty structure, with a handsome tower. There is a considerable pilchard-fishery. Pop. 1,394.

FOWLA, or FOULA, foul'-la, one of the Shetland Islands, with an elevation of nearly 1,400 feet above the level of the sea. Ext. 2 miles long, by about the same in breadth. Pop. 250. Lat. 60° 8′ N. Lon. 2° 6′ W.

FOWLER, EDWARD, foul'-ler, an eminent English prelate, who was, for his zeal in promoting the Revolution, advanced to the see of Gloucester in 1691. Besides several sermons and tracts, he wrote the "Principles and Practices of certain Moderate Divines of the Church of England, abusively called Latitudinarians," "The Design of Christianity" (this is an excellent book, and has been several times printed); "Libertas Evangelica, or a Discourse of Christian Liberty."

Born at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, 1632; died 1714.

FOX, EDWARD, an English bishop and statesman, who was educated first at Eton and next at King's College, Cambridge, to which, in 1528, he was elected provost. Cardinal Wolsey took him into his service, and obtained for him the appointment of ambassador to Rome, in conjunction with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of Henry VIII. He was afterwards sent in the same capacity to France and Germany; and in 1535 was promoted to the see of Hereford. This bishop was a great friend to the Reformation. He wrote "De verâ Differentiâ Regiæ Potestatis et Ecclesiasticæ, et quæ sit ipsa Veritas et Virtus utriusque."

Died 1538.

FOX, RICHARD, an English prelate, the son of poor parents, and educated first at Boston school, and afterwards at Magdalen College, Oxford, whence, on account of the plague, he removed to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He next went to Paris, where he gained the friendship of Dr. Morton, bishop of Ely, who recommended him to the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. On the accession of that monarch, Dr. Fox was made privy councillor, and preferred to the see of Exeter. He was also sent on several embassies, and, after obtaining different church preferments, was advanced to the see of Durham, whence he was removed to Winchester. He founded Corpus Christi College, in Oxford, and the free schools of Grantham, and Taunton in Somersetshire.

Born near Grantham; died at Winchester, 1528.

FOX, or FOXE, JOHN, an English divine, who was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, whence he removed to a fellowship in Magdalen College. In 1545 he was expelled on a charge of heresy, which reduced him to great distress. At length, Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire, took him into his house, as tutor to his children. Afterwards he removed to London, and was employed by the duchess of Richmond as tutor to the earl of Surrey's children; but his life being in danger on account of his principles, he withdrew, with his wife and other Protestants, to the continent, settled at Bâle, and earned his subsistence by correcting the press for Oporinus, the printer, whilst, at the same time, meditating his great work, entitled "The Acts and Monuments of the Church; or, Book of Martyrs." On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he returned to England, and, by means of secretary Cecil, obtained a prebend of Salisbury, and afterwards a stall at Durham. In 1563 he published his "Acts and Monuments of the Church," in one large volume folio. In the edition of 1583 it made two volumes; and, in the subsequent issues, three. This book was highly esteemed by Protestants, though stigmatized by the Roman Catholics as "Fox's Golden Legend." Besides his "Acts and Monuments," he published several books, particularly Latin comedies on Scripture subjects. Bishop Burnet, himself a most painstaking searcher into original documents, says of the "Book of Martyrs," that he had compared these "Acts and Monuments" with the records; and that he had never been able to discover any errors or prevarications in them, but the utmost fidelity and exactness. He was buried in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, of which he was for some time vicar.

Born at Boston, 1517; died 1587.

FOX, GEORGE, the founder of the sect of Friends, or Quakers, was the son of Leicestershire peasants, and at first placed with a shepherd, and afterwards bound an apprentice to a shoemaker. In 1643 he became a religious itinerant, and, about 1647, commenced publicly to preach, inveighing not only against the prevailing vices, but the officiating ministers and religious services; affirming that the light within, or Christ in the heart, is alone the means of salvation, and the true qualification for the ministry. He suffered frequent imprisonments and other rough treatment, which he generally seems to have brought upon himself, by his indiscretions in opposing the clergy, and passing strictures on them in their public ministry. The name of Quakers was given to him and his followers first at Derby, on account of the strange contortions and shakings which accompanied their preaching. In 1655 he was brought to London, and examined before Cromwell, who pronounced in his favour. In 1669 he married the widow of a Welsh judge, but still continued his course of itinerant preaching, and visited America, where he remained two years. On his return, in 1673, he was imprisoned in Worcester jail, and on his release went to Holland and Germany. His journal was printed at London in 1694, his epistles in 1698, and his tracts in 1706.

Born at Drayton, Leicestershire, 1624; died in London, 1691.

FOX, CHARLES JAMES, a distinguished English statesman and orator, was the second son of the first Lord Holland by the eldest daughter of the duke of Richmond, and received his education at Eton and Oxford, where his devotion to classical literature laid the groundwork of his future eminence as an orator. He early distinguished himself by ability, and also by the taste for dissipation and gambling which characterised his future career. He was designed by his father to occupy a high place in the political arena of his country, and with that view he procured for him a seat in parliament for the borough of Midhurst, when he was no more than nineteen years of age. He made his first speech in 1769, in which he supported Colonel Luttrel against Mr. Wilkes, in the Middlesex election. In 1770 he became junior lord of the Admiralty in the administration of Lord North; but he resigned this post in two years, when, in 1773, he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury. In the following year he was dismissed from his post, and in a short time appeared in the ranks of opposition to the ministry. The splendour of his oratorical talents was now exercised in denouncing the measures which led to the American war, and which finally resulted in the separation of the transatlantic colonies from England. In 1782 the administration of Lord North fell, when Fox became one of the secretaries of state, which office, however, he resigned on the death of the marquis of Rockingham. A new administration was formed under the earl of Shelburne, which, however, had but a brief tenure of existence. When the Coalition ministry was formed between Lord North and ministers, Fox resumed his former office. He now brought in his India Bill, which, having passed the House of Commons, was thrown out by the Lords, and was the proximate cause of the resignation of the ministry of which he formed a member. In 1784 occurred the Westminster election, resulting in the return of Fox, in a great measure owing to the exertions of the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire, after forty days' polling. (See DEVONSHIRE, Duchess of.) Mr. Pitt now entered upon office, when Fox arrayed himself at the head of the opposition, and a long contest commenced between these two illustrious individuals. Worn out with the excitement of debate, he repaired to the continent for the purpose of renewing his health, or perhaps of restoring the tone of wounded spirits constantly engaged in the harassing conflict of opinion; and, after passing a few days with Gibbon at Lausanne, he entered the classic land of Italy. George III., however, having been suddenly taken ill, he was soon recalled, and returned to his parliamentary duties. In 1786 the question of the Indian administration of Warren Hastings came on, in which, from its commencement to its close, he took an active part. Next came the question of the regency, which, Fox argued, belonged by right to the prince of Wales; and then the French revolution, the principles of which he also discussed with his usual feeling, fervour, and vehemence. It was upon this question that the memorable quarrel took place between him and Burke. "I know the price of my conduct," exclaimed the latter; "I have done my duty at the price of my friend. Our friendship is at an end." In vain did Fox appeal, with tears in his eyes, to the memory of twenty-five years of uninterrupted intercourse. The words were publicly spoken, and the breach was never healed. Notwithstanding this separation, however, Burke shortly afterwards declared that Fox "was a man made to be loved." Between 1797 and 1802 Fox lived chiefly in retirement at his residence, St. Ann's Hill, near Chertsey, when he formed the plan of his "History of the Reign of James II." In 1802 a dissolution of parliament took place, when Fox, who had before sat for Westminster, was again returned for the same "ancient city." Shortly afterwards he visited Paris, with the view of collecting materials for his "historical work," when he was introduced to Napoleon I., who paid him marked attention. On the death of his great rival Pitt, in 1806, Fox became secretary of state for foreign affairs under Lord Grenville; but his days were now numbered. Brief, however, as these were destined to be, he exerted himself for the abolition of the slave-trade, which was one of the many benevolent objects which lay near to his heart. He also endeavoured to negotiate a peace with France; but being afflicted with water in the chest, he did not live to accomplish his plans. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, within a few feet of the resting-place of his great rival. It is upon his speeches and his statesmanship that the fame of Fox rests; and the former of these have been highly praised, and commended to students of oratory as models for study. This has especially been the case with the first part of his speech on "the Westminster Scrutiny," which Brougham recommends to Macaulay "to pore over till he has it by heart." The criticism of Coleridge on the eloquence of Fox, is, "that his feeling was all intellect, and his intellect all feeling." Sir James Macintosh calls him a "Demosthenian speaker;" but Brougham says, "there never was a greater mistake than the fancying a close resemblance between his eloquence and that of Demosthenes."

Born 1749; died 1806.

FOX, WILLIAM JOHNSON, an eloquent orator, author, and politician. He was the son of a Norwich weaver, and giving promise of great talents, was educated at Homerton College, for the ministry among the Independents. He changed his opinions, and became a Unitarian minister, but in course of time detached himself from that body, and for many years was a Rationalist lecturer, at South-place Chapel, Finsbury, where he had a large congregation. His great oratorical powers made him popular as an advocate of the repeal of the corn-laws, and other liberal opinions in politics, and he was elected member of parliament for Oldham in 1847 and in 1852. In the House of Commons he chiefly distinguished himself by his advocacy of popular education. He is best known, however, as a periodical writer, and from his connection with the "Westminster Review;" for which he wrote the opening article of the first number. He also wrote for the "Monthly Repository," and was for many years the "Publicola" of the "Weekly Dispatch" newspaper. His separate works are "Letters of a Norwich Weaver Boy," and "Lectures to the Working Classes." He also produced a volume on "The Religious Ideas," and several other smaller performances.

Born near Wrentham, Suffolk, 1786; died in London, 1864.

FOX RIVER, or PISHTAKA, a river of North America, an affluent of the Illinois, rising in Wisconsin, and having a course of about 200 miles.

FOX RIVER, or NEENAH, another river rising in Wisconsin. It is divided into two sections by lake Winnebago, and after a course of 200 miles, falles into Green Bay, Lake Michigan.

FOX'S CHANNEL, a strait of British North America, stretching northward from Hudson's Bay, Melville Peninsula, and Southampton Island on the W. side.

FOY, ST., foi, a town of France, department Gironde, on the left bank of the Dordogne, 40 miles E. of Bordeaux. Manf. Hosiery, hempen cloth, and leather. There is a trade in white wines, brandy and agricultural produce. Pop. 3,800.

FOY, MAXIMILIEN SEBASTIEN, French general and politician. At the age of 16 he entered the army, and highly distinguished himself. In 1807, the emperor Napoleon sent him to assist the sultan against the British and Russians, and he defended Constantinople successfully against admiral Duckworth. From 1808 to 1812 he was general of division of the French army in Portugal; he was present at all the battles of the Pyrenees, and was dangerously wounded at the battle of Orthez, in 1814. He commanded a division, and was wounded at Waterloo. In 1819 he entered the Chamber as deputy for the department of the Aisne, and made himself prominent by his ability and eloquent advocacy of constitutional liberty. He strenuously opposed the war with Spain in 1823. He wrote a history of the Peninsular War, published after his death.

Born at Ham, 1775; died at Paris, 1825.

FOYERS, foy'-ers, a river of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, rising in the Monadheadh mountains, and falling into Loch Ness. In its course it forms cascades and falls, one of 90 feet.

FOYLE, foil, a river of Ireland, which, after passing Londonderry, expands into a bay called Lough Foyle, 16 miles long and 9 wide.

FRA BARTOLOMEO. (See BACCIO DELLA PORTA.)

FRACASTORO, GIROLAMO, fra-cas-to'-ro, Italian physician and philosopher, celebrated for the extent and variety of his learning. He was descended from an old family of Verona, and when only 19 years of age was appointed professor of logic at Padua. He was considered the most eminent physician of his time, and achieved a great reputation as a Latin versifier. Statues were erected to his memory at Verona and Padua. He wrote several works on medical and scientific subjects.

Born at Verona, 1483; died 1553.

FRA DIAVOLO, fra de-a'-vo-lo, (MICHAEL PEZZA), a Neapolitan robber. He began life as a stocking weaver, after which he became a friar; and in this capacity was a leader of a gang of banditti in Calabria, and made himself the terror of the country by his blood-thirstiness and cruelty, which gained him the name of "Fra Diavolo," or the devil's brother. In 1799 he assisted Cardinal Ruffo, who headed the counter-revolutionists in favour of the Bourbons of Naples. For this he received a pardon for his crimes, and a pension of 3,600 ducats, with which he was enabled to purchase an estate. He now lived in peace till 1806, when he rose again in favour of the expelled Bourbons, and he received the rank of colonel. He entered Spalinga, and threw open the prisons, when he was joined by large numbers of lazzaroni; but, after a severe engagement with the Bonapartists, he was taken prisoner, condemned, and summarily executed.

Born in Calabria, 1760; died 1806.

FRAGA, fra'-ga, a town of Spain, province of Huesca, on the left bank of the Cinca, 14 miles S.W. of Lerida. There are good open squares, two churches, one of which was formerly a mosque, three convents, a town-house, and several schools. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, cutlery, oil, and wine. Pop. 5,000. This was an important place under the Moors and kings of Aragon.

FRAMLINGHAM, fram'-ling-ham, a market town of Suffolk, on the left bank of the Ore, 14 miles N.E. of Ipswich. The church, built of black flint, is a very stately edifice, and contains interesting monuments of the Howard family. There are the remains of a castle where queen Mary resided for a time after the death of her brother, Edward VI. Pop. 2,570.

FRANCAISE, LA, fra'-saise, a town of France, 11 miles from Montauban. Pop. 4,000.

FRANCAVILLA, fran'-ka-veel'-ya, a large and regularly-built town of Italy, 16 miles S.W. of Brindisi. There are a handsome church, a college, three hospitals, and several convents. Manf. Woollens, cottons, snuff, and earthenware. Pop. 18,000. In 1734, this place suffered severely from an earthquake.

FRANCAVILLA, a town of Sicily, near the left bank of the Alcantara, 34 miles S.W. of Messina. Manf. Silk and linen. There are mines of silver, copper, lead, and antimony in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000.

FRANCE, france, a country of Western Europe, bounded on the N.W. by the English Channel, which separates it from England, N.E. by Belgium, E. by Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, S. by the Mediterranean Sea and Spain, and W. by the Bay of Biscay and Atlantic Ocean. On every side of its frontier, except the N., it has strong natural barriers in the Pyrenees, the Alps, the ridge of Jura, and the Vosges. The greatest length from Dunkirk in the north to the Pyrenees in the S. is about 620 miles; the greatest breadth from west to east, from the extreme point of Finisterre to the Vosges mountains, nearly under 48° lat., is 550 miles. The coast line on the English Channel, the Bay of Biscay, and the Mediterranean measures nearly 1,500 miles. The north and north-west coasts are irregular, and there are several bays. The department Manche forms a peninsula running northward into the English Channel. To the west of this is a large bay, in which are the Channel Islands belonging to Great Britain, and farther west, the peninsula which includes the departments of Cotes du Nord, Morbihan, and Finistère (portions of the old province of Brittany). The southern coast of this bold peninsula is generally lofty and precipitous; but south of the estuary of the Loire, along the east coast of the Bay of Biscay, the shore is low and there are numerous salt marshes. The Mediterranean coast, forming the Gulf of Lyons, is generally low, with lagoons, but east of Toulon it is bolder until it reaches the Italian frontier. The most prominent capes are Gris Nez on the Straits of Dover, La Hogue in the Channel, Barfleur, and Bec du Nez. The principal bays are Cancale, St. Brieux, Douarnenez, and Audierne on the W., La Foret and Quiberon on the S., and the Bay of Bourgneuf at the mouth of the Loire. The Roads are, the Basque, or the Bay of La Rochelle, and those of Brest, Toulon, Cavalaire, Grimaud, Napoule, and Jouan. The four last are in the Mediterranean. The islands near the coast are few and unimportant: Belleisle, Yon, Ré, Oléron, in the Bay of Biscay; and Ushant off the W. of Brittany. There are several mountain chains, noticed below, and the plains of Burgundy, and the basins of the Seine, Loire, and Garonne. In these plains the surface is generally level, or gently undulating. In regard to soil, vast tracts in Brittany, Anjou, and Gascony, come under the description of heaths, containing a gravelly, sandy, and stony surface, almost unfit for tillage. A striking feature in the face of the country are the Landes, lying between the Adour and the Gironde. They consist of heaths or marshes, presenting nothing but a desert, here and there interspersed with patches of pasture or cultivated land. The principal forests are those of Ardennes, Fontainebleau, Compiègne, and Orleans. It is estimated that one-eighth of the superficial area is covered with wood. About one half of the entire surface is under cultivation, and in some parts the soil is extremely fertile.

Mountains.—A portion of the ALPS is in France, extending from the departments of Savoy and Nice into Switzerland, and Mont Blanc, the loftiest mountain of Western Europe, is in French territory. The PYRENEES form the boundary between France and Spain, and Nethou, 11,165 feet high, and several peaks exceeding 10,000 feet, belong to France. The CEVENNES, traversing the country in a north-easterly and northerly direction, between the Rhone and the Loire, attain an elevation of more than 6,000 feet. The JURA mountains and the range of the VOSGES form a considerable portion of the eastern boundary of the country.

Rivers.—The great watershed of France, determining the courses of the principal rivers, is in the Cevennes and Vosges mountains. The largest rivers are the Seine, Loire, Garonne, and Rhone. The Seine falls into the English Channel; the Loire and Garonne into the Atlantic Ocean; and the Rhone into the Mediterranean Sea. The other important rivers are the Meuse, Moselle, Sambre, Schelde, and Lys, which flow into the North Sea; the Somme, Oise, Orne, Marne, Aisne, Yonne, and Eure, which fall into the English Channel; the Blavet, Vilaine, Adour, Allier, Cher, Indre, Vienne, Creuse, Mayenne, Sarthe, Loir (joining the Loire, near Angers), Gers, Dordogne, Ariége, Tarn, and Lot, which disembogue in the Atlantic; the Aude, Arne, Hérault, Saône, Doubs, Isère, and Durance, which fall into the Mediterranean. The most important of these rivers are described under separate headings. Most of the chief rivers are connected by canals, and it is calculated that there are about 220 navigable rivers, and 500 smaller streams, in France. The entire extent of river navigation amounts to 5,500 miles, and of navigable canals, nearly 3,000 miles. There are few lakes; the largest, Grand Lieu, in the department of Loire Inférieure, is not more than 20 square miles in extent.

Climate.—In the north, this is similar to what it is in England, rain occurring frequently, and the country being, consequently, fit for pasture. The interior is different, having much drier weather and fewer changes. In the south the heat is excessive; and the corn crops are often blighted from the want of rain. On the W. coasts the air is more moist, and rain more frequent. In about four-fifths of the entire country, the climate is healthy and delightful.

Pro.—In variety of vegetable products, France surpasses any other country of Europe. Wheat, barley, oats, pulse, potatoes, truffles, and beet-root, from which sugar is made; hemp, flax, chicory, tobacco, hops, dye-woods, and medicinal plants are extensively cultivated. In the S., olives, oranges, grapes, figs, pomegranates, citrons, and the pistachio nut. The vine is cultivated to the extent of about a twenty-seventh part of the superficial area of the country; and Burgundy, Bordeaux, and Champagne wines are produced, of the most excellent quality. In the south the mulberry-tree is very extensively cultivated. Timber for carpentry and for shipbuilding purposes is largely grown; and, in the S., the cork-tree abounds.

Minerals.—Iron, which is found over nearly the whole of the country, copper, lead, silver, antimony, sulphur, gold, coal, and salt. The gold produced is comparatively insignificant, but the iron, coal, and salt-works are of great value. Marble, alabaster, slate, granite, freestone, lithographic stones, and mill-stones, and a few precious stones, are also found. There are a large number of mineral springs. In the Pyrenees there are more than 90 establishments frequented for the purpose of drinking the waters of more than 400 springs, and altogether nearly 5,000 mineral springs are known to exist.

Zoology.—Among the wild animals are the wolf, bear, wild boar, fox, wild cat, stag, roebuck, fallow-deer, chamois, rabbit, and hare. Among birds are the eagle, falcon, partridge, buzzard, quail, and lark. The bee is extensively kept. Fish abounds on the coasts and in the rivers; salmon in the estuaries, and shellfish on the shores. Along the shores of the Mediterranean the anchovy and the tunny are caught; and, near its shores, the kermes, an insect yielding a crimson dye, is found.

Area.—201,900 square miles.

Pop.—The census taken in 1881 showed a population (exclusive of colonial possessions) of 37,672,048, an increase, after making due allowance for the cession of Alsace and Lorraine to Germany, of 1,569,127, as compared with the number returned in the census of 1872. The birth rate is about 24 to every 100 inhabitants, lower than that of any other country in Europe. The leading stock from which the population is derived is the Celtic, but much modified by the incursions of Franks and the Northmen, or Scandinavians. The Bretons of the north-west still retain strong traces, in physical appearance and language, of their Celtic origin.

Language.—The French language is chiefly based upon the Latin. Modern French began to be developed about the 13th century. It is generally adopted as the language of diplomacy.

Political Administrative Divisions.—Previous to the great Revolution, France was subdivided into provinces; but in 1790 it was redivided into 83 departments, and afterwards into 130, including Corsica, Geneva, Savoy, and other additions of territory. In 1815, the departments were reduced to 86, but raised to 89 by the acquisition of Savoy and Nice in 1860. The great war with Germany caused a loss of territory, and there are now 86 departments, subdivided into 362 arrondissements, 2,865 cantons, and 35,989 communes. The names of the old provinces are so familiar and so frequently referred to in history, literature, and even geography, that we subjoin a list, with the nearly corresponding departments:—

OLD PROVINCES.	DEPARTMENTS.
Alsace	Haut Rhin and Bas Rhin, ceded to Germany, 1871.
Angoumois and Aunis	Charente, Charente-Inférieure.
Anjou	Marne-et-Loire.

(Each department is separately described under its proper heading.)

Chief Cities.—The following cities have each more than 100,000 inhabitants. Paris (the capital), Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, Lille, Toulouse, Nantes, and Rouen.

Political Constitution.—France is a republic, governed by a president, elected for seven years, and to whom the executive power is entrusted. The legislative power is vested in an assembly of two houses, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. The Chamber of Deputies is elected by universal suffrage. The law orders that every arrondissement has to elect one deputy, and if its population is in excess of 100,000, an additional deputy for each 100,000, or portion thereof. The only requisite to be an elector is to be possessed of citizenship and to be of the age of twenty-one years, while the only requisite for a deputy is to be a citizen and twenty-five years of age. There are 532 members in the Chamber of Deputies. The Senate is composed of 300 members, of whom 225 are elected by the departments of France and the Colonies, and 75 nominated by the Chamber of Deputies. The senators for the departments are elected by Electoral Colleges for the term of nine years, retiring by thirds every three years, while those nominated by the Chamber of Deputies sit for life. No other qualification is required for a senator than to be a Frenchman and forty years of age. The President of the Republic is elected, by a majority of votes, by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, united in National Assembly. By a law which passed the National Assembly on May 24, 1872, certain consultative functions were assigned to a committee of the Assembly, called the "Conseil d'Etat," or Council of State, which consists of 28 ordinary members, elected by the National Assembly, and of 15 extraordinary members nominated by the President of the Republic. The functions of the Council of State are restricted to give advice on bills presented by the Government to the National Assembly, and on all other matters that may be submitted to it by the President of the Republic or by the Ministers. The "Garde des Sceaux," Minister of Justice, always fills the post of President of the Council of State. There are besides a Vice-President, and three sectional Presidents.

Religion.—About 35,000,000, or 98 per cent. of the total population, profess to be Roman Catholics; there are about 580,000 Protestants. All religions are equal by law, but only the Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, have state allowances. There are eighty-six prelates of the Roman Catholic church—namely, seventeen archbishops and sixty-nine bishops. The Protestants of the Augsburg Confession, or Lutherans, are, in their religious affairs, governed by a General Consistory, while the members of the Reformed Church, or Calvinists, are under a council of administration, the seat of which is at Paris. Between the census periods of 1866 and 1872, the Catholics exhibited an increase of numbers, and the Jews a slight decrease.

Education.—Public education in France is entirely under the supervision of the Government, and is presided over by a minister of Instruction, part of the expense being defrayed by the State. In addition to the faculties of Theology, Law, and Medicine, the Lycées, the Colleges, the Naval and Military Schools and the Ecole Polytechnique, the State supports numerous establishments for instruction in special branches of knowledge. The duration of school life is usually regulated by the religion of the scholar. Roman Catholics of the lower classes, more particularly in the rural districts, rarely visit school after eleven or twelve, the age at which they receive their first communion, while Protestants commonly remain at school until about sixteen. More than one-third of the grown-up population are unable to read or write.

Manufactures and Trade.—The most important manufactures are those of watches, jewellery, arms, cabinet-work, coach-building, pottery, glass, crystal, musical instruments, bronzes, chemicals, oil, soap, beetroot-sugar, dyeing, paper-making, printing, woollens, silks, linens, cottons, carpets, shawls, and lace. The most important manufacture is silk, the chief seats of which are Lyons, Tours, Paris, Nismes, Avignon, and Annonay. St. Etienne is famous for the production of ribbons. Cotton fabrics are produced at Rouen, St. Quentin, Troyes, Lille, and many smaller towns. Woollens, including broad cloths, at Rheims, Louviers, Amiens, Nancy, Elbeuf, Sedan, Abbeville, and Beauvais. Carpets of the best kind are made at Aubusson, Amiens, Abbeville, Felletin, and Paris; lace at Lille, Alençon, Arras, Bailleul, Caen, and Bayeux; gloves at Grenoble and Paris; porcelain and glass at Sèvres, Paris, Limoges, and Bayeux. The chief commercial ports of France are Bordeaux, Marseilles, Nantes, Hâvre-de-Grace, Calais, Boulogne, St. Malo, L'Orient, Bayonne, Dunkirk, Dieppe, Cette, and Rochelle. Marseilles trades with the West Indies and the Levant; Bordeaux with the East and West Indies, and with the north of Europe, to a great extent in wine. Nantes has likewise a share of the colonial and wine trade. The value of exports is about £155,000,000 annually, about two-thirds of the value of the exports of Great Britain.

Railways and Telegraphs.—There are about 12,400 miles of railway open for traffic, and nearly 36,000 miles of telegraph.

Colonial Possessions.—The colonial possessions embrace, inclusive of the so-called countries under protection, a total area of 463,827 English square miles, not including Algeria, which has a government and laws distinct from the other colonial possessions. (See ALGERIA.) The colonies and dependencies are—AFRICA—Algeria, Senegal, Islands of Reumon, St. Marie, Nossi Bé, and Mayotte. ASIA, East Indian Possessions, and Cochin China. AMERICA, Guiana, Guadaloupe, Martinique, St. Pierre, and Miquelon. POLYNESIA, New Caledonia, Marquesas, and Loyalty Islands. Slavery was abolished throughout the whole of the colonial possessions of France by a decree of the provisional government of February 24, 1848.

History.—The history of France cannot be said to commence till the reign of Clovis, who was the grandson of Merovée, and the real founder of the Merovingian dynasty. On his accession, in 481 (see CLOVIS), the Visigoths, Burgundians, Romans, and Germans were disputing amongst themselves the territory of Gaul: Clovis, however, proved the superiority of the Franks, defeated the Romans at Soissons, in 486; subjugated the Germans after the battle of Tolbiac, in 496; confined the Visigoths to the possession of Septimania, by the victory of Vouillé; and shook the power of the Burgundians, whom his sons finally conquered in 534. After his death, the kingdom was divided amongst his four children, Thierry, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotaire. In 558 these were again united under Clotaire, and, subsequently, after some internecine struggles, a second division led to the establishment of the four kingdoms of Austrasia, Neustria, Burgundy, and Aquitaine. Of these, the two former were the most powerful, but, in 687, Austrasia took the lead of the other, it having been converted into a kind of republic, governed by the Heristals, under the title of dukes. These dukes, or mayors of the palace, now became virtually the masters of the Neustrian kings; Burgundy also submitted to them, and Aquitaine, which had been overrun by the Moors, found a liberator in Charles Martel, 732. Twenty years after this, Pepin-le-Bref took possession of the crown, deposing Childeric III., the last Merovingian king, and the second of the Carlovingian dynasty. Pepin now brought Aquitania and Septimania, and united, for the first time, the whole of France under his sway, with the exception of Brittany. He extended his influence as far as Italy; forced Astolph, king of the Lombards, to acknowledge Pope Stephen, and made a gift of a territory to the pope. Charlemagne, his son, succeeded, who conquered southern Spain, Italy, Saxon Germany, Bavaria; and thus formed an immense kingdom, which, in 800, he proclaimed the new Empire of the West. This heterogeneous assemblage did not long hold together, and, in 843, it broke up into the kingdoms of France, Italy, and Germany, the imperial crown falling to the lot of the Italian and German lines of the Carlovingian dynasty; then, passing into the hands of foreign feudatories, and finally remaining with the Germans. In France, the commencement of the decline of Charles Martel's line dates from 843; the feudal system commences, and this increases, at the expense of royalty, when, in 887, Eudes, one of the principal feudal chiefs, seizes the throne, on which the Carlovingians had sat without territory and power. Twice were princes of this line restored to the throne, first in 898, and again in 936; but they failed to retain the sceptre, and definitively gave way to the Capet dynasty in 987. The efforts of able sovereigns and their long reigns, the formation of communes, and, above all, the enterprises of the Crusades, tended to enlarge the royal authority. From 1108 to 1226 the French territory under the Capets, which, at first, only included the duchy of France, rapidly extends—Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Poitou, were recovered from England, which up to this time had held them. The large provinces of Guienne and Gascony were on the point of reverting to the crown, but Louis-le-Jeune's divorce from Eléonore of Aquitaine, in 1152, prevented this consummation. Louis IX., called the saint, did not greatly add to his territory, but, during his reign, from 1226 to 1270, considerably increased the power of the sovereign, and under Philip III., from 1270 to 1284, when Languedoc was added to the crown, France's intervention in the affairs of the Spanish Christian kingdoms, extended its influence as far as Naples. Philip IV. began the recovery of the territories ceded to Lothaire, emperor of Germany, in 843; fought against the temporal power of the popes, and opposed to the nobles the States-General, whom he was the first to assemble, and Parliament, of which he may be said to have been the real founder. Under his sons, from 1314 to 1328, a feudal reaction commenced, which these princes blindly supported; the Valois branch followed their example, and shortly afterwards, in 1337, broke out the Hundred Years' war between France and England. Vanquished at Crécy, under Philip de Valois, in 1346, and again at Poitiers during John II.'s reign, France somewhat recovered herself, from 1364 to 1380, under Charles V. The minority, and afterwards the insanity of Charles VI., the conflicting interests of the royal princes, the power of the house of Burgundy, and the conflicts between the Burgundians and Gascons, again shook the very fabric of the kingdom. The English, after the crowning victory of Agincourt, in 1415, occupied nearly all the maritime provinces of France, when the extraordinary successes of Joan of Arc, in 1429, changed the aspect of affairs. Charles VII. was now crowned at Rheims, and the English, after a succession of battles, finally evacuated France in 1453. Louis XI. was successful in curtailing the power of his vassals, and added considerable territories to his kingdom, from 1461 to 1483. Charles VIII. was engaged in the Italian wars; Louis XII. exhausted his kingdom in continuing them; Francis I., who defeated the Swiss at Marignano, in 1515, but was himself conquered and taken prisoner at Pavia, in 1525, found himself unable to resist the enormous power of the emperor, Charles V. In Henry II.'s reign, 1562 to 1589, the religious wars commenced between the Catholic and Huguenot parties, devastating and impoverishing the kingdom; and in 1589, the death of Henry III. terminated the Valois line of monarchs. With Henry IV. (who united to the crown of France the kingdom of Navarre) the Bourbon branch rose to the throne; and this king put an end to the civil war, healed the wounds of his country, and gave her peace to recover from her exhaustion. Under Louis XIII., from 1610 to 1643, Cardinal Richelieu broke up the remaining power of the feudatories of the crown, and laid the foundations of the absolute monarchy of the succeeding sovereign. The "Thirty Years' War," resulting in the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, and subsequently that of the Pyrenees, in 1659, made France the first power in continental Europe. The treaties of Nimeguen and Ryswick, in 1648 and 1659 respectively, were not disadvantageous to her, although she had to sign an unfavourable peace at Utrecht in 1713, after the war of the Spanish Succession. Under Louis XV., from 1715 to 1774, Lorraine and Corsica were acquired, but in other respects the country gave way before the influence of Austria, and lost many of her colonies. At this period, however, the literature of France made great strides, and her language became that of nearly every European court. Under Louis XVI., assistance was rendered to the American revolutionists to become independent of their mother-country, and in 1789 occurred the Revolution, which overthrew, at the same time, the old constitution of France and its reigning dynasty. The republic existed from 1792 to 1804, when the empire of Napoleon I. was established, and lasted till 1814. The Bourbons now returned, and in the persons of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. (with the exception of the "hundred days" after Napoleon's escape from Elba), held the crown till 1830, when its younger branch, represented by Louis Philippe, was elected to reign over the French. On February 24, 1848, a sudden revolution overturned the monarchy and established the republic. In 1852, this gave place to the new Bonaparte empire under Napoleon III. In 1870, the offer of the Spanish crown to Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern led to a dispute between France and Prussia, and on the 19th of July, the emperor Napoleon declared war. The result was disastrous. The whole power of Germany (the Austrian portion excepted) was concentrated, and one French army after another was defeated with terrific loss. Napoleon himself was taken prisoner at Sedan; Marshal Bazaine surrendered, with 173,000 men, at Metz; and, notwithstanding the heroic efforts of Marshal Macmahon, General Chancy, and others, the Germans, after a series of victories, besieged Paris. (See PARIS.) The empress Eugénie, who had been appointed regent, fled, and on the 26th of February, 1871, the preliminaries of a treaty of peace were signed between the Provisional Government and Germany, by which it was agreed to surrender the greater part of Alsace and Lorraine, and pay a war indemnity of £200,000,000. M. Thiers, the celebrated historian and statesman, was chosen president of the Republic, and was succeeded, in May 1873, by Marshal Macmahon, duke of Magenta. In 1879 M. Grévy was elected President. The present constitution is dated February 25, 1875. (See NAPOLEON, EUGÉNIE, THIERS, MACMAHON, GERMANY, &c.)

FRANCE, ISLE OF. (See MAURITIUS.)

FRANCESCO DI PAULA, fran-ces'-co-de-pawl'-a, an Italian monk, founder of the order of the Minims. When only fourteen years of age he retired to a cave, and lived the life of a hermit. Being joined by others, a church and convent were erected, and the community received the name of the Hermits of St. Francis. When Louis XI. of France was dying he invited Francesco to come to him, and received him with great honour, and Charles VIII. built a convent for him at Plessis-le-Tour, and another at Amboise. He was canonized twelve years after his death.

Born at Calabria, 1416; died at Plessis-le-Tour, 1507.

FRANCHE-COMTÉ, franzh'-koné'-tai, the name, before the Revolution, of a province in France, adjacent to Switzerland and Lorraine. Its capital was Besançon, and it is now divided into the departments Haute-Saône, Jura, and Doubs. It was at one time a port of Burgundy, then passed into the possession of Austria, and was annexed to France by treaty of 1678.

FRANCIA, FRANCISCO, fran'-che-a, a distinguished Italian painter, who, from being a goldsmith and engraver on metals, rose to eminence as an artist. Having been employed by Raphael to place a picture of his in a church at Bologna, he was so struck with its beauty, and so disheartened at his own inferority, that he sank into despair and died.

Born at Bologna, 1450; died 1518.

FRANCIA, JOSÉ GASPAR RODRIGUEZ, Dr., dictator of Paraguay, studied for the church at the university of Cordova de Tucuman, where he took the doctorial degree. He afterwards practised for about thirty years as a lawyer. At the outbreak of the revolution at Buenos Ayres, he came into political prominence, and in 1813 he was appointed joint consul of the new republic of Paraguay. In 1814 he was appointed dictator, and for more than twenty-five years he held the office, exhibiting great administrative ability, developing the resources of the country, encouraging education, and enforcing justice. His treatment of foreigners was peremptory, and in some cases tyrannical, and exposed him to considerable odium in this country; but his countrymen looked upon him as a great benefactor, and his death was greatly regretted.

Born near Ascension, 1758; died 1840.

FRANCIS, fran'-sis, the names of several French, German, and Italian monarchs.

FRANCE.

FRANCIS I., son of the Comte d'Angoulême, married Claude, daughter of Louis XII., and succeeded to the throne in 1515, on the death of the king, who died without male issue. Scarcely had he ascended than he, as grandson of Valentino of Milan, put himself at the head of an army to assert his rights over the Milanese. The Swiss, who opposed his entry into the duchy, were defeated at Marignano (or Melegnano), and Milan fell immediately after this victory. After a short war with England, the famous interview between Henry VIII. and Francis took place, in 1520, in Flanders, and which, for the magnificence displayed on the occasion, was called "the Field of the Cloth of Gold." In the same year, Charles V. of Spain having inherited the empire after the death of Maximilian, Francis laid claim to the imperial dignity, and declared war against his rival. In this struggle, however, he met with nothing but reverses. After the defeat of Marshal Lautrec at Bicocca, in 1522, the retreat of Bonnivet, and Bayard's death (see these names), Francis was himself, in 1525, beaten at Pavia, and taken prisoner. The fight had been a stout one, and the king wrote to his mother, "All is lost, except honour." Led captive into Spain, he only recovered his liberty at the cost of an onerous treaty, signed at Madrid in 1526; but which was not entirely carried out. He immediately recommenced the war in Italy, met with fresh defeats, and concluded a second treaty at Cambray in 1529. In 1530 he married Leonora, sister of Charles V. He once more invaded Italy, in 1536, and, after various success, consented to a definite arrangement at Crespi, in 1544, by which the French were excluded from Italy, though Milan was given to the duke of Orleans, the second son of Francis. Francis was a friend to arts and literature, which flourished during his reign; and he was called the Father of Letters. Justice, also, began to be better administered in his reign in France, although the Calvinists suffered great persecutions. He founded the Royal College of France, the Royal Library, and built several palaces.

Born at Cognac, 1494; died 1547.

FRANCIS II., king of France, was the eldest son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, and succeeded his father in 1559. The year previous he had married Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, and he died, leaving no issue. Francis, duke of Guise, and Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine, held the principal authority in this reign, and, by the abuses of which they were guilty, had a principal share in causing the religious wars to which France now became a prey. Francis was succeeded by his brother, Charles IX.

Born 1543; died 1560.

GERMANY.

FRANCIS I., emperor, was the son of Leopold, duke of Lorraine. He inherited this duchy from his father, in 1729, and six years afterwards exchanged it for that of Tuscany, which the death of the last of the Medicis had rendered vacant. In 1736 he married Maria Theresa of Austria, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. On the death of the latter, he disputed the imperial dignity with the Elector of Bavaria, whom France supported, and who took the name of Charles VII.; he was, however, defeated, and Francis reigned twenty years. His character was tarnished by avarice. He had sixteen children, among whom was Joseph II., who succeeded him, and the unfortunate Marie Antoinette.

Born 1708; died 1765.

FRANCIS II., emperor of Germany, and I. of Austria, succeeded his father Leopold II., in 1792, as emperor of Germany, king of Bohemia, Hungary, &c. At the very commencement of his reign, he had to sustain a war against France, in which he was defeated, and was, in 1797, obliged to sign the treaty of Campo Formio, which deprived him of the Netherlands and Lombardy. Another war taking place with the same power, he was not more fortunate than in the first, and was beaten at Marengo, and lost, by the treaty of Lunéville, in 1801, all his possessions on the Rhine. In a third campaign, undertaken in 1805, the French were victorious over his armies at Elchingen, Ulm, and Austerlitz; and the treaty of Presburg still further diminished his territory. Renouncing, now, the title of emperor of Germany, he took that of Austria, under the name of Francis I. He tried again the fate of battles in 1809; but the defeats of Eckmuhl and Wagram led to the peace of Schoenbrunn; to cement which more strongly, his daughter Maria Louisa was, in 1810, given to Napoleon I. Notwithstanding this alliance, however, he, in 1813, joined the coalition against his son-in-law, and contributed considerably to his overthrow. The treaties of 1815 put him again in possession of the greater portion of his territory, and he reigned peaceably till his death in 1835.

Born 1768; died 1835.

AUSTRIA.

FRANCIS, JOSEPH, emperor, is the eldest son of the archduke Francis, son of the preceding and the princess Sophia of Bavaria. He served under Radetzky in the Italian campaign, and on the abdication of his uncle, Ferdinand, succeeded to the crown. He was crowned king of Hungary in 1867. In 1854 he married the princess Elizabeth of Bavaria.

Born 1830.

NAPLES AND SICILY.

FRANCIS I., king, was the son of Ferdinand I., and twice, during the lifetime of his father, he carried on the government of the kingdom under the name of viceroy; first, in 1812, when a constitution was granted to Sicily; and afterwards, in 1820, during the troubles which broke out in Naples and Palermo. He succeeded to the throne in 1825.

Born 1777; died 1830.

FRANCIS II., succeeded his father, Ferdinand, in 1859; but was driven out by Garibaldi, and his states annexed to the kingdom of Sardinia, 1860.

Born 1836.

FRANCIS, ST., of Assisi, an Italian, the founder of the order of Franciscan monks, was the son of a rich merchant, named Bernardini. He was at first intended by his father for commercial pursuits, and, with that view, studied the French language, which he acquired so perfectly, that the name of Francis was added to his baptismal name John. As a youth he was of a gay disposition, and addicted to the exercises of chivalry. He was taken prisoner, and while a captive at Perugia, suffered from a severe illness, which first directed his mind to religious subjects. At the age of 24, he gave himself up entirely to the religious life, and gained a number of followers, to whom he prescribed that they should possess nothing of their own, should live on alms, and spread themselves over the face of the globe to convert sinners and unbelievers. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, and on the tomb of St. Peter offered all that he possessed on earth. Henceforth he chose a life of abject poverty and humiliation. He performed the most painful offices of charity for lepers and other diseased persons, and begged for alms on the public streets. He was joined by others, and in 1210 a brotherhood was formed. Two years afterwards he settled at Assisi. In 1223 Francis went to the East and preached the gospel to the sultan himself. It is said that he had a remarkable vision, in which he saw an angel descend from heaven, with the marks of crucifixion on his body, and that he himself felt the pains of crucifixion at the same moment, and preserved the same marks in his flesh. He was canonized two years after his death.

Born at Assisi, Umbria, 1182; died 1226.

FRANCIS, ST., a river of Missouri, U.S., rising 25 miles from St. Génévière, and falling in the Mississippi, 45 miles S.W. of Memphis. Its singularly pellucid waters abound in fish. It is navigable for about 200 miles.

FRANCIS, ST., a cape of S. Africa, W. of St. Francis Bay, Cape Colony. Lat. 34° 10′ S. Lon. 24° 52′ E.

FRANCIS, ST., a lake, formed by the St. Lawrence, Canada, 35 miles from Montreal, 30 miles in length, by 2 in breadth.

FRANCIS, ST., a group of islands off the S. coast of Australia. Lat. 32° 32′ S. Lon. 133° 17′ E.

FRANCIS, SIR PHILIP, the supposed author of the celebrated "Letters of Junius," was the son of the Rev. Dr. Francis, the translator of Horace, and was educated at St. Paul's School, London. When he was but 16, he was placed in the office of Mr. Fox, afterwards the first Lord Holland, then secretary of state, and subsequently was fortunate enough to be retained by Mr. Pitt, when that statesman came into power. Afterwards, he was private secretary to General Bligh, then to the earl of Kinnoul, and, in 1763, received an appointment in the War Office, which he held nearly ten years. In 1773 he was named one of the civil members in council for the government of Bengal, and remained in India till 1780, when, having been wounded in a duel with Warren Hastings, he returned to England. In 1784 he was returned to the House of Commons, and remained a member till 1807, when he retired from parliament, evincing his interest in public affairs by his pamphlets and newspaper contributions. In 1816, great attention was drawn to him as being the author of the "Letters of Junius," Mr. John Taylor having published an ingenious pamphlet, in which strong evidence was given in support of this opinion. It may be added, in connection with Sir Philip's supposed authorship of these celebrated letters, that Lords Brougham, Campbell, Mahon, and Macaulay, have not hesitated to declare their conviction that he was that "great unknown;" and to these high names may be added other legal and literary authorities who entertain the same belief. Francis himself never admitted that he was the author of the letters, neither did he deny it, but affected a mysterious air when the subject was alluded to. The chief points of the evidence in favour of his authorship rest on the facts that "Junius" exhibited an acquaintance with many official matters which few except Francis could know of, and that the letters ceased when he departed for India.

Born at Dublin, 1741; died 1818.

FRANCIS JOSEPH, or FRANZ-JOSEF LAND, several large groups of islands in the Arctic Seas, discovered by the Austrian polar expedition of 1873. The western group is named Wilczek Land; the eastern, Zichy Land, divided by Austrian Sound. Another group was named Prince Rudolph Land. The islands are uninhabited, and the vegetation very scanty. Seals are abundant, and thousands of sea birds resort to the cliffs. Many tracks of the Arctic fox were seen. The islands lie to the north of lat. 80° N.

FRANCISCO, SAN, the most important town of the state of California, United States, situated near the northern extremity of a narrow strip of land which forms the south-western side of the Bay of Francisco, and lies between the bay and the Pacific Ocean. The town occupies the slope of some high hills facing the bay, from 300 to 360 feet high, known as Telegraph Hill, on the N.E.;

Rencon Hill on the S.E. and Russian Hill on the W. For rapidity of growth, San Francisco is one of the most remarkable towns in the world. Previous to the discovery of gold in California in 1848, the site was occupied by a straggling town, known as Serba Buena, made up of a few shanties and warehouses for hides and tallow, and an old church, "Mission Dolores," the population, made up of traders, deserters from whaling vessels, and adventurers, numbering less than 500. Now it is a very large and handsome town, notwithstanding that it has been several times destroyed by fire, with broad straight streets (many of them traversed by tram-cars) intersecting at right angles, and twelve open places, or squares, and some of the largest and finest public buildings in the United States. Front, Battery, and Sansom-streets contain some of the best business edifices, California-street is the centre of the financial world of San Francisco. Kearney and Montgomery streets have the appearance of belonging to an old town; and other principal thoroughfares are Bush, Pine, Sutter, and Post-streets, and Van Ness Avenue, where are many handsome residences, displaying an almost infinite variety of architectural styles. There are splendid mansions, fitted in superb style, the residences of the aristocracy of the town. The new City Hall, occupying the site of an old burying-ground, is a magnificent structure, with a cupola. It was erected in 1875, and cost about 800,000*l.* The new United States Branch Mint, at the corner of Fifth and Mission streets, has a large portico in the Corinthian style, and the entire building cost about 300,000*l.* in erection. The Custom House cost about 160,000*l.*, and the Merchants' Exchange, Bank of California, and the blocks of commercial and railway buildings are large and handsome. The Palace Hotel, opened in 1875, is the largest in the world, having accommodation for 1,200 visitors, and there are several other hotels of great size. There are 23 churches, the greater number belonging to the Roman Catholics, a convent, a synagogue, a marine and other hospitals, two orphan asylums, nearly 30 schools, and three theatres, one of great size. The town is provided with water brought by two aqueducts, one 20 miles long. A large number of Chinese are resident, and the Chinese quarter has been built in Chinese fashion, with narrow and crooked streets, opium-dens, gambling houses, a Chinese theatre, and eight joss-houses, or temples. Some of the Chinese merchants are very wealthy, and a considerable portion of the trade is in their hands. There are spacious wharfs, resting on piles, at which ships of the largest size can load and unload, and the harbour is always crowded with ships from almost all parts of the world. Large steamers ply regularly between San Francisco and Oregon, the isthmus of Panama, and towns on the south coast, and river steamers make regular trips to Sacramento city and the mining districts on the Sacramento river. Rent is very high, houses of from six to ten rooms letting at from 200*l.* to 400*l.* per annum. There are several banks and insurance offices and agencies for foreign companies. Since the opening of the Pacific railway across the continent of America, San Francisco has become a port of departure for the Australasian colonies, and traffic has greatly increased. Perhaps in no part of the world is the population so mixed in character. The permanent residents have been contributed by many countries, and visitors from all parts of the world are daily arriving and departing. Large fortunes have been made with great rapidity by acute and lucky speculators, and the diggers of the mining districts spend recklessly in "Frisco," as the town is familiarly called, the wealth they have so laboriously attained at the diggings. "The City of the Golden Gate," is a more poetical appellation. One speculator, Mr. James Lick, who had realised an immense fortune by buying up plots of land in the early days of the city, recently died, and left several millions of dollars for public purposes. The municipality are public spirited, and encourage education, to the furtherance of which about one-fifth of the municipal revenues is devoted. The condition of the working classes is very prosperous, strikes are rare, and there is more than 10,000,000*l.* deposited in the savings banks, by nearly 60,000 depositors. The markets are abundantly supplied, and a recent visitor says, "There is not a day in the year when one may not enjoy the luxury of green peas, fresh tomatoes, celery, and cauliflower—even strawberries may be a perennial delight." It is not quite so satisfactory to know that there are about 800 grog-shops. Oakland, Alameda, San Rafael, and other suburbs are rapidly rising into importance.

Manf.—Machinery, glass, sugar, woollens, chemicals, and rope.

Trade.—There is a very large transit trade, and the exports amount annually to about 11,000,000*l.* of precious metals, and other exports, 2,600,000*l.* A remarkable commercial feature is the development of the trade with China and Japan, carried on by steamers of about 130,000 aggregate tonnage.

Pop.—230,000, including nearly 5,000 Chinese, 15,000 Irish, and many French and Germans. The proportion of males to females is about three to one.

Lat.—37° 46′ N. Lon. 122° 25′ W.

History.—The name San Francisco was first given in January, 1847. The discovery of gold in California caused an immense "rush" of a motley and not very reputable population. By 1852 the inhabitants had increased from about 500 to 35,000. The social condition was terrible. Crimes of terrible character were of constant occurrence, suppressed at last by "vigilance committees" of the more respectable and energetic citizens. Five great fires, between December, 1849, and June, 1851, swept away property valued at 3,200,000*l.* The houses at first were chiefly of wood, but have been replaced by fine buildings of stone, in some instances granite, brought from China. Buildings are increasing at the rate of nearly 2,000 houses a year.

FRANCISCO BAY, SAN, is one of the finest in the world; the entrance to it is striking, a bold and rocky shore completely land-locking it, and arresting the rush of the tide through the narrow passage at the entrance. Several islands, some of which are verdant to their very tops, whilst others are barren, are inclosed in the bay. The Sierra, a lofty range of inland mountains, rises to the E., and at the N. end of the bay are the bays of San Pablo and of Suisoon. The latter, which receives the waters of the Sacramento and Joaquim, is about 10 miles in diameter, and nearly circular in form. The former is not so large. The bay is about 60 miles in length, and 10 in average breadth.

FRANCISCO, SÃO (or SANTO), an island of Brazil, from the coast of which it is separated by a channel, called São Francisco river. It is 24 miles long, by about ten broad, of an irregular shape, lessening in width towards the N., and not of a great elevation above the sea. Various small islets surround it, and it is watered by several streams, which increase its fertility. Pro. Mandioca, rice, millet, coffee, and tobacco, some of which is exported. Pop. 7,000.

FRANCISCO, SÃO, the chief town of the above island, 9 miles from the sea, has its houses principally of mud; but there is a church, built of stone, which rises conspicuously above them. There is also an hospital with a small chapel. The harbour is good, and there is considerable trade with coasting vessels. Lat. 26° 22′ S. Lon. 48° 57′ W.

FRANCISCO, SÃO, a river of Brazil, rising in the S.W. of the province of Minas Geraes, flowing thence through Bahia, forming the boundary between Pernambuco and Alagoas, and, after a course of 1,600 miles, falling into the Atlantic, 50 miles N.E. of Sergipe del Rey. It has two mouths, and receives many affluents, both on its right and left; but, owing to the bar at one of its mouths, and its numerous rapids and cataracts, it is not capable of navigation.

FRANCISCO, SÃO, a town of Brazil, province of Bahia, at the N.W. extremity of the bay at the mouth of the Serigi. There are a church, Franciscan convent, and school. Manf. Sugar and spirits. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 12° 22′ S. Lon. 38° 50′ W.

FRANCKE, AUGUSTUS HERMANN, frank'-ai, a German divine and philanthropist, who was a lecturer at Leipsic, but left that town in consequence of being suspected of heterodoxy. He became professor of the Oriental languages, and afterwards of divinity, in the university of Halle. Here, in 1692, he laid the foundation of an orphan-house, still existing, and known as Francke's Institution, with about 3,500 pupils. For the foundation of this institution, and for schools he also established, he received considerable assistance from many charitable persons. He also carried into effect a mission for propagating the Gospel in Malabar. He produced several volumes of practical theology.

Born at Lubeck, 1663; died at Halle, 1727.

FRANCKLIN, THOMAS, frank'-lin, an English divine, who was educated at Westminster school, whence he was removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the degree of D.D. He was also chosen professor of Greek in that university. In 1758 he was appointed to the vicarage of Ware, to which was afterwards added the rectory of Brasted, in Kent. He subsequently became chaplain in ordinary to King George III. He translated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian into English, and wrote three plays: the "Earl of Warwick," and "Matilda," tragedies; and the "Contract," a comedy. He also published a volume of sermons on the relative duties, and permitted his name to be prefixed to a translation of Voltaire's works.

Born in London, 1720; died 1784.

FRANÇOIS, ST., fransé'-waw, a town of the island of Guadaloupe, French West Indies, 7½ miles from St. Ann. Sugar and cotton works are extensively carried on. Pop. 6,600, of whom about 5,500 are emancipated slaves.

FRANÇOIS, ST., a town, with a good harbour, on the east coast of Martinique, French West Indies. Pop. 6,000, more than 4,000 being emancipated slaves.

FRANCOLI, fran-ko'-le, a small river of Spain, rising about three miles from Prades, in Catalonia; thence flowing through Tarragona, and after a course of 30 miles, falling into the Mediterranean, 1 mile from Tarragona.

FRANCONIA, fran-ko'-ne-a, one of the ten circles of the ancient empire of Germany, the greater part of which, by the treaties of 1815, fell to Bavaria, and formed the circles of the Higher and Lower Rhine, and Rézat; the rest was divided between Wurtemburg, Baden, Hesse and Hesse-Darmstadt, Prussia, and Saxony.

FRANCONIA, UPPER, or OBERFRANKEN, an administrative district in the north-east of Bavaria. It is intersected by the Fichtelgebirge, and other mountain ranges. The valleys, watered by the Maine, Raab, and Saale, are very fertile. The district is rich in minerals. Pop. 575,357. BAIREUTH is the capital.

FRANCONIA, MIDDLE, or MITTEL-FRANKEN, a district of Bavaria, abutting on Wurtemburg. It is intersected by branches of the Jura mountains. The Regnitz and Altmuhl, connected by the Ludwig canal, are the chief rivers. Hops are extensively cultivated, and good wine is produced. Pop. 643,817. The chief towns are ANSPACH and NÜREMBERG.

FRANCONIA, LOWER, or UNTER-FRANKEN, a district of the north-west part of Bavaria, highly cultivated, and famous for the excellent wines produced. In this district are the favourite mineral springs of Kissingen, Brückerau, Orb, and Whipfield. Pop. 626,305. The chief town is WÜRZBURG.

FRANEKER, fran'-e-ker, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Friesland, on a canal, 9 miles from the Zuyder Zee. It is a well-built handsome town, in a fertile district, and is an old place, having, in 1191, obtained some political privileges. In 1585 its university was founded, and attained a great reputation, but it was abolished by Napoleon in 1811. There is now an athenæum, with a botanical garden. Pop. 5,500.

FRANGIPANI, fran'-je-pa-ne, a powerful family of Rome, the members of which exercised great influence in the 11th and 12th centuries, taking the popular side against papal encroachments.

FRANKENBERG, fran'-ken-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the district of Cassel, province of Hesse-Nassau, on the right bank of the Edde, 37 miles S.W. of Cassel. It is entered by four gates, and is divided into an old and a new town. There are two churches, and a court-house, formerly a monastery. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, leather, paper, and tobacco. Twelve annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,300.

FRANKENBERG, a manufacturing town of Saxony, on an affluent of the Mulde, 7 miles from Chemnitz. Manf. Linen and cotton, leather, and machinery. Pop. 10,000.

FRANKENHAUSEN, fran'-ken-how'-sen, a walled town of the principality of Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Germany, on the Wipper, 27 miles N.W. of Weimar. There is a palace. Manf. Salt and saltpetre. There is a trade in wool, corn, and wine. Pop. 6,000.—In 1525 there was a battle here, in which the rebellious peasants were defeated by the Saxon, Brunswick, and Hessian troops.

FRANKENSTEIN, fran'-ken-stine, a fortified town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the left bank of the Pause, 37 miles S.W. of Breslau, standing on an eminence about 850 feet above the level of the sea. Manf. Linen cloth, straw-plait, and chemicals. Pop. 7,500.

FRANKENTHAL, fran'-ken-tal, a manufacturing town of the Palatinate, Bavaria, on the Isenach, 16 miles N.W. of Spires, connected with the Rhine by a broad canal, three miles long. Manf. Cloth, cotton, linen, gold and silver wire, needles, files, and tobacco. Pop. 7,100.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN, or FRANKFURT, a city of Prussia, on the right bank of the Main, about 20 miles above its influx into the Rhine. There is, on the opposite side of the river, a suburb, Sachsenhausen, communicating by a stone bridge of 14 arches, a suspension bridge for foot passengers, and a railway bridge. Frankfort was formerly fortified; but its outworks are now converted into gardens and promenades. The principal streets are wide; there are also many squares, adorned with fountains and statues; the Roemer, or old palace, in which the emperors of Germany were elected (this contains the imperial hall, around which are portraits of the emperors of Germany); the Thurn and Taxis palace and place of the assembling of the Diet; the Saalhof, a modern imperial palace; the Lutheran, or high church; other churches, Jews' synagogues, hospitals, a theatre, an academy of painting, and the Senkenberg Museum. Besides these, there are a geographical society, college, medical institute, and numerous schools. The house in which Luther resided is preserved, and a house, the first stone of which was laid by Goethe, when a child, is preserved in trust for the German people.

Manf.—Carpets, table-covers, oil-cloths, cotton and silk fabrics, woollen stuffs, jewellery, tobacco, printers' ink, type, chemicals, and sewing machines. It has, also, large printing, lithographic, and stereotyping establishments.

History.—Frankfort has been a place of importance for a thousand years. In 843 it was made the capital of the Frankish empire; was selected by Barbarossa as the place for the election of the emperors of Germany, in the 12th century, and constituted a free city in 1257. In 1848 the constituent assembly met here; and in 1866 it was captured by the Prussians, and incorporated with the kingdom of Prussia. The famous old cathedral, St. Bartholomew's, was destroyed by fire in 1867. The treaty of peace between Germany and France, in 1871, was signed here by Bismarck and Jules Favre.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-ODER, or FRANKFURT, a fortified town of Prussia, the capital of a district of the same name, in the province of Brandenburg, 50 miles E. of Berlin, with which it communicates by railway. St. Mary's church, built in the 13th century, is noticeable on account of the fine carvings and stained windows. There are five other churches, and a gymnasium. The old university was incorporated with that of Breslau in 1811. There are three suburbs, one on the opposite bank of the Oder, which is crossed by a wooden bridge, at the end of which is a monument to Prince Leopold of Brunswick, who lost his life in endeavouring to rescue a poor family from an inundation of the Oder.

Manf.—Silk, leather, hosiery, gloves, tobacco, sugar, brandy, mustard, and porcelain. Three great fairs are held annually.

Pop.—51,147.
Lat. 52° 22′ N. Lon. 14° 33′ E.

History.—The town was a member of the Hanseatic League; and in the 15th century and during the Thirty Years' War, was frequently besieged and captured.

FRANKFORT, or FRANKFURT, a district of Prussia, forming the south-eastern portion of the province of Brandenburg. It is an extensive plain, with some low hills, well-wooded and fertile. The principal river is the Oder, and there are also the Neisse, Warthe, Netze, and Bober. There are many saline springs. Large numbers of cattle and sheep, chiefly of the merino and derived breeds, graze on the rich pastures. Minerals. Iron, copper, gypsum, and alum. The capital is FRANKFORT-ON-ODER. Pop. 1,105,493.

FRANKFORT, capital of Kentucky, United States, on the Kentucky river, which divides it into two parts. There are a handsome state house, built of marble, three churches, a court house and penitentiary. Manf. Cotton, bagging, and rope. Pop. 6,958.

FRANKLAND ISLANDS, frank'-land, a group of four, lying off the N.E. coast of Australia, in lat. 17° 13′ S.; lon. 146° 8′ E.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN, frank'-lin, an American statesman, and one of the most distinguished of modern philosophers, was one of the seventeen children of a soap-boiler and tallow-chandler in the city of Boston. His father took him from school, when only ten years old, and set the future philosopher to "the cutting of wicks for the candles, filling moulds," and other duties necessary to his business. Disliking this occupation, however, he was placed under his elder brother, who was a printer in Boston, but with whom he disagreed. He then removed to New York, whence he went to Philadelphia, where, after serving as a journeyman some time, he attracted the notice of Sir William Keith, the governor, who persuaded him to commence business on his own account. With this view he proceeded, in 1725, to England, to procure printing materials; but on his arrival he found that the governor had deceived him by false promises; on which he worked as a journeyman in London. He now produced his "Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain," which was the means of introducing him to Mandeville, the author of "The Fable of the Bees." In 1726 he returned to America, and entered into partnership with a person named Meredith, in the printing trade, which he afterwards conducted alone in the city of Philadelphia. In 1730 he was united to a widow lady, whom he had courted before her first marriage; and, about the same time, contributed to the forming of the public library at Philadelphia, and subsequently established an insurance office and other useful institutions in the same town. In 1732 he published his "Poor Richard's Almanack," which became noted for the pithiness of its proverbs, and wherein were inserted those maxims so generally known by the title of "The Way to Wealth." In 1736 he was appointed clerk to the General Assembly at Pennsylvania, and, in the year following, postmaster of Philadelphia. In 1738 he founded an association for extinguishing fires, and subsequently a company for insurance against fire. He was now a prominent member of the community. In 1742 he invented what is still called "the Franklin stone;" and, two years later, proposed and carried into effect a plan of association for the defence of Philadelphia. About this time he commenced his electrical experiments, of which he published an account, and had the honour of making several discoveries in this branch of philosophy, the principal of which was the identity of lightning with the electric fluid. Hence he invented the lightning-conductor. For these discoveries he received the gold medal of the Royal Society of London; the universities of Oxford, Edinburgh, and St. Andrew's conferred on him the degree of D.C.L., and he was made an associate of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. In 1747 he was chosen a representative of the General Assembly, in which he distinguished himself by several acts of public utility. By his means a militia bill was passed, and he was elected colonel of the Philadelphia regiment, but the honour of this appointment he declined. In 1757 he was sent to England as agent for Pennsylvania. Whilst in this country he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and honoured with the degree of doctor of laws by the universities of St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, and Oxford. In 1762 he returned to America, but two years afterwards revisited England in his former capacity, when he underwent his examination at the bar of the House of Commons concerning the Stamp Act. In 1775 he returned to America, and was elected a delegate to the Congress. In the contest between Great Britain and her transatlantic colonies, he took an active part in the declaration of independence. In 1778 he arrived in France as minister plenipotentiary from America, and signed a treaty offensive and defensive with that power, and which produced a war between France and England. In 1783 he signed the definitive treaty of peace recognising the independence of the United States, and in 1785 returned to America, where he was triumphantly received, and chosen president of the supreme council. In 1787 he sat with Washington and Hamilton, in the federal Convention, which framed the constitution of the United States. His death was sincerely mourned both in Europe and America. Besides his political, miscellaneous, and philosophical pieces, he wrote several papers in the American Transactions, and two volumes of essays, with his life prefixed, written by himself.

Born at Boston, 1706; died 1790.

FRANKLIN, SIR JOHN, a distinguished English navigator, who, in 1800, entered the royal navy as a midshipman, was present at the battle of Copenhagen, and afterwards accompanied Captain Flinders, in his survey of the Australian coast. In 1806 he was present at the battle of Trafalgar, and in 1814 at that of New Orleans. In 1819 he was appointed to head an overland expedition from Hudson's Bay to the Arctic Ocean. After suffering many hardships, and being frequently on the verge of death, from hunger and fatigue, he reached home in 1822, having travelled more than 5,500 miles in those inclement regions. In the following year he married a Miss Purden, the daughter of an architect, and the authoress of several poetical effusions. He was raised to the rank of post captain, and elected a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1825 he submitted to Lord Bathurst a plan "for an expedition overland to the mouth of the Mackenzie river, and thence by sea to the N.W. extremity of America, with the combined object also of surveying the coast between the Mackenzie and Coppermine rivers." This proposition was accepted, and, six days afterwards, he left Liverpool, and surveyed the coast of North America from the Coppermine overland to Point Beechy. During his absence his wife died. In 1827 Captain Franklin arrived at Liverpool, where he was married a second time, and in 1829 had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, and the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford, and received the gold medal of the French Geographical Society. He took an active part in the Greek war of liberation; and in 1836 was appointed governor of Van Diemen's Land, where he was very popular. In 1845 Sir John set out on a third expedition with two ships, called the Erebus and Terror, and spent his first winter in a cove between Cape Riley and Beechy Island. After that period many expeditions were despatched, both from England and America, in search of Sir John, of whom there were no tidings, and not until 1854 did the intelligence reach England that the brave navigator and his heroic companions had, in all probability, perished in the winter of 1850-51. This intelligence, however, wanted confirmation, and Lady Franklin, who deserves all praise for the intelligent persistency of her efforts, resolved to have the mystery cleared up as to whether her gallant husband had really met the fate which it was generally believed he had done. Accordingly, a last expedition was fitted out, and the melancholy news was, in 1859, at length confirmed by the return of Captain McClintock, in the yacht Fox, after a persevering search for the lost adventurers. This officer brought with him indisputable proofs of the death of Sir John and the loss of his crew. Several articles belonging to the unfortunate explorers were found at Ross Cairn and Point Victory. At the latter place a record was discovered, wherein it was stated that Sir John Franklin had died on the 11th of June, 1847. Other traces were found on the west coast of King William's Island, as the various survivors of the expedition had strayed from each other, perhaps in search of food, or the means of escaping from their dreary and desolate situation. He was a brave and lovable man, his daring tempered with judgment, and a deep sense of responsibility.

FREDERICK or FRIEDRICH, the name of several German and Danish sovereigns.

GERMANY.

FREDERICK I., fred'-e-rick, surnamed Barbarossa ("redbeard"), emperor, the son of Frederick, duke of Suabia, succeeded to the imperial throne on the demise of his uncle, Conrad III., in 1152. He was an energetic and warlike prince, and in the second year of his reign, settled the disputes between Canute and Sweyn, competitors for the Danish crown, the former of whom he held as his vassal. He next marched into Italy to settle the tumults which distracted that country, and was crowned at Rome by Adrian IV., who, dying in 1159, no less than three antipopes were chosen, who were all opposed by the emperor. The Milanese, profiting by these divisions, endeavoured to shake off the imperial yoke, on which Frederick again entered Italy, took Milan, and entered Rome; but after a long combat was compelled to make a truce and agree to peace. He then turned his attention to Germany, and crushed the Guelfic power. He subdued Poland, raised Bohemia to the rank of a kingdom, and made Austria an independent duchy. In 1189 he resigned his government to Henry, his eldest son, and embarked, with a large army, for the Holy Land, to fight against the infidels, obtained some victories, took Iconium, and penetrated into Syria, where he was accidentally drowned. His body was recovered and buried at Tyre.

Born 1121; died 1190.

FREDERICK II., the grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI., was elected king of the Romans in 1196, and emperor in 1212, in opposition to Otho. He was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1215, and again in 1220 at Rome. He founded the university of Naples, encouraged learning and literature, and drew up a code of laws. Being threatened with excommunication if he did not fulfil his pledge of leading a crusade, he went to the Holy Land, and concluded a truce with the sultan of Egypt, which so provoked pope Gregory IX., that he anathematized him. In the city of Jerusalem he put the crown on his own head, because no priest would even say the mass. On this, Frederick returned to Europe and laid siege to Rome, which occasioned the famous parties of the Guelphs and the Ghibelines, the former being on the side of the pope, and the other on that of the emperor. Gregory was obliged to make peace, but, in 1236, he again excommunicated Frederick, and the war was renewed, which proved unsuccessful to the emperor, whose German subjects revolted against him. He lost Parma by an insurrection, and was defeated before it; but he afterwards was victorious in Lombardy. He possessed many accomplishments, was master of six languages, wrote verses and philosophical treatises, and was expert in military exercises.

Born 1194; died at Fiorentino, 1251.

FREDERICK III. was the son of Albert I., and was chosen emperor in 1314, by some of the electors, but the majority elected Lewis of Bavaria, who defeated and took prisoner Frederick at Muhldorf, in 1322. The latter then renounced his claim.

Born 1286; died 1330.

FREDERICK IV. (sometimes known as Frederick III., the election of the preceding not being considered valid), called the "Pacific," ascended the throne in 1440, and was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, and, 10 years afterwards, at Rome. His reign was passed in forming plans for the pacification of the empire, and in struggles with domestic intrigues and foreign difficulties. He was an indolent, selfish man, more addicted to scientific studies than to the cares of state, and left it to his son Maximilian to carry out the device inscribed upon his palaces and books, A, E, I, O, U; which characters are generally supposed to represent the motto Austriæ est Imperare Orbi Universo.

Born at Innspruck, 1415; died 1493.

SWEDEN.

FREDERICK, king of Sweden, was the eldest son of Charles, landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. He married the sister of Charles XII., on whose death, in 1718, the states of Sweden elected her queen, and in the year following, consented to her resigning the crown to her husband. He had a long and unsuccessful war with Russia, which ended in a disadvantageous peace to Sweden. He then gave his energies to the pursuits of peace, restored the finances, aided agriculture and commerce, and founded an academy at Stockholm. He died without issue.

Died 1751.

DENMARK.

FREDERICK I., king of Denmark and Norway, succeeded his nephew Christian, or Christian II., on the deposition of the latter, in 1523, and entered into an alliance with Gustavus I., king of Sweden. After taking Copenhagen, he gained over all the nobility, and introduced Lutheranism into his dominions.

Born 1473; died 1534.

FREDERICK II., the son and successor of Christian III., ascended the throne in 1559. He was a great friend of learning, and a patron of Tycho Brahe and other men of science. He waged a long war with Sweden, which ended in 1570. He received the order of the Garter from Elizabeth, queen of England, and gave his daughter in marriage to James VI. of Scotland and I. of England.

Born 1534; died 1588.

FREDERICK III., succeeded his father Christian IV. in 1648. The most remarkable event of his reign was his changing the constitution from an elective to an hereditary monarchy.

Born 1609; died 1670.

FREDERICK IV. ascended the throne on the death of Christian V. in 1699. He leagued against Charles XII. of Sweden, who forced him to make peace; but when Charles fled to Turkey, Frederick drove the Swedes out of Norway, and concluded a favourable peace, retaining possession of the duchy of Schleswig.

Born 1671; died 1730.

FREDERICK V. grandson of the preceding, came to the throne in 1746. The character of his reign may be inferred from the following remark, which, on his deathbed, he made to his successor, Christian VII.: "It is a great consolation to me, my son, that I have not injured any person, and that my hands are not stained with one drop of blood." He encouraged trade, manufactures, and education, established art academies at Copenhagen, and patronized expeditions of discovery in the East. He was twice married; first to Louisa, daughter of George II. of England, and then to Juliana, daughter of the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttel.

Born 1723; died 1766.

FREDERICK VI., king of Denmark, son of Christian VII. and Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England, ascended the throne in 1808, although, since 1784, he was associated in the government with his father, who had lost his reason. On his accession, he had to repair the damages done by the English in their bombardment of Copenhagen in 1807, and to wage a war with the Swedes, who attempted to possess themselves of Norway. He succeeded in defeating them, and peace was signed at Jon Kœping, in 1809. Allying himself with Napoleon, Norway was, in 1814, given by the allies to Sweden under Bernadotte; Pomerania and the isle of Rugen falling to Denmark. More tranquil times now arriving, Frederick devoted himself to the extension of the internal resources of his kingdom. In his reign feudal serfdom and the slave trade were abolished.

Born 1768; died 1839.

FREDERICK VII., succeeded his father, Christian VIII., in 1818. In his reign the Schleswig-Holstein dispute occurred.

Born 1808; died 1863.

FREDERICK AUGUSTUS II. (See AUGUSTUS FREDERICK II., King of Poland.)

FREDERICK AUGUSTUS III. (See AUGUSTUS FREDERICK III.)

PRUSSIA.

FREDERICK WILLIAM, generally called the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg, succeeded his father, the elector George William, in 1640. He is considered as the founder of the Prussian power, and from his example, much of the military spirit which characterizes that nation is believed to have sprung. He entered on a war with Sweden, but was obliged to make peace in 1655, in which year he assisted that power against Poland. In 1672 he joined the imperialists in opposition to Louis XIV.; but, in 1673, he made a separate treaty with France, and, in the following year, again joined the allies; on which the French prevailed upon the Swedes to attack his dominions. Frederick, however, defeated the invaders, drove them out of Prussia, and took several places from them, which, however, by the treaty of St. Germain, in 1679, he was obliged to restore. He now turned his attention to the improvement of his states, and, by affording protection to the French Protestant refugees, added to the industrial power of his dominions 20,000 manufacturers, and laboured to extend the agricultural arts in every direction. He founded the library at Berlin, and a university at Duisburg; encouraged the settlement of Protestants driven from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and, at his death, bequeathed to his son not only a country enlarged beyond the boundaries in which he found it, but a treasury well supplied.

Born 1620; died 1688.

FREDERICK I., son of the above, king of Prussia after 1701, but, as elector of Brandenburg, Frederick III., succeeded to his father's dominions in 1688. He supported William of Orange with troops when he entered England; and also aided the imperialists against the Turks. The great object of his ambition was to be recognized king of Prussia, and in 1701 he attained his object. On that occasion he put the crown on his own head, and on that of his consort. He also founded the order of the Black Eagle, and augmented his dominions by the county of Tecklenburg and the principality of Neufchâtel and Valengin. This prince founded the university of Halle, and greatly improved and embellished Berlin, where he built the palace of Charlottenberg, and founded the royal academy of sciences, and the academy of painting and sculpture. His queen Sophia Charlotte, of Hanover, was the sister of George I., and a woman possessed of a fine understanding.

Born 1657; died 1713.

FREDERICK WILLIAM I., son of the above, and father of Frederick the Great, commenced his reign in 1713, after having married Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England. In 1715 he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, and in conjunction with Denmark took Stralsund; but on the death of Charles, in 1718, he made peace. The habits of this sovereign were entirely military, and he laboured unweariedly to promote discipline of his troops. One of his strongest peculiarities was an extraordinary love for tall soldiers; and in order to procure these sons of Anak, he had agents employed in all parts of Europe. He liked low society and held science and literature in profound contempt; but money he worshipped, and men of a military character after his own ideal he respected and encouraged. The consequence was, that he left an abundant treasury and a well-appointed army of 70,000 men.

Born 1688; died 1740.

FREDERICK II., commonly called "The Great," was the son of the preceding, and received but an indifferent education owing to his father's contempt of letters and predilection for military discipline. On attaining the years of manhood, he evinced so strong an inclination to literature and music, that he incurred the displeasure of his parent, whose treatment induced him, in 1730, to make the attempt of escaping from Prussia. This scheme, however, being discovered, he was confined in the castle of Custrin, his young companion, Katte, being executed before his face. After a confinement of several months, he obtained his pardon, although it seems well authenticated that his father had resolved to take away his life, and that he was only saved by the intercession of the kings of Sweden and Poland. In 1733 he married the princess of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttel, in obedience to his father's command, and retired to Ruppin, where he employed himself in literary pursuits, and also with the study of music, until his accession to the throne. In 1740 he succeeded to the crown, and taking advantage of the defenceless state of Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, he marched into Silesia, which was added to his dominions by the treaty of Breslau. In 1744 the war was renewed against the queen of Hungary, and the same year Frederick took Prague, which, however, he was forced to evacuate, on the approach of a Saxon army under the prince of Lorraine. In 1745 he defeated that prince at Friedberg, and then marched into Bohemia, where, at Sorr, he defeated an Austrian army superior to his own. Shortly after, he took Dresden, where, after laying it under heavy exactions, a treaty of peace was concluded, which enabled Frederick to retain possession of Silesia, and end the second Silesian war. The eleven years of peace which succeeded this event were devoted by Frederick to the internal administration of his dominions, the composition of some literary works, and the framing of the "Frederician code of laws." In 1750 Voltaire visited Prussia, and was received with the most flattering marks of attention by the king; but the friendship which subsisted between them was at last broken, and the French philosopher quitted Prussia abruptly, and in disgrace. In 1756 a treaty was concluded between England and Prussia, which produced another between France, Austria, and Russia. "The Seven Years' War," as it is called, began by Frederick marching into Saxony, and taking the camp of Pirna. The following year, he gained a great battle at Prague over the Austrians, on which he laid siege to that city, and after reducing it to great straits, he was compelled by Marshal Daun, who defeated him at Kolin, to retire into Saxony. Frederick was now surrounded by enemies; the French entered Hanover, the Russians and Swedes advanced towards Prussia, and the Imperialists pursued him into Saxony. Still undaunted, he attacked and defeated the French and Austrians at Rosbach; then marching into Silesia, beat another army at Lissa, and recovered Breslau. The Russians and Swedes retreated precipitately from Prussia; and the Hanoverians took the field under the prince of Brunswick. In 1758 he received a large subsidy from England; and the same year entered Moravia, where he laid siege to Olmutz, which was relieved by Marshal Daun. He then marched against the Russians, who had laid siege to Custrin, and defeated them, after a bloody battle, at Zorndorf. Not long after this, however, he was surprised and beaten by Daun, at Hochkirchen. The next year the king was defeated, after a very obstinate and doubtful engagement, at Cunnersdorf, by the Russians; and in 1761, the confederates entered Brandenburg, and took Berlin. Frederick, however, by defeating Daun at Torgau, put a new face upon the campaign, and the Russians and Swedes were compelled to quit his territories. In 1762 peace was restored between him and Russia and Sweden; and in 1763 a treaty, much in his favour, was concluded with the empress-queen, by which Silesia was confirmed to Prussia, and which concluded the "Seven Years' War." Still ambitious of extending his dominions, in 1772 the partition of Poland was planned, and he obtained for his share all Polish Prussia, and a large portion of Great Poland. From this period the kingdom of Prussia was divided into East and West Prussia. In 1778 he opposed the design of the emperor Joseph to dismember Bavaria, and marched in person against that monarch; but no action took place, and by the treaty of Teschen, in 1779, the Austrian court renounced its design. In 1786 he concluded a treaty of amity and commerce with the United States of America; but his days were fast drawing to a close, for the same year he died, at his favourite palace of Sans Souci, in the forty-seventh year of his reign. Frederick despised his native language and literature, and he was thoroughly French in all his tastes. He was cynical, and occasionally brutal and spiteful; but could, when he pleased, be courteous in his manners, and was an acute politician. As a general, he takes place in the very first rank, bold, acute, full of resources, with a wonderful faculty of recovery after a defeat, rapid in movement, and unfailing in resolution. He had many petty vanities, especially with regard to his literary efforts. He died without issue. His works published in his lifetime, are in four vols. 8vo; and since his death several more have been printed. The principal are, the "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg;" a poem on the "Art of War;" the "History of his Own Time;" and the "History of the Seven Years' War."

Born 1712; died at Sans Souci, 1786.

FREDERICK WILLIAM II., king of Prussia, was the nephew of the great Frederick, and succeeded him in 1786. He gave himself up to pleasure, sacrificing his ministers and generals to the caprices of his mistresses. He also allowed himself to be cajoled by the mystical vagaries of the society of the "Illuminati," and under his feeble rule, Prussia soon lost her place amongst nations. After having played a scarcely honourable part in the war which broke out in 1787 between Turkey and Russia, he proposed, in 1792, a coalition against the French republic. Advancing, at the head of 80,000 men, as far as the plains of Champagne, the world was expecting to see him march on Paris, when he suddenly retired, falling back on the Rhine. The following year he effected, with the aid of Russia, the second division of Poland, and made peace with France in 1795. He wasted the resources of the kingdom, which his predecessor had so well husbanded, and at his death the state was burdened with a heavy debt.

Born 1744; died 1797.

FREDERICK WILLIAM III., son of the above, commenced his reign in 1797 by maintaining a strict neutrality in the various alliances with and against France which resulted from the ambitious designs of Napoleon I. In 1805, however, he yielded to the solicitations of Russia, allying himself with the czar against the French emperor. The rapid campaign of 1806, and the defeat of the Prussians at Jena, opened the gates of Berlin to the enemy, in whose hands it remained till 1809. In 1807 the battle of Friedland led to the humiliating peace of Tilsit, by which Frederick lost half his dominions. Restored to his capital, the king diligently endeavoured to repair the evils of war; but new disasters overtook him, and his kingdom suffered greatly during the struggle from 1812 to 1814. Forced, in the former year, to contribute a force of 30,000 men to Napoleon's army, he subsequently joined his troops with those of Russia. The allies having triumphed over the French at Leipsic, Frederick William, in 1814, entered Paris with the Czar Alexander. He also accompanied the latter to England in the same year. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he once more joined the allies. After the victory of Waterloo, in which the Prussians, under Blucher (whom see), played an important part, Prussia, once more at peace, gradually recovered the losses she had sustained, under the wise and paternal sway of Frederick, whose constant efforts and moderation contributed greatly to the maintenance of peace. Throughout his life, he was a warm defender of the Protestant religion, and a patron of education. He never redeemed his promise, however, to bestow a representative constitution on his people. The establishment of the provincial estates only affected very slightly the absolute power, which, it is true, he wielded with ability, and with a kind of paternal affection for his people. It may finally be said of him, that, a waverer between the absolutist party and the liberal party, he secured, as is the lot with most undecided men, the respect and adherence of neither.

Born 1770; died 1840.

FREDERICK WILLIAM IV., king of Prussia, son of the preceding, succeeded to the throne in 1840. He had served, as a simple officer, in the campaigns of 1813 and 1814, and evinced, at an early period of his life, a very great love for the arts, which he preserved throughout his career. During the first years of his reign, his subjects anxiously demanded the reform of the government, requiring the liberal constitution which had been promised them in 1815, in return for the great sacrifices they had made during the continental war. In 1847, at a general diet of the Prussian states, many of these reforms were granted, and it was thought that the kingdom might escape the troubles of the next year's revolution. In March, 1848, however, the people and the troops came into collision, the king was obliged to change the ministry, to issue a general amnesty, and to commence a war in favour of Schleswig against Denmark, and to salute from his balcony the corpses of the insurgents. These humiliations were somewhat softened by his hopes of becoming emperor of a united Germany, and by the success of his army in putting down an insurrection of the Poles in Posen. The mingled irresolution and absolutism of Frederick, however, led, subsequently, to other conflicts in June and August of the same year; and it was only by two coups-d'état that Frederick, assisted by his army, succeeded in retaining his authority almost unimpaired by the powers he had yielded. In the war between the Western powers and Russia, the king preserved a strict neutrality, although earnestly solicited by each party to espouse its side in the conflict. In 1856, in consequence of an attack on Neufchâtel by some Prussian partisans, war was in danger of breaking out between Switzerland and Prussia; but this was avoided, and a treaty concluded, in May, 1857, in reference to the king's claims on that place. In the complications relative to the Danubian principalities, Prussia followed the lead of France and Russia as opposed to England and Austria. Attempts were twice made to assassinate him. Towards the end of 1857 a severe illness, resulting in the loss of some of his faculties, caused his brother William to be nominated regent.

Born 1795; died 1861.

FREDERICK WILLIAM NICHOLAS CHARLES, crown prince of Prussia, nephew of the preceding, and son of William I., married, in 1858, Victoria, the princess royal of England. He took a conspicuous part, as a commander, in the war with Austria in 1866, and the great Franco-Prussian war of 1870.
Born 1831.

FREDERICK, COLONEL, son of the unfortunate Theodore, commonly called king of Corsica, was bred to the military profession, and obtained the rank of colonel, with the cross of the Order of Merit, from the duke of Wurtemburg, for whom he acted as agent in England. Being greatly reduced in circumstances, he shot himself in the portal of Westminster Abbey. He wrote "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Corse," and "The Description of Corsica, with an Account of its Union to the Crown of Great Britain," &c.
Born 1730; died 1797.

FREIBERG, frī'-bairg, a town of Saxony, near the confluence of the Münzbach and the Mülde, 20 miles S.W. of Dresden. It is an ancient town, with portions of the old walls and towers. The cathedral is a very fine gothic structure, erected in the 15th century, and restored in 1820. It contains some historically interesting tombs and fine carvings. There are several other handsome churches. The gothic town house was built about 1410. The School of Mines, founded in 1765, has a great reputation, and many of the most eminent geologists, among them Wiesner and Humboldt, have studied there. The town is the centre of a very important mining district. Silver mines were discovered in the 12th century, and there are nearly 150 mines of silver, copper, lead, and cobalt in the vicinity. Manf. Ornamental articles in metal, copper, white lead, gunpowder, woollens, and lace. Pop. 27,166.

FREILIGRATH, FERDINAND, fri'-lig-raht, German national poet. On leaving school, where he greatly distinguished himself, he was apprenticed to a merchant in Westphalia. He afterwards obtained a situation in a banker's office at Amsterdam, and remained there for six years. During that time he devoted himself to literature, and found when he returned to Germany that he had secured a reputation there. He still, however, continued to follow commercial pursuits. In 1842 a pension was conferred upon him by the king of Prussia. This he afterwards surrendered for political reasons. Those reasons he stated with such directness in a volume of political poems that a Crown prosecution was instituted against him, and he was compelled to flee the country. He came to England, and in 1846 became a merchant's clerk in London. When the Revolution of 1848 broke out he returned to Germany, but was soon afterwards thrown into prison for publishing a political poem. When brought to trial, however, after two months' confinement, he was acquitted. Two years later he again was compelled to seek refuge in this country. In 1868 he returned to Germany, in great poverty, and his friends and admirers raised a sum which enabled him to live in comfort. On the outbreak of the war with France, he wrote several songs, which attained great popularity. Besides writing many original works, he translated several English poems into German, especially the "Venus and Adonis" of Shakspeare, and some of the poems of Tennyson, Barry Cornwall, and Longfellow.

Born at Detmold, 1810; died near Stuttgart, 1876.

FREIND, JOHN, frinde, an English physician, who, having distinguished himself by some able works, was, in 1704, appointed chemical professor at Oxford, and, in the following year, accompanied the earl of Peterborough in his expedition to Spain, as physician to the army. On his return, in 1707, he published a vindication of the earl's conduct in Spain, which gained him considerable reputation. The same year he took his doctor's degree, and published his Chemical Lectures. In 1711 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and, the same year, accompanied the duke of Ormond to Flanders. In 1716 he was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians; and, in 1722, sat in parliament for Launceston. The year following he was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in Atterbury's plot, but was soon released on bail. At the accession of George II. he was appointed physician to the queen. Amongst other works, he wrote "The History of Physic."

Born at Croton, Northamptonshire, 1675; died 1728.

There are interesting Roman remains. Pop. 2,700.—It was here that Bonaparte landed, on his return from Egypt, in the autumn of 1799; and here he also disembarked, after his escape from Elba, in 1814.

FREMANTLE, fre'-man-tel, a town of West Australia, and the chief port of the colony, at the mouth of the Swan river, 12 miles S. of Perth. The river is spanned by a wooden bridge. The harbour is not good, but measures are being adopted for its improvement. There is a convict prison. There are a Protestant and Roman Catholic church, other places of worship, banks, and hotels. Pop. 3,500. Lat. 32° 7' S. Lon. 116° E.

FREMONT, JOHN CHARLES, fre-mont', American politician and traveller, called "the Pathfinder of the Rocky Mountains." He studied at Charleston college, and was for some time a teacher of mathematics in the American navy. He then adopted the profession of civil engineer, was employed in the Mississippi survey, and afterwards, in several journeys, greatly distinguished himself by his courage and perseverance in extensive explorations, which opened to America "the gates of the Pacific empire." An account of these explorations was published in 1856, and upwards of 50,000 copies of the work were sold as soon as they were issued. In 1859 the whole of his expeditions were published, superbly illustrated with woodcuts and steel plates. This work was superintended by the colonel, and contains a résumé of the first and second expeditions, which he made in the years 1842-43 and 1844, as well as his other four, which embrace a period of ten years, passed amid the wilds of America, and describing his adventures in Oregon, California, the Rocky Mountains of Mexico, and other parts of that distant country. In 1845 he took part in the Mexican war as captain, but some disputes arising, a court-martial deprived him of his commission, which the president of the United States offered to restore, an offer refused. He received the gold medals of the English and Prussian Geographical Societies. In 1856 he contested the presidency with Buchanan; but the latter was elected by a considerable majority. He was again nominated in 1864, but withdrew in favour of Lincoln.

Born at Savannah, 1813.

FREMONT, formerly Lower Sandusky, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 17,652. The capital is Austin.

FRENCH BROAD RIVER, a river of the United States, one of the sources of Tennessee river. It rises in S. Carolina, and, crossing the western part of N. Carolina, enters Tennessee through a breach in the mountain, and joins the Holston 11 miles above Knoxville. Twenty-five miles from its mouth it receives the Nolachucky and 6 miles above Big Pigeon river.

the level of the sea. Lat. 42° 18′ S. Lon. 145° 42′ E.

FRERE, Right Honourable John Hookham, freer, an English author and diplomatist, who filled several important posts, the most noted of which was his ministry in Spain during the Peninsular war. It is by his literary performances, however, that he is best known. At a very early age he translated the Saxon poem on the victory of Athelstan at Brunenburgh, which was written during the controversy occasioned by the poems attributed to Rowley. It is a work of very high merit, and, at the time of its appearance elicited warm commendation. He also wrote and published "The Whistlecraft Papers," which are supposed to have suggested the "Don Juan" of Byron. He was considered by Sir Walter Scott a perfect master of the ancient style of composition, and was one of the founders of the "London Quarterly Review," as well as a contributor to the "Etonian" and "Anti-Jacobin." The last years of his life were passed at Malta.

Born in Norfolk, 1769; died at Malta, 1846.

FRÉRET, Nicholas, frai'-rai, a learned Frenchman, who was chosen a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and afterwards its perpetual secretary. Presenting to this body a dissertation on the origin of the Franks, his opinions were not pleasing to those in authority, and he was sent to the Bastile. On his release, he occupied himself with antiquarian researches, and prepared a very large number of works on the chronology of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Indians, the old Greeks, and even the Chinese. Some of these have been published in Paris.

Born in Paris, 1688; died 1749.

FRÉRON, Elie Catherine, frai'-rawng, a French critic, educated among the Jesuits. He was, at first, a professor at the college of Louis le Grand, but subsequently allied himself with Desfontaines, whom he assisted in his literary undertakings, and against the philosophers of the 18th century. In 1749 he commenced his "Letters on certain Writings of the Times," which extended to 13 volumes. He then began his "Année Littéraire," which he continued till it was suppressed, a short time before his death. His critical works were much read; but owing to some strictures which he passed on Voltaire's writings, that writer attacked him with great asperity, and ridiculed him in his satire of the "Pauvre Diable," and in his comedy of "L'Ecossaise." So cutting was the sarcasm of Voltaire and others, that Fréron died of grief. Besides the above works, he wrote—"Miscellanies," "Les Vrais Plaisirs," part of a translation of Lucretius.

Born at Quimper, 1719; died 1776.

FRESNEL, Augustin Jean, fres'-nel, a French scientific writer, who was at first an engineer, connected with the roads and bridges in the department of Drôme, where he remained till 1815. At this period he quitted active employment, and ardently followed scientific studies. Subsequently he published "Memoirs on the Polarization and Double Refraction of Light," and in 1821 was appointed examiner of the Polytechnic School at Paris. To him are due many improvements in lighthouses, and he was one of the first to introduce lenticular lights. In 1823 he was elected a member of the French Academy of Sciences; in 1825, a member of the Royal Society of London, which, two years afterwards, conferred on him the Rumford medal for discoveries in relation to light and heat.

Born at Broglie, 1788; died 1827.

FRESNILLO, frais-nil'-lo, a town of Mexico, on a stream which flows into the Santiago river. Some of the richest silver and copper mines in Mexico are in the neighbourhood. Pop. 12,000.

FRESNOY, Charles Alphonsus du, fres'-noi, a French painter and poet, who visited Rome for the purposes of study. Here he copied the works of the best masters, and planned his Latin poem on the "Art of Painting." His poem was printed after his death, with a French translation by De Piles. There are three English translations of it; one by Dryden, another by Graham, and another by Mason.

Born at Paris, 1611; died 1665.

FRETEVAL, fret'-e-val, a town of France, in the department of Loir-et-Cher, 10 miles from Vendôme. Here, in 1194, the army of Philip Augustus was defeated by the English.

FREUDENSTADT, froi'-den-stat, a town of Wurtemberg, on the Murg, 24 miles from Strasburg. Manf. Cotton and nails. There is a large trade in cattle, wood, and fruit. Pop. 5,200.—The town was first established at the end of the 16th century, as a place of refuge for Protestants.

FREUDENTHAL, froi'-den-tal, a town of Austria, province of Silesia, on the borders of Moravia, 26 miles N.E. of Olmutz. Manf. Woollens, linens, hosiery, leather, and iron. Pop. 1,600.

FREWEN, Accepted, froo'-en, an English prelate, who, in 1622, accompanied Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I., to Spain, as chaplain. In 1631 he obtained the deanery of Gloucester, and, in 1643, the bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry. At the Restoration he was translated to York, and died at Thorpe Castle.

Born in Kent, 1589; died 1684.

FREY, Johann Cecile, fri, a German physician, who boasted of being the first who defended theses in philosophy in the Greek language in Europe. His "Opuscula" was printed after his death by Baledrens.

Born 1580; died 1639.

FREYJA, FRIGGA, or FREA, fre'-ya, in Scandinavian mythology, the wife of Odin, and sometimes represented as the goddess of love. Friday was named from her.

FREYR, frair, in Scandinavian mythology, the god of peace and fertility. He was the patron of Sweden, and a large temple was dedicated to him at Upsala. Festivals were held in his honour at the end of the year.

FREYSTADT, FREYSTADTEL, or GALGOCZ, fri'-stat, a town of Hungary, on the left bank of the Waag, crossed by a handsome bridge, opposite Leopoldstadt. There are a castle, and a remarkable round tower. Manf. Articles of wood. Large cattle markets are held. Pop. 6,400.

FREYTAG, Frederic Gottlieb, fri'-tag, was a burgomaster of Nuremberg, and wrote: "Rhinoceros Veterum Scriptorum Monumentis descriptus," 1747; "Analecta Literaria, de Libris varioribus," 1751; "Oratorum et Rhetorum Græcorum quibus Statuæ honoris causa positæ fuerunt," 1752; "An Account of Scarce and Valuable Books," 1776.

Born 1723; died 1776.

FREYTAG, Gustav, German dramatic poet and novelist. He studied at Breslau and Berlin, and in 1838 took a degree in philosophy. In 1847, in conjunction with Julian Schmidt, he founded a literary journal, which soon arrived at a large circulation. He subsequently published a small collection of poems, and an historic comedy, "Kuntz von Rosen," which was followed by two dramas and another comedy. All these are remarkable for their well-drawn characters, and the lively and natural tone of the dialogue. He is best known, however, in England, by his "Soll und Haben," a novel which was translated into English, in 1858, under the title of "Debit and Credit," and which attained a high degree of popularity. He wrote, besides, many tales and historical sketches. In 1870 he became editor of a weekly paper in Leipsic.

Born at Kreuzburg, Silesia, 1816.

FREZIER, AMEDÉE FRANCIS, frez'-e-ai, a French mathematician, who was employed in making a survey of the Spanish colonies of Peru and Chili, in 1711, of which he published an account in 1716. He was afterwards employed in fortifying St. Malo and other places, for which he was rewarded with the cross of St. Louis. He wrote—"Traité des Feux d'Artifice," "Elémens de Stéréotomie," &c.

Born at Chambéry, 1682; died 1772.

FRIBOURG, FREIBOURG, or FREYBURG, a canton of Switzerland, between the cantons of Berne and Vaud, with the lake of Neuchâtel on the S. It is finely diversified with every kind of scenery; comprising wooded or grassy hills, Alpine mountains, and long and beautiful verdant valleys. It lies principally in the basin of the Aar, and in the S. and E. is traversed by branches of the Bernese Alps, the culminating points of which are Mount Molesson, Dent de Folligrau, and Dent de Braulaire, rising respectively to the height of 6,580, 7,710, and 7,720 feet above the level of the sea.

Rivers.—The Broie and the Sarine.

Lakes.—The principal is Marat.

Pro.—Cattle rearing is the chief occupation, and dairy husbandry is extensively followed. There is scarcely sufficient corn grown for the population; but both peat and timber are important products. The breed of horses is valuable.

Manf.—Straw hats, cheese, leather, and tobacco.

Area.—642 square miles.

Pop.—115,000; about 95,000 are Roman Catholics; two-thirds French, and the remainder of German descent.

History.—This canton is the ninth in the Swiss confederation, to which it was admitted in 1481. A liberal constitution was received in 1848, and six members are sent to the national council.

FRIBOURG, the capital of the above canton, 18 miles S.W. of Berne, on both banks of the river Sarine, but chiefly on a lofty eminence, on the sides of which the houses are built in terraces, the roofs of some being level with the basements of others. The whole is surrounded by walls with ancient towers and gates. Four bridges cross the Sarine, one of them a suspension bridge 906 feet long, and 175 feet high, the largest bridge of a single span in the world. There is another suspension bridge, 700 feet long, and 317 feet high, across a deep mountain gorge in the vicinity. The Gothic church of St. Nicholas has the highest spire and finest set of bells in Switzerland, and an organ which is reputed to be unsurpassed in Europe for beauty of tone. There are several other fine churches. There are also a large cantonal school and a lyceum. Manf. Hardware, leather, woollens, pottery, and tobacco. Pop. 11,000.

FRIEDBERG, freed'-bairg, a town of Bavaria, 4 miles E. of Augsburg. There are three churches, one of them a very fine building, famous for its painted windows, and an old castle. Manf. Clocks, musical instruments, worsted, and tiles. Four fairs are held annually. Pop. 2,000.

Born at Tretzendorf, 1490; died 1556.

FRIEDRICKSHAM, freed'-der-ik-sham, a fortified town of Russia, in Finland, capital of the circle of the same name; on a peninsula of the Gulf of Finland, 110 miles N.W. of St. Petersburg. Small harbour. Pop. 2,300.

FRIENDLY, or TONGA ISLANDS, friend'-le, a group in the S. Pacific Ocean, forming an archipelago of very considerable extent, and consisting of about 180 islands, the greater part of which are either mere rocks or shoals, only about 30 being inhabited. The most important are,—Tongataboo (or Amsterdam, as it was called by Tasman, who discovered it in 1643), which has about one-third of the entire population, (see TONGATABOO); Boco, called by Tasman, Middleburgh; Annamooka, or Rotterdam, according to Tasman; the Hapia islands, namely, Haanno, Foa, Lefooga, and Hoolawa; Mayorga, a group of islands about 100 miles N. of Hapai, discovered, in 1781, by the Spanish navigator Maurelle, and since visited by Captain Edwards, in 1791, by whom the group was named Howe's Islands; Nuatobutabo and Kootahe, discovered by Schouten and Lemaire in 1616, and visited by Captain Wallis in 1767, who called them Keppel's and Boscawen's Islands; Toofoa, or Amattafoa; Hamoa, and Vavao. To this extensive archipelago Captain Cook gave the name of Friendly Islands, from the firm alliance which seemed to subsist among the natives, and from their courteous behaviour to strangers. Pop. 25,000, nearly all Christians, and fairly educated. The principal chief is an earnest preacher. Lat. between 18° and 23° S. Lon. between 172° and 176° E.

FRIES, ELIAS, frees, Swedish botanist, professor at the university of Upsala, and appointed in 1851 director of the botanical garden and museum, and in 1853 rector of the university. He was a member of the Stockholm Academy, and of many other learned bodies, and author of many important works on botanical science.

FRIESLAND, or VRIESLAND, (the ancient Frisia), freez'-land, a province of the Netherlands, on the N.E. of the Zuyder Zee, being inclosed on the land side by Drenthe, Groningen, and Overyssel. It is flat; and being below the level of the sea, its coasts are protected by dykes. Large portions of it consist of sandy heaths; but in the N. and W. there are some tracts of pasture, where cattle-rearing is carried on. The lakes are numerous, and there are some forests; but peat is the chief fuel made use of by the inhabitants. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics. The islands, Schiermonnikoog, Ameland, and Terschelling, off the N. coast, included in the province, have extensive fisheries. Area, 2,047 square miles. Pop. 330,866. —The chief town is LEUWARDEN.

FRIESLAND, EAST, the name of a province of the late kingdom of Hanover, now belonging to Prussia, and nearly equivalent to the district of Aurich. It is bounded on the N. by the German Ocean, W. by the Netherlands, E. by Oldenburg, and S. by Aremberg. It is low, flat, and protected by dykes. Area, 1,144 square miles. Pop. 190,000. —The counts of Friesland becoming extinct in 1744, Frederick II., king of Prussia, seized the country, in consequence of the expectancy granted to the house of Brandenburg, in 1694, by the emperor Leopold. Napoleon incorporated it with Holland and France; it was restored to Prussia in 1814; ceded to Hanover in the following year, and again became Prussian territory on the annexation of Hanover, in 1866.

FRIGENTO, or FRICENTO, a town of Italy, 35 miles N.E. of Naples. There is a very fine cathedral, with valuable paintings, but the town itself is a miserable place. Pop. 3,100.

FRISCH, JOHN LEONARD, freesh, a German naturalist and divine, who was the founder of the silk-manufactory in Brandenburg, and the first who cultivated mulberry-trees in Germany. He was the author of "A German and Latin Dictionary;" "A Description of German Insects;" "Dictionnaire Nouveau des Passagers François-Allemand et Allemand-François," 8vo, &c.

Born at Sultzbach, 1666; died at Berlin, 1743.

FRISCHEHAFF, freesh'-e(r)-haf, a bay or lagoon of the Baltic Sea, between Elbing and Konigsberg, on the coast of Prussia, united with the Baltic by a passage called the Gatt, at the mouth of which is Pillau, on the shore of the Gulf of Dantzic, where large vessels unload. The Haff is 58 miles long, with an average breadth of 5. It receives the Passarge, Frisching, and Pregel rivers, and two arms of the Vistula.

FRISI, PAUL, fré'-se, a Milanese mathematician and philosopher, who obtained the professorial chair of several colleges, and, in 1757, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of London. He was also a member of several continental learned societies, and published many useful treatises on astronomy, electricity, hydraulics, and other scientific subjects.

Born at Milan, 1728; died there, 1784.

FRITH, or FRYTH, JOHN, frith, a Protestant martyr, who became one of the canons in Wolsey's College. Through his acquaintance with Tyndall, he embraced the principles of the Reformation, for which he was imprisoned. In 1528 he obtained his liberty, and went abroad. On his return, he zealously promoted the doctrines of the Gospel, for which he was burned in Smithfield. He wrote several books against popery.

Born at Sevenoaks, Kent; died 1533.

FRITH, WILLIAM POWELL, R.A., an eminent modern English painter, who studied in the schools of the Royal Academy, and, in 1839, began to exhibit on its walls. He was elected an associate in 1845, and a royal academician in 1853. He is one of the most popular of English painters, and has achieved his greatest successes as an illustrator of Shakespeare, Molière, and Goldsmith, and as a depicter of scenes of social life. Among pictures of the latter class, "Ramsgate Sands," the "Derby Day," and the "Railway Station," are well known. He was selected by the queen to paint the Marriage of the Prince of Wales. He is an honorary member of the Royal Academies of Belgium, Sweden, and of the Imperial Academy at Vienna.

Born at Harrogate, 1820.

FRITZLAR, frits'-lar, a town of Prussia, province of Hesse-Nassau, on the left bank of the Edder, 16 miles S.W. of Cassel. The streets are narrow and winding, and the town is surrounded by walls. There are a very old church, partly in the Gothic and partly in the Byzantine styles, and a monastery. Eight fairs are held annually. Pop. 3,100.

FRIULI, fré'-oo-le, an old province of northern Italy, formerly divided into Tyrolese and Venetian. The latter was ceded to Austria by the peace of Campo-Formio, in 1797; and with the rest of the Austrian possessions in Italy, was annexed to the kingdom of Italy in 1866.

FROBENIUS, JOHN, fro-bé'-ne-us, a German printer, who lived at Basle, and was greatly esteemed by Erasmus, whose works he printed, as he also did those of Augustine and Jerome.

Born 1460; died 1527.

FROBISHER, or FROBISCHER, SIR MARTIN, fró'-bish-er, English navigator and adventurer. He was born at Doncaster, and bred early to the sea. The discovery of a north-west passage to India was an object which constantly exercised his thoughts; and after applying to several merchants to engage in the enterprise, he obtained the patronage of the earl of Warwick and other noblemen, who enabled him to fit out three small vessels, with which, in 1576, he sailed from Deptford. After exploring different parts of the Arctic coast, he entered the strait which bears his name, and then returned to England, bringing with him some black ore, which is said to have contained gold. In consequence of this, he was, in 1577, sent out again to search for ore, with a quantity of which he returned. A third voyage was undertaken the following year, with a number of ships to bring home the riches supposed to exist in the newly-discovered countries; but, on the return of the expeditio , it was discovered that the precious metals had no existence where they had been sought. Between that year and 1585 we have no intelligence as to the employment of Frobisher; but in this year we find that he served under Drake in the West Indies, and in 1588 had a share in the defeat of the Spanish armada, for which he was knighted. He was killed in assaulting a fort near Brest. An account of his voyage was printed in Hakluyt's collection.

Born 1536; died 1594.

FROBISHER'S STRAIT, a narrow sea, to the N. of Cape Farewell, and W. Greenland, in British N. America, between Davis' Strait and Hudson's Strait. Both sides of its shores are extremely rugged and forbidding. Ext. 140 miles long, with an average breadth of 20. Lat. 62° to 64° N. Lon. 65° to 74° W.—It was discovered by Frobisher, the navigator.

FRODSHAM, frod'-sham, a market-town of Cheshire, on the Mersey and Weaver rivers, 12 miles N.E. of Chester. Manf. Cotton goods, and in its neighbourhood are some salt-works. Pop. 7,297.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

FROHBURG, fro'-burg, a town of Saxony, Germany, on the left bank of the Wiehra, 22 miles S.E. of Leipsic. A large castle with park is near the town. Manf. Woollens and earthenware. There is a trade in cattle, and four fairs are held annually.

FROILA I., fro'-e-la, king of Spain, was the son of Alphonsus I., and began his reign in 757. In 760 he obtained a victory over the Saracens in Galicia, but he sullied his character by the murder of his brother Samaran. This was avenged by another brother, Aurelius, who slew Froila.

Born 722; died 768.

FROILA III. succeeded his brother Ordono in 923. He was a cruel prince, and his tyranny caused the province of Castile to revolt against him, when he was deposed. He died of a leprosy.

Died 925.

FROISSART, JOHN, frwoid'-sart, a celebrated French historian and poet. He was well educated, and intended for the church, but his admiration of chivalry and poetry induced him to travel. He visited England, and obtained the appointment of secretary to queen Philippa, wife of Edward III. He afterwards visited Scotland, accompanied the Black Prince to France, and the duke of Clarence on his marriage visit to Milan. He subsequently resided with the duke of Brabant, and with the count of Blois visited Gaston de Foix, and made other journeys. In 1394 he obtained the canonry and treasurership of Chimay, and afterwards again visited England. He wrote a work which he called a "Chronicle," and wherein are narrated the transactions of France, Spain, and England, from 1326 to 1400. It abounds in vivid descripticus of chivalric enterprises, and splendid pageants. The author has been called "the father of special correspondents." His Chronicle has been translated into English by Lord Berners, and afterwards by Mr. Johnes of Hafod.

Born at Valenciennes, 1337; died 1410.

FROME, frome, the name of several rivers of England—1. An affluent of the Lugg, in Herefordshire. 2. In the county of Dorset, rising near Beaminster, and falling into the sea at Poole harbour. 3. An affluent of the Avon, which it joins at Bristol. 4. Another of the Severn, which it joins near Berkley. 5. In Somersetshire, rising in the Mendip Hills, flowing past the town of Frome, and, after a course of 20 miles, joining the Avon between Bath and Bradford.

FROME, or FROME SELWOOD, a parliamentary and municipal borough of Somerset, 12 miles S.E. of Bath. The river Frome passes through the lower part of it, under a bridge of five arches. The principal church (recently almost reconstructed) is a fine old Gothic structure, highly decorated within; besides which there are four new churches, one a very beautiful edifice, built in 1864, and other places of worship, a market-house, union workhouse, a grammar school of the foundation of Edward VI., a charity school, an almshouse, an asylum, and an hospital. Manf. Broadcloths, and kerseymeres, and cards for dressing woollen cloths. Pop. 9,753.—A station on the Great-Western railway.

FRONTEIRA, fron-tai-eer'a, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alemtejo, 14 miles from Estremos. Pop. 2,500.—Here, in 1663, the Spaniards were defeated by the Portuguese under Schomberg.

FRONTIGNAN, fron'-teen-yan, an old town of France, department Hérault, 12 miles S.W. of Montpelier. Some of the best white wine in France is made here. It was formerly a place of considerable importance. Pop. 2,550.

FRONTINUS, SEXTUS JULIUS, fron-ti'-nus, a Roman writer and general, who, in 75 A.D., was appointed governor of Britain, where he subdued the Silures. He was twice consul, and held other important offices at Rome. As an author he is known by the books he wrote on aqueducts and stratagems of war, dedicated to Trajan.

Born 40; died 106.

FRONTO, MARCUS CORNELIUS, fron'-to, a Roman orator, who was preceptor to Verus and M. Aurelius. The latter appointed him consul, and erected a statue to his honour. He wrote a grammatical treatise; and a considerable number of his letters and essays were, in the early part of the present century, discovered in the Ambrosian Library at Milan.

Died 170.

FROSCHDORF, or FROHSDORF, frose'-dorf, a village in Austria, near the Hungarian frontier, on the right bank of the Leitha. It is interesting from the fine castle, the residence of the comte de Chambord, the representative of the Bourbon line of French kings.

FROSINONE, fro-se-no'-ne, a town of Italy, near the junction of the rivers Cossa and Sacco, 48 miles S.E. of Rome. This was the Volician Frusino, and there are the remains of an ancient amphitheatre. Pop. 8,000.

FROUDE, JAMES ANTHONY, frood, historian, studied at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1842 was elected a fellow of Exeter College, but the publication, in 1849, of a powerful work, of a sceptical tendency, the "Nemesis of Faith," cost him his fellowship. Between 1856 and 1869 appeared his great work, "The History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada," a work displaying remarkable research, and noticeable for its defence of the character of Henry VIII. He received the degree of LL.D., and was elected rector of St. Andrew's University in 1869. He afterwards edited "Fraser's Magazine," made a lecturing tour of the United States, and twice visited the South African colonies and missions for the home government.

Born at Totnes, 1818.

FROWDE, PHILIP, froud, an English poet, whose Latin effusions in the "Musæ Anglicanæ" are elegant. He also wrote two tragedies: the "Fall of Saguntum" and "Philotas."
Born 1680; died 1738.

FROYEN, or FROJEN, frö'-yen, an island of Norway, lying off its W. coast, 50 miles N.W. of Drontheim. It is 20 miles long, with an average breadth of 5. Lat. 63° 40′ N. Lon. 8° 40′ E.

FRUGONI, CARLO INNOCENZO, froo-go'-ne, Italian poet, educated for the church, who taught rhetoric at Brescia, Genoa, and Bologna, and was appointed poet-laureate to the duke of Parma. He was released from his ecclesiastical vows by Pope Clement XII. in 1733. He was an elegant and spirited writer.
Born at Genoa, 1692; died 1768.

FRUMENTIUS, ST., froo-men'-te-us, the first who preached the Gospel in Æthiopia, of which country he was ordained bishop by St. Athanasius in 331.
Born at Tyre; died about 360.

FRY, MRS. ELIZABETH, fri, philanthropist, was the third daughter of John Gurney, esq., of Earlham Hall, near Norwich, and belonged to the Society of Friends. At 18 years of age she had established a school for 80 poor children. In 1800 she became the wife of Mr. Joseph Fry, a London merchant, and in 1810 a preacher among the Friends. In 1813 she visited the female prisoners in Newgate, and by her active beneficence and judicious conduct, effected great improvement in the condition of the miserable objects there that came under her notice. In 1817 she was so far successful in her philanthropical projects as to succeed in establishing a ladies' committee for the improvement of the condition of the female prisoners in Newgate, and, by energy and perseverance, had the gratification of converting a sink of iniquity into an abode of order and sobriety. A school and a manufactory were instituted within the walls of that dreary abode of sorrow, and comparative happiness took the place of misery. She was examined before the House of Commons on her plans of prison discipline; and, proceeding from one step to another, next turned her attention to the reformation of the characters of convicts. From 1833 to 1836 she occupied herself with visiting Jersey and Guernsey, and between 1837 and 1842 visited many of the principal towns of the continent, with the view of improving the system of prison discipline.
Born near Norwich, 1780; died at Ramsgate, 1845.

FRYKEN, fruk'-en, a chain of lakes, in a romantic valley of Sweden, discharging into Lake Wener. The lakes stretch for about 40 miles from north to south, and seldom exceed a mile in width.

FRYXELL, ANDERS, fruxé'-el, Swedish historian, who studied at Upsala, and took priest's orders in 1820, but devoted much of his time to the cultivation of literature. After producing an opera, in 1823, he commenced his career as an historian, by the publication of a work entitled, "Narratives from Swedish History," upon a plan similar to that adopted in "Tales of a Grandfather," by sir Walter Scott. From that period he continued to occupy a high place in the literature of Sweden, and greatly extended the plan of the above work. His defence of the aristocracy of his country against the imputations cast on them by other historians, however, led him into controversy, although it did not withdraw him from his historical studies. He is known to English readers by a translation, made by Mrs. Mary Howitt, of two volumes of his extended "Narratives," published in 1844.
Born at Hesselskog, in Dalsland, 1795.

FUAD-MEHMED, PASHA, foo'-ad-me-med, Turkish statesman and author, was the son of a Turkish poet of considerable repute. He studied medicine, and practised as a physician for several years, and then entered the diplomatic service, was secretary to the Turkish ambassador in London, and afterwards went to Madrid. In 1850 he was sent on a mission to St. Petersburg and Egypt, and in 1852 was appointed minister of foreign affairs. As a politician he was energetic, patriotic, and enlightened. He wrote several poems and a Turkish grammar of great merit, and his manners had all the vivacity, wit, and grace of a polished French gentleman.
Born at Constantinople, 1814; died 1869.

FUCA, STRAITS OF ST. JUAN DE, fu'-ka, an inlet on the N.W. coast of N. America, Oregon territory, leading from the Pacific into the Gulf of Georgia, S. of Vancouver's Island, and forming a part of the boundary line between the United States and Great Britain. These straits were for a long time supposed to lead to some inland sea connected with the Atlantic Ocean, but they were explored to their termination, about 100 miles inland, by Vancouver. In 1859 a dispute arose between some of the officials of the U.S. government and those of Great Britain, as to the precise direction of the boundary-line between their several occupations in reference to the possession of the island of St. Juan, and in 1872 the emperor of Germany was asked to become arbiter, and he decided that the island belonged to the United States.

FU-CHOW-FOO. (See FOO-CHOO-FOO.)

FUCHS, LEONARD, fooks, a German physician and botanist, who received the honour of knighthood from Charles V. of Spain. His greatest work is "Historia Plantarum," printed at Bâle in 1542. He also wrote several medical books.
Born in Bavaria, 1501; died 1566.

FUCINO, or CELANO, LAKE, foo-ché'-no, the principal lake of Naples, in the province of Abruzzo Ulteriore II. It lies between two ranges of the Apennines at an elevation of 2,176 feet above the sea level, is 10 miles long and 7 broad, and receives several small rivers. The lake is subject to sudden risings, which inundate the surrounding country, and between 1855 and 1862, a tunnel cut by order of the emperor Claudius, through the solid rock, for the purpose of carrying off the surplus waters, was cleared out, having been choked up for nearly 1,000 years. The works of drainage have been carried on at an immense expense.

FUEGO. (See CAPE VERD ISLANDS.)

FUEN-HO, foo'-enho, a river of China, an affluent of the Hoang-ho, which it joins after a course of 300 miles, in lat. 35° 55′ N.; lon. 111° 25′ E.

FUERTE, or VILLA DEL FUERTE, a commercial town of Mexico, in the province of Sinaloa, on the Rio del Fuerte. Pop. 8,000.

FUGA, FERNANDO, foo'-ga, Italian architect, appointed pontifical architect in 1730. He completed the Quirinal at Rome, erected several palaces and churches. In 1750 he was appointed principal architect to the king of Naples, and erected a palace and other fine buildings. He is considered to have been one of the greatest architects of the 19th century.

Born at Florence, 1699; died 1780.

FUGER, FREDERICK HENRY, foo'-ger, an eminent German painter, who first studied his beautiful art in the Dresden Academy; but, proceeding to Vienna, discovered such talents as to induce his patrons to send him as an imperial pensioner to Rome. Here he studied eight years, when he visited Naples, and painted a series of frescoes in the library of queen Caroline at Caserta. In 1784 he was recalled to Vienna, where he became professor in, and vice-director of, the academy. He was distinguished, not only in fresco, but also as an oil and miniature painter. Some of his pictures consisted of subjects taken from the mythology of Homer; others from Roman history; and he made twenty illustrations of the "Messiah" of Klopstock. Many of his works have been engraved by German artists.

Born at Halbron, Wurtemberg, 1751; died at Vienna, 1818.

FUGGER, foog'-ger, the name of a rich and illustrious family of Suabia, descended from John Fugger, weaver, who originally lived in the environs of Augsburg, about 1300. They were at first successful in selling cloths, but afterwards extended their dealings, and became merchants, accumulating an immense fortune. Reaching the height of their affluence, at the commencement of the 16th century, they rendered considerable services to the emperors Charles V. and Maximilian, by making them large advances. These princes bestowed titles of nobility on the Fugger family, and they soon became connected with the best blood of Germany. Promoted to the highest dignities of the empire, they did not any the more neglect the pursuit of commerce. Their riches were always forthcoming for the improvement of their birthplace, Augsburg, where they erected some handsome monuments, and founded philanthropical institutions. The best known of them are the three brothers, Ulrich, Jacob, and George; and, afterwards, Raimund and Antony, both sons of George. Ulrich, Jacob, and George founded the houses for poor citizens, known as the "Fuggerei," at Augsburg. (See AUGSBURG.) Ulrich received, for his loans to Maximilian, the countship of Kirchberg and the seignory of Weissenhorn, which, afterwards, remained in the possession of his family. He was a great encourager of learning.—Antony and Raimund bore, to a great extent, the expenses of the expedition of Charles V. against Algeria, obtaining from him the permission to coin money. Both brothers were raised to the rank of count, and accumulated enormous wealth. One day, at an interview with the emperor, Antony, as a mark of his regard and esteem, threw into the fire a bond for a large sum of money lent to Charles. Several of this family still exist, and Augsburg owes its position on the continent as a financial centre to the energy and talent of the Fuggers.

FUH-KEEN, FOO-KEEN, or FU-KIAN, foo'-keen, a maritime province of the east of China, to the south of Che-Keang. It includes the islands of Formosa and the Pang-hoo group. Black tea is extensively cultivated. On the coast are the ports of Foo-choo-foo and Amoy. Area, 53,480 square miles. Pop. with Formosa, 25,790,560.

FULBERT, fool'-bair, a French bishop, but a native of Italy, and a pupil of Pope Sylvester II. On going to France as a public lecturer, he gained a great reputation, and, in 1007, was presented with the bishopric of Chartres. He was zealous against Berengarius on the Eucharist, and introduced the worship of the Virgin into France. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and his works are extant.

Born 950; died 1028.

FULDA, fool'-da, a walled town of Prussia, province of Hesse-Nassau, on the right bank of the Fulda. Its principal edifice is the episcopal palace, formerly the residence of the prince-bishops of Fulda. It has, besides, a cathedral (a modern edifice, the fourth which has occupied the site), an old church (St. Michael's), a Roman Catholic seminary, a lyceum, schools of art and manufactures, and an orphan asylum. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, earthenware, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 9,500, mostly Roman Catholics.

FULDA, a river of Germany, rising in the Rhongebirge mountains, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the Werra, forming the Weser.

FULDA, CHARLES FREDERICK, an ingenious Lutheran divine, who wrote a Dictionary of the German Roots, "An Inquiry into Language," "On the Origin of the Goths," "On the Cimbri," "Or the Deities of the Germans," and

"A Chart of History." He was also an excellent mechanic.

Born at Wimpfen, Suabia, 1722; died 1788.

FULHAM, full-ham, a suburb of London, on the Thames, 6 miles S.W. of St. Paul's, London. The bishop of London has here a palace on the banks of the river; a residence which has been occupied by the bishops of London since the time of Henry VII. There are extensive market gardens in the neighbourhood. Pop. 42,895.

FULKE, WILLIAM, fullk, an English divine, who was made master of Pembroke Hall, and, subsequently, Margaret professor of divinity. Of his works, the most noted is his "Commentary upon the Rhenish Translation of the New Testament," printed in 1580.

Born in London; died 1589.

FULLER, ISAAC, an English painter in the reign of Charles II. He painted the "Resurrection" at All Souls College, Oxford, another at Magdalen College, and a picture at Wadham College, which is the best. He studied in France under Perrier.

Died in 1672.

FULLER, NICHOLAS, full-er, a learned divine, who obtained a prebend in the church of Salisbury, and the living of Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire. His "Miscellanea Theologica," printed at Oxford in 1616, is a valuable body of sacred criticism.

Born at Southampton, 1557; died 1622.

FULLER, THOMAS, Dr., an eminent English historian and divine, son of the rector of Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. In 1631 he was chosen fellow of Sidney (Sussex) College, and, after fulfilling clerical duties in several places, he obtained a prebend of Salisbury. He was also presented to the rectory of Broadwinsor, in Dorsetshire, removed to London, and became lecturer at the Savoy. In 1640 he was a member of the Convocation at Westminster. During the civil war he adhered strenuously to the royal cause, and became chaplain to lord Hopton, who left him at Basinghouse, which was shortly after besieged by Sir William Waller; but the garrison, being sustained by the courage of Fuller, made so vigorous a resistance, that Waller was obliged to retire. On the ruin of the king's affairs, he was chosen lecturer of St. Bride's, Fleet-street. In 1646 he was lecturer at St. Clement's, Lombard-street, and St. Bride's, Fleet-street, and about 1648 he obtained the rectory of Waltham, in Essex; and between that time and the Restoration, published a number of books, the principal of which is "The Church History of Britain," folio. In 1658 he was appointed to the living of Cranford, Middlesex, and at the Restoration he was made chaplain-extraordinary to the king, restored to his prebend, and created D.D. Besides the above, he wrote the quaint but valuable work, "The Worthies of England," "The History of the Holy War," "The Holy and Profane States," "Pisgah Sight of Palestine," "Abel Redivivus, or Lives of Eminent Divines," and Sermons and Tracts. He was a powerful, imaginative, and witty writer, remarkable alike for strong sense and quaint humour, very learned and gifted, with a most retentive memory.

Born at Aldwinkle, 1608; died 1661.

FULLER, SARAH MARGARET, countess of Ossoli. (See OSSOLI.)

FULTON, ROBERT, full-ton, an American mechanician and engineer, whose name is intimately associated with the improvement of steam navigation. In his eighteenth year he set up in Philadelphia as a painter of landscapes and portraits; but in 1746 he visited England, where West, the historical painter, took him by the hand, and for some years kept him in his house. His genius, however, seems to have been less directed to the beautiful in art than the mechanical in science. Accordingly, on quitting the house of Mr. West, he sought the acquaintance of the duke of Bridgewater, then engaged with his canals, and in 1794 took out a patent for an inclined plane, designed to set aside the use of locks. He also invented an excavating-machine, a mill for sawing marble, and took out patents for making ropes and spinning flax. With all these projects, however, he seems to have met with little success, and, in 1796, he went to Paris, where he resided seven years, under the roof of Mr. Barlow, the representative of the United States government. Here he directed his attention to other pursuits, but still of a mechanical kind, when, after some experiments made with small steamboats on the Seine, and another visit to England, he proceeded to America, where, in 1807, he commenced the construction of a steam-vessel, with which he succeeded in navigating the Hudson river. He also invented torpedoes for use in naval warfare. In 1814 he constructed for the American government a steam-frigate. His fame was now established; but he did not live to reap the reward which his perseverance deserved.

Born at Little Britain, Pennsylvania, 1765; died at New York, 1815.

FULTON, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 860 square miles. Pop. 6,722. The capital is Salem.

FULTON, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 337 square miles. Pop. 21,053. Dover is the capital.

FULTON, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 10,149. McConnellsburg is the capital.

FULVIA, ful-ve-a, an ambitious woman of Rome, who, after being twice married, became the wife of Mark Antony. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, she ordered it to be brought to her, and, with the greatest barbarity, bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra; upon which she attempted to persuade Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she retired into the East, where Antony received her with great coldness. This totally broke her heart, and she soon after died. (See ANTONY.)

Born 80 B.C.; died 40 B.C.

FULVIUS, ful-ve-us, a name common to some eminent Romans, the most remarkable of whom was a senator, intimate with Augustus. He disclosed the emperor's secrets to his wife, who made them public to all the Roman matrons; and for this he received so severe a reprimand from Augustus, that he and his wife hanged themselves in despair.

FULVIUS, MARCUS NOBILIOR, a Roman consul, who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. He was successful in several conflicts with the Carthaginians, but was shipwrecked at his return, with 200 Roman ships.
Died 153 B.C.

FUNCHAL, foon-shal', a seaport in the island of Madeira, of which it is the capital, situate in the centre of a large bay on the S. coast. It is irregularly built, the streets being narrow, winding, ill-paved, and dirty. There is a cathedral, and churches and convents are numerous; but there is nothing remarkable in their construction. The country behind Funchal rises rapidly, and consists of black rocks of lava, and these, intermingled with plantations of the most brilliant verdure, and contrasting with the white houses of the town, compose a splendid landscape. On the sea-side are several batteries. An old castle, which commands the road, stands on the top of a steep black rock, called Loo Rock, surrounded by the sea at high water. On a neighbouring eminence, above the town, is another, called St. John's Castle. The principal trade is done in wine and sweetmeats. Pop. 19,752, of whom many are English and French, besides Portuguese, and Mulatto and Negro freemen. Lat. 32° 37′ N. Lon. 16° 54′ W. (See MADEIRA.)

FUNDY, BAY OF, fun'-de, an inlet of the Atlantic, separating the state of Maine and New Brunswick from Nova Scotia. It is both deep and dangerous, and comprises the Long Islands and the Grand Manan, and receives the rivers St. Croix and St. John. It is 180 miles long, with an average breadth of 35. At the head are two inlets, Chignecto Bay, on the north, and Minas Channel on the south. This bay is remarkable for the highest tides in the world, the rise being about 70 feet.

FUNEN, or FUHNEN, foo'-nen, a Danish island in the Baltic, separated from Jutland by the narrow passage called the Little Belt. Its shores are deeply indented, and its interior is undulating, and has a productive soil, with numerous lakes.

Pro.—Corn, flax, hemp, and fruit.
Exp.—Horses, cattle, fruit, lard, salted meat, leather, honey, and some manufactured goods. The trade is principally carried on with Sweden and Norway.
Area.—1,302 square miles, including the small island of Langeland.
Pop. 236,500.
Chief Towns.—ODENSEE, SVENDBORG, and NYBORG.
Lat.—Between 55° 4′ and 55° 38′ N. Lon. Between 9° 44′ and 10° 53′ E.

FUNFHAUS, foonf'-hous, a northern suburb of Vienna. Manf. Silks, satins, woollens, cottons, and leather. Pop. 27,500.

FUNFKIRCHEN, foonf'-keer-shen ("five churches"), a town of Hungary, in the district of Baranya, between the Drave and the Danube, 105 miles S.W. of Pesth. It is situate on the southern slope of the Mecseg mountains, in a district that is fertile, particularly in wine. There are a very fine cathedral, several churches, a bishop's palace (in the Italian style), town-house, lyceum, and gymnasium. Manf. Woollens and flannel, silk, and leather. There are coal and iron mines in the vicinity. Pop. 24,500.

FURETIÈRE, ANTHONY, foo-ret'-e-air, a learned Frenchman, who deserted the legal profession, and became abbot of Chalivoy and prior of Chuines. In 1622 he was admitted to the French Academy, but twenty-three years afterwards was expelled, upon the charge of having unfairly profited by the common labour of the Encyclopædists to compile the dictionary which bears his name. This was printed, in 1690, in two vols. folio.
Born at Paris, 1620; died 1688.

FURIÆ, fu'-re-e, in Greek mythology, the three daughters of Nox and Acheron, or, according to some, of Pluto and Proserpine. (See EUMENIDES.)

FURIDPUR, or FUREEDPOOR, foo-rid-poor', or DACCA JELALPUR, a district of Bengal, British India, intersected by branches of the Ganges. The soil is rich and the climate intensely hot. Area, 1,496 square miles. Pop. 1,631,734.

FURIDPUR, or FUREEDPOOR, capital of the above district, on the right bank of the Ganges, 115 miles N.E. of Calcutta. It is little more than a cluster of native villages, at one time notorious as a resort of river pirates. Lat. 23° 26′ N. Lon. 89° 50′ E.

FURINA, fu-ri'-na, in Roman mytholygy, the goddess of robbers. Her festivals were called Furineia.

FURIUS, BIBACULUS M., fu'-re-us, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in Iambic verse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humour of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry, and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace, however, has ridiculed his verses.
Lived in the 1st century B.C.

FURIUS, FEDERICO, Spanish statesman and author, tuter to Philip, son of Charles V. He endeavoured to procure the authorization of translations of the Scriptures, and afterwards made great exertions to obtain a peace between Spain and the Netherlands.
Born 1510; died 1592.

FURK, foork, a castle and village of Persia, 100 miles from the lake of Furrah-rood. This fortress has the character of being the strongest in Khorassan.

FURNEAUX ISLAND, foor'-no, a small island in the Pacific. Lat. 17° S. Lon. 143° 6′ W.

FURNEAUX ISLANDS, a group in Bass' Strait, between Tasmania and Australia, discovered in 1773, by Furneaux, who was second in command to Captain Cook, on his second voyage. The largest, Great Island, is 46 miles long, and 10 broad; other islands are known as Clarke, Hummock, and Babel. The soil is sandy, and there are peaks 2,500 feet in elevation.

FURNES, foorn, a town of Belgium, in the province of Flanders, in a marsh, 4 miles from the sea, on a canal which goes from Bruges to Dunkirk, 15 miles from Ostend. It is small, but neat, and has a town-house, and the remains of an old abbey. Its trade is chiefly carried on in cattle, hops, and cheese. There are three annual fairs at which linen is sold. Pop. 4,500.

FURNESS, fur'-ness, a district in the N.W. part of Lancashire, forming a large promontory between Morecambe Bay and the mouth of the Duddon. It is mostly a rough region, clothed with wood. Its population are chiefly employed in mines and quarries. It had once an extensive abbey, which is now a picturesque ruin. (See BARROW-IN-FURNESS.)

FURRUCKABAD, fur-ruk-a-bad', a district of British India, in the north-western provinces. Cotton, tobacco, and indigo, are cultivated. Area, 1,702 square miles. Pop. 907,608.

FURRUCKABAD, capital of the above district, near the right bank of the Ganges. It stands at an elevation of 750 feet above the sea, is well-built and healthy. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 62,450.

FURST, WALTER, foorst, one of the founders of Swiss freedom and independence. Heading some brave men, he took and destroyed some forts belonging to the Austrians; which was the first step, in 1307, to the restoration of Switzerland as an independent nation. (See TELL and MELCHTAL.)

Died 1317.

FURST, JULIUS, Prussian orientalist, of Jewish parents, and intended for a rabbi; but having studied at Berlin, his opinions underwent a change, and he devoted himself to oriental and antiquarian studies. In 1833 he went to Leipsic, and in 1864 became professor in the university there. He produced many valuable works on the comparative grammar of the Semitic languages, the rabbinical unity, and the Jewish history and literature. A concordance of the Old Testament in Hebrew and Chaldee was a work of immense labour.

Born at Zerwoka, in Posen, 1805; died 1873.

FURSTENFELD, foorst'-ten-felt, a town of Lower Styria, 30 miles from Gratz. It has a large tobacco manufactory. Pop. 2,000.

FURSTENWALD, foorst'-ten-valt, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, on the right bank of the Spree, 30 miles S.E. of Berlin. The Marienkirch is a brick church erected in the 14th century. Manf. Woollens and linens, with an active river trade. Pop. 10,781.

FURTH, foort, the chief manufacturing town of Bavaria, between the Reditz and Pegnitz, 4 miles N.W. of Nuremberg. Manf. Glass of all kinds, principally large mirrors; chandeliers, bronzes, brass and wood wares, metallic leaf, watch keys, brass nails, and optical instruments. There is an annual fair, lasting 14 days. Pop. 38,080, about 4,000 of whom are Jews; but the majority Lutherans.—In 1632 a battle was here fought between Gustavus Adolphus and Wallenstein. In 1634 the town was burned by the Austrians, and an accidental fire in 1680 nearly destroyed it again.

FURY AND HECLA STRAIT, in British N. America, separates Cockburn Isle from Melville Peninsula, and forms a communication between the Gulf of Boothia and Fox's Channel. Length about 100 miles; breadth from 15 to 20. It was discovered in 1821 by Captain Parry, who gave to it the names of the ships under his command; but it is practically useless, being blocked with ice.

FUSARO, LAKE, foo-sa'-ro, in the peninsula of Baiæ, 11 miles W. of Naples. It has been famous for oysters for two thousand years. It is supposed to be the crater of an extinct volcano.

FUSELI, or FUESSLI, HENRY, foose'-le, the second son of John Caspar Fuessli, author of "Lives of the Helvetic Painters," was educated for the church, and, in 1761, entered into holy orders. Having written, in conjunction with Lavater, a pamphlet reflecting on the conduct of a magistrate, it was deemed politic that he should leave his country; when, being furnished with letters of introduction from the British minister at Prussia, he visited England; where, for some time, he supported himself by translating works from the German, French, and Italian, into English. Gaining the acquaintance of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he showed some of his drawings to that distinguished artist, who recommended him to devote himself entirely to painting. This recommendation was not lost upon him, and, in 1770, he visited Italy, and changed his name into Fuseli, which he afterwards retained. After an absence of eight years, he returned, when, with other artists, he was engaged by Alderman Boydell to assist in forming his Shakspeare Gallery. He also employed himself in editing the work of Lavater on Physiognomy, and assisted Cowper, who was then translating Homer, with some remarks and corrections. He subsequently became an associate of the Royal Academy, and, in 1790, was chosen a Royal academician. In 1799 he supplied some pictures towards the formation of a Milton Gallery; but the idea did not take with the public. In the same year he became professor of painting to the Royal Academy, and, in 1803, keeper. Meanwhile, he did not neglect his literary pursuits. In 1805 he published Pilkington's "Lives of the Painters," and subsequently was elected a member of the first class in the academy of St. Luke's at Rome. He was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's.

Born at Zurich, 1741; died in London, 1825.

GADSDEN, gadz'-den, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 1,150 square miles. Pop. 12,169. The capital is Quincy.

GADSHILL. (See ROCHESTER.)

GAERTNER, JOSEPH, gairt'-ner, an eminent German naturalist, who, though destined for the church, applied himself to the study of medicine. He travelled through several parts of Europe, and, in 1759, went to Leyden, where he attended the botanical lectures, and applied himself to vegetable anatomy. He subsequently visited England, and communicated some interesting papers to the Philosophical Transactions, the principal of which is a "Memoir on the Fructification and Propagation of Confervæ," &c. Here he gained the friendship of some of the most eminent men of the age, and was made F.R.S. In 1768 he went to St. Petersburg, and was there appointed professor of botany and natural history. After filling that position with great credit, and exploring the Ukraine, making botanical discoveries, he returned to his native land in 1770. In 1778 he went again to London, to make drawings and descriptions of fruits, to illustrate his "Carpology," the first volume of which he dedicated to Sir Joseph Banks. He left at his death a number of valuable MSS.

Born at Calw, Suabia, 1732; died in London, 1791.

GAETA, ga-ai'-ta (the Cajeta of the Latins), a fortified town of Italy, on a small promontory to which it gives name, 40 miles N.W. of Naples. It lies along the shore, from the centre of the bay to the point of the promontory. It is a bishop's see, has a cathedral, several churches, convents, an hospital, and a foundling asylum. The harbour remains nearly as it was in the times of antiquity; the streets are neatly built, and well paved; the general appearance of the town is lively, and the environs extremely picturesque. In the neighbourhood of this place was the villa of Cicero, who was assassinated in its grounds 43 B.C. (See CICERO.) In 1799 and in 1806 it was taken by the French. In 1848, when the revolution at Rome compelled him to retire, it became the refuge of pope Pius IX., and in 1861 it surrendered, after a protracted siege, to the Sardinians under Cialdini. The inhabitants derive their chief profits from their fisheries and their coasting trade in oil, wine, and fruit. Pop. 16,000.

GAETA, GULF OF, an inlet of the Mediterranean Sea, on the west coast of Italy.

GAFSA, or CAFSA, gaf'-sa, a town in the south of Tunis, north Africa. There are a citadel, mosque, and bazaar, and in the neighbourhood are gardens, and plantations of fig, olive, and date trees, and warm springs. The Romans had here a town of some importance, the materials of which have been extensively employed in erecting the buildings of the present town. Pop. 2,000.

GAGE, GENERAL THOMAS, gaij, the commander-in-chief of the British troops in N. America, and the last governor of Massachusetts for the English government. Shut up in Boston after the battle of Lexington, Gage, whom Congress had declared a public enemy, caused martial law to be proclaimed. After the affair of Bunker's Hill, he was forced to embark for England.

Died 1787.

GAGNIER, JOHN, ga'-ne-ai, a learned French Orientalist, who, bred a Roman Catholic, embraced Protestantism, and settled in England. He was patronised by many eminent persons, and received the degree of M.A. at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1706 he published an edition of Ben Gorion's "History of the Jews," in Hebrew, with a Latin translation and notes. In 1723 he edited Abulfeda's "Life of Mahomet," in Arabic, with a Latin translation and notes, folio. He succeeded Dr. Wallis in the Arabic professorship at Oxford.

Born at Paris, about 1670; died 1725.

GAIA, VILLA NOVA DE, ga-é'-a, a town of Portugal, on the left bank of the Douro, opposite Oporto. It is a depôt for a large quantity of the wine grown in the district. Pop. 5,400.

GAILLAC, gaï'-yak, a town of France, department Tarn, on the right bank of the Tarn, 13 miles S.W. of Alby. There is a communal college. Manf. Hats, leather, and wine. There are coopers' ages, and ship-building is carried on, and there are large vineyards in the neighbourhood. Pop. 7,800.

GAILLARD, GABRIEL HENRI, gaï'-yar, French historian, author of several historical and biographical works which procured his admission into the French Academy, and of various éloges on French notabilities.

Born, near Soissons, 1726; died 1806.

GAILLAN, gaï'-yan(g), a small town of France, department Gironde, 40 miles N.W. of Bordeaux. There is a trade in cattle, wax, and wine. An annual fair is held. Pop. 2,350.

GAILLON, gaï'-yon(g), a town of France, department Eure, 13 miles N.E. of Evreux. There is a large convict-prison, erected on the site of an old château, a portion of which remains. Manf. Silk and plush. Pop. 3,200.

GAINAS, gaï'-i-nas, a Goth, who became a general in the Roman army under Arcadius. He put Eutropius, the favourite of that emperor, to death, also the prefect Rufinus. Causing himself to be named commander of the cavalry and Roman infantry, he governed the weak Arcadius. At length declared an enemy of the state, he took up arms, was defeated, and perished by the hands of the Huns, with whom he had sought an asylum.

Died 400.

GAINSBOROUGH, gains'-bur-o, a port and market town of Lincolnshire, on the right bank of the Trent, 16 miles N.W. of Lincoln. It consists almost entirely of one long street, parallel with the river, and is clean, well paved, and lighted. The principal public buildings are the church of All Saints, the tower of which dates from the 12th century, Holy Trinity church, built in 1842, a town-hall, corn-exchange and assembly room. There is a grammar-school, established 1589. Over the Trent, an elegant stone bridge, of three elliptical arches, was erected in 1791. At the north-west end of the town stands an ancient and curious edifice, termed the old hall or palace, said, by a vague tradition, to have been the palace of John of Gaunt, but now inhabited by private families. Manf. Leather, brass, iron, and nails. It is a place of considerable trade, exporting Manchester, Birmingham, and Sheffield goods, and importing timber, bones, linseed, and rape-seed. Ship-building is also extensively carried on. Its canals connect it with the Trent, and steamers ply between it and Hull. Pop. 10,964.—A station on the Great Northern and the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire railways.

GAINSBOROUGH, THOMAS, an eminent self-taught English landscape-painter, whose early studies were pursued in the woods and fields of Suffolk, rather than in the schools of art. By the time he had attained the age of fourteen, he had ventured upon the art of colouring, and was sent to London. Here he commenced portrait-painting; a path in which he acquired such eminence, as to enable him, in his nineteenth year, to marry a young lady who had a fortune of £200 per annum. In 1760 he went to Ipswich, and thence to Bath; and, in 1774, to London again. He painted some of the portraits of the royal family, and was one of the thirty-six members chosen at the foundation of the Royal Academy. In both portrait and landscape he has been ranked with Rubens, Vandyke, and Claude; but, however this may be, the great originality of his genius is indisputable. "If ever this nation," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "should produce genius sufficient to acquire to us the honourable distinction of an English school, the name of Gainsborough will be transmitted to posterity as one of the very first of that rising name." His portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire, in the collection of the late Wynn Ellis, was sold in 1876 for ten thousand guineas, the highest price ever given for a picture by an English painter.

Born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727, died 1788.

GAISIN, or GAJSSIN, gais'-in, a town of S. Russia, government of Podolia, 172 miles N. of Odessa. Pop. 10,000.

GAIUS, gaï'-yus, "earthy, or lord," of Macedonia, a generous supporter of missionary preachers, supposed to have been settled at Corinth to assist Paul, and to have become bishop of the church at Thessalonica.

GAIUS, a Roman jurist, probably of the age of the Antonines, and the chief source of our knowledge of Roman law prior to Justinian. His institutions formed the basis of Justinian's work of the same name, by which it was superseded.

GAJAR, gaï'-yar, a market-town of Hungary, on the Rudana, 24 miles N.W. of Presburg. Large cattle-markets are held. Pop. 3,000.

GAJDOBRA, gaizh-do'-bra, a small town of Hungary, county of Bacs, chiefly inhabited by Germans. Pop. 3,000.

GAKOVA, gai-ko'-va, a small town of Hungary, county of Bacs. Pop. 3000.

GALA WATER, gaï'-la, a river of Scotland, rising in the county of Midlothian, and falling into the Tweed near Galashiels.

GALACZ. (See GALATZ.)

GALAGA, ga'-la-ga, an island in the Indian Ocean, belonging to France. It is fruitful in cocoanuts, and exports oil. Lat. 10° 29′ 50″ N. Lon. 56° 45′ E.

GALANTHIS, ga-lan'-this, in Greek mythology, a servant-maid of Alcmena, whose sagacity saved her mistress great pain at the birth of Hercules, and defeated the plots of Juno. She was changed by Lucina into a weasel, and condemned to bring forth her young by the mouth, in great suffering. (See ALCMENA.)

GALAPAGOS, or GALLIPAGOS, gal-la-paï'-gos, a number of islands in the North Pacific Ocean, about 600 miles W. of the coast of Ecuador, to which state they belong. They comprise 7 small and 6 large islands, of which Albemarle, the largest, is 60 miles long and 15 broad, with its highest point 4,700 feet above the sea. There is an active volcano, 3,720 feet high, on Narborough Island. The whole are volcanic, and abound in lava, interspersed with fertile oases. They are a great resort of tortoises and turtles, and are frequented by immense numbers of birds. They are mostly uninhabited, but a small penal colony was established on Charles Island in 1832. Their situation is between lat. 1° 4′ and 1° 30′ N. and between lon. 89° and 92° W.

GALASHIELS, gal-a-sheels', a town of Scotland, partly in Roxburgh and partly in Peebles, on the Gala Water, near its confluence with the Tweed, 27 miles S.E. of Edinburgh. It is irregularly built, and has ten churches and chapels, a mechanics institute, and two libraries. Manf. The most important productions of Galashiels are the well-known Scotch tweeds. Pop. 9,742.

GALATA, gal'-a-ta, an old town of Turkey, and a suburb of Constantinople, on the N. side of the Golden Horn. It is enclosed by walls, which have numerous gateways, shut at sunset. It is the principal seat of the foreign trade of the Turkish capital, and is inhabited mostly by European Christians. In it are the custom-house for the port of Constantinople and the government docks. (See CONSTANTINOPLE.)

GALATÆA, or GALATHÆA, gal'-a-té'-a, in Greek legend, a sea-nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was passionately loved by the giant Polyphemus, whom she treated with disdain; while Acis, a shepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happiness of these two lovers was disturbed by the jealousy of the giant, who crushed his rival to atoms with a piece of rock, while he sat in the bosom of Galatæa. Galatæa was inconsolable for the loss of Acis, and as she could not restore him to life, changed him into a fountain. (See ACIS.)

GALATIA, ga-laï'-she-a, a country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, the Euxine, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. It received its name from the Gauls, who migrated there under Brennus, some time after the sacking of Rome. Here St. Paul's labours were successful in establishing the Christian religion.

GALATINA, gaï'-la-te-na, S. Pietro in Galatina, a thriving commercial town in the south of Italy, 13 miles S. of Lecce. Pop. 11,085.

GALATONE, gaï'-la-to-ne, an ancient town in the south of Italy, 9 miles N.E. of Gallipoli. Pop. 5,500.

GALATZ, or GALACZ, ga-latz', a fortified town of Moldavia, on a lake near the confluence of the Pruth and the Danube, 15 miles from Brahilos. There are an old and new town. It is generally irregularly built, but has a good harbour, a large bazaar, numerous grain stores, magazines of eastern wares, and rich banking establishments. In 1834 it was made a free port, and, since that time, its trade has greatly extended, various British and Greek merchants having established themselves in it. Exp. Hides, tallow, timber, grain, petroleum, spirits, cheese, &c. Lat. 45° 23′ N. Lon. 28° E.—This place has regular steam communication with Constantinople and Vienna. Pop. 80,000, a medley of Moldavians, Greeks, Jews, Armenians, Italians, French, English, and Germans.

GALBA, SERVIUS SULPICIUS, gal'-ba, a Roman, who, by unremitted diligence, rose gradually to the highest offices of the state. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero, who, however, because Galba expressed disapprobation of his conduct, ordered him to be put to death. He escaped, fortunately, the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. His conduct now greatly displeased the people; and, when he refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them, after being raised to the throne, they assassinated him. The virtues which had shone so bright in Galba when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne.

Born 3 B.C.; died A.D. 69.

GALDAR, gal'-dar, a town in the north of Gran Canaria, the largest of the Canary Islands. There are the remains of an ancient palace and a convent. Manf. Woollens, linen and cotton fabrics. Pop. 4,000.

GALE, THOMAS, a learned English divine and antiquary, who, in 1666, was chosen Greek professor, and in 1672 master of St. Paul's school. He was a member of the Royal Society, of which he became one of the honorary secretaries, and in 1697 was promoted to the deanery of York. He published a collection of the Greek mythologists, "Historiæ Poeticæ Antiqui Scriptores Græcæ et Latinæ;" "Jamblichus de Mysteriis;" "Herodoti Halicarnassensis Historiarum;" an edition of Cicero; "Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores;" "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ;" a volume of sermons; "Antonini Iter Britanniarum," &c.

Born at Scruton, Yorkshire, 1636; died at York, 1702.

GALE, ROGER, the eldest son of the above, sat in parliament for Northallerton, and became the first vice-president of the Society of Antiquaries, and treasurer to the Royal Society. He published some valuable books, the principal of which was an edition of his father's "Commentary on Antoninus."

Born 1672; died 1744.

GALE, SAMUEL, brother of the above, also eminent for his knowledge of antiquities.

Born 1682; died 1754.

GALEN, CHRISTOPH BERNHARD VON, gai'len, was made bishop of Münster (Westphalia) in 1650, having previously held several political offices. His administration, which was vigorous, caused a revolt of the inhabitants, whom, however, he reduced to submission, with the assistance of 1,200 cavalry supplied by the emperor. Was appointed in 1664, with the Margrave of Baden, director of the Rhenish alliance, and assisted in the war against the Turks. Subsequently joined with England against the Netherlands, and afterwards, 1672-74, with France against the Dutch. In 1675 he entered into an alliance with the emperor against the French, and by taking part also with the king of Denmark and the elector of Brandenburg in the war with Sweden, he added the duchy of Bremen and other places to his possessions. He was regarded as one of the ablest generals of his time.

Born at Bispink, 1600; died 1678.

GALEN, or GALENUS CLAUDIUS, ga-lé'-nus, a celebrated Greek physician, who visited the most learned seminaries of Greece and Egypt, and at last went to Rome, where he rendered himself famous by his profession. Many, astonished at his cures, attributed them to magic. He was very intimate with Marcus Aurelius, the emperor, after whose death he returned to Pergamus, where he died in his 90th year. He wrote no less than 300 volumes, the greatest number of which were burnt in the Temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been deposited. Galen was second only in merit as a physician to Hippocrates; and to these two medical philosophers of the ancients the moderns are indebted for many useful discoveries.

Born at Pergamus, 103; died 193.

GALENA, ga-lé'-na, a city of Illinois, United States, on the river Feve, 6 miles above its junction with the Mississippi. Pop. 6,451, chiefly employed in lead and copper-works. The surrounding district is extremely rich in lead, and produces large quantities annually.

GALERIUS, CAIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, ga-lé'-re-us, Roman emperor, a herdsman of Dacia, who, entering the army as a private soldier, became, by his valour, a general. Diocletian gave him his daughter in marriage, and in 292 adopted him and Chlorus as his successors. In 296 he commanded in Mesopotamia, where he was, at first, defeated by Narses, king of Persia, but soon retrieved his reputation by a great victory. He instigated Diocletian to persecute the Christians, and on his abdication, in 305, Galerius rose to supreme power. At the close of his life he desisted persecuting the Christians, and requested their prayers.

Died 311.

GALGACUS, gal'-ga-kus, chief of the Caledonians, who resisted with uncommon valour the Romans under the command of Agricola. After several skirmishes, the two armies came to a pitched battle, in which Galgacus was defeated with prodigious loss, dying on the field. Tacitus puts in his mouth a noble speech made to his troops previous to the battle.

Died 84.

GALIANI, FERDINANDO, gal'-e-a'-ne, an Italian antiquary and writer, whose principal work, on Money and Specie, was published in 1750. He was one of the first to discover the archæological riches of Herculaneum. In 1759 he was appointed, by the king of Naples, secretary to the French embassy; and, during his residence at Paris, his company was universally courted. He wrote there "Dialogues on the Corn-trade," which, from the strength of their argument and pleasant style, excited considerable notice, though anonymous. In 1779 he returned to Naples, where he filled many high offices of state. Besides the above works, he wrote a Commentary on Horace, a treatise on the Natural Duties of Princes to Belligerent Powers, &c. It is said of Galiani, that he presented to Pope Benedict XIV. a collection of stones found about Vesuvius; and accompanied them with the inscription,—"Beatissime pater, fac ut lapides isti panes fiant." (Most blessed father, cause these stones to be turned into bread.) This piece of wit had the desired effect, and the holy father presented him with a valuable church preferment.

Born at Chieti, Abruzzi, 1728; died at Naples, 1787.

GALICIA, ga-lish'-e-a, a province of the Austrian empire, which formerly constituted a part of Poland. It is bounded N. by Poland and Russia; E. by Russia and Moldavia; S. by Transylvania and Hungary; and W. by Silesia. In consists of wide and fertile plains, with hardly any elevation, except in the south, where it is intersected by some branches of the Carpathian mountains, the most elevated peak in Galicia being the Great Kriwan, 8,150 feet.

Rivers.—The Vistula, the Dniester, the Pruth, the San, and the Wyslocka; besides a considerable number of smaller streams. It has no canals, and no extensive lakes, though ponds are numerous throughout the country.

Climate.—The most severe in the empire.

Pro.—Wheat, oats, barley, maize, flax, hemp, and tobacco. Cattle and horses are largely reared, and, in the south-east part of the kingdom, horses and sheep are the principal stock. Bees are also extensively kept, and both honey and wax are exported.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, copper, zinc, sulphur, marble, alabaster, and fossil salt. There is of this last a bed which stretches from E. to W. along the Carpathians nearly 251 miles.

Manf.—Spinning and weaving flaxen and hempen fabrics. There are some brandy distilleries, but these are not numerous.

Area.—29,941 square miles.

Pop.—5,958,907, a considerable number belonging to the Greek church.

History.—This country was long in the possession of the Poles; but in the partition of their kingdom, in 1772 and 1795, it was assigned to Austria.

GALICIA, an old province of Spain, forming the N.W. angle of the peninsula, and, since 1833, divided into the separate provinces of LUGO, CORUNNA, PONTEVEDRA, and ORENSE.

GALILEE, gal'-i-le, a "circle," or "circuit," the northern and largest province of Canaan. It comprised the country west of the Jordan, from Samaria, nearly to Sidon, together with both shores of the Lake of Galilee or Tiberias. It now forms the central part of the pashalic of Acre, Asiatic Turkey.

GALILEI, GALILEO, ga-leel'-ai-e, commonly called gal'-i-lé'-o, a distinguished Italian astronomer, who may be said to have been the founder of experimental science. He was intended for the medical profession; but, having a strong predilection for the exact sciences, at the age of 25 he became mathematical professor at Pisa, whence, in 1592, he removed to Padua. His first important discovery was that of the vibrations of a simple pendulum sustained by a fixed point; and, subsequently, he invented an imperfect kind of thermometer. In 1609, having heard that Jansen had invented a glass by which objects at a distance were rendered as visible as if near, he directed his attention to the subject, and constructed the Galilean telescope, by help of which astronomy has been brought to the present perfection. His first instrument was presented to the doge of Venice, who confirmed his professorship for life in the university of Padua, with the largest salary which had ever been there given before to a mathematical professor. By this noble instrument he found that the "Milky Way" is an assemblage of fixed stars; and, by assiduous application of his invention, made many other important discoveries in the heavens. His assertion, however, of the earth's motion gave such offence to the inquisitors, that, in 1615, he was cited to Rome, and required to deny what he had before asserted,—that the sun is the centre of the world, and that the earth is not the centre of the world, but has a diurnal motion. In 1632 he published at Florence his "Dialogues on the Ptolemaic and Copernican Systems of the World," for which he was cited to Rome, his book ordered to be publicly burnt; the author sentenced to be imprisoned, to make a recantation of his errors, and by way of penance, to recite the seven penitential psalms once a week. A portion of the abjuration of this great man we here transcribe, to show to what extent he was forced by inquisitorial power to deny the truth of the great principles which, through the comprehensive grasp of his own mind, had brought conviction to himself. "With a sincere heart and unfeigned faith, I abjure, curse, and detest the said errors and heresies [namely, that the earth moves round the sun, &c.]. I swear that, for the future, I will never say or assert anything, verbally or in writing, which may give rise to a similar suspicion against me." Rising from his knees after this solemn act, he is said to have whispered to a friend, "It moves, for all that." Galileo now obtained his liberty, and retired to his house near Florence, where he continued his observations till he became blind by intense application. His principal works are, "The Operations of the Compass," "On the Swimming of Bodies," "Mechanics," "Nuncius Sidereus," "On the Trepidation of the Moon," "Discourse of the Solar Spots," "Mathematical Discourses and Demonstrations," "Treatise of the Mundane System."

Born at Pisa, 1564; died near Florence, 1642.

GALILEI, VINCENZIO, son of the above, was the first who applied his father's invention of the pendulum to clockwork.

Born 1606; died 1649.

GALINARI, a small fortified island of Italy, on the Gulf of Genoa, 40 miles S.W. of Genoa.

GALITA, ga-lé'-ta, a small island in the Mediterranean, lying off the N. coast of Tunis. Lat. 37° 31′ N. Lon. 8° 55′ E.

GALITZIN, or GALYZIN, WASSILI, or BASIL, ga-lit'-zin, a Russian nobleman, who, in 1680, became minister of the czar Fédor Alexowitz, whom he persuaded to abolish the titles of nobility, and to let his subjects rise to dignities by merit. He was in great favour with the regent, Princess Sophia, sister of the czars Peter I. and Ivan, and, during her regency, possessed supreme power. The intrigues of the regent, however, against her brother Peter being discovered, she was confined in a monastery, and Galitzin exiled.

Born 1633; died 1713.

GALITZIN, MICHAEL MICHAELOWITZ, of the same family as the above, served under Peter the Great, both by land and sea. In 1725 he was made field-marshal, and afterwards president of the College of War.

Born 1674; died 1730.

GALITZIN, DIMITRI AUGUSTINE, became a Roman Catholic, and devoted himself to the priesthood. He went to America, and was ordained in 1795, and laid the foundation of the town of Loretto, in a bleak region, among the Alleghany Mountains, Pennsylvania, where he took up his residence, and was known as Father Smith. A monument was erected to his memory in a neighbouring village in 1848. He wrote various widely circulated controversial works.

Born at the Hague, 1770; died 1840.

GALIZIN, AMALIE, princess, wife of Dimitri Galyzin, and the daughter of the Prussian general Count von Schmettau. She separated from her husband, and resided at Munster, where her talents and amiable disposition made her the centre of a circle of literary friends, including Goethe, Jacobi, Hemsterhuis, and many other eminent men.

Born at Berlin, 1748; died 1806.

GALL, ST., gal, or ST. GALLEN, a canton of Switzerland, inclosed by Tyrol and Liechtenstein, and the cantons of the Grisons, Glarus, Schwytz, and Zurich. It is mountainous, but abounding in long and fertile valleys. Near its centre is Mount Sentis, with an elevation of about 8,220 feet above the level of the sea. There are extensive forests in the south.

Rivers.—The Rhine, Thur, Sitter, Linth, and Seez.

Lakes.—Zurich, Constance, and Wallenstatt, have their coasts within its boundaries.

Pro.—Corn, maize, hemp, flax, and fruit. Wine, cider, and kirschwasser are articles of importance. Cattle-rearing is the principal branch of rural industry.

Minerals.—Iron and coal: large quantities of peat are used.

Manf.—Linen cloth, muslins, and cotton thread. There are, besides, wax-bleaching factories, glass factories, and cotton-bleaching establishments.

Pop.—210,401. German is the language spoken in the canton.

GALL, ST., a town of Switzerland, the capital of the above canton, on the left bank of a small stream, the Steinach, 18 miles S.E. of Constance. It is well built, and surrounded with walls and ditches. The church of the old abbey (founded in the 7th century) is now, considerably modernized, the cathedral. There are an academy, the gymnasium, the cabinets of natural history and coins, and a public library. Of the public buildings, the council-house, the arsenal, and the hospital, are worthy of notice. Manf. Cotton goods, and embroidery. Pop. 21,438.

GALL, ST., or GALLUS, an Irish monk, a disciple of Columbanus. With a few followers, he went to Switzerland in the 7th century, and founded the Benedictine monastery, in the town which bears his name. For several centuries the schools in connexion were held in the highest estimation, especially for the study of ecclesiastical music. At the French revolution the abbey was secularized, and the estates sequestered.

Born 551; died 646.

GALL, FRANZ JOSEPH, a distinguished German physician, who founded the science of phrenology, by which the talents and tendencies of the mind are affirmed to be manifested by certain external developments evinced on the surface of the cranium. He settled in Vienna, and afterwards travelled through the north of Germany, Sweden, and Denmark, lecturing upon his system. In 1807 he established himself in Paris, as being the best centre for the dissemination of his opinions, and became physician to Prince Metternich. In 1810 that nobleman guaranteed the expense of publishing the phrenological work of Gall and Spurzheim. (See SPURZHEIM.)

Born at Teifenbrunn, Wurtemberg, 1758; died at Paris, 1828.

GALLAND, ANTHONY, gal'-la, a learned French writer, who was sent by the French minister Colbert to the East; and on his return to France was made a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and professor of Arabic in the Royal College of Paris. He wrote several dissertations on Greek and Roman medals, and other archæological matters; but the work by which he is best known is the translation from the Arabic of the "Arabian Nights' entertainments."

Born in Picardy, 1646; died at Paris, 1715.

GALLARATE, a market-town of Italy, on the Arno, 24 miles N.W. of Milan. Manf. Cotton and pottery. It has an active trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 6,000.

GALLAS, COUNTRY OF THE, gal'-las, a territory of Africa, whose savage inhabitants have occupied all the territories to the south of Abyssinia, and seized on some of the finest provinces of that country. The larger number of the Gallas are still heathens, though Mahomedanism has made great progress amongst them.

GALLATIN, gal'-la-tin, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 324 square miles. Pop. 13,000. The capital is Equality.

GALLATIN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 152 square miles. Pop. 5,100. Warsaw is the capital.

GALLATIN, ABRAHAM ALBERT ALPHONSE, financier and statesman, a native of Geneva, whence he emigrated to America, was appointed a member of the convention for revising the state constitution of Pennsylvania. In 1801 he became secretary of the treasury, and in 1809 minister of finance. Took an important part in the negotiations for peace with England in 1814, and signed the treaty of Ghent. From 1815 to 1823 he was United States minister at Paris, and in 1826 came to London as ambassador extraordinary. Was author of numerous publications in finance, politics, and ethnology.

Born at Geneva, 1761; died at New York, 1849.

GALLE, POINT DE, gal, a seaport-town on the south-western coast of Ceylon, situated on a low rocky point of land projecting into the sea, 70 miles S.E. of Colombo. There is a large fort, and the harbour is spacious and safe, and much frequented. It is a calling station for mail steamers to and from Calcutta and China. Manf. Articles in tortoise-shell, cordage, and arrack. Lat. 6° 3′ N. Lon. 80° 13′ E.

GALLEGO, hal-lai'-ho, a river of Spain, an affluent of the Ebro; rises in the province of Huesca at the southern base of the Pyrenees, and flowing S. about 90 miles joins the Ebro immediately below Saragossa.

GALLI, gal'-li, the Gauls, a nation of Europe, naturally fierce and inclined to war. They believed themselves descended from Pluto; and, from that circumstance, always reckoned their time, not by the days, as other nations, but by the nights. Not only the most precious things, but even the favourite animals and most cherished slaves and dependants of the master, were burnt with his corpse on the funeral pile. Children, among them, never appeared in the presence of their fathers, before they were able to bear arms in defence of their country. They seized the city of Rome; invaded Greece in different ages, and spread themselves over the greatest part of the world. Their Druids were a dominant caste, presiding even over civil affairs; while in religious matters their authority was despotic. Cæsar has given a full account of the Gauls, and was ten years in their country before he could totally subdue them.

GALLI, the priests of Cybele, who received that name from the river Gallus, in Phrygia, where they celebrated the festivals. The chief among them was called Archigallus.

GALLIA, gal'-le-a, Gaul, a large country of Europe. The inhabitants were called Galli, Celtæ, Celtiberi, and Celto-scythæ. Ancient Gaul was divided into four different parts by the Romans, called Gallia Belgica, Narbonensis, Aquitania, and Celtica. Besides these grand divisions, there is often mention made of Gallia Cisalpina, or Citerior; Transalpina, or Ulterior, which refers to that part of Italy which was conquered by some of the Gauls, who crossed the Alps. By Gallia Cisalpina, the Romans understood that part of Gaul which lies in Italy; and by Transalpina, that which lies beyond the Alps, in regard only to the inhabitants of Rome. Gallia Cispadana and Transpadana is applied to a part of Italy conquered by some of the Gauls, and then it means the country on the W. side of the Po, or beyond the Po, with respect to Rome.

GALLIATE, a town in the province of Novara, Italy, 4 miles N.E. of Novara. There are an ancient parish church, a castle, and a convent. Manf. Cotton and silk. There is a well-attended annual fair. Pop. 6,700.

GALLIENUS, PUBLIUS LUCINIUS, gal'-li-é'-nus, a son of the emperor Valerian, reigned conjointly with his father for seven years, and ascended the throne as sole emperor 260 A.D. In his youth he evinced military genius in an expedition against the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the throne, resigned himself to pleasure and indolence. His time was spent in the greatest debauchery; and two of his officers at length revolted, and assumed the imperial purple. This roused him, and he marched against them, without showing the least favour either to rank, sex, or age, putting all to the sword. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; thirty of his generals, known as the Thirty Tyrants, assuming the purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations was assassinated at Milan by some of his officers.

Born 233; died 268.

GALLIPOLI, gal-lip'-o-le (Callipolis of the Greeks), an important town, situated on the E. side of the Gulf of Taranto, 30 miles W. of Otranto. It is a bishop's see, is well built and fortified, and has a convenient harbour, with a cathedral, castle, and schools. Manf. Muslin, cotton stockings, and other stuffs, and it carries on a considerable trade in olive oil, for the clarifying of which it has cisterns excavated in rocks. The tunny fishery employs many of the inhabitants. Pop. 10,518.

GALLIPOLI, a seaport-town of European Turkey, in Rumelia, on a peninsula of the same name, at the N.E. end of the Dardanelles, 90 miles S. of Adrianople. It has two good harbours. The bazaars are very extensive, and furnished with merchandise of every kind. Manf. Cotton, silk, and morocco leather. There is a considerable trade in corn, wine, and oil. Pop. 30,000.—It was taken by the Turks in 1356, and was the first town in Europe that fell into their hands. In 1854 a portion of the Anglo-French army, designed for the protection of Turkey, against the encroachments of Russia, was here stationed.

GALLIPOLI, PENINSULA OF, separates the Hellespont from the Ægean Sea and the Gulf of Saros. It was the ancient Thracian Chersonesus. Ext. 62 miles long, with a breadth ranging between 4 and 12. Lat. between 40° 3′ and 40°38′ N. Lon. between 26° 10′ and 27° E.

GALLOIS, JEAN ANTOINE GAUVAIN, gal-lwaw′, French politician and author. He was employed by Louis XVIII., in 1818, to write a poem, "Return of the Age of Gold, or the Reign of Louis XVIII."

Born 1755; died 1828.

GALLUS, CAIUS, a Roman astronomer, noted for his exact calculation of eclipses.

Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

GALLUS, CAIUS CORNELIUS, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical as well as military talents. He was passionately fond of the slave Lycoris, or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forsook him, which gave occasion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus was a favourite with Augustus, by whom he was appointed over Egypt; but he forgot the benefits he had received, pillaged the province, and even conspired against his benefactor; for which he was banished by the emperor. This disgrace operated so powerfully upon him, that he killed himself in dispair. Some few fragments remain of his poetry. He particularly excelled in elegiac composition.

Born 66 B.C.; died 26 B.C.

GALLUS, CAIUS VIBIUS TREBONIANUS, a Roman, who assassinated Decius, the emperor, and raised himself to the throne. He became indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers.

Born 206; died 253.

GALLUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS CONSTANTIUS, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius, his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was condemned to be beheaded.

Died 355.

GALMIER, ST., gal′-me-a, an ancient town of France, department of Loire, near the right bank of the Coise. There are mineral springs, which have been famous since the Roman times. Pop. 3,000.

GALOPARO, or CAPO DI FARO, gal-o-par′-o, the Charybdis of the ancients. It forms the whirlpool on the outside of the harbour of Messina, in the strait between Italy and Sicily. Opposite, on the coast of Italy, is the rock Scylla.

GALSTON, gal′-ston, a town of Scotland, county Ayr, on the left bank of the Irvine, 19 miles S.W. of Glasgow. The river is crossed by a fine bridge of three arches. Manf. Cotton, plaidings, and druggets. Pop. 5,961.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

GALT, JOHN, galt, Scotch novelist, the son of a captain in the merchant service. He was educated at Greenock, where he obtained a situation in the custom house, but in 1804 went to London, and endeavoured unsuccessfully to enter on a literary career. After a few years he went abroad, and made the acquaintance of Byron. He visited Greece and Constantinople, and on his return published "Letters from the Levant." For some time he acted in the capacity of agent to a company for establishing emigrants in Canada, but quarrelled with the government, and was suspended by the Canada company. On his return to England, he devoted himself to literature, and supported himself by the labours of a most prolific pen. "There is a thorough quaintness of phrase and dialogue in Mr. Galt's best works, which places him apart from all other Scotch novelists; much knowledge of life, variety of character, liveliness and humour, are displayed in his novels, and render them justly popular. The public will not soon forget his 'Ayrshire Legatees,' his 'Annals of the Parish,' or his 'Entail.' His biographies, and many of his later works, manufactured for the booksellers, are of a very different character."

Born at Irvine, Ayrshire, 1779; died at Greenock, 1839.

GALT, a town of Canada, county Waterloo, province Ontario. It stands on both sides of the Grand River, about 55 miles from its entrance into Lake Erie. A branch of the Great Western Railway passes through the town. The first house was built in 1816. It now contains numerous places of worship, grammar and other schools. Manf. Woollens, iron, and tools, and there are extensive flour mills. Pop. 5,187, principally of Scotch descent.

GALVANI, LUIGI, gal-va′-ne, the discoverer of galvanism, was a celebrated Italian physiologist, and, in 1762, became a lecturer on anatomy at Bologna, obtaining a considerable reputation. By experiments on frogs, he discovered that all animals are endued with a peculiar kind of electricity; and he followed up this discovery with so much perseverance and success, as to give his name to certain manifestations of electricity, which have excited universal attention. His first publication on this subject was in 1791, and entitled "Aloysii Galvani de Viribus Electricitatis in Motu Musculari Commentarius." The famous Volta followed Galvani in his researches, and discovered further wonders in this branch of science. Galvani, on the death of his wife, in 1790, fell into a state of melancholy, from which he never entirely recovered. Beside the above work, he wrote several memoirs upon professional subjects.

Born at Bologna, 1737; died 1798.

GALVESTON, gal-ves′-ton, a seaport of Texas, United States, situate at the extremity of Galveston island, at the entrance to Galveston Bay, in the Gulf of Mexico. The principal trade is the shipping of cotton and wool. There are good wharfs, shipbuilding yards, foundries, &c., &c.; also Roman Catholic university and cathedral, and Episcopal church, with other churches, convents, schools, &c. The Bay extends 30 miles inland, and receives several rivers. The Island is 30 miles long, with an average breadth of 2. The harbour is the best in the state, and the export of cotton very large. Pop. 22,248.

GALVESTON, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 330 square miles. Pop. 24,121. The capital is Galveston.

GALWAY, gawl'-wai, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, bounded W. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. by Mayo, N.E. by Roscommon, E. by the river Shannon, which separates it from King's county and Tipperary, and S. by Clare and Galway Bay. It is extremely diversified, both in soil and aspect, about half being fertile and well cultivated, the remainder consisting of waste and bog land.

Rivers.—The principal are the Shannon, Suck, and Blackwater.

Lakes.—Corrib, Mask, Inagh, and Naffoy. The first is 20 miles long, and 12 at its broadest part.

Pro.—Oats and potatoes; but the land is better adapted for grazing purposes than for tillage. Its breed of cattle is valuable, and the fisheries are important.

Minerals.—Lead, copper, marble, and limestone.

Manf.—Coarse linens and woollens, mostly made for home consumption.

Area.—2,603 square miles.

Pop.—241,662.

Chief Towns.—GALWAY, TUAM, LOUGHREA, and GORT.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, and two for the town of Galway.

GALWAY, a seaport-town and parliamentary borough of Ireland, and capital of the above county, is situate at the mouth of the Corrib, on the north side of Galway Bay, 117 miles W. of Dublin. It is built on both sides of the river, and on two islands in the channel, united by bridges. In the older part of the town, the streets are narrow and irregular, and many of the houses are built in the Spanish style, there having been, some centuries since, considerable communication between this town and Spain. In the new part, the streets are wide, and the houses well built and handsome. In the suburbs are wretched cabins. The principal buildings are the church of St. Nicholas, in the Decorated style, founded in 1320; the Queen's College, a beautiful building in the Elizabethan style; the county and town court houses; the Franciscan convent of St Clare; Erasmus Smith's grammar-school, custom house, an hospital, and an infirmary. The harbour, which is an extensive line of quays, is connected, by a canal, with Lough Corrib. There is a floating dock of 5 acres. On the right bank of the river is a suburb, Claddogh, inhabited by a primitive race of fishermen. Manf. Coarse cloths, linen, paper, flour; and there are both breweries and distilleries. Exp. Fish, bacon, corn, and flour. Pop. 15,471, nearly all Roman Catholics.—A station on the Midland Great Western railway.

GALWAY BAY, on the W. coast of the Atlantic, between the counties of Clare and Galway. Ext. 30 miles long, with an average breadth of 10. It is indented by many peninsulas, and opposite its entrance are the S. Arran islands.

GAM, DAVID, gam, a brave Welsh officer in the army of Henry V., whom he accompanied to France. Having returned from reconnoitring the enemy on the eve of the battle of Agincourt, he reported that there were enough of the enemy to be killed, enough to be taken prisoners, and enough to run away. He was knighted by Henry on the field, but was killed defending his sovereign when exposed to imminent danger.

Died 1415.

GAMA, VASCO or VASQUEZ DE, ga'-ma, an enterprising Portuguese navigator, to whom belongs the merit of having discovered the route to the East Indies by sea. In 1497 Emanuel, king of Portugal, sent him to endeavour to double the Cape of Good Hope, which he accomplished, and then sailed along the eastern coast of Africa, having proceeded as far as Calicut, where he arrived in May, 1498, and was received by the prince of that place with great pomp and ceremony. After an absence of two years, he returned to Lisbon, where he arrived in September, 1499. In 1502 he went out with twenty ships, and returned, the following year, with thirteen, which he had captured in the Indian seas. On this occasion he was created count of Videqueyra, but afterwards experienced a long neglect. In 1524 he was appointed by John III., viceroy of Portuguese India, being the first who held that title, and he sailed and took possession of his government, but did not long survive his honours after his arrival at his destination.

Born at Sines, Portugal; died at Cochin, 1525.

GAMALIEL, ga-mai'-le-el, "recompense of God," or "camel of God," a prince of the tribe of Manasseh.—A Jewish doctor of the Pharisees, of the highest reputation.

GAMBETTA, LÉON, a French politician, of Genoese descent. He joined the Paris Bar in 1859, and acquired considerable reputation in the political trials of 1868, as counsel for the defendants, in the course of which he proved himself an able and determined opponent of the empire, and was in consequence returned to the Chamber, both at Paris and Marseilles, at the election in 1869. After Sedan he became Minister of the Interior, was in Paris when it was invested by the Germans, but escaped from the city by means of a balloon, and descending at Amiens, proceeded to Tours, where he took the control of the war department, and assuming unlimited authority, endeavoured with tremendous energy to retrieve the disasters of the war, and to stir up the provinces to the defence of Paris. In 1871, when it was determined to appoint a National Assembly, Gambetta issued a decree directing that no official connected with the second empire should take part in the elections. The decree was cancelled at the instance of prince Bismarck, and Gambetta then resigned office and retired to Spain, but soon afterwards returned and entered the assembly as member for Paris. In 1876 he was returned to the chamber of deputies, of which he became president, in succession to M. Grévy (elected President of the Republic), in January, 1879.

Born at Cahors, 1838.

GAMBIA, gam'-be-a, a British colony of West Africa, at the mouth of the river Gambia. It is settled on the most healthy part in West Africa, and enjoys a flourishing trade. Exp. wax, hides, ivory, gold-dust, rice, palm-oil, horns, timber, and ground nuts. of 1,000 miles, falling into the Atlantic in lat. 13° 30′ N.; lon. 16° 34′ W.

GAMBIER, JAMES, lord, gam'-be-er, a British admiral, son of the lieutenant-governor of the Bahamas. He went to sea at an early age, and, in 1778, was appointed to the command of the Raleigh, 32. In this frigate he was engaged against the French in 1781, and assisted in the reduction of Charleston, S. Carolina. He was present at lord Howe's memorable victory of the 1st June, 1794, commanding the Defence, 74; and, after filling various posts, was intrusted, in July, 1807, with the command of the fleet despatched to Copenhagen. This city was bombarded for three days, when the enemy capitulated, and 19 sail of the line, 23 frigates and sloops, and 25 gunboats, were taken and conveyed to England. He was now created a baron, and, in 1808, had the command of the Channel fleet. In 1809, lord Cochrane (afterwards the earl of Dundonald), who was under lord Gambier's orders, attacked and destroyed with his fire-ships, several French vessels in the inner roads of the Isle d'Aix, and lord Cochrane was desirous of completing the destruction of the remainder of the enemy's fleet, but the commander-in-chief did not consider the attempt practicable. A court-martial sat on the conduct of the latter, but he was acquitted. In 1814 he negotiated a peace with the United States of America, at Ghent; and, on the accession of William IV., was advanced to the rank of admiral of the fleet.

Born at the Bahama Isles, 1756; died at Iver, near Uxbridge, 1833.

GAMBIER ISLANDS, a group of 11 small islands in the South Pacific Ocean, important on account of their being the only known station (with the exception of Pitcairn's Island) between Chili and Tahiti where good water can be obtained. They are under the protection of the French. The largest is called Mangareva, a name applied by the French to the entire group. Pop. 8,500. They were discovered in 1797. Lat. 23° 8′ S. Lon. 134° 55′ W.

GANGA SAGOR, a "sacred" island at the mouth of the western branch of the Ganges, noted as the resort of pilgrims.

GANGES, gan'-jees, a celebrated river of Hindostan, rising in the Himalaya mountains, formed by the junction of two streams, the Bhagirathi and the Alaknanda, at elevations of 13,000 and 18,000 feet above sea-level. These streams, after running 500 miles in a W. direction, inclining to the N., turn to the S., unite their waters at Deoprag, and form what is properly called the Ganges, from the Hindoo word Ganga, which signifies river. It takes a S.E. direction through the country of Sirinagur, until, at Hurdwar, it finally emerges from the mountains, among which it has meandered for about 80 miles. At this point it is about 1,000 feet above the sea level. From Hurdwar, where it enters the plain country, it flows with a smooth navigable stream, during the remainder of its course, to the Bay of Bengal, which it enters by several mouths. In its course through these extensive plains, it passes by Furruckabad, Allahabad, Benares, Patna, &c., and receives eleven large rivers, the chief of which are the Jumna and Sone, on the right bank, and the Ramgunga, Goomtee, Gogra, Gunduk, Mahanada, and Ahi, on the left bank. The delta, an alluvial tract, through which the river discharges in several branches, commences about 200 miles from the sea, and is from 80 to 200 miles wide. In the annual inundation of this immense river, the country is overflowed to the extent of more than 100 miles in width; nothing appearing above water but villages and trees, excepting, very rarely, the top of an elevated spot, the artificial mound of some deserted village, which appears like an island. The river rises at this period, on an average, about 31 feet. The Ganges is a beneficent river, diffusing plenty by means of its living productions, enriching the lands, and affording an easy conveyance for the produce of its banks. The Hindoos hold its waters in high veneration, and it is visited annually by pilgrims from all parts of Hindostan. Happy are those accounted whose lot it is to perish in its streams; its estuary being considered by the Brahminists the termination of the "Sacred Stream." The length is estimated at 1,940 miles, and the area of drainage 400,000 square miles. It carries down an immense quantity of mud in suspension, calculated to amount on the average to 534,600,000 tons annually.

GANGES CANAL, constructed for the irrigation of the Doab, and avoiding the difficulties in the navigation of the river above Cawnpore. It measures 810 miles (350 for the trunk, and 460 for the branches. It crosses the Solani over an aqueduct, erected at a cost of 300,000*l.*, and having fifteen arches, each with a span of 50 feet.

GANGES, ganje, a town of France, department Herault, 25 miles N.W. of Montpelier, beautifully situated near the left bank of the Herault, with an old castle and many country seats in the vicinity. GARD, gard, a department of France, bounded on the S. by the Mediterranean, and landward by the departments of the Lozère, the Ardèche, the Rhone, the Herault, and the Aveyron. It is mountainous in the N., being traversed by part of the chain of the Cevennes, but in the S. it is interspersed with numerous lakes and marshes.

Rivers.—The Rhone, which forms the eastern boundary, Herault, Vidorra, Ceze, and Gardon.

Pro.—Fruit, olive oil, and wine. It is deficient in corn; but is noted for its excellent cattle and a breed of white horses. Silk worms are extensively reared.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, lead, sulphur, and zinc.

Manf.—Silk, cotton and woollen goods, hosiery, carpets, and leather.

Area.—2,291 square miles.

Pop.—415,629.

Administrative Divisions.—There are 4 arrondissements: Nismes, Alais, Uzes, and Le Vigans, and 347 communes. The chief town is NISMES.

GARD, or GARDON, a river of France, which traverses the centre of the department Gard, and, after a course of 55 miles, joins the Rhone 5 miles from Tarascon.

GARDA, LAKE OF, or BENACO, gar'-da, the Lacus Benacus of the Romans, a lake of Italy, lying between Tyrol and the governments of Venice and Milan. It is about 32 miles in length, and from 2 to 10 wide; the depth varies from 10 to 40 feet where it is narrowest, and its greatest depth is 1,900 feet.—In 1796 the battle of Rivoli was fought near its E. shore, when Bonaparte defeated Wurmser.

GARDA, a small town of Northern Italy, in the province of Verona, on the lake to which it gives name. There is a small harbour, and in the vicinity are the ruins of an old castle. Pop. 1,200.

GARDAFUI CAPE. (See GUARDAFUI.)

GARDAIA, or GHARDEIA, gar-daï'-a, a town in the Sahara, belonging to Algeria, encompassed by walls, and defended by towers. It has a flourishing trade by means of caravans with Tunis, Algiers, Fez, Morocco, Súdan, and Timbuctoo, in all the varied produce of Central and Northern Africa. Lat. 32° 28′ N. Lon. 4° 38′ E.

GARDE FREINET, LA, gard-frë'-nai, a small town of France, department Var, situated on a lofty eminence, 15 miles S. of Draguignan. There are, in the newer part, fine open squares planted with trees, and with fountains. The ruins of an old Saracenic castle are on the hill. Manf. Corks. Pop. 2,600.

GARDELEGEN, gar'-dë-lai'-gen, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the right bank of the Milde, 30 miles N.W. of Magdeburg. It is surrounded by an old wall. Manf. Leather, and there are numerous breweries, and distilleries. A trade in cattle is carried on, and there are five annual fairs. Pop. 5,200.

GARDINER, a city on the right bank of the Kennebec, 7 miles below Augusta, in the S.W. of the State of Maine, United States. Manf. Machinery, paper, leather, woollens, and pottery. It stands at the head of the ship navigation of the Kennebec, and a considerable shipping trade is carried on. Pop. 4,500.

GARDINER, STEPHEN, gar'-di-ner, a distinguished English prelate and statesman, the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, brother to Elizabeth, queen of Edward IV. He was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, whence he went into the family of the duke of Norfolk, and afterwards into that of Cardinal Wolsey, who made him his secretary. In 1527, in company with Edward Fox, he went to Rome for the purpose of persuading the Pope to consent to the divorce of Queen Catherine by Henry VIII. Though unsuccessful in his mission, he greatly assisted Henry in the prosecution of his design, and became secretary of state, and in 1531 bishop of Winchester. He wrote "De Verâ Obedientiâ," in defence of the king's supremacy, and drew up articles accusing Henry's last queen, Catherine Parr, of heresy; but the queen avoided the storm, and he fell into disgrace. At the accession of Edward VI. he opposed the Reformation, and was committed first to the Fleet, and afterwards to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner during the remainder of the reign; he was also deprived of his bishopric; but, on the accession of Mary, he was restored to his see, and, in 1553, appointed lord chancellor and prime minister. He had a deep knowledge of human nature; but his conduct towards the Protestants was cruel and sanguinary. He was a learned man, but of little principle, crafty, and ambitious. Lloyd, in his "State Worthies," says that he was to be traced like the fox, and, like the Hebrew, was to be read backwards.

Born at Bury St. Edmund's, 1483; died 1555.

GARDINER, COL. JAMES. He obtained a commission in a Scotch regiment in the Dutch service at the early age of 14. Subsequently entered the English army, and served with distinction in the campaigns of Marlborough. In the earlier part of his life he was notorious for his licentiousness, but became in 1719 the subject of profound religious impressions, resulting from a "vision" of the "Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross surrounded on all sides with a glory," &c., &c. From that time the whole course of his life was changed, and he became as remarkable for his piety as he had been notorious for his evil living. He was raised to the rank of Major in 1724; married Lady Francis Erskine in 1726, by whom he had 13 children; in 1730 became lieut.-general of dragoons, and in 1743 colonel. He was killed at the battle of Prestonpans. He is remembered principally as the subject of the very curious book, the "Life of Colonel Gardiner," by Dr. Doddridge.

Born at Carriden, Linlithgowshire, 1688; died 1745.

GAREEP. (See ORANGE RIVER.)

GARESSIO, a town of Northern Italy, on the left bank of the Tanaro, 17 miles S.E. of Mondovi. There are several handsome churches, a monastery, and a nunnery. Two annual fairs are held. In the vicinity are a mine of argentiferous lead, and quarries of marble. Pop. 6,500.

GARGANO, a mountain group in S. Italy, province of Foggia.

GARGANO, gar-gá'-no, a town of Italy, on the Lake of Garda, 24 miles N.E. of Brescia. Pop. 4,000.

GARGAPHIA, gar-gaï'-fe-a, a valley near Platæa, with a fountain of the same name, where Actæon was torn in pieces by his dogs, according to Greek legend.

GARGARIS, gar'-ga-ris, a king of the Curetes, who first found out the way of collecting honey.

GARGARUS. (See IDA.)

GARIBALDI, GIUSEPPE, ga'-re-bal'-de, Italian patriot and general, was brought up at Nice, amongst sailors and fishermen, and, at an early age, entered the Sardinian navy, soon distinguishing himself by his courage and coolness. Implicated, in 1834, in the Italian insurrectional movement, he was compelled to fly, and take refuge in Marseilles. After passing two years here, chiefly in the pursuit of mathematical studies, he embarked in an Egyptian corvette, to serve as a naval officer in the fleet of the Bey of Tunis. Disappointed in his expectations, however, he set out for Rio Janeiro, and fought, with great bravery and success, in the service of the government of Uruguay against Buenos Ayres. His influence over his troops was something wonderful; and for the bravery he and his Italian followers displayed at Salta, the government of Montevideo decreed, on that day, that the Italian legion should take the right, the post of honour, even when with native troops, in every engagement. The revolutionary movements of 1848 brought Garibaldi back to Nice. A portion of his legion accompanied him, and took a prominent part in the war of independence against the Austrians in the Southern Tyrol. At Rome he was the soul of the resistance; and Marshal Vaillant, the French commander, in his report of the operations during the siege of that city, did justice to the energy and skill of his adversary. On May 9, at Palestrina, he defeated the Neapolitan army, though vastly superior in numbers to his own. A few days later, at Velletri, where he was severely wounded, he was still to win the honours of the day. Finally he sustained, by his courage and resources, for a whole month, the attacks of the French army. In the last council of war held at Rome, Garibaldi proposed the employment of extreme measures, but they were not approved. He then left the famous city with the remnant of his little army, traversed the enemy's lines, and withdrew to the neighbourhood of St. Marin. There his troops disbanded. He reached Genoa with 200 soldiers, who had refused to leave him. At the end of a few months he returned to America, where he engaged energetically in trade and industry. About 1852 he was again actively employed in command of the Peruvian army. When the war ceased he returned to Nice. For five years he lived in retirement with his sons on the isle of Caprera, off the Sardinian coast, where he farmed on a large scale. In the Italian war of 1859, he played a conspicuous part against the Austrians, and seemed to be ubiquitous, by the marvellous rapidity of his operations. After the peace, the preliminaries of which were signed at Villafranca, he had the command of the army of Central Italy, but subsequently retired from the field, and laid down his arms. He was, however, soon recalled from his retirement, and in 1860 he won Naples and Sicily for Victor Emmanuel, with his volunteers, or Garibaldini. In 1862 he again called for volunteers to aid him in liberating Rome and Venice; but he failed in uniting them to the new kingdom of Italy. In 1864 Garibaldi visited London, where he was received with enthusiasm, and honoured with a banquet by the Lord Mayor and Corporation. In 1866 he took the field against the Austrians, without achieving any considerable success, and at the close of the war returned to Caprera. In 1867 he openly organised an attack on Rome, but was arrested on his way, and conveyed back to his island home, whence he subsequently escaped, and, heading the insurgents, defeated the Papal army at Monte Rotonde. He was shortly afterwards attacked by a combined force of French and Papal troops at Mentana, and was defeated with heavy loss. In 1870 Garibaldi was engaged in the Franco-German war, and held a command of irregular troops in the Vosges; was returned as a deputy to the French National Assembly in 1871, but declined to sit. In 1875 he again emerged from his retirement in Caprera, and visited Rome, took the oaths and his seat as a deputy in the Italian parliament, accepted the pension which he had previously refused, and devoted himself to the task of promoting the works necessary to prevent the periodical overflow of the river Tiber, and the drainage of the Campagna.

Born at Nice, 1807. Died 1882.

GARIGLIANO, ga'-reel-yé-ano, an important river in S. Italy. It rises in the Abruzzi, in the valley of Nersa, and, after a course of 75 miles, falls into the Mediterranean, 10 miles S.E. of Gaeta.

GARLASCO, gar-las'-ko, a town of Italy, province of Pavia, 24 miles S.E. of Novaro. There are a very fine church, two monasteries, and an ancient tower, now used as a court of justice. Pop. 6,400.—Near this place the Austrians, when invading Italy in 1849, crossed the Po.

GARNERIN, ANDRÉ JAQUES, gar-na'-rain, French aeronaut, who made a great number of ascents, and was the first to descend in a parachute.

Born at Paris, 1769; died 1823.

GARNET, HENRY, gar'-net, an English Jesuit, memorable for being concerned in the gunpowder plot, was educated at Winchester school. He took the Jesuit's habit at Rome in 1575, and returned to England in 1586, as provincial of his order. He was executed for high treason. He confessed the crime for which he suffered, but was placed by the Jesuits among their martyrs.

Born 1555; died 1606.

GARNIER-PAGES, LOUIS ANTOINE, gar'-ne-a-paje, owes the double name he bears to the fact that his mother was twice married, first to M. Garnier, and afterwards to M. Pagès, formerly a professor of rhetoric at Sorrège, but subsequently "maître de pension" at Marseilles. The son, Garnier-Pagès, was a commission agent in Paris when the revolution of 1830 broke out, and he fought at the barricades. Absorbed in politics he relinquished his occupation, and was elected a deputy of the arrondissement of Verneuil; whereupon he took his seat in the chamber on the "left," and devoted himself mostly to questions of finance. In 1847 he took a leading part in the agitation for reform, and was present at most of the banquets connected with that movement, the ultimate prohibition of which hastened the revolution of 1848. After that event, M. Garnier-Pagès was proclaimed mayor of Paris and member of the provisional government, in the capacity of minister of finance. In this latter capacity he had to deal with the financial crisis of the time, and by the introduction of important reforms he successfully steered the state through its monetary difficulty. Turning his attention after to authorship, he wrote "L'Histoire de la Revolution de 1848," in eight volumes, and a continuation, entitled "L'Histoire de la Commission Exécutive."

Born at Marseilles, July 18, 1803.

GARONNE, ga-ron', one of the largest rivers of France. It rises among the Pyrenees, in the Val d'Aran, on the confines of Spain, and passing by Bordeaux and Blaye, falls into the Atlantic. At Blaye it unites with the Dordogne, and assumes the name of the Gironde. Length, 350 miles.—The Garonne is connected with the Mediterranean by the Canal du Midi.

GARONNE HAUT, a department in the S.W. of France, bounded N. and N.E. by the department Tarn-et-Garonne and Tarn, S. by department Ariége and Spain; W. by the Hautes-Pyrenées and Gers. It is mountainous, and generally elevated, especially in the S., where offshoots of the Pyrenees occupy a considerable portion of its surface. It has, however, many beautiful valleys, and abounds with small plains.

Rivers.—The Garonne and its affluents, the Ariége, Save, and Lers.

Pro.—Corn, hemp, tobacco, potatoes, grapes, oranges, and other fruits. In the mountain districts, cattle-rearing is carried on to a great extent, and numbers of mules are also reared.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, zinc, and antimony; marble, rock-salt, and slate.

Manf.—Woollen and cotton fabrics and hardware. Wine, timber, and cattle also largely exported.

Area.—2,369 square miles.

Pop.—478,009.

Administrative Divisions.—There are 4 arrondissements, Toulouse, Maret, St. Gaudens, and Villefranche, and 584 communes. TOULOUSE is the capital.

GAROO, or GARTOP, ga-roo', a station of Tibet, 60 miles N.E. of the Niti Pass. An active trade is carried on in exchanging the products of China and Tibet for those of India and Cashmere. Lat. 31° 40′ N. Lon. 80° 21′ E.

GARRARD, gar'-rard, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 312 square miles. Pop. 11,704. The capital is Lancaster.

GARRICK, DAVID, gar'-rik, a celebrated English actor, descended from a French family of the name of Garric, or Garrique, who fled to England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His father, Peter Garrick, was a captain in the army, and generally resided at Lichfield. David received his education partly at the grammar-school at Lichfield, and partly under Dr. Johnson, with whom, in 1735, he went to London to seek his fortune. He was for some time under Mr. Colson, an eminent mathematician, and afterwards entered into partnership with an elder brother in the wine trade. This business he soon quitted for the stage. His first appearance was at Ipswich, in 1741, where, under the assumed name of Lyddal, he appeared as Aboan, in the tragedy of "Oroonoko." The applause he met with induced him to make his appearance in London, at the theatre in Goodman's Fields, where, in the character of Richard III., he appeared, in 1741, and achieved a decided success. The other theatres were quickly deserted, and Goodman's Fields became the resort of people of fashion, even from the west-end. He next formed an engagement with Fleetwood, the patentee of Drury-lane, and, in 1742, appeared for three nights as Bayes, Lear, and Richard III. In the summer of 1743 he played in Dublin, with Mrs. Woffington, to such full houses, that the heat of the weather and the crowds occasioned a fever, which was called the Garrick fever. In 1747 he became joint-patentee of Drury-lane theatre, and, in 1749, married Mademoiselle Violetti, an Italian stage-dancer. In 1763 he and Mrs. Garrick made a visit to Italy, and at Paris he saw the celebrated Mademoiselle Clairon, whose future eminence he predicted. He returned to England in 1765, and, in 1766, brought out the "Clandestine Marriage," a comedy written in conjunction with the elder Colman. In 1769 he celebrated a fête in honour of Shakspeare, called the Jubilee, at Stratford-upon-Avon, and afterwards made an entertainment of it at Drury-lane, under the same title, where it had a prodigious run. In 1776 he sold his interest in the theatre for 35,000*l*. The last character he performed was Don Felix in the "Wonder," which he acted in 1776, for the benefit of decayed actors. He accumulated a very large fortune by the exercise of his art. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a handsome monument is erected to his memory by private friendship. Mr. Garrick was hospitable and generous, but vain and fond of flattery. He wrote several dramatic pieces, prologues, epilogues, songs, and epigrams. In the last he excelled. It is, however, upon his skill in histrionic representation that his fame rests. In this he has never been equalled. "That young man," said Pope, after seeing his Richard III., "never had his equal as an actor, and will never have a rival." In tragedy and comedy he was alike at home, and certainly possessed a matchless versatility of genius for the exhibition of passion. "His appearance," says Schlegel, in his "Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature," "forms an epoch in the history of the English theatre." Mrs. Garrick survived her husband forty-three years, and died at her house in the Adelphi, 1822, in the 98th year of her age.

Born at Hereford, 1716: died in London, 1779.

GARRISON, WILLIAM LLOYD, an eminent American abolitionist lecturer and journalist. At 9 years of age he was apprenticed to a shoemaker at Lynn, in Massachussets, but, as the business did not suit him, he was sent back to Newburyport, where he went to school for some time, working after school hours to support himself. At 13 he made a brief attempt to learn cabinet-making, but finding the occupation distasteful, abandoned it, and apprenticed himself to the printer of the Newburyport Herald, of which he became the editor in 1824. He next edited, in 1826, the Free Press, of which he was the proprietor, and on the failure of this enterprise, went to Boston, where for a time he worked as a journeyman. From 1827 to 1829 he was connected with several newspapers, and in the latter year his articles on slavery led to his conviction and imprisonment for libel. Released by the kindness of a friend, who paid his fine, Garrison commenced his career as an anti-slavery lecturer. In 1831 he returned to Boston and started the Liberator, which he carried on until slavery ceased to exist in the United States. Garrison's integrity, unconquerable energy, self-devotion, and great ability, gave him a place amongst the very foremost men in the anti-slavery agitation. It is said that for some years after the Liberator was started almost every mail brought him letters threatening his assassination; a reward of 5,000 dollars was offered by the legislature of Georgia for his conviction under the laws of the State, and constant offers were made by the pro-slavery party to secure the suppression of his paper. In spite of everything, however, he persevered, and lived to see the complete success of the movement with which he was identified. He visited England in 1833, and on his return organised the American Anti-Slavery Society, of which he was subsequently president. He visited England again in 1846, 1848, and 1866; in this latter year he was entertained at a public breakfast in St. James's Hall. In 1865 he was presented by his friends in the United States with 30,000 dollars, as a memorial of the abolition of slavery, and his efforts in connection therewith.

Born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, 1805.

GARROVILLAS DE ALCONETAR, gar'-ro-vil-las-dai'-al-kon-a-tar', a Spanish town, province of Caceras, on the left bank of the Tagus, 20 miles N.W. of the town of Caceras. The church of San Cedro is a very large and handsome building. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, leather, oil, vinegar, and wine. Pop. 6,500.

GARROW MOUNTAINS, gar'-ro, a range of Further India, surrounded by the territories of Bengal, Assam, and Jynteah. It is inhabited by an independent people, who carry their produce to the Bengal districts. Height, from 3,000 to 4,000 feet.

GARRY, gar'-re, a river of Perthshire, Scotland, which, after a course of 20 miles, joins the Tummel, 5 miles S.E. of Blair Athole. James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, speaks of it in his beautiful song of "Bonnie Prince Charlie."

> "Cam ye by Athol, lad wi' the philabeg, > Down by the Tummel, or banks o' the Garry?"

It flows from a small lake of the same name, in the wild district of Athol Forest.

GARSTANG, gars'-tang, a town of Lancashire, 12 miles S. of Lancaster. There is a townhall in the market-place. Manf. Calico-printing and cotton and worsted spinning. Pop. 5,833. A station on the London and North-Western railway.

GARTH, SIR SAMUEL, garth, an English poet and physician, who greatly contributed to the establishment of dispensaries; but was opposed by the apothecaries, whom he severely lashed in his poem of the "Dispensary," for their venal spirit. He was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and in 1691 settled as a physician in London. In 1697 he spoke the Harveian oration before the college. On the accession of George I. he was knighted, and appointed king's physician in ordinary, and physician-general to the army. His poems do not possess any extraordinary merit.

Born at Bolham, Durham, 1660; died 1718.

GARTNER, FRIEDRICH VON, gart'-ner, German architect, professor of architecture in the academy of Munich, and afterwards director. He designed many fine buildings at Munich, and the royal palace at Athens.

Born at Coblentz, 1792; died at Munich, 1874.

GARZ, gartz, a town of Prussia, province of Pomerania, at the confluence of the Oder and the Salvei, 16 miles S.W. of Stettin. It is defended by two forts. Manf. Woollen cloth, hosiery, gloves, and tiles. Pop. 4,400.

GASCOIGNE, SIR WILLIAM, gas'-koin, an eminent English judge, who rose, in 1401, to be chief justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Henry IV. He was a man of integrity and independence, refusing to pass sentence on archbishop Scroope, as a traitor, and, according to a tradition open to doubt, sentencing the prince of Wales, afterwards Henry V., to be imprisoned for indecorous conduct before him on the bench.

Born at Gaythorpe, Yorkshire, 1350; died 1413.

GASCOIGNE, GEORGE, an old English poet, who served under the prince of Orange in the wars of the Low Countries. He wrote masques of the progresses of queen Elizabeth, and some of his poems are not without merit.

Born 1536; died at Stamford, 1577.

GASCONADE, gas'-ko-nad, a river of N. America, which joins the Missouri from the N., 100 miles from its confluence with the Mississippi.

GASCONADE, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 11,000. Hermann is the capital.

GASCONY, or GASCOGNE, gas'-ko-ne, an old province in the S.W. of France, which, before the Revolution, was one of the great provinces administered by an intendant. It now forms the departments of Hautes-Pyrénées, Gers, and Landes. From 1152 to 1453, Gascony belonged to England. At the latter date it was definitely united to France by Charles VII.

GASKELL, ELIZABETH, gas'-kel, (maiden name Stevenson), novelist and biographer. She was the wife of the rev. William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister, resident at Manchester, and at once made herself popular by her first novel, entitled "Mary Barton," which appeared in 1848. This fiction forcibly depicted the struggles of the working cotton-spinner with the evils of poverty, and contrasted the splendid condition of the mill-owner with that of the other. It also illustrated the evil of strikes, and presented such a vivid image of real life in one particular phase of society, that the authoress was at once raised into fame. After this Mrs. Gaskell became a contributor to "Household Words," and other periodicals, and in 1850 published her Christmas story of "The Moorland Cottage." In 1853 appeared "Ruth," her second novel, and in 1855, "North and South," an almost verbatim reprint from "Household Words." She has also published other collections of her writings, all of which have enjoyed great popularity, and given her a prominent place amongst the writers of fiction of the 19th century. She also wrote a memoir of her friend Miss Brontë (Currer Bell), the author of "Jane Eyre," and contributed to the columns of the "Daily News."

Born about 1820; died 1865.

GASPARINA, gas-pa-ré-na, a town of Italy, province of Catanzaro, near the Ionian Sea. Pop. 2,700.

GASPAR STRAIT, gas'-par, a passage nearly 60 miles wide, of the Indian archipelago, between the islands of Banga and Billiton. There is a small island of the same name in the strait. Lat. 2° 25′ S. Lon. 107° 4′ E.

GASPE, gas'-pe, a district of Canada, province of Quebec, on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, including the counties of Gaspe and Bonaventure. The cod and whale fisheries employ a large number of the inhabitants. Area, 7,500 square miles. Pop. 25,000, chiefly of French descent. Lat. between 48° and 49° 20′ N. Lon. between 64° 15′ and 67° 56′ W.

GASPE, a bay of the district of Gaspe, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, lying between Cape Gaspe and Whale Head. It is 18 miles long, by 6 broad, and affords a safe and capacious harbour.

GASSENDI, or GASSEND, PIERRE, gas-sen'-de, a celebrated French philosopher and mathematician, who, at a very early age discovered an acute and inquisitive mind, and made such progress in learning, as to be appointed teacher of rhetoric at Digne before he was 16. Two years afterwards, he became professor of divinity and philosophy at Aix, when he ventured to oppose the system of Aristotle, and his lectures were published under the title of "Exercitationes Paradoxicæ adversus Aristotelem." This work procured him the friendship of the celebrated Peirese, president of the university of Aix, by whose interest he was preferred to a canonry in the cathedral of Digne. In 1628 he visited Holland, with the avowed object of cultivating the friendship of the philosophers of that country; and, on his return, applied himself ardently to astronomical studies. In 1631 he was the first to observe a transit of the planet Mercury over the disc of the sun, which had previously been calculated by Kepler. In 1645 he was appointed royal professor of mathematics at Paris, where he applied so intensely to his studies and to astronomical observations, that he fell into a consumption, when he was forced to retire to Digne for the restoration of his health. In 1647 he published his principal work, entitled "De Vitâ et Moribus Epicuri." This was, in 1649, followed by his "Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicureæ," which was an attempt to reconstruct the Epicurean system of philosophy out of the remains of its masters. In 1653 he went back to Paris; but his labours brought a return of his disease, of which he died, in 1655. Gassendi is deservedly ranked among the first mathematicians of his age. He opposed the philosophy of Descartes with success, and obtained a number of followers, who were called after his name. His other works are, the "Lives of Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, Purbachius, and Regiomontanus; a Commentary on Diogenes Laertius;" astronomical and philosophical pieces, the whole collected into 6 vols. folio, 1658.

Born at Chantersier, near Digne, 1592; died at Paris, 1655.

GASSINO, gas-sé'-no, a town of Italy, near the left bank of the Po, 8 miles N.E. of Turin. There are an ancient and a handsome new church, and some remains of the old walls. Marble quarries are in the neighbourhood. Five fairs are held annually. Pop. 2,600.

GASSNER, JOHANN JOSEPH, gass'-ner, a Catholic priest at Klösterle, in the diocese of Coire, in Tyrol. He professed to exercise miraculous powers of healing, but fell into disrepute before his death.

Born at Bratz, 1727; died 1779.

GASTEIN, or HOF-GASTEIN, gas'-tine, a market town of Austria, on the right bank of the Achen, 44 miles S. of Salzburg. It is built chiefly of wood, but there are some old stone houses. A bathing establishment is supplied by pipes from the springs of Wildbad-Gastein, a charming watering place, on a lofty situation, 6 miles distant. The cascades of the Achen, near the town, are very striking. Pop. 4,000.

GASTON, gas'-ton, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 308 square miles. Pop 14,000. The capital is Dallas.

GATA, CAPE, gá'-ta, a promontory of Spain, on the coast of Granada, bounding the Bay of Almeria. Lat. 36° 43′ N. Lon. 2° 22′ W.

GATES, gaits, a county of N. Carolina, United States, bordering on Virginia. Area, 312 square miles. Pop. 8,897. The capital is Gatesville.

GATES, HORATIO, an American general, who received his military tuition in England, and served in the West Indies, and also in Ohio, under general Braddock. Being wounded, he retired for some time from the army, and settled on an estate which he purchased in Virginia. When the war of American independence commenced, he espoused the cause of the revolutionists, and received the appointment of adjutant-general in the army. In 1776 he was appointed to the command of the army operating on Lake Champlain; but, in the following year, he was superseded, although, in a few months afterwards, he was again appointed to oppose general Burgoyne, whom he defeated, and, at Saratoga, forced him to capitulate with his whole army. This success surrounded Gates with a halo of popularity, and attempts were made to place him above Washington These, however, were frustrated, and, in 1780, he was appointed to the command of the southern army. He met Cornwallis at Camden, in S. Carolina, and suffered a complete defeat. For this he was superseded, and his conduct subjected to a court of inquiry; he was, however, honourably acquitted. After this he retired to his estate in Virginia, where he resided till 1800, when he removed to New York, where the freedom of the city was conferred upon him. He now became a member of the legislature; but, before he quitted Virginia, he emancipated his slaves, and conferred upon the necessitous and infirm a provision for life.

Born in England, 1728; died 1806.

GATESHEAD, gaits'-hed, a municipal and parliamentary borough in the county of Durham, on the south bank of the Tyne, directly opposite to Newcastle, with which it is connected by a bridge over the Tyne. The old town consisted mainly of one long street of poorly built houses; but it has been much improved of late years, great extensions having been made westward and southward. There are numerous places of worship, the parish church being an ancient cruciform structure. A free school for grammar, arithmetic, and navigation. Manf. Glass, iron, bricks, tiles, and soap. There are shipbuilding yards, &c. Pop. 65,873. A station on the North-Eastern railway. In 1854 a large portion of the town was destroyed by fire.

GATESHEAD-FELL, a parish adjoining Gateshead, and formerly a part of it, celebrated for its grinding-stones, which are exported to all parts of the globe.

GATH, gath, "a wine-press," a principal city of the Philistines, about 32 miles W. of Jerusalem.

GATINAIS, ga'-te-nai, an old division of France, now subdivided into the departments Loiret, Seine-et-Marne, Nièvre, and Yonne.

GATINEAU, ga'-te-no, a river in Canada, province of Quebec. It originates in a chain of lakes immediately N. of the 48th parallel of latitude, flows S.W., and falls into the Ottawa, 12 miles below the town of Aylmer.

GATO, GATTO, or AGATTON, ga'-to, a town of Upper Guinea, on a creek of the Benin river, 16 miles from Benin. Pop. Unascertained, but said to be considerable. Here Belzoni, the traveller, died, in 1823. (See BELZONI.)

GATSCHINA, gats'-che-na, a Russian town, about 30 miles S.W. of St. Petersburg, situated on a small lake formed by the Ishora. It is noted for a royal palace, the seat of Paul I., which has 600 rooms, and is surrounded by beautiful pleasure grounds. There are churches for Greeks, Roman Catholics, and Lutherans. Manf. Woollen cloths, leather, hats, and porcelain. The emperor, Paul I., bestowed municipal rights on the town in 1797. Pop. 8,400.

GAUBIL, ANTHONY, go'-beel, a learned French missionary, who, in 1723, was sent to China, and there acquired the Chinese and Mantchoo languages, becoming interpreter at the court of Pekin. He held this position thirty years, and gained the respect and esteem of the emperor. No European, perhaps, was better acquainted with Chinese literature than Gaubil. He wrote an "Historical and Critical Treatise on Chinese Astronomy," and a "History of Gengis Khan." He also translated the "Chou King," which comprises the historical traditions of China and its sovereigns, and produced other works.

Born at Gaillac, Languedoc, 1689; died at Pekin, 1759.

GAUBIUS JEROME-DAVID, gou'-be-oos, a celebrated German physician, who contracted an intimate friendship with Boorhaave, and succeeded him as lecturer in botany and chemistry at Leyden, in 1731, and in 1734 obtained the medical professorship. His principal works are a treatise on the "Method of Prescribing, or of Writing Receipts;" "Principles of Nosology;" and "Institutiones Pathologiæ Medicinalis."

Born at Heildelberg, 1705; died at Leyden, 1780.

GAUCIN, gau'-cin, a town of Spain, 47 miles S. of Malaga. A strong castle of Moorish origin, is in an almost inaccessible position, on an adjoining rock, and is now used as barracks. Manf. Linen, woollens, and cottons, leather, hats, soap, wine, and oil. Pop. 4,000.

GAUDEN, JOHN, gaw'-den, an English bishop, who being appointed chaplain to Robert, earl of Warwick, preached before the House of Commons in 1640, and gave so much satisfaction to the members, that they presented him with a silver tankard, and added to it, in the following year, the rich deanery of Bocking, in Essex. In 1643 he was nominated one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, but did not sit among them. He wrote against the "Covenant," but complied with it to keep his preferment. In 1648 he published a pamphlet against bringing the king to trial. He had also committed to his care the collating and publishing of the king's meditations, to which he gave the name of "Eikon Basilike, or the Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings." This book had a wonderful effect upon the public mind; but it has been doubted, and still is, whether it was the production of Gauden or of the monarch himself. Macaulay attributes it to the bishop. In 1659 he became preacher at the Temple; and when Charles II. was restored, he was preferred to the see of Exeter, and in 1662 to that of Worcester, where he passed the remainder of his days. Besides the above, he wrote several other works on the hierarchy of the Church of England, and sermons.

Born at Mayland, Essex, 1605; died at Worcester, 1662.

GAUDENS, ST., go'-dens, a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, 50 miles S.W. of Toulouse. It has been called "The Key of the Pyrenees." There are an antique church, other interesting buildings, and a communal college. Manf. Porcelain, earthenware, coarse cloth, leather, glass, and tiles. There is an active trade in rural produce. Pop. 5,100.

GAULTIER, ALOÏSIUS EDOUARD CAMILLE, gole'-te-ai, a French abbé and educational writer, who was ordained a priest at Rome, and went, in 1780, to Paris, where he occupied himself entirely with the instruction of the young. In order to diminish, to those of tender age, the difficulty of learning scientific subjects, he reduced the elementary studies to a kind of game, and he afterwards adopted the plan of mutual instruction, the same as that used by Lancaster and Bell. During the Revolution he took refuge in England, and his system was very successful there. He returned to France in 1800, where he continued the application of his principles. He is the author of a complete course of elementary education; amongst which are, "Geographical Lessons by Means of a Game," "A Reasonable and Moral Game for Children," "A Complete Course of Instructive Games for Children."

Born in Italy, of French parents, 1740; died at Paris, 1818.

GAUSS, KARL FRIEDERICH, gause, mathematician of Göttingen. On the discovery of the planets Ceres and Pallas, he calculated the elements of their orbits, and for these labours was awarded the Lalande medal by the French Institute. In 1807 he was appointed director of the Observatory at Göttingen, and in 1821 was charged with the triangulation of the kingdom of Hanover. He was the author of several important works, and was pronounced by La Place to be the greatest mathematician in Europe.

Born at Brunswick, 1777; died 1855.

GAUTIER, THEOPHILE, go'-te-ai, a modern French poet and littérateur, who in 1830 produced his first volume of verses. He afterwards became connected with some of the foremost publications in Paris—"Figaro," "Revue de Paris," "Presse," "Revue des deux Mondes," and the "Musée des Familles." Many poems also have been written by him, and he was also engaged on the "History of the Painters." He subsequently became the editor of the literary feuilleton of the "Moniteur."

Born at Tarbes, 1808; died at Paris, 1872.

GAVARNI, ga-var'-ne, the name by which one of the most popular of French caricaturists was known. His real name was Paul Chevalier, and he began life as a mechanical draughtsman, but in 1835 discovered his genius for burlesque, in hitting off the peculiarities of manners and persons. He at once rose into fame, and, taking the passing and ever-varying modes of Parisian life for his subjects, produced an endless variety of caricatures, unequalled for the originality and tone they display. Besides illustrating the universally-known pages of "Charivari," and other periodicals, he lent the aid of his pencil to the works of popular authors.

Born at Paris, 1801; died 1866.

GAVARNIE, ga-var'-ne, a hamlet of France, in the department Hautes-Pyrenees, 35 miles from Tarbes. It stands upwards of 4,300 feet above the level of the sea, on a small stream, which rushes over a height of 11,500 feet, and forms the Fall of Gavarnie.

GAVAZZI, ALESSANDRO, ga-vat'-ze, a popular Italian preacher and reformer. He became a member of the Barnabite order of monks at the age of sixteen; was afterwards appointed professor of rhetoric at Naples, and acquired a great reputation as an orator. On the accession of Pius IX. he supported the liberal policy with which the pontiff's reign was inaugurated, and received the papal sanction in his endeavours for the political enlightenment of the population of Rome. He was appointed almoner of a body of 16,000 men who volunteered for the campaign of Lombardy in 1848, and exercised an immense influence over the populace. When the Roman legion was recalled, Gavazzi continued in Florence, Genoa, and Bologna, to agitate in favour of the national movement, and on the establishment of the republic at Rome, was appointed almoner-in-chief to the army, superintended the organisation of military hospitals and the volunteers who undertook the care of the wounded. On the fall of Rome he escaped to England, and delivered numerous lectures and addresses to illustrate the political and religious aims of his country. He afterwards visited the chief towns in Scotland for the same purpose, and subsequently the United States and Canada. In this latter country his appearance nearly caused a riot. He was present with Garibaldi at Palermo in the expedition of 1860. Returned to London in 1870, since which time he has been engaged chiefly in lecturing.

Born at Bologna, 1809.

GAVESTON, PIERS, gaiv'-ston, a favourite of Edward II., whose pride and prodigality raised the ire of the English nobility. The king was forced to send him into exile, but recalled him. He was at length beheaded.

Died 1312.

GAWLER, gaw'-ler, a town of South Australia, 25 miles N. of Adelaide. There are numerous places of worship, banks, insurance offices, and hotels. Silver, copper, and lead, have been found in the neighbouring range. Pop. 1,800.

GAY, JOHN, gai, an English poet, who received his education under a Mr. Luck, a man of wit and a poet, in the town of Barnstaple. He was afterwards apprenticed to a silk mercer in London, but disliking the occupation in a few years, he bought the remainder of his time. His first poem, entitled "Rural Sports," appeared in 1711, was dedicated to Mr. Pope, and gained him the friendship of that poet, which lasted till death. In the following year he was appointed secretary to the duchess of Monmouth, and, two years later, produced "The Fair," a poem. About the same time he printed his mock heroic, entitled "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London," in the composition of which he was assisted by Swift. In 1714 appeared his "Shepherd's Week," a series of pastorals, intended to ridicule Phillips, but which possess more merit as a genuine picture of rustic life than as a satire. The same year he became secretary to the earl of Clarendon, on his embassy to Hanover. On the death of Queen Anne, he returned to England, but his expectations of preferment from the new court were doomed to disappointment. In 1720 he published his poems by subscription, which produced him £1,000; but embarking in the famous South-Sea bubble, he lost the whole, and was reduced to such a state of despondency as to prove nearly fatal to his health. He next produced the tragedy of the "Captive," which met with a favourable reception, and occasioned his being employed by the princess of Wales to write his fables for the young duke of Cumberland. In 1727 appeared his "Beggar's Opera," which had a success, considered by many, infinitely beyond what it deserved both in a dramatic and moral point of view. It ran for sixty-three nights, and threw the author and his friends into ecstacies. Though it was a favourite with the town, however, it was not so at court; and when he produced his sequel to it, under the title of "Polly," it was prohibited by the lord chamberlain. Gay, however, was no loser by it; on the contrary, by its publication he put into his pocket about £1,200, and was adopted as a member of the family of the duke and duchess of Queensberry. He was interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory by his patrons, with an epitaph written by Pope.

Born at Barnstaple in 1687; died 1732.

GAYA, or GYA, gaï'ya, a town of British India, the capital of the province of Behar, Bengal presidency, on the Phalga, an affluent of the Ganges. It consists of an old and new town, the latter inhabited by Europeans. The old town is a place of great sanctity, and is inhabilted by many Brahmins. About 100,000 pilgrims visit the place annually. Pop. 67,000.

GAYA ISLANDS, two islands of the Indian Archipelago, one off the N.E. coast, the other off the N.W. coast of Borneo.

GAYANGOS, PASCUAL DE, ga-yan'-gos, a distinguished modern Spaniard, who early began to devote himself to the study of Oriental literature, and with a view to realize a complete acquaintance with the mediæval history of his country, applied himself ardently to the Arabic. During a visit to Algiers, he married an English lady, a circumstance which, doubtless, led him to make himself acquainted with the English language, in which the most important of his works was published. In 1834 he became a contributor to the "Westminster Review," and subsequently to the "Edinburgh" and other reviews. He also lent his aid to the "Penny Cyclopædia," and wrote some of the articles for the "Biographical Dictionary" of the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge Society. For several years he resided in England, and there published his "History of the Mahometan Dynasties in Spain," &c., which was a translation from a native work from copies in the British Museum. On his leaving England, he proceeded to Spain, where he became professor of Arabic at the Athenæum of Madrid.

Born 1809.

GAY-LUSSAC, NICHOLAS FRANÇOIS, gaï-loos'-sak, a celebrated French philosopher, who studied at the Polytechnic school at Paris, and having distinguished himself by his researches into the nature of gases and vapours, in conjunction with M. Biot, ascended in a balloon, lent by the government of France for the purpose, to the height of 13,000 feet above the Seine, and ascertained that the influence of terrestrial magnetism there is nearly as great as it is on the earth; that the electricity of the atmosphere increased as they rose, and was always negative; that the hygrometer discovered increased dryness, and that the thermometer sank from 64° Fahrenheit on the earth, to 51°. He made another ascent alone, and attained an elevation of 4½ miles, where he had great difficulty in breathing, and the thermometer fell to 20° Fahrenheit. After sailing six hours through the atmosphere, he descended at a village 20 miles from Rouen. The result of this aërial flight was the discovery that air obtained at the highest point, was composed of the same elements as that found on the surface of the earth. These experiments brought Gay-Lussac greatly into notice, and he rose both in fame and position. In a joint memoir presented to the Academy of Sciences in 1804, he and Humboldt announced the important discovery that oxygen and hdyrogen when combined to form water, unite in the proportion of 100 parts by bulk of the former to 200 parts of the latter. Following up the suggestions of this fact, Gay-Lussac was led to the further discovery of the law of volumes, which was announced in 1808. By direction of the emperor Napoleon he next turned his attention, in conjunction with Thénard to the line of chemical research initiated by Sir Humphrey Davy's discovery of potassium and sodium by the decomposing action of the volcanic pile, and in 1811 the results of their labours were published under the title of "Recherches Physiochemique" including amongst other matters the discovery of boron, which, however, had been simultaneously discovered by Davy. In 1805 he became a member of the committee of arts and sciences; received the appointment to superintend the government manufacture of gunpowder and saltpetre in 1818; and was made chief assayer of the mint in 1829. In 1831 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and, in 1839, was made a peer of France. He was, in conjunction with Arago, for many years the editor of the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique."

Born at St. Leonards, Haute Vienne, 1778; died at Paris, 1850.

GAZA, gaï'-za, an ancient town of Syria, 50 miles S.W. of Jerusalem, and on the right bank of a river of the same name. It is an entrepôt for the caravans passing between Syria and Egypt. Manf. Cotton fabrics and soap. This place is early mentioned in Scripture, and was one of the chief cities of the Philistines. Pop. 15,000, chiefly Mahometan.

GAZA, THEODORUS, a Greek grammarian, who, when his native place was taken by the Turks, in 1430, escaped to Italy, where he studied the Latin language with so much assiduity, that he became an elegant writer and speaker of it. He was, for several years, a professor at Ferrara, and became rector of that university. Thence he went to Rome, under the patronage of Pope Nicholas V. and Cardinal Bessarion. He wrote a Greek grammar, a treatise on the Grecian months; translated Aristotle on Animals, Hippocrates' Aphorism, and other works into Latin; and some of Cicero's into Greek.

Born at Thessalonica, about 1400; died in Calabria, 1478.

GÉANT, zhaï'-an(g), one of the chief summits of the Pennine Alps, Savoy, 5 miles N. of Mont Blanc, attains an elevation of 13,100 feet above the level of the sea. The Col, or pass, du Géant is upwards of 11,100 feet.

GEAUGA, je-aü'-ga, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 14,000. The capital is Chardon.

GEBESEE, gaib'-e-see, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Geva, 11 miles N.W. of Erfurt. There are a castle and two churches. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,200.

GEBHARDSDORF, or GEPPERSDORF, gaib'-hards-dorf, a small town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 10 miles S.E. of Lauban. There is a castle, and four fairs are held annually. Pop. 2,700.

GEBIR, ABU-MUSSAH JAAFER AL SOFI, an Arabian physician, and alchemist of great reputation. He has been called "one of the twelve sublimest geniuses of the world." A considerable number of his treatises are still extant, and many of his unpublished MSS. are in the library of Leyden.

Died 776.

GEBY, gé'-be, an island of the Indian Archipelago, about 20 miles long, directly under the equator. Lon. 129° 19' E.

GED, WILLIAM, ged, a goldsmith of Edinburgh, who, in 1725, endeavoured to introduce a method of printing with blocks and plates, now known as stereotype plates. He entered into an engagement with the university of Cambridge, to print Bibles and Prayer-books by this means; but the project failed. On his return to Scotland, however, he printed an edition of Sallust with his plates. The plan was subsequently successfully adopted by M. Didot of Paris, and is now in universal use amongst printers in England.

Born 1690; died 1749.

GEDDES, ALEXANDER, ged'-dez, a Roman Catholic divine, who was educated at an obscure school in the Highlands of Scotland, and, in 1758, removed to the Scottish college at Paris. In 1764 he returned to his native country, and officiated to a congregation in the county of Angus, but the year following, became chaplain in the family of the earl of Traquair. In 1769 he undertook the charge of a congregation at Auchinhalrig, in Banffshire; and, after various changes, went to London, where, in 1788, he published proposals for a new translation of the Bible. In 1790 he gave a general answer to the queries, counsels, and criticisms communicated to him since the publication of his proposals. In this undertaking he was liberally supported by Lord Petre. The first volume of this work appeared in 1792, and the second, which carried the translation to the end of the historical books, was published in 1793. In 1800 he issued a third volume, containing his "Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures." The opinions expressed by Geddes in these volumes were what is now known as "rationalistic," and they brought upon him the charge of infidelity. His criticisms were described as "less scurrilous perhaps, but not less impious than those of Thomas Paine." And whatever merits his work possessed was obscured and lost sight of in the controversy thus evoked, and he was suspended from his ecclesiastical functions. He also published an "Apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain."

Born in Ruthven, Banffshire, 1737; died 1802.

GEDDES, JANET, a well known name in connection with the attempt to introduce Archbishop Laud's service book into the Church of Scotland in 1637. On Sunday, July 23rd, in that year, which was the day fixed for the innovation, on the dean of Edinburgh beginning to read the service in the presence of a crowd which filled the high church, "Jenny Geddes" flung a stool at his head, bawling out as she did so, "Villain! dost thou say mass at my lug (ear)?" This was the commencement of great confusion and uproar; the authorities were unable to quell the tumult—the dean fled to save his life, and the disturbance became so serious that the attempt to introduce a liturgy was abandoned. A stool, said to be that of "Jenny Geddes," is preserved in the Museum of Antiquaries in Edinburgh, but its authenticity is very doubtful. It has even been doubted whether such a person as Jenny Geddes ever existed, and the exploit said to have been performed by her has been attributed to Barbara Hamilton, wife of John Mein, merchant and postmaster of Edinburgh.

GEDUMA, ge-doo'-ma, a state of Western Africa, on the N. frontier of Senegambia.

GEEFS, WILLIAM, geefs, a distinguished modern Belgian sculptor, who studied at Paris, and in 1830 exhibited his first work, entitled "A Young Herdsman of the Early Christian Times strewing Flowers on a Tomb." The performance gave high promise, and he did not disappoint the expectations which had been formed of his genius. He obtained commissions from the Belgian government for several monuments to those who fell in the struggle for Belgian independence, and, by his admirable execution of the works intrusted to him added to his fame. These are his greatest performances; but he has employed his chisel in a poetical path, and executed a "Group of Sleeping Children," purchased by Queen Victoria; the "Infant St. John;" "Melancholy:" "The Lion in Love," which was greatly admired in the Great Exhibition of 1851; "Paul and Virginia," and several other works.

Born at Antwerp, 1805; died 1860.

GEEL, JAKOB, geel, a distinguished Dutch scholar, head librarian and honorary professor at Leyden. Author of numerous works written in prose, and pleasing Latin and various other treatises and translations in the Dutch language.

Born 1789.

GEELONG, je-long', a township of county Grant, in the colony of Victoria, South Australia, 45 miles S.W. from Melbourne. It is built on the harbour of Corio, on grounds sloping to the bay on the N. side, and to the Barwon river on the S. Geelong contains numerous large buildings, a town-hall, hospital and benevolent asylum, mechanics' institute, post-office, banks, churches, chapels, synagogue, &c. There is an extensive and well laid out botanical garden, besides two parks attached to the town. A "bar," which formerly existed at the entrance to Corio bay, has been removed at a cost of £60,000, an improvement which enables ships of the largest tonnage to load and unload alongside the four jetties which have been constructed. The first woollen mill established in Victoria was erected in Geelong, and received the government award of £1,500. At present four mills are in operation; all manufacture excellent tweeds, and two of them shawls and blankets also to a limited extent. From the local meat-preserving establishment on the banks of the Barwon, considerable quantities of meat are shipped to this country. One of the largest tanneries in the colony is carried on in the neighbourhood, and there are several wool-scouring establishments. The country surrounding is essentially agricultural, and is taken up by famous vineyards and orchards. The Barrabool hills are situated on the left bank of the Barwon, and there are extensive limestone quarries on the E. boundary of the town. Pop. 23,200.

GEER, CHARLES DE, geer, a celebrated Swedish naturalist, who studied at Utrecht and Upsal, at the latter place having Linnæus for his master. Possessing a share in the iron-mines at Dannemora, he improved these works by the application of new machinery. He also invented an apparatus for drying corn by the heat of the smelting-houses; and, gaining great wealth, applied it to the noblest purposes of charity, religion, and education. His principal work was "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes," 7 vols.

Born 1720; died at Stockholm, 1778.

GEERTRUIDENBERG, geer-trui'-den-berg, commonly known as Den Berg, a town of Holland, province of North Brabant, at the junction of the Donge and Biebosch. There is a large haven, and the fortifications were restored in 1833. Wool-dressing, tanning, and fishing, are carried on. Pop. 1,700.

GEFLE, or GIAWLE, yef'-le, a seaport of Sweden, on the Gulf of Bothnia, about 100 miles N.W. of Stockholm. The river Gefle flows through the middle of the town, and forms a good harbour. The chief public buildings are a government-house, council-house, school, and hospitals. Manf. Sail-cloth, linen and woollen fabrics, leather, tobacco, and sugar. It has, besides, shipbuilding-yards, tan-works, and sugar-refineries. Pop. 20,175.

GEFLEBORG, yef'-le-borg, a län or county of Sweden, having the Gulf of Bothnia on the E. It is mountainous in the W., and covered with numerous lakes. The rivers are the Dal-elf, Liusne, and Wroxna. Area, 7,560 square miles. Pop. 187,931. Lat. between 60° and 62° 20′ N. Lon. between 15° and 17° 30′ E.

GEHAZI, ge-hai'-zi, "valley," or "sight," a servant of the prophet Elisha; perhaps, also, of Elijah. He became unfaithful.

GEIBEL, EMANUEL, gi'-bel, a popular German poet, author of numerous translations and original poems. Was appointed professor of æsthetics in the university of Munich in 1852, and retained the office until 1868, when he retired to Lubeck. In 1857 he published his tragedy of "Brunchilda," in 1864 "Gedichte und Gedenkblaeter," and in 1868 a tragedy called "Sophonisba"; in 1871 his "Gedichte" reached the 69th edition. His poems are said to be distinguished "by fervour and truth of feeling, richness of fancy, and a certain pensive melancholy," and have "procured him a popularity —especially among cultivated women—such as no poet has enjoyed since the days of Uhland."

Born 1815.

GEIJER, ABRAHAM, gi'-ya, a Jewish rabbi in Breslau. While pursuing his studies at Bonn, he gained a prize for an essay on the Jewish sources of the Koran; in 1835 he joined several able men in editing a magazine of Jewish theology. His opinions brought him into collision with the more conservative Jews, especially after 1838, when he became assessor of the rabbinate at Breslau, though he retained the attachment of the great majority of the educated members of his persuasion. He was vice-president of the second, and president of the third assemblies of rabbis held since 1844 at Brunswick, Frankfort, and Breslau. Was the author of some important contributions to Jewish literature.

Born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in 1810; died 1874.

GEIJER, ERIK GUSTAF, yi'-jer, a Swedish historian, who, for many years, was the principal ornament of the University of Upsal. In 1810 he visited England with strong prejudices against the people of that country; but, in a letter printed in 1855, he says:—"I came to England with strong prejudices against the people . . . . but there is no honester man in the world than the selfish, industrious Englishman, from the merchant to the day-labourer." He edited several periodicals, in one of which, the "Iduna," appeared his poems of "The Viking" and "The Last Champion," which still hold their place among the best selections of Swedish poetry. In 1817 he became professor of history at the university of Upsal, which situation he held till 1846, when he resigned it. The most important work of Geijer is his "History of the Swedish Nation," which has been translated into English.

Born in the province of Vermeland, 1783; died at Stockholm, 1847.

GEILER, VON KAISERBERG JOHANN, a celebrated German pulpit orator of the fifteenth century, studied at Freiburg and Basel, and became preacher in the Cathedral of Strasburg in 1478.

Born 1455; died 1510.

GEISENHEIM, gi'-en-him, a small town of Prussia, province of Hesse-Nassau, beautifully situated on the Rochenberg, 11 miles S. of Wiesbaden. There is a very fine old Gothic church. A considerable trade in wine is carried on. Pop. 2,700.

GEISLENGEN, gi'-len-gen, an old town of Wurtemberg, circle of Donau, in a narrow valley on the Rohrbach, 16 miles N.W. of Ulm. Manf. Paper, copper, iron, and turnery. The corn markets are important. Pop. 2,300.

GEISPALSHEIM, or GEISPITZEN, gi'-pals-hime, a town of Prussia, in Alsace, 7 miles S.W. of Strasburg. Manf. Ribbon, starch, tobacco, and tiles. Pop. 2,200.

GEITHAN, or GEITEN, gi'-han, an old town of Saxony, 27 miles S. of Leipsic, on a lake, at the source of the Eyla. There is a handsome church. Manf. Woollen cloth, tiles, and lime. There is a trade in cattle and fruit, and three annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,500.

GELA, ge'-la, a town on the river of the same name, in the southern part of Sicily, about 10 miles from the sea, built by a Cretan colony, 713 years B.C. The inhabitants were called Gelenses, Geloi, and Gelani.

GELASIUS I., Pope, je-lai'-se-us, succeeded Felix III. in 492. He had an acrimonious contest with the patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned the practice of communicating only with bread, as was the custom of the Manichean sect, and made it imperative on the laity to use both bread and wine in the Lord's Supper.

Died 496.

GELASIUS II. succeeded Pascal II. as pope in 1118. Cencio, marquis di Frangipani, consul of Rome, aided by the Emperor Henry V., drove him from Rome, and Maurice Bourdin, as Gregory VIII., was elected in his stead. Gelasius, after an unsuccessful attempt to regain the pontificate, retired to France, and died in the abbey of Cluny.

Born 1050; Died 1119.

GELDERLAND, or GUELDERLAND, gel'-der-land, a province of the Netherlands, bounded on its respective frontier lines by Overyssel, Westphalia, North Brabant, Holland, and Utrecht. It is in general level, but not so flat as the maritime part of the Netherlands. There are extensive sandy tracts in the north-west, towards the Zuyder-Zee, and in the north-east districts covered with heath.

Rivers.—The Rhine, the Waal, the Yssel, the Leck, and the Maese. It has also several large canals.

Pro.—Along the banks of the rivers, corn, hops, and tobacco are grown, and large quantities of fruit for exportation; but the principal crops are wheat, rye, buckwheat, and potatoes. Many cattle are reared, and some of the waste lands have been planted with the oak and the pine.

Manf.—Linens, woollens, cottons, glass, paper, leather, soap, and salt. Distilling and brewing are largely carried on.

Area.—1,948 square miles.

Pop.—490,905.

Administrative Divisions.—There are 4 arrondissements, and 22 cantons.

Chief Towns.—ARNHEIM, the capital, NIMEGUEN, and ZUTPHEN.

GELDERN, gall'-dern, a town of Prussia, in the Rhine province of Dusseldorf, at the confluence of the Niers and Blente. Manf. Cotton and linen goods, ribbons, hosiery, hats, leather, and soap. Four annual fairs are held. From the 11th to the 14th centuries, this town was the residence of the sovereigns of Guelders. The fortifications were destroyed in 1764. Pop. 4,000.

GELENAU, gail'-a-no, a town of Saxony, in the district of Zwickau. There are a handsome church and an old castle. Manf. Lace. Flax is extensively cultivated in the vicinity. Pop. 4,800.

GELL, SIR WILLIAM, antiquary and classical scholar, graduated at Cambridge, and was for some time a fellow of Emanuel College, in that university. Was appointed one of the chamberlains to Caroline, princess of Wales, consort of George IV., on her departure to the continent, in 1814, and in that capacity attended her in various parts of Italy, but soon resigned his situation in consequence of illness. Was one of the witnesses in the proceedings against her majesty after she had become queen and returned to England. Published "The Topography of Troy," in 1804; "The Geography and Antiquities of Ithaca," in 1808; "An Itinerary of Greece," in 1810; "Itinerary of the Morea," in 1817; "Attica," in 1817. In the same year he published, in conjunction with Mr. Gandy, the first series of "Pompeiiana, or Observations upon the Topography, Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii;" a second series of which appeared in 1832; he also wrote "A Narrative of a Journey in the Morea," "The Topography of Rome and its Vicinity," and "Rome and its Environs."

Born at Hopton, Derby, in 1777; died at Naples, 1836.

GELLERT, CHRISTIAN FURCHTEGOTT, gel'-lert, a German divine and poet, who supported himself for many years as tutor in private families; but afterwards became professor of philosophy at Leipsic. He is best known by his fables and tales, which are very pleasing.

Born at Haynichen, Misnia, 1715; Died 1769.

GELLIUS, AULUS, jel'-le-us, a Roman grammarian, who published a work which he called "Noctes Atticæ," because composed at Athens during the winter nights. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, abounds with many grammatical remarks, and contains many extracts from the works of Latin and Greek authors no longer known.

Lived in the 2nd century.

GELNHAUSEN, gailn'-hou-sen, an ancient town of Prussia, in the province of Hesse-Nassau, on the right bank of the Kenzig, built on a hillside and surrounded by old walls. There are a fine Gothic church, with a twisted spire and cupola, dating from the 13th century; another church, in the round-arched style; the remains of the palace in which the emperor Barbarossa resided; and an old castle on an island in the river. Manf. Paper, tobacco, leather, chocolate, brandy, and liqueurs. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,500.

GELO, or GELON, ge'-lo, a son of Dinomenes who made himself absolute at Syracuse. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and became very popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

GELVES, hel'-ves, a town of Spain, province of Seville, on a hill above the right bank of the Quadalquiver, 4 miles S.W. of Seville. There is a palace belonging to the Duke of Berwick and Alba. Pop. 3,700.

GEMARKE, gai'-mar-ke, a town of Prussia, on the Rhine, province of Dusseldorf, on the right bank of the Wupper. It is properly a part of BARMEN.

GEMBLOUX, zhaim'-bloor, a town of Belgium, on an affluent of the Sambre, 10 miles N.W. of Namur. Manf. Cutlery, hardware goods, and leather. Pop. 2,500.—Here in 1794 the French gained a victory over the Austrians.

GEMELLI CARRERI, FRANCIS, jai-mail'-le-kar-rair-e, an Italian traveller, who, from 1680 to 1698, made long and difficult voyages to all parts of the world. He visited Europe, Asia, and Africa, advancing as far as the great wall of China, and travelled through Mexico. In 1699 he published an account of his travels, under the title of "Giro del Mondo," a 'Tour of the world.'

Born at Naples, 1651; died 1725.

GEMINUS, jem'-i-nus, an astronomer and mathematician of Rhodes.

Lived in 1st century B.C.

GEMISHKANA, ge-mish-ka'-na, a town of Turkey, in Asia, on the left bank of the Kharshoot, 45 miles S. of Trebizond. There are silver and copper mines in the vicinity.

GEMISTUS GIORGIOS, surnamed Plethon, the last of the Byzantine authors, flourished in the last part of the fourteenth and the first part of the fifteenth centuries. He was one of the deputies sent by the Greek church to the council held in Florence 1438, for the purpose of effecting a union between the Latin and Greek churches. Disgusted with the philosophy of the schools of his day, he devoted himself to the propagation of that of Plato, and founded a school of Platonic philosophy, which continued to flourish for nearly a century. Gemistus wrote a great number of theological, historical, and philosophical works.

Born 1590.

GEMMA, REINIER, commonly called FRISIUS, gem'-ma, a Dutch physician and mathematician, who became medical professor at Louvain. He wrote a number of works on mathematics, geometry, and medicine.

Born at Dockum, Friesland, 1508; died at Louvain, 1555.

GEMMI, zhem'-me, a mountain pass across the Bernese Alps, Switzerland, between the cantons Vallais and Berne, about 25 miles from Thun. It is 7,160 feet above the level of the sea.

GEMONA, gai'-mo-na, a fortified town of Italy, province of Udine, near the left bank of the Tagliamento, 14 miles N.W. of Udine. Two annual fairs are well frequented. Pop. 6,700.

GENAPPE, zhe-nap', a village of Belgium, on the bank of the Dyle, 18 miles S. of Brussels. Pop. 1,800. Here, in 1815, before and after Waterloo, several military actions took place between the French and the allied forces.

GENAZENO, jai'-na-zai'-no, a town of Italy, 24 miles S.E. of Rome. It is picturesquely situated, and contains the famous chapel and shrine of Madonna di Buon Consiglio. Pop. 2,400.

GENESEE, jen-e-se', a river which rises in Pennsylvania, U.S., and after a course of 150 miles falls into Lake Ontario. There are five remarkable falls.

GENESEE, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 39,220. Flint is the capital.

GENESEE, a county of New York, United States. Area, 473 square miles. Pop. 32,806. The capital is Batavia.

GENEVA, je-ne'-va, a canton of Switzerland, and the smallest in the confederation, bounded on the N. and N.W. by France, W. by the canton Vaud and the lake of Geneva, and E. and S. by Italy. The surface does not in any part rise more than 400 feet above the level of the lake. It is highly cultivated, and noted for the great rarity and beauty of the flowers grown. Manf. Clocks and watches, metal ware, woollens and silks, hats, and leather. Area, 109 square miles. Pop. 101,595.—The canton was admitted to the Swiss Confederation in 1814.

GENEVA, a town of Switzerland, and the capital of the above canton, at the western extremity of the lake of the same name, at the point of issue of the Rhone, which is crossed by several bridges, one of them a handsome stone structure, erected in 1861. The town stands on both banks of the river, which forms two small islands, on one of which are some antique buildings, and the other is laid out as a pleasure ground. On the left bank of the river is a public promenade, laid out with flower-beds. The upper town is the most attractive, not only commanding magnificent views, but containing a number of elegant houses. The public buildings are the town-hall, arsenal, university, founded in 1368; college, founded by Calvin; hospital, theatre, Rath museum, and cathedral of St. Pierre, dating from the 12th century, and containing several monuments of persons of historical note, and an English church. A monument, a strange compound of a Gothic cross and an equestrian statue has been erected to the memory of the late Duke of Brunswick. A new theatre in the Place Neuve, was opened in October, 1878. Nothing can be more agreeable than the environs of Geneva. At a little distance to the west is Ferney, where Voltaire resided.

Manf.—Watches, musical boxes, and jewellery.

Pop.—68,320.

History.—Geneva is very ancient, and was well known in the time of the Romans, Julius Cæsar having made use of it as a bulwark against the Helvetians. It was formerly the see of a bishop; but when Calvinism was embraced here, in 1553, on the invasion of the French, the bishop was expelled. In 1794, a revolution took place in the city and state of Geneva; and in 1798 it was taken by the French, and, till 1813, it was the capital of the department Leman, in the French empire, under Napoleon I. In 1814 it joined the Helvetic Confederation. It was the birthplace of Beza, Calvin, Lefort, Le Sage, Sue, Neckar, and Rousseau. Here John Knox, the Scotch reformer, long resided, and, from time to time, it has been the adopted place of residence of many learned men.

GENEVA, LAKE OF, or LAKE LEMAN, a celebrated lake of Switzerland, extending in the form of a crescent between that country and Savoy, and occupying part of the great valley which separates the Alps from the Jura ridge. It is in the form of a crescent, measuring 50 miles on the northern shore and 40 on the southern, about 6 miles wide in the centre, and greatest depth 900 feet. It is subject to a sudden rise and fall, sometimes of 5 feet, but ordinarily less, and lasting about half an hour. It is traversed by the Rhone, and is remarkable for the blue transparency of its waters. Byron calls it "clear placid Leman." The shore is lower on the southern side, rising into gentle slopes covered with vineyards. On the northern side there are lofty precipices, and the shore is generally rocky. In 1823 steam navigation was introduced upon its waters.

GENEVA, a town in Seneca, Ontario county, New York, United States, on the N.W. side of Seneca Lake, 50 miles from Rochester. It has a considerable trade. Pop. 5,500.

GENEVA, a county of Alabama, United States. Pop. 4,342.

GENEVOIS, or GENEVESE, zhen'-e-vais, a district of France, department Haute-Savoie, formerly a portion of the Sardinian States. It is traversed by branches of the Pennine-Alps, and watered chiefly by mountain torrents. In the centre is Lake Annecy. About four-fifths of the surface is under cultivation. The chief town is ANNECY. Pop. 80,000.

GENEVIEVE, a saint of the Roman Catholic Church, and patroness of the city of Paris, near which city she was born. At an early age she devoted herself to a life of virginity and conventual seclusion, was remarkable for active charity, and acquired an extraordinary reputation for sanctity. During the Frank invasion, under Childeric, she and her sisters in religion successfully conveyed to Paris an abundant supply of provisions, and the city when taken received specially lenient treatment through her intercession. Subsequently, when news arrived of the march on Paris by Attila and his army, and it was in consequence proposed to abandon the city, Genevieve assembled the matrons and consecrated virgins in one of the churches, and exhorted them by prayer and fasting to avert the impending calamity. Attila's march was unexpectedly altered, and this being regarded as a consequence of her prayers, added to her reputation. She died at the age of 89, retaining the love and reverence of the people to the end. A religious congregation of priests, under her name and patronage, was founded in the 12th century, and continued till the Revolution. The "Sisters of Saint Genevieve," a religious congregation of women, devoted to the education of young females and the care of the sick, was established in 1636.

Born in 422; died in 512.

GENEVRE MONT, zhe-naver', a summit of the Cottian Alps, 4 miles N.E. of Boriancon, 12,100 feet high. It is crossed by a road constructed by Napoleon I., at an elevation of nearly 6,600 feet.

GENGENBACH, gain'-gan-bak, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, on the right bank of the Konzig, 12 miles S.E. of Strasburg. The old part of the town is surrounded by walls, and there are four suburbs. Two fairs are held annually. Manf. Paper and leather. Pop. 2,400.

GENGIS KHAN, or ZINGIS, jen'-gis khan, the son of a petty Mongolian prince, who, after some years of desultory warfare with various Tartar tribes, in 1205 invaded the Chinese empire, and took its capital by storm. In 1218 he again invaded the empire, and by the success of his arms took the cities of Samarcand and Bokhara, which he pillaged and burned, and destroyed upwards of 200,000 individuals. Continuing his career of savage devastation for several years, in 1225 he went against the sovereign of Tangut, with whose armies he fought on a plain of ice, formed by a frozen lake, defeated him, and slew 300,000 of his men. Conquering wherever he went, he extended his territory until it not only comprised within its boundaries Northern China, but Eastern Persia, and the whole of Tartary. In achieving the conquest of these "barren acres," it is computed that this warrior destroyed upwards of 5,000,000 of the human race.

Born in Tartary, 1155; died 1227.

GENIL, or XENIL, zhai'-neel, a river of Andalusia, Spain, which, after a course of 130 miles, joins the Guadalquiver, 30 miles below Cordova. The city of Granada is on its banks.

GENIS, ST., zhen'-e a town of France, department Rhone, 4 miles S.W. of Lyons. Manf. Stained paper, buttons, rugs, and tapestry. A trade in wine grown in the district is carried on; coal is worked in the vicinity, and there are three great cattle fairs. Pop. 2,800.

GENLIS, STÉPHANE FÉLICITÉ, Countess de, celebrated for her literary talents, became, at four years of age, a canoness in the noble chapter of Aix. From this time she was called la Comtesse de Lauz. At the age of 15, a letter which she had written accidentally came into the hands of Count de Genlis, who was so charmed with the beauty of its composition, that he made her an offer of his hand and fortune, which she accepted. Through this union she became niece to Madame de Montesson, who was privately married to the duke of Orleans, and whose son, the duke of Chartres, in 1782, chose her to superintend the education of his children. About this period she produced "Adela and Theodore," "The Evenings of the Castle," "Annals of Virtue," and "The Theatre of Education," all of which were well received. In 1791 she paid a visit to England with her pupil, Mademoiselle d'Orléans, and, on their return to France, were ordered immediately to quit the territory, After a short time they went to Switzerland; but, driven from there, they at length found an asylum in the convent of St. Clair. In 1800 she returned to her native country, and, in 1805, Napoleon I. gave her apartments in the arsenal at Paris, with a pension. On the fall of the empire and the return of the Bourbons, her affection for her former friends returned; and when Louis Philippe ascended the throne, every attention was paid to her wants and comforts. She employed herself almost continually writing, and her works are very numerous, embracing nearly every style of literature.

Born near Autun 1746; died 1830.

GENNARO, JOSEF AURELIUS, jen-na'-ro, an eminent Neapolitan lawyer, who, after practising at the bar, became the chief magistrate of his native city. He wrote on legal subjects, and his works are remarkable for their purity of style and depth of erudition. His principal production is "Respublica Jurisconsultorum," which ingeniously teaches, in the form of a novel, the dry and intricate system of civil law.—Genaro was one of the commission appointed by the minister Tanucci to prepare a uniform code, called the "Carolin Code," for the whole kingdom.

Born at Naples, 1701; died 1761.

GENNESARETH, LAKE OF. (See TIBERIAS.)

GENOVA, or GENOA, jen'-o-va, a province of Italy, at the head of the Gulf of Genoa, bounded on the N. by the provinces of Alessandria, Pavia, and Corri; N.E. by the provinces of Piacenza, Parma, and Massa Canara, and W. by the province of Porto Maurizio. It is about 130 miles in length and 50 in breadth, and is traversed by the Apennines in a direction nearly parallel with the shore. The coast is mostly precipitous, but there are some large bays and good habours. The soil is generally poor, but on the low ground near the sea are some very fertile parts. The climate is temperate, but at times the sirocco, or hot winds, is severely felt.

Rivers.—The Vogra, Magra, Bisagro, Polcevora, and many small mountain streams, discharge into the Gulf of Genoa; the Bormida, Arba, Scrivia, Taro, and Trebbia belong to the basin of the Po.

Area.—3,000 square miles.

Pop.—777,411.

Chief Towns.—GENOA, the capital, ALBENZA, BOBBIO, CHIAVARI, LEVANTE, NOVI, and SAVONA.

GENOA, jen'-o-a, a strongly fortified maritime city, and the seat of an archbishop, in the N.W. of Italy, once a celebrated republic, now the chief commercial seaport of the Sardinian provinces. It is situate at the N. point of the Gulf of Genoa, 78 miles S.E. of Turin. The city rises gradually from the shore, in the shape of a crescent, and the houses are well built; but in the older part of the town the streets are so narrow and irregular, that, in many places, it is almost impossible to pass them in a carriage. Three streets, however, the Strada Balbi, the Strada Nuova, and the Strada Nuovissima, form striking exceptions: they are regular, spacious, and the more impressive to a stranger, from following each other in succession. It is in these streets that are to be found the palaces of the great families; buildings which display the attractions, not only of architecture, but of painting and sculpture. The most remarkable public edifices are the Palazzo della Signora, the ancient residence of the doge; and the palaces Doria-Pamfili, Brignole, Durazzo, Spinola, Serra, Balbi, Pallavicini, which contain numerous specimens of art. There are many magnificent churches, among which the Duomo, or cathedral of St. Lorenzo, built in the early part of the 12th century, is conspicuous. The elegant church of Carignano was built at the expense of a citizen of the name of Sauli; his grandson erected a monument of equal magnificence, and the bridge of the same name, which is of great height, connecting two hills, and forming one of the favourite resorts of the Genoese. Other churches of great beauty and interest are those of St. Stefano della Porta, San Siro, St. Ambrosia, and L'Annunciata, all containing valuable paintings and fine monuments. There are several theatres, numerous convents, a university, with a botanic garden and museum; and the great hospital for the sick and infirm, and the Albergo dei Poveri, or poor-house, are magnificent buildings. Besides these there are fifteen female asylums, an exchange, and the bank of St. George. A handsome public monument to the memory of Columbus, who was a native of Genoa, has recently been erected here. There is railway communication with Turin, Arona, Alessandria, Nice, &c. A new line of railway is in progress to Parma and Modena. The harbour of Genoa is in the form of a semicircle, with a diameter of about three quarters of a mile. It is inclosed by two strong moles, the opening between which is 350 fathoms in width; but the entrance is difficult. There is a lighthouse 300 feet high.

Manf.—Velvets, silks, damasks, gloves, jewellery in silver and coral, paper, soap, &c. The city possesses a number of ingenious workmen in articles of jewellery and coral, vases and cups. Genoa exports the products of the adjacent country, such as rice and fruit, and, in particular, olive oil, to a great annual value.

Lat. 44° 24′ N. Lon. 8° 54′ E.

History.—From the 11th to the 18th century, Genoa was the capital of a flourishing commercial republic, and planted colonies on the shores of the Black Sea, as well as in the Levant. It was bombarded by the French in 1684, and submitted to the Hungarians in 1746; but a citizen being abused by an Austrian officer, the inhabitants rose and massacred most of the soldiery, and drove away the remainder. The republic, in 1798, assumed the French form of government, with the title of Ligurian republic, which was confirmed by the treaty of Luneville, but not by that of Amiens. In 1815 it was ceded to the king of Sardinia, and in 1859 the French troops landed here on their route to oppose the Austrian army, which had invaded Sardinia. It is now a part of the kingdom of Italy, and exhibits many signs of improvement.

GENOA, GULF OF, N. shore of the Mediterranean, N. of Corsica, 90 miles across and 30 miles inland. The town of Oneglia is situated at the entrance of the W., and Spezia occupies a similar position on the E.

GENOA, a town in Cayuga county, New York, United States, on the Cayuga Lake, 25 miles from Auburn. Pop. 2,700.

GENOVESI, ANTHONY, jen'-o-ve-se, an Italian philosopher, who, for some time, read lectures in philosophy at Naples, with great reputation. He was attacked, however, by numerous enemies, for publishing his "Metaphysics," in which he expressed his admiration of the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. Galliani, archbishop of Tarento, protected him; and Bartolomeo Intieri, a wealthy Italian, established for him a professorship of political philosophy.

Born at Castiglione, 1712; died 1769.

GENSANO, jain'-sa'-no, a town of Italy, 19 miles S.E. of Rome. The streets are wide and straight, and there is a handsome square, with an elegant fountain. The villa of the duke of Cæsarini and a Capuchin convent are on heights above the town. The town is famous for its annual festival, when the streets are strewn with flowers, and a large number of visitors are present. The beautiful little lake Nami is in the vicinity. Pop. 4,600.

GENSERIC, jen'-se-rik, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa (A.D. 429), where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation, in Africa, of the Vandal kingdom, which was composed of Numidia, Mauritania, Carthage, Corsica, Sardinia, and the Balearic Isles. In the course of his military expeditions, he invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in 455.

Born at Seville, 406; died 477.

GENTHIN, gen'-tin, a town of Prussia, in the province of Saxony, 27 miles N.E. of Magdeburg. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, and tiles. There is a good trade in cattle, and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,800.

GENTILLY. (See PARIS.)

GENTILESCHI, HORATIO, jen'-te-les'-ke, an Italian artist, who painted the ceilings in Greenwich Hospital. His daughter was also a good artist. She lived chiefly at Naples.

Born at Pisa, 1663; died in England, 1747.

GENTIUS, jen'-te-us, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassadors at the request of Perseus, king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Gentius was conquered by Anicius, and led in triumph with his family.

Lived in 2nd century B.C.

GENTRY, jen'-tre, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 770 square miles. Pop. 17,176.—Gentry Court House is the capital.

GENZANO, jain-za'-no, a town of Italy, 18 miles N.E. of Poetnza. There are several convents. Pop. 6,000.

GEOFFREY, jef'-fre, of Monmouth, a British historian, who was first archdeacon of Monmouth, and next bishop of St. Asaph, which see he resigned, and retired to the monastery of Abingdon, of which he was abbot. His principal work is his "Chronicosive Historia Britonum," which, however, is full of legendary tales respecting the early monarchs of Britain. Both Shakespere and Milton have drawn largely from this history. A metrical "Life and Prophecies of Merlin," attributed to Geoffrey, was reprinted for the Roxburgh Club in 1830.

Died about 1154.

GEOFFRIN, Madame, zhef-fran(g)', a French lady, who married, when fifteen years of age, a wealthy glass manufacturer, who, in a short time left her a widow. Endowed with the graces of person and mind, her house became the rendezvous of all the most celebrated persons of the age, and to many literary men she rendered important services. Stanislas Poniatowski, who saluted her as his mother, caused her to go to Warsaw after his accession to the Polish throne. She expended large sums of money to support the "Encyclopædia," and many acts of delicate generosity are recorded of her.

Born at Paris, 1699; died 1777.

GEOFFROY SAINT-HILAIRE, ETIENNE, jai-of'-froy-saing'-hil-yair, a celebrated French zoologist and physiologist. Destined by his family for the priesthood, Geoffroy commenced his studies at Navarre, but soon abandoning theology for natural history, became a pupil of Haüy and Daubenton. In 1792 he was appointed sub-keeper and assistant demonstrator at the Jardin des Plantes, and on the reorganisation of that establishment in the June following (1793), was nominated professor of the zoology of the vertebrate animals, and after much hesitation accepted the appointment. He was at that time twenty-one years of age. About this time three itinerant collections of animals, which had been confiscated by the police, were sent to the museum, and these formed the nucleus of the zoological collection which has since been celebrated as the richest in the world, and the success of which was due to the energy and skilful management of Geoffroy. In 1795 he became acquainted with G. Cuvier, who was then a young man living in the wilds of Normandy, devoting all his leisure time to natural history studies, and Geoffroy recognising his abilities invited him to Paris in the prophetic terms, "Come to Paris without delay; come and assume the place of a new Linnæus, and become another founder of natural history." In later days the intimate friendship then formed was broken in the heat of scientific discussion, to be afterwards resumed, however, with its orignal warmth. In 1798 Geoffroy accompanied Napoleon to Egypt as one of the scientific commission then appointed, and brought with him a valuable collection of natural history specimens on his return to France in 1801. In 1807 he was elected to the academy; visited Portugal in 1808, and was appointed to the professorship of zoology in the Faculty of Science at Paris on his return. In the latter years of his life he became blind, but continued to take an active interest in biological studies to the last. In 1830 he was engaged in a warm and memorable controversy, maintaining in opposition to Cuvier the unity of the organic plan of the animal kingdom. He was the author, in addition to numerous memoirs in scientific periodicals, of the "Philosophie Anatomique," "Principes de la Philosophie Zoologique." "Etudes Progressives d'un Naturaliste," "Notions de Philosophie Naturelle," and in conjuction with Frédéric Cuvier, of a "Histoire Naturelle des Mammifères."

Born at Etampes, 1772; died at Paris, 1844.

GEOFFROY SAINT-HILAIRE, ISIDORE, son of the above, became assistant naturalist at the museum at the age of nineteen, and in 1830 (at the age of twenty-five) delivered the zoological lectures at that institution as his father's substitute. His principal work was the "Histoire Générale et Particulière des Anomalies de l'Organisation chez l'Homme et les Animaux, ou Traité de Tératologie," the first volume of which was published in 1832, and the third and concluding volume in 1837. He also wrote a book on the "Domestication et Naturalisation des Animaux Utiles," and published in 1852 the first volume of a "Histoire Générale des Règnes Organiques," which however he did not live to finish. He was the founder of the Société pour l'Acclimatation des Animaux Utiles, in 1854; and was a strong advocate for the use of horse-flesh as human food.

Born in Paris, 1805; died 1861.

GEORGE I., LEWIS, king of Great Britain, was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, by Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and grand-daughter of James I. of England. He was created duke of Cambridge in 1706, and succeeded queen Anne in 1714. In the following year a rebellion broke out in Scotland in favour of the Pretender, which was soon suppressed, and several of its leaders forfeited their lives upon the scaffold. In 1717 a war was threatened with Charles XII. of Sweden, on account of the king of England having purchased from the Danes the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which had been taken from Sweden in 1712. The death of Charles, however, prevented this from taking place. In the previous year parliaments were made septennial. In 1720 the failure of the famous South-Sea scheme occurred, and thousands of families were ruined. This caused disturbances among the people, and the king, who was then on a visit to his Hanoverian possessions, had to be hastily recalled. In 1722 a conspiracy against the government was discovered. It had been planned for the purpose of bringing in the Pretender; and Atterbury, the bishop of Rochester, was involved in it. In 1725 war was rekindled between the king of Spain and the emperor on one side, and England, France, Prussia, and afterwards Sweden, on the other. In 1726 the siege of Gibraltar was commenced; but the dispute was soon terminated by negotiation, when George proceeded on a journey to the continent. He was on his way to his Hanoverian dominions, but had only reached Osnaburg when he was struck down with apoplexy. He was a person of plain and simple tastes, of a grave carriage in public, but sufficiently gay and familiar in his private intercourse. His marriage was unhappy, and his unfortunate queen, Sophia Dorothea, a daughter of the duke of Zell, was immured in the castle of Ahlan, in Hanover, from 1694 till 1726, when she died, on a charge never proved, and generally disbelieved, of an intrigue with Count Koningsmark. He left by her one son, George, by whom he was succeeded, and one daughter, Sophia Dorothea, who, in 1706, was married to Frederick II. of Prussia.

Born 1660; died at Osnaburg, 1727.

GEORGE II., AUGUSTUS, son of George I., married in 1705 princess Caroline, of Brandenburg-Anspach, who died in 1737. She was a woman of considerable intellectual power, and exercised a great influence over her dull and coarse husband. In 1714 he came to England with his father, and was, previous to his accession to the throne in 1727, created prince of Wales. At this period, the country was in a state of great prosperity; and peace being restored in 1729, the administration of the internal affairs of the kingdom occupied a large share of attention. In 1739, however, war was declared against Spain, when Admiral Vernon was sent with a squadron to the West Indies, where he demolished Porto Bello, but failed in his attempt on Carthagena. In 1743 the king headed his army on the continent, and gained the battle of Dettingen, to celebrate which Handel composed the famous "Dettingen Te Deum." In 1745 the Pretender's eldest son, Prince Charles-Edward Stuart, landed in the Highlands of Scotland, and was joined by several of the clans; but, after obtaining various successes, his followers were defeated by the duke of Cumberland at Culloden, in 1746. In 1748 the war was ended by a treaty of peace, concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1751 died Frederick, prince of Wales, between whom and his father there never existed any cordiality. In 1755 war broke out between England and France, which was at first very unpromising; Braddock was defeated and killed in North America, and Minorca was taken, in the Mediterranean, for which Admiral Byng, who was sent to relieve it, was shot. About this time, Mr. Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, became prime minister, and public affairs began to assume a much more promising aspect. In 1758 a treaty was entered into between England and Prussia, and the French power was nearly destroyed in the East Indies. In America, Louisburg was taken, and the capture of Quebec, where Wolfe fell, was followed by the conquest of Canada. Cape Breton had already been recovered; in the East, Clive had captured Calcutta, won the battle of Plassy, and was driving the French from every possession which they held in that quarter. The island of Guadaloupe and the settlement of Senegal were taken. Admiral Hawke defeated the French fleet under Conflans, and the British flag waved triumphant in every part of the world. In the midst of this blaze of glory, George II. died suddenly, at Kensington, by the bursting of the right ventricle of the heart He was an ignorant man, of coarse tastes, and licentious habits. His character is shown by his words at the death-bed of his wife, for whom he entertained a great respect, notwithstanding his systematic unfaithfulness. She expressed a wish that he should marry again after her death. "No," blubbered the king, "I can never do that," and then added, "I will keep mistresses." "That will make no difference," calmly replied the dying queen, with perhaps a little sarcasm. The scene is characteristic of the domestic morals of the age.

Born at Hanover, 1683; died 1760.

GEORGE III., king of Great Britain, was the grandson of George II. and the eldest son of Frederick, prince of Wales, who died in the lifetime of his father. He was the first sovereign of the Hanoverian dynasty born in England, and ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, in 1760. At an extraordinary council in the following year, he stated that, "ever since his accession to the throne he had turned his thoughts towards a princess for his consort; and that, after mature deliberation, he had come to a resolution to demand in marriage the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz." He was accordingly married in the same year, and the joint coronation of the king and queen took place on the 22nd of September. From this period till 1764, when lord Bute retired from the administration of the country, the public mind was kept in a constant state of agitation by political squibs, pamphlets, and libels, which, on the whole, may be considered to have been favourable to religious liberty. In that year, however, Mr. Grenville was appointed premier, when he brought in those measures relative to the American colonies which caused their revolt, and finally resulted in their independence and the formation of the federal governments of the United States. At this time the king had his first attack of that illness which obscured his latter days, and led to a legislative enactment, which, by sign manual, empowered the queen, or some other member of the royal family, to assume the guardianship of the heir-apparent, and be regent of the kingdom. This measure caused a change in the administration, when the marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the Treasury. His cabinet, however, was dissolved in 1766, and the duke of Grafton succeeded to the head of affairs. In 1770 the duke of Grafton was succeeded by lord North, and, in 1772, on account of the duke of Cumberland marrying Mrs. Horton, the Royal Marriage Act was passed. This act prevented the members of the royal family from marrying before the age of twenty-five, without the approval of the king, and, even after that age, without the approbation of both houses of parliament. In 1782 lord North resigned, and the Rockingham party again took office; but this administration enjoyed but a short tenure of power, when lord Shelburne was placed at the head of affairs, with Mr. Pitt, the son of the earl of Chatham, chancellor of the exchequer. In the following year the Coalition ministry, respectively headed by Mr. Fox and lord North, pushed themselves into office; but the king was so averse to them, that when the famous India bill of Mr. Fox was thrown out by the lords, he sent a message to Mr. Fox and lord North, commanding them at once to deliver up their seals of office by messenger, as a personal interview with them would be offensive to him. This bold act of the king, with the energy and firmness he displayed, obtained for him considerable popularity. In 1786 a woman named Margaret Nicholson made an attempt with a knife to assassinate his majesty at the garden entrance of St. James's palace. The coolness of the king, on this occasion, was the subject of general admiration. The woman was found to be insane, and was sent to Bedlam. In 1789 he had a return of his mental malady, which lasted for three months, when, with his family, and amid the acclamations of the people, he proceeded to St. Paul's, to return solemn thanks for his recovery. In 1795 another attempt was made to assassinate him whilst proceeding to the house of lords to open parliament in person; a small bullet passed through the window of his carriage, but he sustained no injury from it. In 1798 the Irish rebellion broke out, and the distress of the people had reached its height. The dissatisfaction of that country was very great, and another attempt was made upon the life of the king. This occurred in the theatre of Drury-lane. He had just entered his box, and was in the act of bowing to the audience, when a man who sat in the middle of the pit, near the orchestra, fired a pistol at him, and the bullet entered the roof of the royal box. On this occasion the loyalty of the audience rose to the acme of enthusiasm. Amid repeated cheers, "God save the King" was three times sung by the whole house. The man who perpetrated this act was called Hatfield, had been in the army, had received eight sabre-wounds in the head, was proved to be insane, and was discharged, and admitted an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital. He was subsequently, however, transferred to Bethlem Hospital. In 1800 the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland was passed; but the sovereign strenuously opposed the admission of Roman Catholics to political power. This caused the retirement of Mr. Pitt from office, when the Addington ministry assumed the government of the country. In 1804 Mr. Pitt again came into power, but in 1806 he died, when the Grenville party, with Mr. Fox, once more entered into office. In the following year this administration endeavoured to effect a change in the sentiments of the king regarding catholic emancipation; but his majesty remained immovable. "Although I have firmness," said he, "sufficient to quit my throne and retire to a cottage, or place my neck on a block if my people desired it, yet I have not resolution to break the oath I have taken, in the most solemn manner, at my coronation." This led to the downfall of the Grenville and Fox administration, and the accession of Percival to power. In 1809 the king commenced the 50th year of his reign, when a jubilee of great splendour took place. His faculties now rapidly began to decay. In the following year he lost the princess Amelia, his favourite daughter, an event which seriously affected his spirits, whilst his former malady returned with greatly increased severity. In 1811 a regency bill was passed; and, from that time, the life of the king may be regarded as little more than mere existence. In 1818 his queen died; but, with this event, he was never made acquainted, and the duke of York was appointed to the office of custos to his person. At the close of 1819 his appetite became weak, and every symptom of a coming dissolution began to exhibit itself. He had, however, already been dead to the world, having, for some years, been deprived of intellectual consciousness. George III. was religious and sincere, temperate in his habits, and inflexible in his will. His tastes were of patriarchal simplicity. He loved music; and patronised its professors; he appreciated art, and knighted sir Joshua Reynolds; he assisted science, and afforded encouragement to Byron and Cook, the navigators. He was a considerate husband, and a kind father; and his court exhibited a decorum and morality almost hitherto unknown. In the course of his reign, the supremacy of England in India was established, the American colonies achieved independence, and Napoleon rose and fell.

Born 1738; died 1820, in the 59th year of his reign.

GEORGE IV., AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, was the eldest son of the preceding monarch, by Queen Charlotte. Notwithstanding the excellent example of his father, and the strictness with which his education had been conducted, George IV., when prince of Wales, fell early into habits of dissipation, which debased the better parts of his nature and greatly marred the intellectual endowments with which he was gifted. In his eighteenth year he began to associate with the Whig nobility, and formed political connections with Fox, Sheridan, and others, who led him into scenes of gallantry, which soon made his name notorious in the mouths of the people. His first attachment was to a Mrs. Robinson, an actress, with whom he fell in love when she was performing Perdita in the "Winter's Tale." Of this scandalous connection the public prints were full, when, on a sudden, he abandoned this lady for another, and this for another, until he met with Mrs. Fitzherbert, a Catholic widowed lady of good family, with whom he formed a more permanent connection. (See FITZHERBERT.) His dissipation, and the building of Carlton House, had now steeped him to the lips in debt, when he was driven into mean expedients for the purpose of putting off, or meeting, the pressing demands of his creditors. These, however, were insufficient for his purpose, when he determined to apply to his father, who, however, was so exasperated at his conduct, that he refused to lend him the smallest assistance. He, therefore, curtailed his expenditure, and for nearly twelve months persevered in his virtuous resolution. He sold off his racing stud, and lived in retirement till 1787, when his circumstances were brought under the notice of parliament. On this occasion the house voted 161,000*l.* to satisfy his creditors, 20,000*l.* to finish Carlton House, and the king added, from the civil list, 10,000*l.* per annum to his son's income. Relieved, for a time, from his pecuniary embarrassments, he once more assumed his habits of extravagance. For Mrs. Fitzherbert he had built a splendid mansion at Brighton, which place he raised from obscurity into a fashionable watering-place, and surrounded himself with many notorious characters; among whom, the most prominent was the countess of Jersey. Under these circumstances the king and his ministers were desirous that the prince should marry; and as he was again weighed down by debt, he consented to an alliance with his cousin, the princess Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Brunswick. The marriage occurred in the April of 1795, and on the very day of the wedding the bridegroom expressed his disgust. The princess soon discovered the nature of her husband's connections, which naturally excited her resentment, when scenes of discord, and mutual recrimination and dislike were the result. In 1796 the princess of Wales gave birth to a daughter, and, shortly afterwards, the prince sent her proposals for a separation. These were at once acceded to, and George III. undertook the guardianship of the young princess, whilst her unhappy mother retired to a private residence at Blackheath. The conduct of the prince had now so effectually estranged the affections of his father from him, that, when Napoleon I. threatened the invasion of England, he allowed him only the colonelcy of a regiment of dragoons; but, when the incapacity of George III. occurred, he became prince regent, assuming all the rights of royalty. In 1814 the prince received a visit from the emperor of Russia, the king of Prussia, and other foreign potentates, and treated them with truly royal hospitality. In 1816 his daughter, the princess Charlotte, was married to prince Leopold, of Saxe-Coburg, afterwards king of the Belgians; but she died in the following year. (See CHARLOTTE.) In 1817 an unsuccessful attempt was made upon the life of the prince regent, when on his way to open the session of parliament; and in 1820 the Cato-street conspirators were tried and executed for plotting against his life and the lives of the leading members of the administration. On the death of his father, in 1820, he ascended the throne as George IV., and, in the following year, was crowned, with great magnificence, in Westminster Abbey. Previous to this, a process had been instituted in the house of lords for the purpose of depriving his wife of her rights and privileges as queen of England. This circumstance, for a time, brought him into great unpopularity. In the same year of his coronation, he paid a visit to Ireland and Hanover; and in the following year similarly visited Scotland. The great public event of his reign, however, was the passing of the bill for abolishing the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics, which took place in 1829. During the latter part of the king's life, he lived much in retirement, and ultimately held his courts entirely at Windsor. As old age came upon him, he suffered much from gout and other infirmities, always exhibiting an excessive dislike to be in the least exposed to the public gaze.

Born 1762; died at Windsor Castle, 1830.

GEORGE OF DENMARK, prince, was the husband of queen Anne of England, and was married to her in 1683. There is little to be said of him. Lord Dartmouth observes, in his notes to Burnet's History, "that his behaviour at the Revolution showed he could be made a tool of upon occasions, but king William treated him with the utmost contempt. When queen Anne came to the throne, she showed him little respect, but expected everybody else should give him more than his due." Again—"After thirty years living in England, he died of eating and drinking, without any man's thinking himself obliged to him; but I have been told that he would sometimes do ill-offices, though he never did a good one." Anne bore him seventeen children, of whom only five lived to be baptized, and not one to succeed to the throne.

Born at Denmark, 1653; died at Kensington Palace, 1708.

GEORGE, duke of Saxony, called the "bearded," son of Albert, founder of the Albertinian Saxon line, was educated for the Church, but succeeded to the dukedom on the death of his father in 1500. Being very desirous for a reform of the numerous abuses which existed in the Church, he at first favoured Luther's proceedings; but a misunderstanding, and consequent ill-feeling, arose between them during the celebrated Leipsic controversy, the duke taking offence at Luther's doctrine of justification by faith. This ill-feeling was carefully fostered by Luther's enemies, and rendered lasting by George's natural obstinacy. When, however, it was anticipated that the emperor would violate his safe conduct given, the duke firmly protested against such a breach of faith. In the latter years of his reign, he lost, in succession, his wife and all his children. His brother Henry, duke of Freiberg, who was a zealous protestant, then became heir-apparent, George's aversion to protestantism was so great that he endeavoured to break the line of succession, but died without accomplishing his purpose.

Born 1471; died 1530.

GEORGE, a district of Cape Colony, valuable for its timber and pasturage. The river Gauritz separates it from the district of Zwellendam, and Mossel Bay is a port on its coast. Area, 2,600 square miles. Pop. 10,700. The chief town is George, 6 miles from the coast.

GEORGE, ST., was, according to tradition, a young and handsome prince of Cappadocia, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. He has been made a kind of Christian Perseus, and a thousand prodigies are reported of him. He slew an immense and powerful dragon, and saved a king's daughter, as the monster was about to devour her. It is in the performance of this deed that he is represented, on horseback, armed with a lance, and piercing a dragon. He was famous in the East, and it was thence that his fame came to the West. This legendary saint is more particularly honoured in England, Russia, and Genoa. The English and Genoese take him as their patron, whilst the Russians adopt St. George and the Dragon as the principal figure in their arsenals and armories, and have given his name to the first of their military orders. All the legends respecting this saint are of very doubtful authenticity.

GEORGE, (known also as the Horicon,) a lake in the United States, 34 miles by 3, and in some parts is 400 feet deep. It is situated in the state of New York, and empties itself into Lake Champlain. It is remarkable for the beauty of its shores, and the transparency of its waters, and possesses some historical associations in connection with the American wars between France and England.

GEORGE, ST., the largest of the Bermuda islands, strongly fortified, and the principal military depôt of those islands. It is 15 miles long and three broad. The capital is of the same name, and has a handsome church, a library, and town-house. Lat. 32° 45′ N. Lon. 63° 30′ W.

GEORGE, ST., on of the group of the Azores. It is 23 miles long, and very narrow. Lat. 38° 30′ N. Lon. 27° 50′ W.

GEORGE, ST., the capital of the island of GRENADA. It possesses one of the best harbours in the West Indies. The town is divided by a ridge, which, running into the sea, forms on one side the careenage, on the other the bay. Thus there is the Bay-town, which boasts a handsome square and market, and the Careenage-town, wherein the principal merchants reside. Pop. 5,500. Lat. 12° 4′ N. Lon. 61° 31′ W.

GEORGE'S, ST., a river in St. Mary's county, Maryland, United States, which runs into the Potomac between Piney Poin; and St. Mary's river. Opposite its mouth are the islets called St. George's Islands.

GEORGE'S CHANNEL, ST., that part of the Atlantic Ocean which is situate between Ireland and Wales, and extends from the island of Holyhead to St. David's, and from Dublin to Wexford. It is from 40 to 70 miles wide, and its length is about 100 miles.

GEORGETOWN, the capital of Pulo Penang, or Prince of Wales Island. (See PENANG.)

GEORGETOWN, a county in South Carolina, United States. Area, 683 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

GEORGETOWN, capital of British Guiana, situated on the right bank of the Demerara. It has the reputation of being damp and unhealthy; the inhabitants are said to be liable to yellow and intermittent fevers. The district in which Georgetown stands is swampy, and canals run through most of the streets, the houses being raised three or four feet above the ground to avoid the damp. The principal public buildings are a town-hall, with marble paved galleries, colonial hospital, and episcopal cathedral. Exports sugar, coffee, and rum. Pop. 26,000, including 20,000 negroes, &c. Lat. 6° 49′ N. Lon. 58° 11′ W.

GEORGETOWN, a city and port of entry, district of Columbia, United States. It is situated on the left bank of the Potomac, 2 miles N.W. of Washington, on a range of hills from which a magnificent view of the surrounding country is gained. There is a college under the direction of the Jesuits, and a convent, with an academy for females. The viaduct of the Chesapeak and Ohio Canal is an enormous structure, 1,446 feet in length. The commerce of Georgetown is considerable; there are fifty flour-mills, and immense quantities of herrings and shad are caught in the Potomac, and barrelled here.

GEORGIA, or GRUSIA, jor'-je-a, a considerable country of Asia, situate between the Black Sea and the Caspian, to the N. of Armenia, and included in the Russian government of Tiflis. It combines the mountainous character of the Caucasian region with that of the fertile plains of Persia. The hills are covered with forests of beach, oak, ash, chestnuts, walnuts, and elms, encircled with vines, growing spontaneously.

Rivers.—The principal are the Kur and the Araxes, which pour their united streams into the Caspian.

Pro.—From its situation, it unites the products both of tropical and temperate climates. Rice, wheat, millet, hemp, and flax are raised on the plains, almost without culture; grapes and cotton grow spontaneously, whilst the valleys afford fine pasturage, and the rivers are full of fish.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, naphtha, and others; but they are turned to little or no account.

Manf.—Woollen, cotton, and silk fabrics; leather, shagreen, and arms; but all are very inferior.

Area.—12,800 square miles.

Pop.—300,000. The people are thought to be the best soldiers in Asia. Their dress resembles that of the Cossacks; but those that are wealthy affect the habit of the Persians. They usually dye their hair, beards, and nails, red. The women, who are celebrated for their beauty, stain the palms of their hands of the same colour, and paint their eyebrows black, in such a manner as to form one entire line, while the rest of the face is coated with white and red. Being generally educated in convents, they can read and write, qualifications uncommon with the men, even of the highest rank. The inhabitants are Christians, partly of the Greek, partly of the Armenian church. Here are also Tartars, Ossetes, Armenians, and a great number of Jews. Of these last, some have villages of their own; others are mixed with the Georgian, Armenian, and Tartarian inhabitants, but not with the Ossetes. They pay a small tribute above that of the natives.

Chief Town.—TIFLIS, the capital.

Lat.—Between 38° and 42° 30′ N. Lon. between 43° and 47° E.

History.—Georgia was formerly one kingdom, the inhabitants of which were Christians; but, in 1639, when it was conquered by the Persians, the country was divided between two native princes, by themselves called kings, but by the Sophi styled governors. Each of these had a guard of Mahometan horse in their pay. In 1802 it was annexed to Russia.

GEORGIA, one of the original of the United States, bounded N. by North Carolina and Tennessee, N.E. by South Carolina, S. by Florida, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, and W. by West Florida and the Alabama territory. It is divided into the two districts of Upper and Lower Georgia; the eastern part, between the mountains and the ocean, and the rivers Savannah and St. Mary's, presenting a tract of country more than 120 miles from N. to S., and from 50 to 80 E. and W. entirely level, and without a hill or a stone. At the distance of about 40 or 50 miles from the coast, the ridges gradually rise one above another into hills, and the hills successively increase in height, until they finally terminate in mountains. The vast chain of the Alleghanies terminates in Georgia, 60 miles south of its northern frontier.

Rivers.—The Alatamaha, Savannah, and the Chattahoochee.

Pro.—Cotton, flax, sugar, honey, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, potatoes, and wool. The famous sea-island cotton is raised on a chain of small islands which border the seacoast. Most of the rice-lands lie on rivers, which, as far as the tide flows, are called tide-lands; or on creeks and particular branches of water, flowing in some deeper or lower parts of the lands, which are called inland swamps, and extend back in the country from 15 to 25 miles. The intermediate lands between these creeks and rivers are of an inferior quality. Here and there are interspersed oak and hickory ridges, which are of a better soil.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, iron, coal, limestone, granite, and marble.

Manf.—Cotton, and there are tanneries and iron-works.

Exp.—The chief articles are cotton, which has now become the great staple of the state; rice, tobacco, indigo, sago, lumber of various kinds, naval stores, leather, deer-skins, snake-root, myrtle, bees-wax, corn, and live stock.

Area.—58,000 square miles.

Pop.—1,542,180, of whom about half are of the coloured race.

Divisions.—There are 133 counties.

Chief Towns.—MILLEDGEVILLE, the capital; AUGUSTA and SAVANNAH.

Lat.—Between 30° 30′ and 35° N. Lon. between 80° 48′ and 84° 41′ W.

History.—Georgia was settled in the year 1732, by about a hundred adventurers under General Oglethorpe. After struggling for about 30 years with the usual obstacle of Indian hostility, the state began at last to flourish, and has ever since increased. It was re-admitted into the union in 1870, after the great revolt, and sends nine members to the federal congress, in addition to the two to which every state is entitled. There are 33 colleges, and 1850 other educational establishments in the state of Georgia.

GEORGIA, GULF OF, an islet on the N.W. coast of America, separating Vancouver's Island from the mainland. It communicates with the strait of Juan de Fuca on the S.W., and with the Pacific by Queen Charlotte's Sound on the N.

GEORGIAN BAY. (See HURON, LAKE.)

GEORGIANA, jor'-je-a-na, a county of Australia, New South Wales, traversed by the Abercrombie river and its affluents. On the banks of the former gold has been found.

GEORGIEVSK, gai'-or-ge-evsk, a fortified town in the government of the Caucasus, belonging to Russia, 90 miles from Stavropol. Pop. 3,000, mostly Cossacks.

GEORGSWALDE, jorjs'-wold, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, 64 miles N. of Prague, on the N. border of Bohemia. There is a mineral spring, and linen manufactures are carried on. Pop. 8,300.

GERA, geer'-a, a walled town of Saxony, on the right bank of the White Elster, 35 miles S.W. of Leipsic. The streets are regular, and it has several churches, hospitals, a gymnasium, orphan asylum, public library, and schools. Manf. Woollen and cotton cloths, hats, leather, &c. There is a manufactory of harmoniums, which employs 600 hands. Pop. 27,118.

GERACE, jai-rai'-ce, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, 34 miles N.E. of Reggio, about 4 miles from the Ionian sea, on the upper slopes of the Apennines. The ancient name of Gerace was Santa Ciriace, and was erected in the 12th century by the inhabitants of Locri, when that town was destroyed by the Saracens. It has suffered at various times severely from earthquakes. Manf. Silk; there is also a considerable trade in wine. Pop. 6,000.

GÉRARD, BALTHAZAR, zhai'-rard, the assassin of William I., prince of Orange. He meditated this design seven years, and at last shot the prince with a pistol at Delft. He declared he committed the murder "to expiate his sins," the prince being at the head of the Protestants. The reward of Gérard's crime was paid to his heirs by Philip II., of Spain, the duke of Parma informing that sovereign, that though the "poor man" was dead, his parents deserved the payment of that "reward the laudable and generous deed had so well deserved." The sentence pronounced upon Gérard was that his right hand should be burned off, that his flesh should be torn from his bones in six different places, that he should be disembowelled alive, that his heart should be torn from his bosom and flung in his face, and his head chopped off. This sentence was executed to the letter.

Born at Villefans, Burgundy; executed 1584.

GÉRARD, ETIENNE MAURICE, Comte, marshal of France. Entered the army as a volunteer, and served in the campaign of 1792-3; and accompanied Bernadotte on his mission to Vienna, where he saved his master's life in a mêlée. Was rapidly promoted, and was appointed colonel in 1800, and became aide-de-camp to Bernadotte in 1805. Distinguished himself at Austerlitz, Halle, Jena, Erfurt, Lintz, and Wagram. For his services at Austerlitz he was made general of brigade, and after the battle of Wagram received the title of baron of the empire. He took part in the Peninsular war and the Russian campaign, and in 1812 was made general of division, and subsequently became count of the empire, grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and chevalier of St. Louis. He joined Napoleon on his return from Elba, served at the battle of Ligny, and at Waterloo. After the second restoration he was obliged to leave France, but returned in 1817; was elected to the chamber of deputies in 1822; took part in the revolution of 1830; was appointed a marshal of France by Louis Philippe; received command of the expedition to Belgium, and distinguished himself by taking Antwerp, in 1832. Became grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour in 1835.

Born 1773; died 1855.

GÉRARD, FRANÇOIS PASCAL BARON, a celebrated modern painter, who went from Italy to Paris, where he became a pupil of M. David. From 1795 to 1810, appeared his "Belisarius," "Psyche receiving the first Kiss of Love," "The Three Ages," the "Battle of Austerlitz," and "Ossian." All the leading men and women of the French empire were painted by him; and, in the space of thirty years, he executed more than a hundred full-length portraits, besides an immense number of less size. Amongst others who sat to him were Moreau, Murat, Letitia Bonaparte, Mesdames Tallien and Récamier, the emperors Napoleon and Alexander of Russia, Prince Talleyrand, Louis Bonaparte, the empress Josephine. He left behind him several unfinished works.

Born at Rome, 1770; died at Paris, 1837.

GERARD, JOHN, jer'-ard, an English botanist, who, bred a surgeon, settled in London, and became gardener to Lord Burleigh. He compiled a "Catalogus Arborum, Fruticum, et Plantarum, tam indigenarum quam exoticarum, in horto Joh. Gerardi," and is the author of the "Herbal, or General History of Plants," published first in 1597, and afterwards several times reprinted.

Born at Nantwich, Cheshire, 1545; died 1607.

GERARDMER, or GEROMÉ, zhai'-rard-mare, a town of France, department Vosges, 15 miles S. of St. Dié. Manf. Linen and cotton goods, Burgundy pitch, and earthenware. Pop. 5,900.

GERASA, or DJERASH, je-rai-sa', a city of Syria, pashalic of Damascus, the ruins of which are remarkable for their extent and preservation. It was situated about 25 miles N. of Rabath-Ammon, and 20 E. of the Jordan, among the mountains of Gilead. In the 2nd century it was a prosperous place, and became the seat of a bishopric. Great part of the wall is still standing, with three of the gateways, and more than 200 columns were said to remain standing in their pedestals.

GERBI, GERBA, or JERBA, jer'-be (the Meninx of the ancients), an island, 12 miles broad and 20 long, situated in the Gulf of Cabes, N. coast of Africa. It belongs to the state of Tunis, and contains a triumphal arch in honour of Antoninus and Venus. There is also a remarkable pyramid, from 25 to 30 feet in height, constructed of the sculls of Spanish soldiers, who fell in a battle with the Turks in the 6th century. Manf. Shawls, silk, and woollen fabrics, bournous, and blankets.

GERBILLON, JEAN FRANÇOIS, zhair-bee'-yawng, one of the most celebrated of the French Jesuit missionaries in China. He wrote "Historical Observations on Great Tartary;" and accounts of some of his travels are inserted in Du Halde's "History of China." He was in great favour with the Chinese emperor, to whom he was appointed mathematical instructor, and wrote two books on geometry, which were printed at Pekin in the Chinese and Tartar languages. He was superior-general of the French missions in China.

Born at Verdun, 1654; died at Pekin, 1707.

GERDAUEN, gair'-dou-en, a town of Prussia, district of Königsberg, on the Omet. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, and tiles. There is a trade in cattle, and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

GERGAL, hair'-gal, a town of Spain, province of Almeria, 23 miles N.W. of the town of that name. Manf. Earthenware, glass, wax, cottor quilts, and oil. Pop. 5,000.

GERHARDT, Karl Friedrich, gair'-hart, an eminent chemist, the son of a manufacturer of chemicals at Strasburg. Having in early life acquired a taste for questions of speculative chemistry, Gerhardt found the commercial pursuits to which he was put, insupportable, and at the age of twenty, in a moment of passion, enlisted in a regiment of chasseurs. In the course of three months, however, he purchased his discharge, and went to Giessen, where he worked under the superintendence of the celebrated Liebig for eighteen months. After this he took up his residence in Paris, where he was welcomed by Dumas. Here he gave lectures and instructions in chemistry, and in association with Caborus commenced some important researches on essential oils. In 1844 he became professor of general chemistry in the Faculty of Sciences at Montpellier, and published about the same time his "Précis de Chimie Organique." In the following year, in association with Laurent he commenced the "Comptes rendus des Travaux de Chimie publiés en France et à l'Etranger." In 1848 this work was discontinued; he resigned his chair at Montpellier, returned to Paris, and devoted himself to special investigations, in the course of which he established and elaborated his views of series and the theory of types with which his name is inseparably connected. These were embodied in his "Traité de Chimie Organique," in four volumes, which appeared at intervals, 1853-1856. He had hardly completed the correction of the last proofs of this work when he died, after an illness of two days, having just received the diploma of corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. In 1855 he was appointed professor of chemistry at Strasburg. Gerhardt's suggested modification of notation for chemical formulæ, to which he was led by certain theoretical considerations, consists mainly of the doubling the combining or equivalent numbers of oxygen, carbon, sulphur, selenia, and telluriun. This notation is now generally adopted on the continent and in this country.

Born 1816; died 1856.

GERIZIM and EBAL, two mountains in Samaria, separated by a narrow valley, in which the ancient Shechem or Sychar (now Nâblus) stood. The valley is 1,800 feet above the sea level, and the mountains rise 700 or 800 feet higher. Mount Gerizim is regarded as the scene of Abraham's great trial, when he was ordered to sacrifice his son Isaac. It was here, in later times, that the impressive ceremony described in the 27th chapter of Deuteronomy took place, when the people of Israel assembled to hear the recita' of the law. Half the tribes stood on the declivities of Mount Gerizim, and the other half upon Mount Ebal opposite, and as the Levites, who occupied the valley between, alternately pronounced the blessings affixed to the performance of the law, or the curse attached to its neglect, the people responded, Amen. In a subsequent age, by permission of Alexander the Great, the Samaritans built a temple on Gerizim, and established a priesthood. The temple was destroyed a couple of centuries later, but the mountain continued to be esteemed sacred by the Samaritan people. Still later, a Christian church was erected here in honour of the Virgin Mary, and the ruins of the wall which Justinian built for its protection against the assaults of the Samaritans are still visible.

GERKI, ger'-ke, a town in Africa, in the Sudan, district of Sokato. Lat. 12° 26′ N. Lon. 9° 10′ E. The inhabitants bear a bad character, being averse to any kind of industry, and are notorious for their thievish propensities. Pop. 15,000.

GERLACHE, Etienne Constantin, zhair-laché, Baron de, a Belgian statesman, was elected as deputy from Liege to the second chamber of the states general in 1824, and was actively engaged in the revolution, when he presided over the committee appointed to revise the constitution; headed the deputation to Prince Leopold to solicit his acceptance of the crown; and having been elected president of the congress, received the oath required of the king, in 1831. Was appointed in the year following first president of the court of cassation, and in 1843 received the title of baron. In 1867 he retired from office, and took no further part in politics. He was one of the chief leaders of the Catholic party in Belgium. Baron Gerlache pubished several works, the most important of which were "Mémoires sur les Changements à apporter aux Tarifs du Royaume" (1821-24); "Histoire du Royaume des Pays-Bas depuis 1814 jusqu'en 1830" (1839).

Born 1785; died 1871.

GERMAIN-EN-LAYE, St., a well-built town of France, department Seine-et-Oise, on a height above the Seine, 6 miles N. of Versailles. The houses are in general good; the streets are wide, regular, and well paved. Here are also several handsome squares; but the object of greatest interest to the traveller, is the magnificent terrace on the side of the river, upwards of two miles long, and affording a delightful view, of nearly fifteen miles in circuit. The ancient castle, built by Charles V. of France, is a spacious but heavy building, chiefly of brick; and there is a house of education of the Legion of Honour. Manf. Woollen goods, horsehair-cloth; and there are some tanneries. In the chateau of this place James II. of England died, in 1701. Pop. 12,200.

GERMAN OCEAN, or NORTH SEA, jer'-man, an extensive sea, on the N.W. coast of Europe, bounded S. by the Straits of Calais, and N. by the Orkney and Shetland islands. By the Danes it is called the West Sea, in consequence of their position.

GERMANIC CONFEDERATION. (See Germany.)

GERMANICUS, Cæsar, jer-man'-i-kus, son of Drusus and Antonia, niece of the emperor Augustus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and was married to Agrippina, daughter of Agrippa and grand-daughter of Augustus. He was raised to the most important offices of the state, and, when Augustus died, had the command of the army in Germany; and the affection of the soldiers led them to unanimously salute him emperor. He refused this honour, continued his wars, defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return to Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the East, and sent him to appease the seditions of the Armenians. But the success of Germanicus here was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius; and he was secretly poisoned at Daphne, by Piso, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest grief. He had had nine children by Agrippina, a woman of eminent virtue. One of these, Caligula, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. Germanicus has been commended, not only for his military accomplishments, but also for his learning, humanity, and extensive benevolence.

Born 15 B.C.; died A.D. 19.

GERMANO, SAN, or CASINO, a town of Italy, in the province of Caserta, about 50 miles N.W. of Naples, at the foot of Mount Casino. It is built on the site of the ancient Casinum, or Casca, and contains many interesting ruins of the Volscian period. One of these, supposed to have been a tomb, is now used as a church, it is a square building in the form of a Greek cross, constructed with enormous blocks of stone; from its form it is called the Church of the Crucifix. The Benedictine monastery of Monte Casino, two miles distant from the town, was founded early in the sixth century; it contains one of the most beautiful churches in the kingdom, and an extensive library, enriched with a valuable collection of documents of the middle ages. The district surrounding the town is highly cultivated. Pop. 12,000.

GERMANS, ST., a small village in Cornwall, 21 miles E. of Bodmin, ten miles above Plymouth Sound, on a branch of the river Lynher, was formerly the seat of episcopal government of the diocese of Cornwall. There is a fine parish church. Pop. 2,678.

GERMANY, jer'-ma-ne (in German, DEUTSCHLAND; in French, L'ALLEMAGNE), a name popularly given to that portion of Central Europe inhabited by people of the Germanic race, and speaking dialects of the German language, and including, therefore, besides the states now included in the German empire, portions of Austria, Switzerland, and the Netherlands. The following are the old names, still frequently used, of districts of Germany, with the more modern names of the nearly identical states and provinces.

OLD NAMES.	MODERN EQUIVALENTS.
East Friesland	Country between the Ems and Lower Weser.
Franconia	Districts of Bamberg, Schweinfurt, and Würtzburg.
Lusatia	Eastern part of Saxony.
Palatinate	Northern part of Baden and Rhenish Bavaria.
Rhineland	Rhine provinces of Prussia, and parts of Bavaria, Baden, Nassau, and Hesse-Darmstadt.
Thuringia	Saxe Weimar, and the district lying between the Saale and the Werra.
Suabia	The Bavarian province of Suabia, the principality of Hohenzollern, and the southern part of the grand duchy of Baden.
Voigtland	The country between the Bavarian district Hof, and the district of Zwickau in Saxony.
Westphalia	The north-eastern part of Germany, between the Rhine, Holland, and the North Sea.

GERMAN EMPIRE, a confederation of states of Central Europe, bounded N. by the Baltic, Denmark, and the North Sea (or German Ocean); E. by Russia and Austria; W. by France, Belgium, and the Netherlands; S. by Switzerland, Austria, and the Alps. It is divided by very marked outlines into two great portions, North and South Germany. The line of separation is along the great line of mountains, beginning with the Westerwald, in Westphalia, and traversing Hesse-Cassel, the S. of Saxony and Silesia, until it ends in the Carpathians, on the frontiers of Poland and Hungary. These ranges include the HARZ, TEUTOBURGERWALD, FICHTELGEBIRGE, ERZGEBIRGE, RIESENGEBIRGE, TAUNUS, and THURINGERWALD. Almost all the country to the N. of this is flat, and all the rivers have a northerly direction, without meeting with any formidable impediment, until they reach the level of the German Ocean or Baltic. S. Germany is much more diversified; consisting in part of extensive plains, but traversed also by vast ranges of mountains, including the Schwarzwald and Bavarian Alps. (See BLACK FOREST.) Indeed, the surface of Germany might not inappropriately be divided into four regions: 1. A mountainous region in the S.E. 2. A hilly region in the central part. 3. An extensive plain in the N., stretching to the Baltic and North seas, and attaining the greatest elevation, 1,000 feet, near Dantzic. There are extensive forests on all the mountain ranges, furnishing valuable timber, especially oak and beech, from the shores of the Baltic, and pine in the interior. The coast line is about 950 miles in extent. 4. A table-land, much more limited than any of the other regions, forming the plain of S. Bavaria.

Rivers.—It is computed that there are no less than fifty navigable rivers; while seven, viz., the Danube, the Rhine, the Main, the Weser, the Elbe, the Ems, and the Oder, rank among the noblest and largest in Europe. There are, besides these, the tributaries to the Rhine, as the Neckar, Lahn, Ruhr, Moselle, and Lippé. The Rhine is one of the most rapid of the European rivers, and the Oder one of the most sluggish. There are three great river basins or areas of drainage. The RHINE, WESER, ELBE, and their numerous tributaries, flow into the North Sea; the ODER and VISTULA into the Baltic; and the DANUBE, which rises in the Black Forest, in Baden, traverses Bavaria and enters Austria, discharging into the Black Sea. Canals have been constructed, which connect the great river systems. The Danube and Maine (and, by that river, the Rhine) are united by the Ludwig Canal in Bavaria, affording communication between the North Sea and the Black Sea, and other canals connect the large rivers flowing into the North Sea and the Baltic. There are numerous but small and unimportant lakes.

Climate.—Generally temperate and healthy, and remarkably uniform, notwithstanding the great extent of territory. The mildest climate is enjoyed in the valleys of the Rhine and Main.

Zoology.—The bear, red deer, lynx, wolf, fox, marten, and weasel, and the chamois in the alpine regions; and game of every description in most parts: waterfowl are especially plentiful in the north, and fish abound in the rivers. Domestic animals of every kind are abundant.

Minerals.—Abundant; iron, copper, tin, lead, silver, some gold, cobalt, bismuth, arsenic, alum, gypsum, quicksilver, salt, coal, and sulphur. Bavaria has not only mines of metal, but is, as well as the duchy of Saltzburg, very rich in salt mines. The mines of Idria, in Carniola, yield annually large quantities of quicksilver. The iron of Styria, sometimes called native steel, is some of the best in Europe. Fullers' earth and porcelain clay are also found. Marble is quarried in various parts of Germany; coal in Westphalia, Saxony, and other provinces. The mineral springs of Germany have been in high repute from very remote times, and are now resorted to by visitors in search of health and pleasure from all parts of Europe. They include chalybeate, sulphureous, alkaline, saline, and warm springs. They are principally in Baden, Bavaria, and the Rhine provinces of Prussia, Nassau, and Wurtemburg.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, oats, and other kinds of corn; flax, madder, rape-seed, hemp, potatoes, tobacco, chicory, and hops. Buckwheat is largely grown. Wine, though less generally made in Germany than in France, is very good in particular districts. The vine was introduced by the Romans, and is cultivated mostly in the valley of the middle Rhine, and on the Danube, in Lower Austria, and in the valleys of the Main, Moselle, and Neckar. Aniseed, liquorice, coriander, sugar, and beet-root, are also cultivated. The fruit-trees comprise the apple, pear, apricot, walnut, almond, and chestnut.

Manf.—Linen, in Silesia, Saxony, and Westphalia, not only for home consumption, but for export to the S. of Europe and to America. It is the most important of the manufactures of Germany. The others consist of cotton and woollen goods, chiefly in the Rhine provinces of Prussia, Silesia, Saxony, and the Prussian province of Brandenburg; silk in the Rhine provinces; hardware, glass, musical instruments, leather, wooden clocks, and toys. Great ingenuity is displayed in making articles of wood, ivory, and steel, toys, and trinkets. Saxony, the Rhine province, and Bohemia, are the principal seats of manufacture.

Area.—212,091 square miles.

Pop.—45,234,061, of whom about 40,000,000 are Germans, 2,560,000 Poles, and the remainder composed of Danes, French, Russians, and other races. The average density of population is 193 to the square mile.

Lat.—From 49° 7′ to 55° 50′ N. Lon. 6° to 22° 40′ E.

Constitution and Government. — The present empire was established in April, 1871. The direction of the military and political affairs of the empire is vested in the king of Prussia, who, as such, bears the title of emperor of Germany. He represents the empire internationally, and can declare war, if defensive, and make peace, as well as enter into treaties with other nations, and appoint and receive ambassadors. In the Bundesrath, or federal council, and the Reichstag, or diet of the realm, are vested the legislative functions of the empire. The Bundesrath represents the individual states of Germany, and the Reichstag the German nation. The members of the Bundesrath, 59 in number, are appointed by the governments of the individual states for each session, while the members of the Reichstag, 397 in number, are elected by universal suffrage and ballot, for the term of three years. Both the Bundesrath and the Reichstag meet in annual session. The emperor has the right to prorogue and dissolve the Reichstag. All laws for the empire must receive the votes of an absolute majority of the Bundesrath and the Reichstag. The Bundesrath is presided over by the chancellor of the empire, and the president of the Reichstag is elected by the deputies. The laws of the empire, passed by the Bundesrath and the Reichstag, to take effect must receive the assent of the emperor.

By the constitution of April 16, 1871, every German is liable to service in the army, and no substitution is allowed. Every man capable of bearing arms has to be in the standing army for seven years, as a rule from the finished 20th till the commencing 28 years of his age. Of the seven years, three must be spent in active service, and the remaining three in the army of reserve. After quitting the army of reserve, he has to form part of the Landwehr for another five years. The common expenditure of the empire is defrayed from the revenues arising from customs, certain branches of excise, the profits of the post, and telegraphs. Should the receipts from these various sources of income not be sufficient to cover the expenditure, the individual states of Germany may be assessed to make up the deficit, each state being made contributory in proportion to its population. The empire is divided into 9 military districts, has 16 fortresses of the first class, and 27 other fortresses; and a navy of 77 vessels of various classes, including ironclads, steamers, and sailing vessels. There are three ports of war, KIEL, DANTZIC, and WILHELMSHAVN.

Religion and Education. — Of the entire population about 26,000,000 are Protestants, 15,000,000 Roman Catholics, 82 belong to Christian sects of various denominations, and more than 500,000 are Jews. Education is compulsory throughout the empire. Elementary schools are supported from the local rates. There are 21 universities, attended by about 16,500 students. Of these universities 14 are Protestant, 4 Roman Catholic, and 3 are attended by both Protestant and Roman Catholic students of theology. There are 16 polytechnic institutions, 500 high schools, a gymnasium, and many schools of agriculture, commerce, and other technical subjects.

Railways and Telegraphs.—The empire is intersected by railways, of which there are about 13,000 miles; and there are more than 22,000 miles of telegraph.

History.—The First German Empire.—For a long time known under the name of Germania, this vast country was, after the invasion of the barbarians and the destruction of the Roman empire, divided between a number of independent races,—the Alemanni, Franks, Saxons, Slaves, Avari, and others. Charlemagne (whom see) conquered these various tribes, and incorporated them in his vast empire; but on his death, in 814, all these diverse elements, forcibly brought together, soon separated, and the treaty of Verdun, signed in 843 by the sons of Louis-le-Débonnaire, gave birth to the kingdom of Germany. Separated from France and Italy after the dethronement of Charles the Fat, in 887, Germany was governed by princes of the Carlovingian dynasty. On the extinction of this family, the monarchy became elective, and the crown was conferred, in 911, on Conrad I., duke of Franconia. Henry the Fowler succeeded in 918, and was the head of the house of Saxony, which gave five sovereigns to Germany, and renewed, in the person of Otho the Great, the empire of Charlemagne. Dating from this reign, the imperial crown, which had alternately been worn by the kings of France, Germany, and Italy, belonged exclusively to Germany, which now took the name of "The Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation." The Saxon dynasty added to the empire Lotharingia, Bohemia, and Italy; and to this family succeeded that of Franconia, which reigned from 1024 to 1137, and added the kingdom of Arles to the possessions of the empire, and especially signalized itself by its quarrels with the pope. The house of Suabia next succeeded, and, of this line, Conrad III. and Frederick Barbarossa, from 1138 to 1190, raised the imperial power to its utmost height. After them, their successors, assailed by their powerful vassals and the popes, and frequently deposed, fell into the lowest depths of weakness. It was at this period that the internecine struggles of the Guelphs and Ghibelines occurred. On Conrad IV.'s death commenced the long interregnum from 1254 to 1273, which ended in delivering Germany from anarchy. Rudolph of Hapsburg, from 1273 to 1291, began the establishment of the authority of the imperial crown; but under his successors, the influence of the grand feudatories and electors of the empire sensibly increased. Their rights were publicly sanctioned by the famous Golden Bull, or charter, granted by Charles IV. in 1356. In 1438 Albert of Hapsburg was elected emperor, and became the chief of the present house of Austria. Charles V., the 4th sovereign of this dynasty, was elected in 1519, and resuscitated the grandeur of the empire. Ferdinand, his brother, reigned after him; and, until the reign of Ferdinand II., no change of importance occurred. Under him the "Thirty Years' War" began, which, lasting from 1618 to 1648, resulted in the humiliation of Germany, the supremacy of France, and the confirmation of the Lutheran religion. The reigns of Leopold I., Joseph I., and Charles VI. were occupied with long wars with Louis XIV. and XV. of France; and the death of Charles, in 1740, gave rise to the "War of the Austrian Succession," which secured the throne to the husband of Maria Theresa, Charles's daughter, and thus placed on the throne a member of the house of Lorraine, in the person of Francis I. Finally, in 1804, the empire of Germany ceased to exist, on the abdication of Francis II., who only preserved his hereditary estates, assuming the title of the emperor of Austria. The Germanic Confederation.—Most of the small states which had formerly comprised the empire, were united by the title of the "Confederation of the Rhine," under Napoleon I.; but the treaties of 1815 changed this arrangement. In place of this confederation, there was then substituted the "Germanic Confederation," which was placed under the protectorate of the emperor of Austria. Each of the German states now became independent, as far as concerned its internal government, and German unity existed only in regard to its intercourse with foreign powers. In 1866 the North Germanic Confederation was formed, excluding Austria. This lasted nearly five years. The New German Empire.—At the time of the great war with France, the new empire was constituted, the king of Prussia being acknowledged hereditary emperor of Germany, and he accepted the dignity on the 18th of January, 1871. The present constitution of the empire bears date April 16, 1871. (See FRANCE and PRUSSIA.) The imperial throne of Germany has always been filled by election, though with a tendency towards the hereditary principle of succession. Originally, the emperor was chosen by the vote of all the princes and peers, but the mode came to be changed in the 14th century, when a limited number of princes, fixed at seven for a time, and afterwards enlarged to nine, assumed the privilege of disposing of the crown, and, their right being acknowledged, were called electors. With the overthrow of the old Germanic empire by the emperor Napoleon, in 1806, the electoral dignity virtually ceased, although the title of elector was retained sixty years longer by the sovereigns of Hesse-Cassel, the last of them dethroned in 1866 by Prussia. The election of the present emperor was by vote of the Reichstag of the North German Confederation, on the initiative of all the reigning princes of Germany.

GERMERSHEIM, gair'-mas-hime, a town of Bavaria, near the confluence of the Queich with the Rhine, 40 miles N. of Carlsruhe. It is strongly fortified. The river is crossed by a bridge of boats, and there are the ruins of an old castle in which the emperor Rudolf of Hapsburg died. There is a shipping trade, chiefly in corn, hemp, and flax. There is a profitable fishery. Pop. 2,200.

GERNSBACH, gairns'-bak, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, on the left bank of the Murg, 16 miles S. of Carlsruhe. There are numerous saw mills, employed in cutting up the trees of the Black Forest. Pop. 2,300.

GERNSHEIM, gairns'-hime, a town of the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, in a marshy district on the right bank of the Rhine, 10 miles S.W. of Darmstadt. There are a handsome church and a town-house, and a monument to Schoeffer, one of the early printers. A good trade in cattle is carried on, and there are three annual fairs. Pop. 2,900.

GEROME, JEAN LEON, jai-romé, eminent French painter, who studied under Paul Delaroche, and first exhibited at the Louvre, in 1847. He afterwards travelled in the East, received the Cross of the Legion of Honour in 1855, and in 1863 was appointed professor of painting in the School of Fine Arts. In 1869 he was decorated with the Prussian Order of the Red Eagle. His great pictures of Roman gladiators in the amphitheatre, of Phryne before the judges, and many others, have made him well known in this country.

Born at Vesoul, 1824.

GERONA, jai-ró'-na, a province of Spain, part of the old province of Catalonia, bounded on the N. by France, and E. and S.E. by the Mediterranean. The surface is mountainous, being traversed by branches of the Pyrenees; but there are many fertile valleys and slopes, and vineyards and olive plantations. The climate is cold and damp in the hilly districts.

Rivers.—The Ter, Fluvia, Marnol, Muga, and smaller streams, falling into the Mediterranean.
Manf.—Linen, woollens, paper, leather, corks, earthen and hardware.
Area.—4,400 square miles.
Pop.—301,516.
Chief Town.—GERONA.

GERONA, a strong town of Spain, capital of the above province, at the confluence of the Oña and the Ter, the latter of which flows through the town, 60 miles N.E. of Barcelona. It is built at the foot of a steep mountain, and is surrounded by walls, flanked with fortifications, and protected by four forts. The cathedral is a noble Gothic structure, begun in 1316. There are five other churches and twelve convents. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, hosiery, leather, paper, and soap. Pop. 15,015.—The town, which is of Roman origin, was formerly the residence of the kings of Aragon. In 1809 it was besieged by the French under Augereau, and held out for more than seven months, when the garrison, weakened by famine and disease, were compelled to surrender.

GERS, zhair, a department in the S.W. of France. It is mountainous in the S., being traversed by branches of the Pyrenees; but in the northern parts are many spacious valleys, and there are large tracts of forest, heath, and waste lands.

Rivers.—The Gers, Gimone, Baise, Arrax, and Save.
Pro.—The usual cerealia are grown, and a grape is produced, from which a wine is made and converted into Armagnac brandy. Hogs and poultry are plentiful, and many mules are reared.
Area.—2,403 square miles.
Pop.—287,532.
Administrative Divisions.—The department is divided into 5 arrondissements and 465 communes. The capital is AUCH.

GERS, a river of France, rising in the Pyrenees, 20 miles S.E. of Tarbes, and, after a course of about 80 miles, uniting with the Garonne at Agen.

GERSAU, zhair'-so, a town in the Swiss canton of Schwytz, on the Lake of Lucerne. Pop. 1,500. The small territory belonging to this town formed an independent state from about the close of the 14th to that of the 18th century.

GERSHON, ger'-shon, "a stranger," the eldest son of Levi.

GERSON, or CHARLIER, JEAN DE, zhair'-saung, an eminent French divine, who was educated in the university of Paris, of which he became chancellor. He was so eminent for learning that he was generally known as "the most Christian doctor." He was deputed to go to the council of Pisa, where he largely contributed to the election of Pope Alexander V. He also distinguished himself at the council of Constance. He energetically denounced the murder of the duke of Orleans by the powerful duke of Burgundy, to escape whose vengeance he wandered about for some time in the disguise of a pilgrim. His works, amongst which are "Consolations of Theology" and "Mystical Theology," are highly valued.

Born at Gerson, near Rheims, 1363; died 1429.

GERSTACKER, FRIEDRICH, gair'-stek-ker, a modern German writer, the son of an actor, was apprenticed to a merchant at Cassel, but, desiring a more exciting life, he resolved to emigrate to America, and having studied agriculture for two years, embarked at Bremen for New York. After some months' stay in that city, he found it necessary to put his hand to anything that offered, and was by turns a stoker in a steamboat, sailor, farmer, silversmith, woodcutter, and innkeeper. Returning to Germany, after an absence of six years, he published several books recounting his experience in the United States, many of which were translated both into English and French. In 1849 he undertook a new voyage, with the twofold object of collecting information for emigrants, and new material for his writings. This time he visited Rio Janeiro, Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, and California, and went back to his "Vaterland" in 1852, after having touched at the Sandwich and Society Islands, and seen a great deal of Australia. These new travels were published, first in the journals, and afterwards in a collected form, under the title of "Voyages." In 1862, he travelled in Egypt and Abyssinia; and in 1867 started on another excursion to America and the West Indies. Besides his works of travels, he published several novels.

Born at Hamburg, 1816; died at Brunswick, 1872.

GERVAISE, NICHOLAS, zhair'-vaise, a French missionary, who went to Siam, and, on his return, published the Natural and Political History of that country. About 1724 he visited Rome, and was appointed bishop of Horren. He then set out for Guiana, where, with all the other members of the mission, he was murdered by the natives.

Born at Paris, 1662; died 1729.

GERVAISE, ARMAND FRANCIS, brother of the above, was abbot of La Trappe, and wrote, amongst other biographical and theological works, the "Lives of Abelard and Heloïse."

GERVASE OF TILBURY, ger'-vase, English historian, supposed to have been a nephew of Henry IIi He was appointed by the emperor Otho IV. of Germany monarch marshal of the kingdom of Arles. He was the author of a commentary on the chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth, a history of the kings of England and France, and histories of the Holy Land and of Burgundy.

Died about 1218.

GERVINUS, GEORG GOTTFRIED, gair-vi'-nus, German historian and political writer, was educated for a commercial career, but at the age of 21 entered the university of Heidelberg, and in 1835 was appointed a professor. In 1836 he became professor of history and literature at Göttingen, but lost his chair in the following year, in consequence of signing a protest against the abolition of the Hanoverian constitution. He travelled for several years, until appointed honorary professor in the university of Heidelberg. He wrote several historical works, among them a history of the national poetry of Germany, many political pamphlets and essays in defence of constitutional liberty, a work on Shakspeare, and a history of the 19th century. In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Assembly.

Born 1805; died 1871.

GERYON, jer'-i-on, in Greek legend, a celebrated monster, represented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the island of Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two-headed dog called Orthos, and by Eurythion. Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, destroyed Geryon and his attendants, and carried away all his herds to Tirynthus.

He produced a lexicon of the Hebrew language, generally accepted by scholars as a standard work. He wrote other and more elaborate works of a similar character, a treatise on the Samaritan Pentateuch, a translation of Isaiah, and several other works of great value.

Born in Prussian Saxony, 1785; died 1842.

GESHUR, ge'-shur, "a walled valley," a city of Bashan, in Syria.

GESNER, KONRAD VON, gais'-ner, an eminent Swiss physician and naturalist, whose parents were too poor to give him an education, which he acquired by the liberality of some of his fellow-citizens. He went to Paris, and supported himself by teaching grammar. He subsequently became Greek professor at Lausanne, and at Basle took his doctor's degree in physic, and then returned to Zurich, where he practised as a physician, and gave lectures in philosophy. His fame as a naturalist circulated over Europe, and he maintained a correspondence with learned men of all countries. He wrote on the Collection of Plants, a work of great merit; "Historia Animalium," which is considered his greatest performance, and procured him the name of the "Modern Pliny;" "Bibliotheca Universalis," which had gone through several editions; a history of 130 ancient and modern languages, and produced other works on botany and medicine. He died of the plague.

Born at Zurich, 1516; died 1565.

GESNER, SOLOMON, a Swiss poet and painter, whose father was a bookseller and printer, and brought him up to the same business. In 1753 he published a short poem, in poetic prose, entitled "Night," which was followed by the pastoral of "Daphnis." His next work was the "Idylls;" and his reputation was increased and extended by his poem of the "Death of Abel," which has been translated into several languages. Besides his great merit in poesy, he was a good painter and engraver, and, in 1765, published ten landscapes, engraved by himself from his own designs. These were followed by others. He was also the author of a "Letter on Landscape-Painting," Poems, &c.

Born at Zurich, 1730; died 1781.

GESNER, JOHN MATTHIAS, a profound German scholar and critic. On the recommendation of Buddæus, he was appointed rector of the school at Weimar, which situation he filled eleven years. Thence he removed to Leipsic, and lastly to Göttingen, where, on the foundation of its university, he was made professor of rhetoric, librarian, and inspector of public schools. His most esteemed works are,—editions of some of the classics, and an excellent Latin "Thesaurus."

Born at Roth, Anspach, 1691; died 1761.

GESSLER, ALBRECHT, gess'-ler, was appointed in 1300 joint governor of the Forest Cantons of Switzerland, and made himself so odious by his cruelties and oppression, that, according to not very authentic tradition, he was shot by William Tell.

Died 1307.

GESSNER, SOLOMON, gess'-ner, a Swiss poet and artist, who published idyllic poems, illustrated by admirable engravings, displaying far more genius than his poetry.

Born at Zurich, 1730; died 1787.

GFRORER, AUGUST FRIEDRICH, gaf-roah'-rer, German historian, studied for the church, was for some time a theological tutor at Tübingen, and afterwards at Stuttgart, where he was appointed national librarian in 1830. He wrote a large work on the history of primitive Christianity, a history of Gustavus Adolphus, a history of the German Church, and other elaborate and learned works. He then became a Roman Catholic, and in 1846 he became a monk of the Catholic university of Freiburg. A history of East and West Franconia, and several works of a political character, in which he strongly advocated his ecclesiastical views, were among his latest productions.

Born at Calcr, in the Black Forest, 1803; died 1861.

GHADAMES. (See GADAMES.)

GHAMBARU, gam-ba-roo', a town of Bornou, Africa, formerly a place of great importance, but destroyed by the Foolahs in 1809, and has since remained a ruin, almost covered with vegetation. Lat. 13° 5′ N. Lon. 12° 5′ E.

GHARA, GORRA, or GURRA, gar'-a, the name given to the united streams Beas and Sutlej, in the Punjab, Hindostan, from their union with the Endrusa to their joining the Chenaub after a course of 300 miles, in lat. 29° 16′ N.; lon. 71° 8′ E.

GHARMY, gar'-me, a village in the Libyan desert, Egypt, on the summit of a lofty rock, supposed to overlook the site of the ancient temple of Jupiter Ammon.

GHASI-DAS, ga'-se-das', religious reformer of India, by birth a Chamar, one of the lowest of the Hindoo castes. About 1820 he began to announce himself as a messenger from God, prohibited the adoration of idols, and enjoined the worship of the Supreme Being without any visible sign or representation. His followers called themselves Satnamis, or "the worshippers of God," and form about 5 per cent. of the population of the district of BILASPUR.

Died 1860.

GHASREGGOMO, gas-reg-go'-mo, a town of Central Africa, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Bornou. It is now in ruins, but was formerly a very large town, enclosed by a wall 6 miles in circumference, with several gates. The ruins of the old buildings are of baked brick.

GHAT, gat, a small oasis and town in the great desert of Sahara, Africa, S.W. of Fezzan. The town, consisting chiefly of mud huts, is surrounded by a wall. The place is a centre of the traffic in slaves. Lat. 24° 58′ N. Lon. 11° 15′ E.

GHENT, gent (in French, GAND, gang), a fortified city of Belgium, the capital of East Flanders, situate on the Scheldt, where that river is joined by the Lys, 30 miles N.W. of Brussels. These rivers, with two smaller streams (the Lievre and the More), and a number of navigable canals, divide the town into no less than 26 islands, which are joined together by 309 bridges. The circuit of the walls within which the town is inclosed, is about eight miles, entered by seven gates. A large proportion, however, of this space is occupied, not by buildings, but by gardens, orchards, and cornfields, as well as by the canals and rivers. Most of the canals are bordered by magnificent quays, some of them with beautiful rows of trees, forming convenient promenades, the finest being the Coupure, along the Bruges Canal. The streets are in general wide and straight; but some of them are narrow, and do not admit of two carriages passing abreast. The houses are large, but not elegant. The public squares are thirteen in number. The principal are the Marché-du-Vendredi, where the weekly market is held, and where in former times the counts of Flanders were inaugurated; the Cauter, surrounded by elegant residences; the Place St. Pharaïlde, where the gate of the old palace still remains; and the Plain de Recollets, where are many fine mansions and hotels. Among the public buildings, are the cathedral of St. Bavon, highly worthy of attention, not so much on account of its external appearance, as for the splendour and richness of its interior; the church of St. Michael, which contains a famous "Crucifixion," by Van-Dyck; the old church of St. Nicholas; also the Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter. The inside of several of the churches in Ghent is of marble. Besides these, there are the palace of justice, built in 1844; the town-hall, presenting a mixture of ancient and modern architecture, but still a grand building; the public library, university, the royal gymnasium, and a gallery of pa... inting, the botanic garden, the citadel, cavalry ...acks, theatre, hospitals, and the Grand Bé... guin... ...age, a convent of great extent. Ghent is the see of ... an archbishop, and the residence of the military ... ommandant for Flanders. A statue of Jacques van Ar... ...evelde was unveiled in 1863. The Great canal con... ...nects Ghent with the sea, and vessels of considera... ...le size can be received in the docks. The new d... ...ock on the north-east side of the city can hold 400 ve... ...sels.

Manf.—Lace ... of great fineness, cotton (very extensive), linen, woollens, ... silk, paper, soap, gold and silver stuffs, chemicals, cutle... ...ry, machinery, and leather. Floriculture is a great bra... ...ch of industry, and a brisk corn trade is carried on.

Pop.—146,976.

Lat. 51° 3′ 12″ N. Lon. 3° 43′ 51″ E.

History.—In the 9th century a fortress was erected here as a protection against the Normans. In the 14th and 15th centuries it was one of the most important and wealthy towns in Flanders, and of course suffered considerably in the numerous wars of the period. It was the birthplace of Charles V.; but the inhabitants have no reason to respect his memory, as he repeatedly loaded them with heavy exactions, and built the citadel to awe them. Here, in 1576, was concluded the famous treaty called the Pacification of Ghent, the first commencement of the separation of seven provinces from the seventeen which then formed the Austrian Netherlands. The town has been often taken; the last time by the French, in 1792; from which period to 1814 it was the capital of the department Scheldt. In 1814 it was incorporated with the kingdom of the Netherlands.

GHENT, a township of the state of New York, United States, 27 miles S. of Albany. Pop. 2,500.

GHERARDESCA, UGOLINO DELLA, ga-rar-des'-ca, a nobleman of Pisa, a leader of the Guelphic party, who, in conjunction with Giovanni Visconte, endeavoured to obtain supreme power. Being banished from the city, he united with the Florentines, and regained his possessions. In a battle with the Genoese, in 1284, he abandoned his countrymen, and so caused the destruction of the fleet and the surrender of 10,000 men as prisoners. After this disaster, the Florentines, Lucchese, and others united against Pisa, and in their extremity, the Pisans, knowing his ability, and forgetting his former conduct, besought Ugolino to accept the supreme power. His tyranny, however, was so unbearable, that a conspiracy was formed, and he was imprisoned, with two sons and two grandsons, in the tower of Gualandi, where they were starved to death. The tower is still known as the "tower of hunger." The story of Ugolino's fall is told with terrible power by Dante in his "Inferno."

Died 1288.

GHERIAH, ge-re-a', a small town of British India, in the presidency of Bombay. It was the principal port of Angria, a famous piratical prince, whose fort here was taken, and his whole fleet destroyed, by Admiral Watson and Colonel Clive, in conjunction with the Mahrattas, in 1756. Lat. 16° 45′ N. Lon. 73° 7′ E.

GHERZEH, ger'-za, a maritime town of Asiatic Turkey, on the S. coast of the Black Sea, 16 miles S.E. of Sinope. A small coasting trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

GHIAMDA, a town of Thibet, 110 miles N.E. of Lassa. There are two immense Buddhist tempies. A large trade is carried on in deers' horns and lapis lazuli.

GHIBERTI, LORENZO, ge-ber'-te, Italian sculptor, famous for the execution of the beautiful bronze gates of the Baptistery of Florence. (See FLORENCE.) Other works of his, of great beauty, are in the cathedral of Florence, and he was also a fresco painter of great ability.

Born at Florence, 1378; died 1455.

GHIKA, ALEXANDER, ge-ka, hospodar of Wallachia, one of a princely family of Albanian origin. He was elevated to the dignity in 1834, and distinguished himself by encouraging education and as a leader of the national party, known as "Young Roumania." This raised a great opposition, and in 1842 the Turkish government deprived him of the hospodarat. He went to Vienna, where he resided until 1853, when he returned to Wallachia, and in 1856 he was elected to the government of the principality, with the title of caimacam, and retained that position till 1859.

Born 1795; died 1862.

GHIKA, GREGORY, hospodar of Moldavia, appointed by the Sultan of Turkey, in 1849. During his administration he effected great improvements; but the occupation of the principality by the Russians in 1853 caused his temporary resignation. He resumed office in the following year, abolished serfdom and the censorship of the press, and greatly encouraged commercial intercourse. In 1856 he retired from office and went to France.

Born in Moldavia, 1807; died 1857.

GHIKA, HELENA, Princess Koltzoff Massalsky, better known as "Doria d'Istria," a nom de plume, niece of Alexander Ghika (see above), having been carefully instructed in the classics, travelled in France, Germany, and Italy, and made herself familiar with modern languages and literature. When only 15 years of age, she translated the "Iliad" into German, and has written many books descriptive of life in the East and of travel.

Born at Bucharest, 1829.

GHILAN, ge-lan', a province of Persia proper, extending along the S.W. coast of the Caspian Sea, and supposed to be the Hyrcania of the ancients. It has Russia to the N., Azerbijzan and part of Irak-Agemi to the W., and Mazanderan to the S.E. It is about 150 miles long, and 70 broad. The sea forms its boundary on one side, and on the other is the Elburz range, high mountains, covered with various sorts of fruit-trees. In the highest parts of them are deer, bears, wolves, leopards, and tigers. It is extremely fertile, producing silk, oil, wine, rice, tobacco, mulberry, box, walnut-trees, and excellent fruits in abundance. Pop. Unascertained. The capital of Ghilan is RESHD, at which an extensive trade is carried on, and the manufacture of silk.

GHIR, GEER, or RAS-AFERAI, CAPE, gir, a headland in Morocco, 62 miles S.W. of Mogador. The highest point is 1,235 feet above the sea level. Lat. 30° 37′ N. Lon. 9° 52′ W.

GHIRLANDAJO, or CORRADI, DOMENICO, geer'-lan-da'-jo, a Florentine painter; was intended for a goldsmith, but, having a strong passion for painting, cultivated that art with success. At Florence, in the church of Santa Maria Novella, is his picture of the "Massacre of the Innocents," and in the gallery of the Louvre at Paris, "The Visitation of St. Ann to the Virgin;" but, perhaps, he deserves most to be celebrated for being the tutor of Michael Angelo.

Born 1449; died 1493.

GHIUSTENDIL, geus-ten-dil', a walled town of European Turkey, near the right bank of the Kara-su, nearly 200 miles N.W. of Adrianople. There are sulphurous baths. Pop. 10,000.

GHIZEH, gi'-ze(r), a town of Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, 3 miles S.W. of Cairo. Near here is the great pyramid. It was formerly a beautiful town, with palaces and mosques; but is now a miserable village in the midst of ruins.

GHIZNI, or GHUZNEE, giz-'ne, a fortified city of Afghanistan, built on a hill at the extremity of a mountain-range, 7,720 feet high, and 80 miles from Cabul. It was the capital of a powerful empire of the same name. It is called the second Medina, from the great number of illustrious persons who have been interred there. The old town of Ghizni was destroyed in the 12th century, and the modern one stands on a site about 3 miles from the ruins of the other. It was stormed and taken by the British under Lord Keane in 1839. In 1842 its garrison gave it up to the Afghans, from whom, in the same year, it was retaken by the forces under General Nott. Pop. about 8,000. Lat. 33° 34′ N. Lon. 68° 18′ E.

GHIZNI, or GHUZNEE RIVER, rises about 12 miles N. of the above town, and after a course of 60 miles falls into a lake called Abistada, in lat. 32° 35′ N.; lon. 68° E.

GHORE, gor, a mountainous district in Afghanistan, S.E. of Herat. It was the original possession of Mahmoud of Ghore, who, in the 12th century, founded the Afghan dynasty.

GHUMURDJINA, or KOMULDSINA, goo-murd-jé'-na, a town of Turkey in Europe, on the right bank of the Karardji, about 80 miles S.W. of Adrianople. There are large bazaars. The town is protected by a small citadel. Pop. 8,000.

GHUZEL-HISSAR, goo'-zel his'-sar, a town of Anatolia, Asia Minor, 55 miles from Smyrna. Pop. Unascertained, but considerable.

GIANIBELLI, or GIAMBELLI, FREDERIGO, je-an'-e-bel-le, military engineer. He was of Italian birth, and having served for some time in his own country, went to Antwerp, and afterwards to England. Queen Elizabeth sent him to assist the inhabitants of Antwerp against the Duke of Parma, who was besieging the town, and had thrown a large bridge across the Scheldt, interrupting communication with the sea, and so cutting off all means of obtaining assistance. Gianibelli contrived an explosive machine and blew up the bridge, 800 of the enemy being killed, and many ships destroyed. He was afterwards employed to fortify the coast of England, at the time of the threatened Spanish invasion, and proposed the plan so successfully carried out, of sending fire-ships into the midst of the great Armada. He died in London, but nothing more is known of his later years.

Born at Mantua, 1530.

GIANNONE, PIETRO, jé'-an-no-nai, Italian lawyer and historian. Having made a competent fortune at the bar, he retired from practice, and devoted himself to historical researches. His great work, at which he worked for twenty years, was the "Civil History of the Kingdom of Naples." Some severe strictures on the corruptions of the Roman Catholic Church excited the animosity of the priests, the author was compelled to seek refuge at Vienna, and the pope condemned the book as heretical and libellous. The emperor Charles VI. gave him a small pension, of which he was afterwards deprived, and then he retired to Geneva. He was induced by a false pretence to enter the Sardinian territory, and was arrested and imprisoned at Turin. He died in the fortress after a captivity of twelve years.

Born at Ischitella, near Naples, 1676; died 1748.

GIANT'S CAUSEWAY, a remarkable columnar formation of basaltic rock, running along the shore on the N. coast of Antrim, Ireland, 15 miles from Coleraine. Lat. 55° 20′ N. Lon. 6° 50′ W.

GIARRETTA, or SIMETO, je-ar-ret'-ta, a river of Sicily, which, with its affluents, waters the plain of Catania and the country W. of Mount Etna, on the western slope of which it rises, about 15 miles S.E. of Caronia, and, after a course of 40 miles, falls into the Mediterranean, 6 miles S.E. of Catania.

GIAVENO, je-a-ven'-no, a walled town of northern Italy, on the left bank of the Sangone, 17 miles S.W. of Turin. There is a castle, erected in the 14th century. The town was formerly of much greater importance than at present. Manf. Linen, cotton, leather, and silk. Pop. 10,117.

GIBBON, EDWARD, gib'-bon, one of the most distinguished of English historians, was descended from an ancient family of Kent. He was first placed at a private school at Kingston, and next at Westminster school, whence he was removed to Magdalen College, Oxford. While there, he read books of controversial divinity, particularly those between the Papists and Protestants, and conceived that the truth lay on the side of the Romanists. Accordingly, in 1753, he renounced heresy at the feet of a Roman Catholic priest in London. His father was greatly concerned at this, and to reclaim him sent him to Lausanne, in Switzerland, under the care of Mr. Pavilliard, a Calvinist minister, by whose instructions he was convinced of the errors of the Romish church, and on the Christmas-day of 1754, just eighteen months after his conversion to Romanism, he received the sacrament according to the Reformed communion. While at Lausanne he pursued his classical studies with ardour, labouring to acquire, at least, a creditable acquaintance with the Greek, Latin, and French languages. He here fell in love with the daughter of a minister, a clever and beautiful girl named Susan Curchod, but was dissuaded from entering into the married state by the force of paternal remonstrance; and he lived single the remainder of his life. The lady afterwards became the wife of the famous Necker and the mother of Madame de Staël. In 1758 he returned to England, where he began to collect a noble library; and in 1761 published, in French, a small volume entitled "Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature." He was, at this time, a captain in the Hampshire militia, which he resigned at the peace of 1763, when he visited Paris, and thence went again to Lausanne. He next travelled into Italy; and in 1767 he assisted M. Deyverdun in writing the "Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne." Of these memoirs he says, "I will presume to say that their merit was superior to their reputation; but it is not less true that they were productive of more reputation than emolument." In 1770, he published in English a pamphlet, entitled "Critical Observations on the Sixth Book of the Æneid;" the design of which was to refute bishop Warburton's hypothesis on the descent of Æneas. The same year, by the death of his father, he came into the possession of the family estate; but it was much involved. In 1774 he was returned to parliament for Liskeard; but though he sat eight years, he never distinguished himself as a speaker, always giving a silent vote for the minister. In 1776 appeared the first volume of his great work, the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," which was afterwards extended to six volumes 4to. "It was at Rome," he tells us, "on the 15th October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind." Splendid, however, as is this history, it must be observed that its author opened a masked battery against Christianity in several places, but especially in two chapters of the first volume, on the growth and progress of that religion. Several writers attacked the historian, to one of whom only, Mr. Davis, who had charged the author with want of fidelity, Mr. Gibbon vouchsafed a reply. He was employed by ministers in writing a memoir in justification of this country's going to war with France, for the part taken by that court in the American contest. This piece was written in French, and was greatly admired. For this he obtained a seat at the Board of Trade, which he lost on the abolition of that board by Mr. Burke's bill. In 1783 he returned once more to Lausanne, where he employed himself in completing his history. When he had concluded a work so grand in its subject, and so majestic in its treatment, he thus beautifully describes his emotions:—"It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a bureau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom, and, perhaps, the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that, whatsoever might be the future fate of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious." The French revolution now began to disturb the neighbouring states, and Mr. Gibbon returned to England. The immediate cause of his death was a rupture and hydrocele, which he had concealed for more than thirty years. He was very corpulent and unwieldy, and this peculiarity was made more apparent from the vanity he exhibited in endeavouring to imitate the manners of the fashionable men of his time. After his death appeared his posthumous works, with his memoirs, written by himself, and finished by his friend lord Sheffield.

Born at Putney, 1737; died in London, 1794.

GIBBONS, GRINLING, an eminent English carver in wood, was the son of a Dutchman who settled in England. Grinling was appointed by Charles II. to a place under the Board of Works, and he was employed in ornamenting several of the royal palaces. He carved the foliage in the chapel at Windsor, the choir of St. Paul's cathedral, and the admirable font in St. James's church, Westminster. There is some of his carving in St. James's church, Piccadilly; but his principal performance is said to be at Petworth. He was also an excellent artist in marble and bronze, and executed the statue of James II. behind the banqueting house at Whitehall, and other monuments.

Born 1648; died 1721.

GIBBONS, ORLANDO, an eminent English musician, who became organist of the Chapel Royal at the age of 21; and, in 1622, was created doctor of music by the university of Oxford. Some of his anthems and madrigals are considered masterpieces. He caught the small-pox while attending the marriage ceremonial of Charles I., for which he composed the music, and died of the disease.

Born at Cambridge, 1583; died at Canterbury, 1625.

GIBBS, JAMES, gibs, a Scotch architect, who designed the churches of St. Martin's and St. Mary le Strand, London; the senate-house, and the improvements of King's College, Cambridge, and other works.

Born at Aberdeen, 1674; died 1754.

GIBEON, gib'-e-on, "a hill," a city 5 miles N.W. of Jerusalem, allotted to Judah.

GIBRAELON, jib-ra-ai'-lon, a town of Spain, in the province of Huelva, on the left bank of the Odiel, 7 miles N.E. of Huelva. One of the two churches is a handsome building. There are the remains of two old forts. A trade in corn, wine, wool, and fruit is carried on, and an annual fair is held. Pop. 2,800.

GIBRALTAR, jib-ral'-tar, a fortified seaport-town and garrison, occupying a promontory in the southern extremity of Spain, at the entrance from the Atlantic into the Mediterranean. The promontory forms the eastern side of the Bay of Gibraltar, called also the Bay of Algesiras, from the Spanish town on the opposite side. The bay is about 5 miles wide. The promontory of Gibraltar consists of a high rocky mountain, the ancient "Mons Calpe," and one of the "pillars of Hercules," running from N. to S., about 3 miles in length, from half a mile to three-fourths in width, and at its highest point, the Sugar Loaf, 1439 feet high. The rock is perforated by numerous caverns, one chamber above the other, the lowest being beneath the level of the sea. On the N. side is a sandy isthmus, about a mile and a half in length, and half as much in breadth, which connects the "rock" with the continent. The N. front of the rock is almost perpendicular; the E. side is full of frightful precipices; while the S., Point Europa, being narrow and abrupt, presents hardly any possibility of approach, even to an enemy in command of the sea. On none of these sides has the garrison ever been attacked. There remains only the W. front, which is almost as abrupt as the others, but which may be approached by shipping from the bay, and presents a kind of pied à terre in the level spot on which the town is built. Here, accordingly, have the efforts of assailants been directed, and here are the great batteries and works of defence. The zoology of the rock comprises monkeys without tails, the only species of that animal to be found native in any part of Europe. There are also rabbits, woodcocks, and snakes. The town stands at the foot of the promontory, on its N.W. side. Though fortified in itself, its chief protection is derived from the batteries on the neighbouring heights, which sweep both the isthmus and the approach by water. The houses have flat roofs and large bow windows; they are generally painted black, with a white stripe to mark each story or floor; the black is intended to blunt the dazzling rays of the sun. One large street traverses almost the whole town; it is nearly half a mile in length, and full of shops. Two other busy streets run in a parallel direction. The chief public buildings are the navy hospital, the victualling office, the Admiralty, the barracks, and the house of the lieutenant-governor. The places of worship are two English churches, two Catholic chapels, other chapels, and two synagogues; here are also a small but elegant theatre and a garrison library. Eliott's Gardens, at the north end of the town, are laid out for a public promenade, and there is a bronze statue of general Eliott, Lord Heathfield. The place is a general entrepôt for the manufactures of England, and other produce, such as sugar, rum, tobacco, rice, flour, wine, fruits, silk, and wax.

Pop.—18,831.

History.—In 711, when the Saracens passed into Spain, a chief named Tarik fortified the rock, which was named from him, Gebel-Tarik, or "hill of Tarik," from which the present name is derived. The "rock" was first fortified in the modern style in the reign of Charles V. It was surprised by the English, under Sir George Rooke, in 1704, soon after the commencement of the war of the Spanish succession: it has since been repeatedly besieged; first in 1705, next in 1727, and lastly in 1782, when, under General Eliott (see ELIOTT), it withstood a terrific siege by the French and Spaniards for more than three years. Since then the British have retained possession.

GIBRALTAR, STRAITS OF, form the passage between the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, having Spain on the N., and Morocco in Africa on the S. They are 36 miles long, with a breadth of from 15 to 24. A strong current always runs through these straits, from the ocean into the Mediterranean.

GIBRALTAR, SAN ANTONIO DE, a town of Venezuela, South America, in the state of Zulia, on a small river which falls into the lake of Maracaybo, and situated in the centre of a very fertile region. It was founded as early as 1552. Pop. 3,500.

GIBSON, EDMUND, gib'-son, a learned prelate, who, being sent to Queen's College, Oxford, applied himself particularly to the study of the northern languages. In 1691 he published a new edition of Drummond's "Polemo-Middiana," and James V. of Scotland's "Cantilena Rustica," with curious notes. The next year he published a Latin version of the "Chronicon Saxonicum," with notes. These works were followed by another volume, entitled "Librorum Manuscriptorum in duabus Insignibus Bibliothecis, altera Dugdaliana Oxonii, Catalogus," dedicated to Bishop Denison, which procured him the patronage of that prelate, who appointed him his chaplain. Three years afterwards, his edition of Camden's "Britannia" appeared, with considerable additions; and in 1713 he published his "Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani," in folio, which procured him the applause of the friends of the church, and much censure from those opposed to it. In 1715, Dr. Gibson was made bishop of Lincoln, and in 1723 translated to London.

Born at Bampton, Westmoreland, 1669; died at Bath, 1748.

GIBSON, JOHN, R.A., an eminent English sculptor, who, at the age of 14, was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, but afterwards became a wood-carver. At the age of 16, however, he quitted this employment, for the marble-works of Messrs. Francis, in Liverpool, who purchased the remaining portion of his time at the wood-carving for £70. He was now in a congenial atmosphere, and commenced modelling, and working with the chisel. His genius soon began to develop itself, and he attracted the attention of Mr. Roscoe, who allowed him to study his art treasures. At the age of 26, he was sent, by means of a private subscription, to Rome, for the purpose of studying the works of the great masters. In 1817 he arrived at the "ancient Capitol," with letters of introduction to Canova, who gave him a kind reception. He entered the studio of this great artist, and, in 1821, took a studio for himself. From that period he resided in Rome, making few visits to his native country. His first work was a group of "Mars and Cupid," which brought him a commission for it to be executed in marble for the duke of Devonshire. It now forms one of the principal features in the Chatsworth collection. From this time his fame rose; but, to render it the more certain and lasting he took lessons from Thorwaldsen, the great Danish sculptor. Having, by close application, completely mastered his art, he worked most in the poetical field of sculpture, and produced many fine pieces. His innovation of tinting the marble of some of his statues, especially the famous Venus, excited a warm art controversy. He has, however, executed several portrait statues of great merit; among which may be noticed one of Sir Robert Peel for Westminster Abbey, another of George Stephenson, and another of her Majesty Queen Victoria for Buckingham Palace. He has been the first modern sculptor to introduce the use of colouring into his statues, an innovation which has occasioned much discussion, but which he defends by instancing Grecian precedents. In 1833 he was elected an A.R.A., and in 1836 an R.A.

Born at Conway, North Wales, 1790; died 1866.

GIBSON, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 512 square miles. Pop. 22,742.—The capital is Princeton.

GIBSON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 660 square miles. Pop. 32,685.—Trenton is the capital.

GIDEON, gid'-e-on, "a cutter down," a famous judge of Israel.

GIEN, je-on(g)', a town of France, department of Loiret, on a hill on the right bank of the Loire, 38 miles S.E. of Orleans. A handsome stone bridge of 12 arches crosses the river. There are an old church, St. Etienne, and an ancient castle. Manf. Faience porcelain, serges, and leather. Pop. 6,100.

GIENGEN, geeng'-en, a town of Wurtemberg, on the Brenz, 7 miles S.E. of Heidenheim. One of the two churches is a fine building, with two towers. Manf. Linen and woollen goods, felt, paper, and cutlery. Pop. 2,000.—In its vicinity are the baths of Wildbad.

GIESELER, JOHANN KARL LUDWIG, gees-é'-ler, German ecclesiastical historian, who, having attracted attention by an essay on the Gospels, was, in 1819, appointed professor of theology at the university of Bonn. There he wrote his great work on church history. In 1831 he became professor at Göttingen; in 1837 a consistorial councillor, and was afterwards made a knight of the Guelphs.

Born near Minden, 1792; died 1854.

GIESSEN, gees'-sen, the chief town of the province of Upper Hesse, in the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the Lahn, near its confluence with the Wieseck, 34 miles N. of Frankfort-on-the Maine. It has a castle, an arsenal, town-hall, observatory, and university, founded in 1607, which, under Baron Liebig, became famous as a school of organic chemistry, and is attended by students from every part of Europe. Manf. Woollen goods, leather, liqueurs, vinegar, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 19,423.

GIFFARD, WILLIAM, gif'-fard, a modern English writer, was the son of poor parents, and was left an orphan before he had reached his 13th year. He was apprenticed to the sea; but, disliking that occupation, he was put to shoemaking, at which employment he continued till he was 20 years of age. By that time he had disclosed some qualities of genius, and a Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon of Ashburton, sent him to Exeter College, Oxford. After leaving college, he made the tour of Europe, as the travelling companion of Lord Belgrave; and, on his return to England, settled in London as a literary man. In 1794 he published his "Baviad," a poetical satire, which annihilated the "Della Crusca" school of poets. In the following year his "Maviad" appeared, and showed the low state to which dramatic authorship had then fallen. In 1797 he became the editor of the "Anti-Jacobin," established by Mr. Canning and other gentlemen, and got entangled in a quarrel with Dr. Wolcot, to whom, as Peter Pindar, he wrote a poetical epistle. His influence with political leaders obtained for him various lucrative offices. In 1802 he published his translation of Juvenal, which Sir Walter Scott says "is the best version ever made of a classical author." In 1804 his edition of Massinger appeared, and, in 1816, that of Ben Jonson. Subsequently, editions both of Ford and Shirley were published, but not entirely edited by him, his death having taken place before he had completed them. In 1808 he became the editor of the London "Quarterly Review;" and it is in this capacity that he is best known. As a critic, he has been much censured for his severity, with which he mingled no inconsiderable degree of injustice. "He was a man with whom I had no literary sympathies," says Southey; "perhaps there was nothing upon which we agreed, except great political questions. . . . He had a heart full of kindness for all living creatures except authors; them he regarded as a fishmonger regards eels, or as Isaac Walton did worms, e' gs, and frogs. I always protested against the indulgence of that temper in his Review." Scott says he was good "as a commentator;" but, as a critic, the "fault of extreme severity went through his critical labours; and, in general, he flagellated with so little pity, that people lost their sense of the criminal's guilt in dislike of the savage pleasure which the executioner seemed to take in inflicting punishment." He held the editorship of the Review till 1824.

Born at Ashburton, Devonshire, 1756; died in London, 1826.

GIFHORN, gif-horn, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hanover, at the confluence of the Ise and Aller. The old castle is now used as a court-house. Pop. 2,700.

GIGANTES, ji-gan'-tees, "the giants," in Greek mythology, the sons of Cœlus and Terra. (See CŒLUS.) They are represented as men of uncommon stature, with proportionate strength. Some of them, as Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, had fifty heads and a hundred arms, and serpents instead of legs. The defeat of the Titans incensed them against Jupiter, and they all conspired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to assist him. The giants heaped Mount Ossa upon Pelion, so as to more easily scale the walls of heaven. The gods then fled with consternation into Egypt, where they assumed the shape of different animals, to screen themselves from their pursuers. Jupiter, however, by the advice of Pallas, armed his son Hercules in his cause, who soon defeated them.

GIGHA, gig'-ha, one of the Hebrides. (See HEBRIDES.)

GIGLIO, ISOLA DI, geel'-ye-o, a mountainous and fertile island in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Italy, 8 miles S.W. of the peninsula of Mount Argentaro. It is about 5 miles long. There is a small town of the same name. Pop. 1,800.

GIHON, gi'-hon, "a valley of grace," a river of Eden, and a fountain of Jerusalem.

GIJON, ge'-jone, a fortified town and seaport of Spain, in the province of Oviedo, on a low peninsula, projecting into the Bay of Biscay, 20 miles N.E. of Oviedo. Manf. Linen fabrics, stone wares, and hats. It has a considerable trade in fruit and nuts, and steamers call regularly at the port. Pop. 6,506.

GIL, SAN, or ST. GILES, jil, a town of the state of Boyaca, United States of Colombia, South America. Manf. Cotton goods and tobacco. Pop. 6,000.—The town was founded in 1690.

GIL, VICENTE, Portuguese dramatist, who studied law at the university of Lisbon, but a pastoral poem having attracted the notice of the queen, he was encouraged to adopt a literary career, and wrote several dramatic pieces, which were the first of the kind in Portuguese literature, and he deserves the credit of having founded the national theatre.

Born 1485; died 1557.

GIL POLO, GASPAR, Spanish poet, who held some important offices under Philip II., and was superintendent of the royal patrimony at Barcelona. He wrote many lyrics, and a pastoral, which is highly commended by Cervantes, in "Don Quixote."

Born 1516; died 1572.

GILA, RIO, je'-la, a river of North America, rising in the Sierra Mimbres, New Mexico, and, after a course of 450 miles, joining the Colorado, about 70 miles above the point of discharge of that river into the Gulf of California. The river is navigable for boats for about 180 miles.

GILAD, ge-lad', a small town of Hungary, on a branch of the Temer. Pop. 4,000, nearly all Wallachians.

GILBERT, SIR HUMPHREY, gil'-bert, an English navigator, whose mother becoming a widow, married a Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the celebrated Sir Walter. Humphrey served with reputation in Ireland, and, for his services there, was knighted. In 1576 he published a discourse to prove a passage by the N.W. to Cathay and the East Indies. Two years afterwards, he obtained a patent for establishing settlements in North America, and, in 1583, took possession of Newfoundland, where he thought to find silver mines. On his return from a second voyage thither, the vessel foundered, and all on board perished. Longfellow has a beautiful poem on the fate of the brave navigator.

Born at Dartmouth, 1539; died 1584.

GILBERT, WILLIAM, natural philosopher and physician. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1573 became a member of the College of Physicians, and was appointed physician to Queen Elizabeth. In 1600 he was chosen president of the college, and in the same year published a work, entitled "De Magnete, Magneticisque Corporibus, et de Magno Magnete Tellure, Physiologia Nova," in which are many important suggestions for the improvement of navigation. Indeed, this work contains the history of all that had been written on the subject of terrestrial magnetism, and anticipated the relation of electricity and magnetism before his time, and forms the first regular system upon it. It may be viewed as the parent of all the improvements that have been therein since made. Galileo spoke of Gilbert in the warmest terms of admiration, and Lord Bacon, in his "Advancement of Learning," calls the book "a painful and experimental work."

Born at Colchester, 1540; died in London, 1603.

GILBERT ISLANDS, or KINGSMILLS, a group off the south-west coast of Terra del Fuego, South America.

GILBERT ISLANDS, a group of 15 coral islands, part of the Mulgrave archipelago, in the Pacific Ocean. The two largest are Drummond's Isle, 30 miles long, and Knox's Isle, 20 miles long, but both very narrow. Pop. 60,000, resembling the Malays in appearance. Lat. between 1° S. and 2° 30′ N. Lon. between 172° and 174° 30′ E.

GILDAS, gil'-das, a British monk and chronicler, who visited France and Ireland, and wrote a poor chronicle of the occupation of Britain by the Romans, and of the occurrences in Britain after their departure.

Born 516; died 570.

GILDONE, geel-do'-nai, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Tappino, 6 miles S.E. of Campobasso. Several annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,600.

GILEAD, gil'-e-ad ("region of rocks,") a district of elevated, rocky country, to the east of the river Jordan.

GILES, jiles, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 36,014.—Pulaski is the capital.

GILES, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 584 square miles. Pop. 8,794.—The capital is Parisburg.

GILGAL, gil'-gal, a "wheel," or "revolution," a city near the Jordan, where the Israelites passed the river into Canaan.

GILIMER, gil'-i-mer, the last king of the Vandals in Africa, was the descendant of Genseric, and took possession of the throne in 531, having deposed his cousin, the feeble Hilderic. Justinian, the emperor of the East, wishing to avenge his ally, or make use of this pretext to attack the Vandals, sent Belisarius against the usurper. This general took possession of Carthage, defeated Gilimer in 534, at the battle of Tricameron, and captured the king, who was conducted in triumph to Constantinople, repeatedly exclaiming, as he was led along, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." Justinian made of the kingdom of the Vandals a province of his empire, but gave Gilimer a large domain in Galicia.

Died 534.

GHILGIT, gil-git, a small independent country of Asia, on the southern declivity of the Hindoo Koosh Mountains, between Little Tibet on the E. and Kaferestan on the W. The chief town is on the left bank of a river of the same name, 150 miles N.E. of Attock. Lat. 35° 35′ N. Lon. 74° 15′ E.

GILL, ALEXANDER, gil, a famous English schoolmaster, who, in 1608, became master of St. Paul's school, where he educated many eminent persons, and among the rest, Milton. He was the author of several religious treatises and commentaries.

Born in Lincolnshire, 1564; died 1635.

GILLES, PETER, zheel, a French naturalist, one of the first who made useful researches into the natural sciences. He visited the shores of the Adriatic and Mediterranean, was sent to the Levant by the order of Francis I., explored the ruins of Chalcedon, and returned from Constantinople with the French ambassador in 1550. He wrote "De Vi et Naturâ Animalium," "De Bosphoro Thracio," and "De Topographiâ Constantinopoleos."

Born at Alby, 1490; died at Rome, 1555.

GILLES, ST., an old town of France, department Gard, 12 miles S.E. of Nismes. The beautiful abbey church, built in the 11th century, is famous for its western front, of Romanesque architecture, and highly decorated. A strong red wine is produced in the neighbourhood, and there is a good trade in wine and brandy. Pop. 5,500.

GILLIES, JOHN, LL.D., gil'-lee, Scottish historian, was educated at the university of Glasgow, and was for some time a travelling tutor to the sons of the earl of Hopetoun. On the death of Dr. Robertson, however, he was appointed historiographer for Scotland, and distinguished himself by his literary labours. He wrote a "History of Greece," a translation of the "Ethics and Politics of Aristotle," "A View of the Reign of Frederick II. of Prussia," the "Orations of Isocrates and Lysias," and a "History of the World from Alexander to Augustus."

Born at Brechin, 1747; died 1836.

GILLINGHAM, gil'-ling-ham, a town in Kent, 2 miles from Chatham, and inhabited principally by persons belonging to the dockyard. The streets are wide, and, from their declivity, remarkably clean. Pop. 20,808.—It is noted in history for being the place where 600 Norman gentlemen, who came over in the retinue of the princes Alfred and Edward, were barbarously murdered, in the beginning of the 11th century, by Earl Godwin.

GILLRAY, JAMES, gil'-rai, political caricaturist, an engraver by profession, who published more than a thousand caricatures, chiefly attacking Napoleon and the French people, and the English ministry. He was clever, satirical and humorous, but spiteful, and frequently outrageously coarse.

Born 1785; died 1815.

GILMER, gil'-mer, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 793 square miles. Pop. 8,386.—The capital is Ellijay.

GILMER, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 512 square miles. Pop. 4,500.—The capital is Glenville.

GILOLO, or ALMAHERA, ge-lo'-lo, one of the Molucca Islands, in the Malay Archipelago, lying immediately under the equator, in lon. 128° E. It is of an extremely irregular form, consisting of a long mainland, with two large peninsulas, which are divided from each other by a deep bay, projecting from its E. side. On the N. and S. of these bays, the land again forms two peninsulas; so that the island may be said to consist of four peninsulas, which are separated from each other by deep bays. It is mountainous and densely wooded. There is a volcano, Cammacanore, 6,500 feet high. Pro. Nuts, fruits, spices, sago, cocoa, edible birds'-nests, pearls, and gold dust. Horses, sheep, and cattle are reared. Area, 6,500 square miles. Pop. 25,000.

GILPIN, BERNARD, gil'-pin, an English divine, who, from perusing the works of Erasmus, was one of the first who embraced the principles of the Reformation. Having travelled on the continent for some time, he returned to England in 1556, and was presented by his uncle, Bishop Tonstal, to the archdeaconry of Durham and the rectory of Easington. Being next presented to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, his labours there, in promoting the reformed religion, became so notorious, that Bishop Bonner gave orders for him to be arrested and sent to London. Gilpin prepared himself for the stake, but before he reached London, news came of Mary's death; on which he returned to his parish, to the great joy of his people. Queen Elizabeth subsequently offered him the bishopric of Carlisle, which he refused.

Born in Westmoreland, 1517; died 1583.

GILPIN, WILLIAM, an English divine and writer, who was the master, for many years, of a school at Cheam, in Surrey, and afterwards became vicar of Boldre, in Hampshire, and prebendary of Salisbury. Amongst other works, he wrote, "The Life of Bernard Gilpin," his ancestor, above mentioned; "The Lives of Latimer, Wickliffe, Huss, and Archbishop Cranmer;" "Exposition of the New Testament," "A Tour to the Lakes," "Remarks on Forest Scenery," "Observations on the River Wye," and "Picturesque Remarks on the Western Parts of England."

Born in Westmoreland, 1724; died 1804.

GIMINO, ge-mé'-no, a town of the Austrian empire, 60 miles N. of Fiume. There is a very handsome collegiate church, with a lofty tower, and old marble altar. Pop. 3,600.

GIMONE, zhee-mone', a river of France, rising in an offshoot of the Pyrenees, adjoining the Garonne, after a course of 65 miles. It is not navigable.

GIMONT, zhee-mawn(g)', a town of France, department Gers, on the Gimone, 15 miles E. of Auch. There is an old and interesting church. Pop. 3,000.

GINGEE, gin-ge. (See VIRGIN ISLANDS.)

GINGEE, a strong town on the coast of Coromandel, once the capital of a kingdom of the same name, 80 miles from Madras. It stands on a mountain, the top of which is divided into three points, on each of which is a castle. Pop. Unascertained. Towards the end of the 18th century, the Great Mogul unsuccessfully besieged this place for a period of three years.—In 1750 it was taken by the French, who, in 1761, ceded it to the British.

GIOBERTI, VINCENZO, jo-bair'-te, Italian politician and writer. He was educated for the church, ordained priest in 1825, and afterwards appointed professor of theology at Turin. King Charles Albert selected him as court chaplain, but in 1833 he was charged with promoting the liberal movement, dismissed from his office, imprisoned for four months, and then allowed to quit the country. He went to Paris and Brussels, supporting himself for twelve years as a private tutor. During this period he wrote an elaborate work on the civil and moral supremacy of the Italians, in which he advocated the confederation of the Italian States, with the king of Sardinia as military protector, and the pope as supreme arbitrator. This work made the author extremely popular, and he returned to Italy, where he was received with enthusiasm, and returned as a representative to the Sardinian parliament, and became senator, president of the chamber of deputies, and finally prime minister, but he only held office for a few weeks. He was the author of an introduction to the study of philosophy, and other works.

Born at Turin, 1801; died at Paris, 1853.

GIOCUNDO, FRA GIOVANNI, jo-koon'-do, an Italian architect and writer, constructed several buildings at Verona, where he had formerly kept a school, and had Julius Cæsar Scaliger for a pupil. In 1499 he was invited to Paris by Louis XII., and built the bridge of Notre Dame, Chamber of Accounts, &c. He also assisted Michael Angelo in the works of St. Peter's, at Rome, and published an edition of Vitruvius, and another of Cæsar's Commentaries.

Born at Verona, 1435; died 1521.

GIOJA, FLAVIO, jo'-e-a, an Italian pilot or sea-captain, to whom is ascribed the invention of the compass, which he first used, it is said, in 1302 or 1303. He marked the north with a fleur-de-lis, in honour of the sovereigns of Naples, who were a branch of the royal family of France.

Born at Pasitano, near Amalfi, at the end of the 13th century.

GIOJA, MELCHIORRE, Italian statistician, was educated for the priesthood, but preferred to direct his attention to social and economic science. In 1797 he was appointed state historiographer at Milan, but was deprived of the office in 1803. Three years afterwards he was appointed director of the statistical department. He wrote many laborious works in connection with his favourite researches.

Born at Piacenza, 1767; died at Milan, 1829.

GIOJA, a town of south Italy, 26 miles S. of Bari. It is a thriving, busy place. Pop. 17,000.

GIOJA, an ancient town of Italy, 28 miles N.E. of Reggio. It was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 1783. Pop. 1,000.

GIOJA, a town of Italy, 34 miles S. of Aquila. Pop. 2,400.

GIOJA, a town of Italy, 6 miles N.W. of Caserta. Pop. 3,600.

GIOJOSA, jo'-e-o-sa, a town of Italy, in the province of Reggio, Calabria Ulteriore. Pop. 7,000.

GIOJOSA, a town of Sicily, divided into an old and new town, near the Mediterranean, 4 miles N.W. of Patti. The old town having suffered much from earthquakes is now nearly deserted. Pop. 4,700.

GIORDANO, LUCA, jor-da'-no, an Italian painter, who having studied at Rome, Florence, and Venice, went to Madrid, and was in high favour with Charles II. of Spain, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood.

Born at Naples, 1632; died 1705.

GIORGIONE, or GIORGIO BARBARELLI, jor-jo'-nai, one of the earliest painters of the Venetian school, who executed a great number of frescoes, which time has destroyed. It is said that Titian worked under him to obtain his manner of colouring, but Giorgione perceiving his design, dismissed him. His finest work is a painting of "Christ carrying his Cross," at Venice.

Born at Castel Franco, 1478; died 1511.

GIOTTO, or AMBROGIOTTO BORDONE, jot'-to, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was in his youth a keeper of sheep, but Cimabue (see CIMABUE) discovered his talent, and took him as a pupil. Giotto, following his master in the study of nature, clothed her in more noble forms than he, and was thus the precursor of Rafaelle. Amongst the numerous works of this painter, may be mentioned a mosaic representing "Peter walking on the Water," in St. Peter's at Rome, and a "St. Francis," in the Louvre at Paris. He was also an architect of great ability, and executed several works at Florence, where, in 1834, he superintended the erection of the fortifications. He was the friend of Dante, and has transmitted the features of the poet in a little picture. In return, the author dedicated to the painter some verses in his "Divina Commedia." Lorenzo de' Medici erected a tomb to his memory in a church at Florence.

Born in Tuscany, 1276; died at Florence, 1336.

GIOVANNI, SAN, jo-van'-ne, a town of Italy, 3 miles E. of Naples, in the midst of a fertile district, where are many villas. It is generally known as San Giovanni a Teduccio, from the Italian form of the name of the emperor Theodosius. Pop. 7,000.

GIOVENAZZO, jo'-vai-nat'-so, a seaport-town of Italy, on the shore of the Adriatic, 14 miles N.W. of Bari. There are some remains of ancient walls, and the town contains several churches and convents. Pop. 7,000. This is supposed to be the Natolium of the Romans.

GIRALDI, GIGIO GREGORIO, je-ral'-de, an eminent Italian writer, the most esteemed of whose works are, "Syntagma de Diis Gentium," which is the first treatise on "Mythology" ever written, and "A History of the Greek and Latin poets."

Born at Ferrara, 1479; died 1552.

GIRALDI, JOHN BAPTIST CINTIO, an Italian poet and physician, who became secretary to the duke of Ferrara, and professor of rhetoric at Pavia. He wrote tragedies, poems, and histories; but his principal work is entitled "Ecatomiti; or A Hundred Novels."

Born at Ferrara, 1504; died 1573.

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, ji-ral'-dus kam-bren'-sis, an old English writer, whose real name was Gerald de Barri. He was the son of a Norman noble, by a Welsh princess. He studied at the university of Paris, and was appointed to several rich benefices under Henry II. and Richard I., and administered the bishopric of St. David. He accompanied prince John in his expedition to Ireland in 1185, and remained there some time writing his well-known work on that country. He afterwards made a tour of Wales, and went to France with king Richard I., and remained there for ten years. He was twice elected by the chapter bishop of St. David's, but in the first instance the king, Henry II., and in the second, the pope, refused to confirm the appointment. He was elected a third time, but declined to accept the see. His principal works are "Topographiæ Hibernicæ," "Itinerarium Cambriæ," "De Rebus a se gestis," which is a journal of his life, and displays no inconsiderable amount of vanity; "Ecclesiæ Speculum," in which he censures the manners of the monks.

Born near Pembroke, 1146; died at St. David's, 1220.

GIRARD, GABRIEL, zhe-rard', a French abbé and grammarian, author of "Synonymes François," a work which has been reprinted, with additions, many times. He was almoner to the duchess de Berry, and the king's interpreter for the Russian and Sclavonian languages. Besides the above, he wrote other works; among which the best known is "Principes de la Langue Françoise."

Born at Clermont, Auvergne, 1677; died 1748.

GIRARD, STEPHEN, an American millionnaire, who came of poor French parents, and being driven from his home, embarked as a cabin-boy at Bordeaux and landed at New York. Thence he went to Philadelphia, where he got into business, and by his industry and intelligence, combined with his avaricious habits, amassed an immense fortune. He left behind him nearly £3,000,000 sterling; and, by his will, did not leave his fortune to his family, but to found a college at Philadelphia, from which all ministers of religion were to be excluded.

Born at Périgueux, 1750; died at Philadelphia, 1831.

GIRARDIN, EMILE DE, zhe'-rar-dan(g), French politician and journalist. He was the illegitimate son of the royalist Gerard Girardin and Madame Dupuy, and was, up to his 25th year, known as Emile Delamothe. In 1827, however, he claimed the name by which he was afterwards to be known, and, in the same year, produced his first essay in literature, under the title of "Emile." This was followed, in the next year, by "Au Hasard, Fragmens sans Suite d'une Histoire sans Fin." This is the romance of his birth and his early years. Soon after, he founded two journals,—"Le Voleur," and "La Mode." In 1828, he married Mdlle. Delphine Gay. (See GIRARDIN, MADAME DE.) After 1830, M. de Girardin published successively the "Journal des Connaissances Utiles," which attained, in a few months, a circulation of 120,000; the "Journal des Instituteurs Primaires," the "Musée des Familles," "L'Almanach de France," of which more than a million copies were sold; an "Atlas de France," and a "Universal Atlas," at a halfpenny a map. All these were published as emanating from "A National Society for Intellectual Freedom," and had considerable influence on the progress of popular education. All this, however, did not suffice for his restless activity; and, in 1836, "La Presse" was started, as an organ of conservative policy. The appearance of this paper caused a complete change in Parisian journalism, and, attacked on all sides, M. de Girardin fought a duel with Armand Carrel (see that name), the editor of the "National," which ended fatally for the latter. In 1834 he was elected deputy by the college of Bourganeuf (Creuze), and was accused of electoral corruption. In 1839 he supported the minister Molé against the coalition, and, during the greater part of his career, Guizot had the support of the "Presse." In 1846 he was excluded from the French chamber, under the pretext that he was not a Frenchman. In February, 1848, he urged a revolution, and, penetrating into the Tuileries, presented to Louis Philippe a notice demanding his abdication and the regency of the duchess of Orleans. After the revolution, M. de Girardin was returned to the Assembly for the Lower Rhine, and voted with the "Mountain" party. To him is due, it is said, the gaining over of Victor Hugo to the republican cause; the poet being, with him, the principal editor of "L'Avénement." After Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of December 2, 1851, M. de Girardin was banished from France; but, two months after, was allowed to return. He again undertook the management of his journal, which he retained till the end of 1856, when he parted with his portion of the property for a sum which amounted to nearly £33,000 sterling. He afterwards was director of another journal, La Liberté, and, in 1872, became proprietor of the Journal Officiel. He has written a few pieces for the stage.

Born in Switzerland, 1802.

GIRARDIN, DELPHINE GAY, MADAME EMILE DE, a French poetess, the wife of the above, received a literary education, and, at 17, produced some poems, the patriotic character of which procured her the surname of the "Muse of the country." In 1822 she obtained a prize from the French Academy for her "Sœurs de Saint Camille;" and, during the three or four following years, she published many pieces on the Greeks, Romans, Franks, General Foy, Napoleon, and Charles X.; the latter allowing her, from his privy purse, a pension of 1,500 francs. After several other effusions, she went, in 1827, with her mother, Sophie Gay, to Italy, where quite an ovation attended her. In 1828, she married M. de Girardin, and, after this, wrote several fugitive pieces, elegies, and satires. But what, above all, contributed to the reputation of this lady, and to the success of her husband's journal, were her "Lettres Parisiennes," a series of sparkling, gossiping letters, published in "La Presse," with the signature of the Vicomte de Launay. She was also the author of several tragedies, comedies, and farces, many of which were eminently successful.

Born at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1804; died 1855.

GIRARDIN, ST. MARC, French author. At the age of 26 he was appointed professor in the college Louis-le-Grand, and was subsequently professor of history in the Faculty of Letters, and of poetry at the Sorbonne. In 1834 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and in 1844 became a member of the Academy. He resigned his professorship in 1863; in 1871 was elected a member of the National Assembly, and was elected vice-president. He was editor of the Débats, contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and wrote several works on the history of literature.

Born at Paris, 1801; died 1873.

GIRARDON, FRANCIS, zhé-rar-dawng, a French sculptor and architect, who, after studying under Anguier, was sent to Rome by Louis XIV., to perfect himself in his art. He succeeded Le Brun, on the death of that artist, as inspector-general of sculpture. His chief works are the mausoleum of Richelieu, in the church of the Sorbonne; the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., which formerly stood in the Place Vendôme, but was destroyed in the Revolution; and the "Rape of Proserpine," standing in the gardens of Versailles.

Born at Troyes, 1630; died at Paris, 1715.

GIRGEH, gir'-ge, a large town of Upper Egypt, near the left bank of the Nile. It has several mosques, a convent of Christian missionaries, and a government cotton factory. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 26° 20° N. Lon. 31° 58' E.

GIRGENTI, or GERGENTI, jeer-jain'-te, a city of Sicily, and the capital of a district of the same name, in the Val di Mazzara, nearly three miles from the coast. It adjoins the site of the ancient Agrigentum (see AGRIGENTUM), the magnificent ruins of which are still to be seen. The modern town stands on a high hill, and commands a beautiful prospect; but the streets are narrow, steep, and dirty. There are a cathedral, 45 churches, 15 convents, and an orphan asylum. The harbour is at a considerable distance, and was formed by a very fine mole, erected at the public expense in 1752. It is, however, the principal port in Sicily for the shipment of sulphur. Pop. 17,800.

GIRGENTI, a province of Sicily, on the S.W. coast. It is very mountainous, but there are some very fertile valleys. It is traversed by the river Platani, and bounded by the Belice on the N.W. and the Salso on the S.W. Manf. Bitumen, sulphur, naphtha, and salt. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 330,411.

GIRONDE, zhe-rond', a maritime department in the S.W. of France, having on its W. the Bay of Biscay, and inclosed on its other sides by the departments Landes, Lot-et-Garonne, Charente-Inférieure, and Dordogne. It is in general flat, and interspersed with lagoons, but fertile on the banks of the Garonne, along which it extends. The Landes, or sandy tracts, occupy nearly all the western half of the department. In the east are some hills of moderate elevation.

Rivers.—The Garonne and Dordogne, which, united, form the Gironde.

Pro.—Corn, fruit, hemp, timber, and turpentine. Most of the grapes which produce claret wine are grown in this department, and about 45,000,000 gallons of the finest wines are produced. The fisheries are important.

Manf.—Cottons, muslin, chemicals, and salt.

Area.—4,132 square miles.

Pop.—748,703.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—The department is divided into six arrondissements—Bordeaux, Bazas, Blaye, Lesparre, Libourne, and La Réole; and 541 communes. BORDEAUX is the capital.

GIRONDE, an estuary in the W. of France, formed by the union of the rivers Dordogne and Garonne. It is 50 miles long, with a breadth of from 2 to 7.

GIRONS, ST., zhé'-rawng, a town of France, in the department Ariége, 22 miles from Foix. Manf. Linens, woollens, and paper. Pop. 4,000.

GIRTIN, THOMAS, gir-tin, English painter in water colours, who, while an apprentice to a mechanical trade, attracted the attention of the earl of Essex, and was enabled to indulge his artistic tastes. He formed an intimate friendship with Turner, afterwards the famous painter, and they studied together. He produced many works of great beauty, but led an irregular life, and died early.

Born 1775; died 1802.

GIRVAN, gir'-van, a seaport town and burgh of barony, on the west coast of Scotland, in Ayrshire, 21 miles S.W. of Ayr. The town is pleasantly situate on the Girvan, at its confluence with the Irish Sea, and has a commodious harbour. A large quantity of coal is shipped for Belfast. Pop. 5,480.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

GISCO, gis'-ko, son of Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, was banished from Carthage by a cabal, but was afterwards recalled. He was then allowed to revenge himself on his enemies in any manner he thought fit, and contented himself with seeing them prostrate themselves on the ground, and placing his foot on their neck, to show them that their lives depended on his will. Soon after, he had the command in Sicily against the Corinthians, led by Timoleon, and made an advantageous peace with them.

Lived in the 4th century, B.C.

GISORS, zhé'-sors, a town of France, department of Eure, on the Epte, 33 miles N.E. of Evreux. Manf. Woollens, calico, lace, and cotton yarn. Pop. 3,400.—In October, 1198, the French were defeated by the English near this town; and on that occasion Richard Cœur-de-Lion gave as the watchward of the day "Dieu et mon Droit," which has since that time been the motto to the royal arms of England.

GISSI, jees'-se, a town of Italy, near the right bank of the Asinello, 17 miles S.E. of Lanciano. Pop. 3,800.

GITSCHIN, or GIEZIN, gits'-chen, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the Cydlina, 48 miles N.E. of Prague. The old town is surrounded by walls, but there are four suburbs. There are a fine old castle, and good public buildings. Four large fairs are held annually. Pop. 5,800.—This town was once the capital of the duchy of Friedland.

GIUGLIANO, joo'-le-a'-no, a town of Italy, 10 miles N.W. of Naples. It has a fine castle, four churches, and an hospital. Pop. 12,276.

GIULIANO, SAN, joo'-le-a'-no, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara, 5 miles N.E. of Trapani. It has several convents, a great many churches, and an hospital. Pop. 10,300.—On the summit of a hill in the neighbourhood, are the ruins of the temple of Venus, celebrated by Polybius, Virgil, Diodorus Siculus, and other ancient writers. The hill is called Mons Eryx.

GIULIANO, SAN, a town of Italy, 25 miles from Urbino. Manf. Principally straw hats. Pop. 3,000.

GIULINI, GIORGIO, joo-le'-ne, Italian historian and antiquary, who while very young received the degree of doctor from the university of Padua. He wrote an elaborate historical work on the Milanese territory, making great use of the evidence afforded by seals, documents, monuments, and coins. He was a man of benevolent character, and exhibited considerable musical and poetical talent. His death was caused by apoplexy.

Born at Milan, 1714; died 1780.

GIULIO PIPPI. (See ROMANO.)

GIURGEVO, ge-oor'-ge-vo, a town and river-port of Wallachia, on the left bank of the Danube, opposite Rutschuk, and about 40 miles S.W. of Bucharest, of which it is the port. It has a citadel, on an island in the river, connected with the town by a bridge, and although a mean looking place, is the most important town on the Wallachian side of the Danube. Pop. 11,000.—In 1773 the Turks were here defeated by the Russians, who took it in 1811, and again in 1829, when its defences were levelled with the ground. In 1854, the Russians were, in its neighbourhood, defeated by the Turks.

GIUSTI, GIUSEPPE, joos'-te, Italian satirical poet, studied law, and received the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Pisa. He was appointed minister of justice at Florence, and, under the name of "the Anonymous Tuscan," published a number of satirical poems, attacking with amazing vigour and poetical talent, the corruptions and shams of the age. The publication was stopped, but the verses circulated in manuscript, and greatly helped to produce the revolution of 1848. Then Giusti published under his own name. He was greatly beloved, and a large crowd of Florentine citizens attended his funeral, in defiance of a prohibition by the Austrian government. One of his most famous poems is the history of a boot, its misfits and ill-usage, the boot meaning Italy (shaped like a boot.)

Born at Pescia, 1809; died at Florence, 1850.

GIUSTINIANI, a famous family of Italy, members of which were doges of Venice and Genoa. There is a Giustiniani palace at Rome, once celebrated for its fine gallery of paintings, dispersed in 1807.

GIVET, zhé-vai, a fortified town of France, in the department Ardennes, on both banks of the Meuse, near the Belgian frontier. Charlemont, Notre Dame, and St. Hilaire, are the names of the chief forts, and from them are named portions of the town. There are barracks, a military hospital, and a port. Manf. Leather, white lead, clay pipes, sealing wax, and nails. Pop. 4,300.

GIVORS, zhé-vor, a town of France, in the department Rhone, 14 miles S. of Lyons, on the right bank of the Rhone. Manf. Bottles and window glass. Pop. 11,470.

GJASK, ge-yatsk', a town of Russia in Europe, on a river of the same name, 132 miles N.E. of Smolensk. Manf. Linen. There is a large trade in corn, hemp, and iron. Pop. 2,600.

GLADBACH, or MONCHEN GLADBACH, glad'-bak, a town of Prussia, in the district of Düsseldorf, on the small river Niers, 16 miles W. of Düsseldorf. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen goods, leather, wine, tobacco, and percussion caps. It has both dyeing and bleaching fields. Pop. 4,000.

GLADOVA, glad'-o-va, a town of Servia, situate immediately below the "Iron Gate" on the Danube, 10 miles from New Orsova. The Turkish name is Fet-Islam. It is a mean place, but is the principal station of the Danube Steam-Navigation Company. From 2 to 3 miles below it are the remains of a bridge built by Trajan across the Danube.

GLADSTONE, THE RIGHT HONOURABLE WILLIAM EWART, glad'-stone, statesman, orator, and author, the fourth son of a wealthy Liverpool merchant, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he greatly distinguished himself, taking a double first degree in 1831, and, in 1832, returned to the House of Commons as a member for Newark, in the Conservative interest. In 1834 he was appointed by Sir Robert Peel to a seat in the Treasury, and, in the following year, became under-secretary for colonial affairs. In the same year he retired, with his great leader, from office, and, till 1841, continued with Sir Robert Peel in opposition, when he became a privy-councillor, and was appointed vice-president of the Board of Trade and master of the Mint. In this position he greatly distinguished himself by his masterly defence of the commercial policy of the government he represented, and which it was his duty to explain. In 1843 he became president of the Board of Trade, which office he resigned in 1845. In the following year he became secretary of state for the colonies, and adhered to Sir Robert Peel's measure, which proposed a modification of the corn-laws. In 1847 he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford, in which position he found himself so frequently at variance with his friends on the bill for repealing the last of the Jewish disabilities, that, in 1852, he seceded from the Conservative party, and refused to take office under the administration of the earl of Derby. In the same year he was again returned for the university of Oxford, and chiefly contributed to the overthrow of the short-lived Derby government by his masterly speech on the budget introduced by Mr. Disraeli. On the accession of the Aberdeen ministry, he became chancellor of the Exchequer; and under the Palmerston administration, which succeeded it, held the same post; but resigned it in a few days, in consequence of Mr. Roebuck's determination to persevere in his resolution of having a committee of inquiry into the state of the British army before Sebastopol. For some time he remained out of office; but in the June of 1859 he was again appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, under the Palmerston ministry. In the early part of 1860 he brought in his budget, which carried out the principles of free trade in the path of Sir Robert Peel, and which gave a considerable impulse to commerce between England and France. In 1865 he was elected member for South Lancashire, and was selected to succeed Lord Palmerston as leader of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. At the general election of 1868, the Lancashire constituency failed to re-elect him, and he accepted the invitation of Greenwich, and was returned for that borough. In December, 1869, he became Premier, carried the Act for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Irish Land Bill, the Ballot Bill, and other important measures, but being defeated in an attempt to reform the Irish universities, appealed unsuccessfully to the country by a general election, and resigned office. He was re-elected for Greenwich. The disclosure of the atrocities committed by the Turks in Bulgaria, in 1876, was followed by a powerful pamphlet from his pen, and vigorous speeches on the same subject greatly stimulated the public indignation. In the winter of 1879, in anticipation of a general election, he made a great oratorical tour through Midlothian, Scotland, and at the election of April, 1880, he was returned for that county. The Conservative party being in a minority, Lord Beaconsfield resigned, and Mr. Gladstone became Premier and Chancellor of the Exchequer. During his premiership of that period, the government was in constant antagonism with the Irish party in Parliament, who resisted all efforts to exercise British authority. Mr. Gladstone tried every expedient which severity or conciliation could suggest, but all in vain, and the government was at length defeated by a combination of Conservative and Irish votes, in the memorable division of June 8, 1885, when the majority against the government was 264 to 252. The government immediately resigned, and a Conservative government was formed under the premiership of the Marquis of Salisbury. Parliament had previously passed acts for the universal establishment of household suffrage and the redistribution of seats, and the general election of the following November was looked forward to with eagerness. It resulted in the return of 335 Liberals, 249 Conservatives and 86 Parnellites, so that the Liberals were precisely balanced by the other two parties combined. A few days after the meeting of the new Parliament, the Conservative government, upon being defeated in a division, resigned, and Mr. Gladstone again became Premier. Dissensions immediately arose in his cabinet, owing to divided opinions on legislation for Ireland. Mr. Chamberlain and others resigned, and the cabinet had to be reconstituted. Mr. Gladstone ultimately introduced his Home Rule Bill, which, after extremely exciting debates, was defeated by 341 to 311, in the early morning of the 8th of June. Mr. Gladstone immediately determined to appeal to the country, as soon as necessary financial business was completed, and Parliament was consequently dissolved on the 26th of June. In the course of the consequent electoral campaign, Mr. Gladstone exhibited extraordinary powers of oratory, especially at Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester and Liverpool; and, under the active stimulus of his speeches, the election proceeded with unexampled animation. The result was a surprising falling off in the aggregate votes for all parties, a diminution in the number of opponents sitting on the Liberal side of the House, a still greater diminution in the number of Mr. Gladstone's supporters, and a large increase in the number of Conservative members. Upon the meeting of Parliament Mr. Gladstone announced his resignation, and though the Conservatives were still not a majority, they formed a government and accepted office, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons being Lord Randolph Churchill. (See CHURCHILL.)

Born at Liverpool, 1809.

GLAMORGAN, a county of Tasmania, on the eastern coast. The chief towns are Swansea, Llandaff and Eastbourne.

GLAMORGANSHIRE, gla-mor-gan'-sheer, the most southern county of Wales, being bounded W. and S. by the Bristol Channel, and on its other sides by the counties of Carmarthen, Brecon and Monmouth.

Rivers.—The principal rivers are the Rumney, Taff, Ely, Tame, Avon, Neath, and the Loughor (or Llwchnor), which divides the county from Carmarthenshire. The principal canals are the Cardiff to Merthyr Tydvil, the Neath, the Swansea and the Aberdare.

Pro.—The usual crops are wheat, barley and oats, with a rotation of the common green crops. Grazing is practised to a great extent, and the horned cattle are much esteemed. The horses are handsome, strong and active, and the sheep vie in form and quality with some of the best English breeds. But mineral riches have raised Glamorganshire to the greatest importance.

Minerals.—Ironstone, coal, limestone, and small quantities of lead and copper.

Trade and Manf.—The leading industries are coal mining and the smelting and manufacturing of iron and copper.

Area.—854 square miles.

Pop.—511,672, rapidly increasing.

Chief Towns.—CARDIFF, SWANSEA, MERTHYR TYDVIL, NEATH, ABERDARE, ABERAVON and LLANDAFF.

History.—The Welsh name, from which the present name is derived, is Gwlad Morgan. There are many traces of Roman occupation, and among the most interesting remains of buildings of later date are Caerphilly Castle, Cardiff Castle, Oystermouth Castle and Magram Abbey.

GLANVIL, JOSEPH, glan'-vil, an English divine, who, at the Restoration, became a member of the Royal Society, being a zealous advocate for the new philosophy. In 1666 he was presented to the rectory of the abbey church at Bath, at which time he published his "Considerations on the Being of Witches and Witchcraft," in which he certainly betrays considerable credulity. In 1678 he obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Worcester. Besides the above, he wrote several pieces in defence of revealed religion and experimental philosophy.

Born at Plymouth, 1636; died at Bath, 1680.

GLAPHYRE, or GLAPHYRA, glaf'-i-re, a daughter of Archelaus, the high priest of Bellona, in Cappadocia, celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. She obtained from M. Antony, by her wantonness, the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons.

Lived in the 1st century, B.C.

GLAPHYRE, grand-daughter of the above, and daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, married Alexander, son of Herod, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Alexander, she married her brother-in-law, Archelaus.

Lived in the 1st century.

GLARUS, or GLARIS, gla'-roos, a canton in the north-east of Switzerland, inclosed by St. Gall, the Grisons, Uri and Schwytz. It is mountainous (being traversed by an Alpine range 8,000 feet in average elevation), yet affording cattle, cheese, butter, orchards, and a prodigious variety of uncommon plants, metals, crystals, medicinal springs, petrifactions and large slates.

Manf.—Cotton, woollen, silk and muslin goods, paper, slates and the cheese known as Schabziger.

Area.—262 square miles.

Pop.—34,213, of whom about five-sixths are Protestants.

Chief Town.—GLARUS.

History.—Previous to the 14th century, Glarus was a portion of the dominions of Austria, but achieved its independence, and in 1388 joined the Swiss Confederation.

GLARUS, the capital of the above canton, is situate near the Lith, about 30 miles from Lucerne. It has a large Gothic church, used by both Protestants and Catholics, a townhall, a new government house, free-school, hospital, and public library. Manf. Woollens, linen, silks, muslins, paper, writing slates, and prints. Pop. 5,500.

GLAS, JOHN, glas, founder of the sect of Glassites, minister of a parish near Dundee, who was deposed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on account of the views he had adopted concerning the nature of the kingdom of Christ; and his assertion that all national church establishments are inconsistent with the gospel. He was a man of great piety, and after his deposition became the pastor of a congregation, who formed a sect known as the Glassites.

Born 1698; died at Dundee, 1773.

GLASGOW, glas'-go, a royal, municipal, and parliamentary borough, the chief manufacturing city of Scotland, in the county of Lanarkshire, on both sides of the Clyde. The city proper stands on the north or right bank of the river, having the suburbs of Calton and Bridgeton, and the villages of Camlachie, Westmuir, and Parkhead on the east, and the suburbs of Anderston and Finnieston, and the suburban village of Partick, on the west. These places are now so connected with the city as to form a continuous town. The older part of the town occupies a level site, but the ground rises in the north and north-west districts. On the south side of the river is the old suburb, Gorbals, with Hutchesontown on the east, and Laurieston, Tradeston, Kingston, and the village of Govan, on the west. The river is crossed by the Glasgow, or Broomielaw bridge, a splendid structure, 500 feet long and 60 feet wide, designed by Telford, the Victoria bridge, Albert bridge, St. Andrew's, and another suspension bridge, and further east by the Rutherglen and Dalmarnock bridges. A railway viaduct crosses the river between Victoria and Albert bridges, and there are several ferries. The city, except in the older parts, is regularly laid out, the principal streets running from east to west, parallel with the river, on each side of which are spacious thoroughfares. The houses are generally lofty, and the use of white freestone for the principal buildings gives a handsome appearance. One of the finest lines of street is Argyle Street, with its continuations, Trongate and Gallowgate, in all about two miles long. Sauchiehall Street is a busy thoroughfare, with handsome shops and houses. Buchanan Street, running north and south, between Argyle and Sauchiehall Streets, in the centre of the city, is a fashionable resort, and is lined with elegant shops. Queen Street, a little farther to the east, and George Street, crossing Buchanan Street, are busy thoroughfares. In the old parts of the town, the High Street and Saltmarket are picturesque and interesting from their historical and literary associations. On the north side of the river, west of Glasgow Bridge, is the long waterside road, with quays, known as the Broomielaw. Altogether there are within the city about 120 miles of public thoroughfares. There are few squares or open places, the principal being George Square, at the junction of Queen Street and George Street. The wealthier and more fashionable residents occupy Blythswood Square, St. Enoch Square, and Woodside, Elmbank, Queen's, Royal, Lansdowne, and St. Vincent Crescents, in pleasant situations, and adorned with many fine specimens of domestic architecture, in the western part of the city. Large districts of the older parts of the city, occupied by old and wretched tenements, have been cleared away, and substantial dwellings of a superior kind for the accommodation of the working classes, and built in "flats," have been erected. Many of the large warehouses and other commercial establishments are noble buildings. There are four public parks, one in each quarter of the city—Kelvin Grove, or West-end Park (40 acres) laid out by Sir Joseph Paxton at a cost of £89,000, on a hill side at the west end; the Green (140 acres), on a level riverside tract, on the east; the Alexandra (85 acres), on the north-east; and Queen's Park (100 acres), on a rising ground on the south side. It commands a fine view of the city, and overlooks the scene of the battle of Langside, fought in the presence of Mary Queen of Scots, from which circumstance the name was given to the park. It was laid out at an expense of £60,000. About two miles north-west of the centre of the city are the Botanic Gardens, comprising 20 acres, on a slope overlooking the banks of a romantic little stream, the Kelvin, the scene of a well-known ballad. The Necropolis, laid out with great taste, and containing many handsome monuments, is on a rocky eminence, opposite the cathedral, in the north-western part of the city. There are three other cemeteries on the outskirts. The harbour, occupying an area of 75 acres, has more than three miles of quays, and can accommodate vessels of more than 1,000 tons burden. A very large amount has been spent in deepening the river and removing obstructions, and now there is a depth of about 22 feet. The harbour of Port-Dundas, on the Forth and Clyde Canal, to the north of the city, where it unites with the Monkland Canal, is of considerable commercial importance. The north side of the city is supplied with the purest water from Loch Katrine, 30 miles distant, by an aqueduct, commenced in 1856 and completed in 1859, which cost £18,000 a mile, and in the construction of which great difficulties had to be overcome. The daily supply from this source is now about 25,000,000 gallons daily. The works were opened by the Queen on the 14th of October 1859. The southern suburbs are partly supplied by the Gorbals works, from the Fereneze hills, six miles distant. The lofty chimney stalks, of which there are many hundreds, attract the attention of the visitors on approaching the town. One is 460 and another 450 feet high, being the tallest in the kingdom. This great height is necessary to carry off the noxious vapours of the chemical works. The public market-place is in Candlerigg Street, and there is a large cattle market at the east end of the city.

Public Buildings.—The cathedral of St. Mungo, in the north-eastern part of the city, on the bank of the ravine, through which flows a small stream, the Molendinar burn, is a splendid edifice, in the Early Pointed style, begun by John Achaius, bishop of Glasgow, in 1123, and was continued by successive bishops, until it was finished in the manner in which it at present remains. The original plan of this cathedral was in the form of a cross, though the transverse part has never been built. It is 319 feet long, 63 broad, and 90 feet high within the walls, with a large tower in the centre, on which a spire was built about the year 1420, making the whole 225 feet in height. Recent restorations have made the cathedral one of the most beautiful in Europe. The crypt is unequalled for exquisite decorations and richness of carving. Besides the cathedral, there are many other churches, of which the most remarkable are St. George's and St. Andrew's, both of which have very elegant fronts, with fine steeples. The College Church is a plain building, partaking of the Gothic, with a small steeple in front, containing a clock and bell. The Tron church was built in 1794, on the site of the old one, which was destroyed by fire in 1793. Besides these, there are the North-west church, of an oblong form, with a transverse aisle, and a steeple 140 feet high; St. Enoch's Church, with a lofty and handsome steeple; the Barony Church; the Episcopal Chapel, immediately behind St. Andrew's Square; and several new churches of elegant design. There are altogether about 300 places of worship, belonging to the Presbyterian body, the established church, and other denominations. The University, formerly located in High Street, was removed in 1870 to the right bank of the Kelvin, opposite West-end Park. The buildings are in the collegiate Gothic style, designed by Sir G. Gilbert Scott, and form a rectangular pile 600 feet long and 300 feet wide, with two quadrangles, each about 180 feet square, separated by the common hall, beneath which are arcades. The hall, museum, and library are so arranged that they can be opened to form a magnificent suite of rooms for public occasions, where several thousand persons may assemble. In the centre of the south front of the University buildings is a tower 300 feet high. The library contains 105,000 volumes, and there are attached to the university Dr. William Hunter's collection of coins, medals, and anatomical preparations, an observatory, and botanical garden. The grounds occupy about 42 acres; and the total cost of the new university buildings and adjuncts has been nearly £400,000. Near the University is the Free Church College, a building in the Italian style, with three towers. One of the finest of the public buildings is the Royal Exchange, in Queen Street, in the Corinthian style, with a noble portico and a circular clock tower. The County Buildings, in Nelson Street, and the Tontine Buildings, containing the old town hall, on the north side of Trongate, near the old cross of Glasgow, are also fine structures. The Deaf and Dumb Institution, near the Queen's Park, is a large and attractive building in the Venetian style, with a west front 240 feet in length, and large grounds tastefully laid out. Among the other most noticeable edifices are the Corporation Halls, the City Hall, [opened in November, 1877, having cost £80,000); the Stock Exchange, completed in 1877, at a cost of £55,000, the Corn Exchange, Custom House, the banks and club houses, the Town's Hospital, the north and south prisons, the assembly rooms, Athenæum, Hutchinson's Hospital, Anderson's University, the Observatory, and the large lunatic asylum at Gartnavel, 2 miles west of the city. There are theatres, museums, and concert halls.

Public Monuments.—Equestrian statues of William III., at the cross: the Duke of Wellington, in front of the Exchange; and Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, in George Square. An Egyptian obelisk, 144 feet in height, on the Green, commemorates Nelson. In George square are a Doric column, surmounted by a statue erected in memory of Scott, and statues of Sir John Moore, Watt, Peel, Lord Clyde, and Livingstone. In Queen Square are eleven statues, including one of Burns.

Manf.—Very extensive. Textile fabrics in every variety employ many thousands of hands, in the city and outlying villages. Cotton-spinning, printing, and dyeing: muslin and woollen fabrics, embroideries, carpets, are the staples of this department of industry. The iron manufactures are quite as important as those of cotton; marine and land engines, locomotives, railway plant, machinery of the most varied kind, and iron ship-building, are representative industries. The largest chemical works in the world are the St. Rollox Works, in the N.E. part of the town; and pottery, fire-bricks, glass bottles and glass are manufactured on a very extensive scale. The making of confectionery, distilling, brewing, and type founding, are also carried on. It is estimated that about 1,300 steam engines, of various power, are constantly at work.

Commerce.—Glasgow ranks as the fourth exporting port in the kingdom, being exceeded only by London, Liverpool, and Hull, and the value of the exports is about £17,000,000 annually. Nearly 900 vessels are registered as belonging to the port.

Municipal Government.—There are a lord provost, 10 bailies, and 48 councillors, with whom are associated the dean of guild and the deacon-convener, the former representing the merchants and the latter the trades.

Pop.—663,533, including suburbs.

Parliamentary Representation.—Three members are returned for the city, and one for the university, in conjunction with the university of Aberdeen. The parliamentary constituency is 56,727.

History.—In 560 St. Mungo, or Kentigern, founded a bishopric and established a church on the site of the present cathedral, which formed the nucleus of the town. The present name is variously derived from the Gaelic clais-ghu, "dark ravine;" glas-gow, "white smith," and eglais-dhu, "black church." Glasgow was erected into a burgh by William (surnamed the Lion), king of Scotland. James II. erected its city and barony into a regality, in favour of the bishop. James VI. granted the city a very ample charter, by which it was erected into a royal burgh, to be holden under his majesty in free burgage. Charles I. granted further privileges, which were confirmed, with additional privileges, by an act in 1690. In the early part of the 18th century Glasgow became the chief emporium of the tobacco trade, and retained that position until the outbreak of the American war. The manufacture of linens, lawns, cambrics, and other articles of similar fabric, was introduced about the year 1725, and superseded in 1787 by the introduction of muslins. In 1730, the manufacture of green bottles was introduced; and flint glass was manufactured in 1777; in 1732 manufactories for inkles and delft were established; in 1785 the dyeing of cottons in turkey-red colour was begun; and a manufactory of bandanna handkerchiefs subsequently established, which raised the character of that branch of trade all over Europe. The West India trade afforded another outlet to the increasing capital of the city. The following are the principal events of interest connected with the history of Glasgow:—

GLASGOW, PORT. (See PORT GLASGOW.)

GLASTONBURY, glas'-ton-ber'-re, a market town of Somersetshire, 22 miles S.W. of Bath. It consists principally of two streets, in both of which are many houses, either entirely built, or patched up, with stones from its abbey, formerly the most magnificent in the kingdom, covering an area of 60 acres, and possessing immense revenues. Glastonbury was anciently called Avalonia, or the Isle of Avalon, into which no person whatever, not even a bishop or prince, was allowed to enter without leave from the abbot, to whom this power was granted by Canute the Dane. There were 61 abbots, who sat among the barons in parliament, and governed it successively for nearly 600 years. Richard Whitinge, the last, for refusing to surrender his abbey to Henry VIII., and acknowledge his supremacy, was condemned at Wells, and carried, with two of his monks, on a hurdle, to the Tor, a high hill in the neighbourhood, on the summit of which is St. Michael's tower, where he was hanged in his robes. Extensive ruins of the abbey still remain. The curious structure called the abbot's kitchen, is yet entire, and is of a very unusual contrivance, being built of stone, without any combustible material, as are also some fragments of the church and St. Joseph of Arimathea's chapel—an elegant specimen of the transition from Norman to Early English architecture; it was probably erected during the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. The roof is gone, and the vaulting of the crypt below, which contains St. Joseph's well, is nearly destroyed. Other buildings of interest are the churches of St. Benedict and John the Baptist, and the new market-cross in the centre of the town. There are also other structures of especial interest to the lover of antiquity; the George Inn, formerly the hospitium; the Tribunal, an ancient building in the High street; and the gate-house, now the Red Lion inn. According to ecclesiastical tradition the first Christian church in England was founded here by Joseph of Arimathea, in the first century, and Weary-all Hill is still pointed out as the place where the saint rested on his arrival, and where his staff on being planted took root and grew into the "miraculous thorn" which was supposed to blossom on Christmas day in honour of the nativity of our Lord. King Arthur and queen Guinevere, it is said, were buried in the Abbey cemetery.

Manf. Chiefly silk; but it has an export trade in timber, tiles, &c., and agricultural produce, by a canal connecting it with Bristol. Pop. 3,670.—A station on the Somerset and Dorset railway.

GLASTONBURY, a township of Hartford county, Connecticut, United States, on the E. side of Connecticut river, 8 miles below Hartford. Manf. Cotton, and it has iron-works. Pop. 4,500.

GLATZ, a town of Prussia, district of Breslau, on the Neisse, lies in a narrow valley between two lofty hills, 52 miles S.W. from Breslau. It is a fortress of the second rank, has several churches, a town-house, arsenals, barracks, gymnasium, several schools, and an infirmary. It is the seat of several courts and public offices, and is connected by two bridges over the Neisse. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen goods; leather, and carpets; and there are distilleries, mills, and tile-works. Pop. 13,307.—Glatz surrendered to the Prussians in 1742, was taken by the Austrians, in 1759, but restored at the peace of 1763. The celebrated Baron Trenck was confined in it, but made his escape by leaping from the walls.

GLAUBER, JOHN RODOLPH, glow'-ber, a German chemist, who after considerable travelling, settled in Holland. He was a great follower of alchemy, and expended much of his time in the search after the philosopher's stone. His researches were not altogether valueless, for he made some useful discoveries; amongst others, that of Glauber's salts, or sulphate of soda, a neutral purgative.

Born at Karlstadt, 1604; died at Amsterdam, 1668.

GLAUCE, glaw'-se, in Greek legend, the wife of Aetæus, the daughter of Cychræus.

GLAUCE, in Greek legend, a daughter of Creon, who married Jason.

GLAUCHAU, glow'-chou, a manufacturing town of Saxony, on the right bank of the Mulde, 54 miles S.W. of Dresden. It is well built, and contains a large castle. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, hosiery, carpets, and leather; and there are some print-fields, dye-works, iron foundries, &c. Pop. 20,583.

GLAUCUS, glaw'-kus, in Greek legend, a son of Hippolochus, the son of Bellerophon. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the simplicity to exchange his golden suit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one; whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedis permutatio, to express a foolish purchase. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax.

GLAUCUS, in Greek mythology, a fisherman of Anthedon, in Bœotia, son of Neptune and Nais, or according to others, of Polybius, the son of Mercury. As he was fishing, he observed that all the fishes which he laid on the grass received fresh vigour as they touched the ground, and immediately made their escape by leaping into the sea. Having touched the grass himself, he instantly desired to inhabit the sea, and accordingly leaped into it, and was made a sea deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the request of the gods. After this transformation, he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whose ingratitude was severely punished by Circe. He is represented with a long beard, dishevelled hair, and shaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fish.

GLAUCUS, in Greek legend, a son of Sisyphus, king of Corinth, by Merope, the daughter of Atlas, born at Potnia, a village of Bœotia. Having a desire to make his mares swifter than others in such a manner as to irritate Venus, that goddess inspired them with such fury that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games which Adrastus had celebrated in honour of his father. He was buried near Potnia.

GLAUCUS, in Greek legend, a son of Minos II. and Pasiphae, who was smothered in a cask of honey, and miraculously brought to life by means of a herb, which had previously been seen by a soothsayer, named Polyidus, to re-animate a serpent.

GLAUCUS, a son of Epytus, who succeeded his father on the throne of Messenia, about ten centuries before the Augustan age. He introduced the worship of Jupiter among the Dorians, and was the first who offered sacrifices to Machaon, the son of Æsculapius.

GLEIG, GEORGE ROBERT, Rev. gleeg, son of Bishop Gleig of Brechin, and primus of the Scots Episcopal church, left the university of Oxford, where he was a student, and joined the army in 1812; shortly afterwards obtained a commission in a light infantry regiment, and served in the Peninsular war. Was engaged in the campaign of Washington during the American war of 1812-1814, and was severely wounded at the capture of the city. At the close of the war he retired on half-pay, completed his studies at the university, and having been ordained, was presented to the living of Ivy church, Kent, by the archbishop of Canterbury. Was appointed chaplain of Chelsea Hospital in 1844, and became chaplain general of the forces in 1846. He subsequently devised a scheme for the education of soldiers, and was appointed inspector-general of military schools. In 1848 he was made a prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. Gleig has written numerous works, including an account of the "Campaigns of Washington and New Orleans," 1821; "The Subaltern," a novel; and a "Life of the Great Duke of Wellington."

Born at Stirling, 1796.

GLEIWITZ, gli-vitz, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the Klodnitz, 43 miles S.E. of Oppeln. There are three churches, a synagogue, and Catholic gymnasium. Manf. Linen and woollen, iron, and glass. The royal iron foundry is established here. There are eight annual fairs. Pop. 15,077.

GLENCOE, glen'-ko, a valley in the northern part of Argyleshire, Scotland, noted for the military execution of its unsuspecting inhabitants, the Macdonalds, by a party of English soldiers, in 1692, in consequence of an order, signed by William III. in council, for that purpose, and contrary to the faith of a royal proclamation. Many of the inhabitants had been in arms for the abdicated James II. Its bed is swept by Ossian's "Dark torrent of Cona." There is but one solitary farmhouse within a distance of 10 miles; and no portion of the Highlands presents a scene of such gloomy, silent grandeur.

GLENDAL, or GLENDALOUGH, glen'-da-la, "the seven churches," a beautiful valley in Wicklow, Leinster, 24 miles south of Dublin. It is nearly surrounded by inaccessible mountains, and contains two lakes and extensive ruins of the city of Glendalagh, which was formerly the seat of a bishopric, with an episcopal jurisdiction extending to the walls of Dublin.

GLENDOWER, or GLENDWR, OWEN, glen'-door, a celebrated Welsh chieftain, lineally descended from Llewellyn, the last native prince of Wales. He was a stanch adherent of Richard II., in consequence of which his land was seized on the accession of Henry IV., upon which he took up arms, and was engaged in hostilities against the throne, with varying success, for fifteen years. He died a natural death at the age of 65. He figures conspicuously in the first part of Shakspeare's play of "Henry IV."

Born 1350; died 1415.

GLENELG, glen-elg', a town and watering place of South Australia, 6 miles S.W. of Adelaide, on Holdfast Bay. There are several places of worship, banks, insurance offices, and other public buildings, several hotels, a pier and promenade. The steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company embark and land here the South Australian mails. There is a lighthouse. Pop. 2,724.

GLENELG, a river of Victoria, Australia, rising in the Victoria range, in the western part of the colony, and falling into Discovery Bay, at the boundary between Victoria and South Australia. The length of the river is about 250 miles, in lat. 38° 5′ S., by 141° E.

GLENELG, a river in the N.W. of Australia, falling into Doubtful Bay, after a winding course of about 70 miles.

GLENLIVET, glen-liv'-et, a valley of Banffshire, in Scotland, noted for its whisky. It lies 20 miles from Huntly, and contains lead and iron ore. In 1594 Glenlivet was the scene of a battle between the earl of Huntly and the duke of Argyle, in which the earl of Huntly was defeated.

GLENROY, glen-roi', a valley of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, Lochaber. It is famous for its "parallel roads," generally supposed to have been the shores of a former lake which had several distinct epochs of subsidence. Their origin has been the subject of much discussion, and the question can scarcely yet be said to be settled.

GLEN TILT, a valley in the north of Perthshire, 15 miles in length, extending from the Grampians southward to Glengarry. The mountains rise on either side of the upper half, from 3,350 to 3,589 feet in height. Through the bottom of the valley, the Tilt, fed by numerous mountain torrents, runs with great velocity. The discovery, by Hutton, of intrusive granitic veins in the rocks of Glen Tilt marks an epoch in the history of geology.

GLIDDON, GEORGE ROBINS, glid'-don, author of various works on ethnology, Egyptian archæology, &c., son of John Gliddon, United States consul at Grand Cairo, a post subsequently filled by the son. Mr. Gliddon lived for more than thirty years in the Valley of the Nile and the Levant, and devoted the greater part of his life to ethnological and archæological pursuits. About the year 1840 he visited America and Europe, and delivered many lectures in the States on Egyptian and other Oriental antiquities. He was firmly convinced of the extreme antiquity of the human race, and the diversity of the origin of mankind. His first work, "Ancient Egypt: her Monuments, Hieroglyphics, History, and Archæology, &c.," has passed through many editions. He also published "An Appeal to the Antiquaries of Europe on the Destruction of the Monuments of Egypt," "A Memoir on the Cotton of Egypt," and "Otia Egyptiaca." In 1854 he published, in conjunction with Dr. J. C. Nott, "Types of Mankind; or, Ethnological Researches based upon the Ancient Monuments, Paintings, Sculptures, and Crania of Races, &c." and, in 1857, a volume entitled "Indigenous Races of the Earth; or New Chapters of Ethnological Inquiry." Both these works contain papers and monographs by eminent contemporary authors.

Born in Devonshire, 1809; died at Panama, 1857.

GLOCKNER (GROSS), glok'-ner, a mountain of Austria, in the Tyrol, and the highest point of the Central Tyrol Alps. (See ALPS.)

GLOGAU (GROSS), glo'-gou, a strongly fortified town of Prussia, province of Silesia, capital of the district of Liegnitz, on the left bank of the Oder, 33 miles N. of Liegnitz. Its chief edifices are the castle, the garrison church, the Lutheran church and school, the synagogue, two hospitals, and two gymnasiums, one protestant, the other catholic. On an island formed by the Oder, and separately fortified, is the cathedral, dating from the 12th century, containing a Madonna by the elder Cranach. Manf. Sugar, beetroot, tobacco, straw hats, cotton and woollen fabrics. Pop. 18,630.

GLOGAU, (KLEIN, or OBER), a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the right bank of the Hotzenplotz, 22 miles S. of Oppeln. It is surrounded by walls, and contains a castle. Manf. Worsted, rope, and tiles. Pop. 4,400.

GLOGGNITZ, a town of the Austrian empire, province of Lower Austria, at the northern base of the Semmering Alps, 40 miles S.W. of Vienna. The Semmering railway extends from Gloggnitz southwards to Murzzuschlag, a distance of 25 miles, ascending and descending the steep face of the rocks in curves with the most extraordinary gradients, rising at one point at the rate of 1 in 40, the average rate of ascent being 1 in 82. At its greatest elevation the line is 2,872 feet above the sea level. It passes through fifteen tunnels, and crosses numerous bridges in its course. The quickest trains take 1 hour 42 minutes to accomplish the distance. The line was constructed between 1848 and 1853 by Carlo Chega, an eminent engineer. Pop. 2,000.

GLOMMEN, glom'-men, the principal river of Norway, rising from Lake Arsund, in the Dovrefield tableland, and, after a course of 320 miles, falling into the Skager-rack at Frederickstadt. The source is 2,419 feet above the sea level, and there are numerous waterfalls in its course, notably the Sarpenfos, with 60 feet descent, about 10 miles from its mouth.

GLOSSOP, glos'-sop, a municipal borough of Derbyshire, 14 miles S.E. of Manchester. It is divided into two portions, Old Glossop and Howard Town, in the latter of which are the best houses. There are a handsome church, several other places of worship, a town hall, and market-house. Manf. Cotton, of which it is the principal seat in Derbyshire. It has, besides, woollen-mills, dyeing, bleaching, paper-works, and iron-foundries. Pop. 19,574.—A station on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire railway.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE, glos'-ter-sheer, one of the western counties of England, situate along the vale of the Severn, bounded on the N.W. and N.E. by the counties of Hereford, Worcester, and Warwick; on the E. by Oxfordshire; on the S. by Berks, Somerset, and Wilts; and on the W. by the estuary of the Severn. The county is diversified by hill, vale, and forest. The Severn and the Avon mark out an extensive vale of the richest soil, the most genial climate, and every way adapted to the raising of corn and fruit, and the grazing of cattle. This district is divided into Upper and Lower, or the vales of Gloucester and Berkeley. On the west of the Severn, and entirely detached by it from the rest of the county, rises to some elevation, a district occupied principally with the Forest of Dean; while on the east of the Severn, and parallel with it to the distance of 6 to 10 miles, runs through the whole of the county, from Bath, on the Lower, nearly to Evesham, on the Upper Avon, the range of the Cotswold Hills, chiefly devoted to the pasture of sheep.

Rivers.—The Severn and its affluents, the Wye, and Upper and Lower Avon; and the Thame, which receives the Colne, Churnet, and Windrush. One navigable canal connects, by means of the tunnel of Sapperton, the navigation of the Severn with that of the Thames. There are other canals in the county.

Pro.—The vale of Berkeley is chiefly devoted to the produce of the dairy and the rearing of cattle. In the vale of Gloucester a good deal of corn is raised. Here all the Gloucester cheese is produced, with excellent butter; and, in the vale of Berkeley, all the double Gloucester, or double Berkeley, which is much superior in quality. The produce of the orchard forms also a capital object with the vale farmers; great quantities of cider and of perry are made annually, and this manufacture extends into the other districts.

Minerals.—Coal, iron and limestone are the principal. The coal supplies the immense consumption of the Bristol manufactories, and even Bath in some degree. There are, besides, blue claystone, freestone of excellent quality, with stone tiles, on the Cotswold hills, and paving-stones and grits in the forest. The mineral waters of Cheltenham and of Clifton have been long noted.

Manf.—Tin-plate, edge-tools, brass wire, wire cards, pins, and nails; but the most important are those of superfine broad-cloths, of Spanish wool, thin worsted stuffs and carpets at Cirencester, stockings at Tewkesbury, rugs and blankets at Dursley, cotton at Stroud, and felt hats in some of the villages.

Area.—1,257 square miles.

Pop.—572,480.

Chief Towns.—GLOUCESTER, BRISTOL, CHELTENHAM, CIRENCESTER, TEWKESBURY, and STROUD.

Parliamentary Representation.—Four members are returned for the county, 2 each for Bristol and Gloucester, and 1 each for Cheltenham, Cirencester, Tewkesbury, and Stroud.

GLOUCESTER, a city, parliamentary borough, and river port, capital of the above county, stands on the left bank of the Severn, about 30 miles above its junction with the Bristol Channel, and 7 miles S. W. of Cheltenham. The Severn here divides itself into two branches, and forms the island of Alney, which is connected with both sides of the river by two bridges. The city consists chiefly of four spacious streets, meeting each other in the centre. The public buildings are handsome; but the chief object of interest is the ancient cathedral, the restoration of which, at great expense, has now been completed. It was originally one of the finest Benedictine abbeys in the kingdom, and remarkable for combining in itself the architecture of successive ages, the Saxon and Norman, with some of the finest examples of the Gothic or English. It is cruciform, 441 feet in length, 144 in breadth, with a tower 225 feet high. It contains the tombs of duke Robert of Normandy and of Edward II., who was murdered in Berkeley castle. The large painted window is very beautiful, and there is a remarkable whispering gallery. The chapter-house, Lady's chapel, and St. Andrew's chapel are very beautiful, and have recently been restored. The cloisters are in excellent preservation. The episcopal palace, the residence of the bishop of the united sees of Gloucester and Bristol, has also been restored. There are 13 parish and other churches, chapels, and a synagogue; schools, hospitals, commodious market-houses, a customhouse, a theatre, a county gaol, built on the site of the ancient castle, a guildhall, a "Tolsey," and a shire-hall; a house of industry, a county infirmary, a corn-exchange, excellent market-buildings, and a pump-room over a spa. The Berkeley ship canal, opened in 1827, enables vessels of considerable size to reach the port; and there are two large dry docks and building slips. Great improvements are in progress. Manf. Cutlery, watches, gloves, saddlery, and soap. There is a considerable trade in timber. Pop 36,552.—A station on the Great Western and Midland railways.

GLOUCESTER, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 287 square miles. Pop. 25,886. The capital is Woodbury.

GLOUCESTER, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 243 square miles. Pop. 11,876. Gloucester Courthouse is the capital.

GLOUCESTER, a seaport of Massachusetts, United States, 29 miles N.E. of Boston. It is situated on a small peninsula, has a good harbour, and two lighthouses. It is a pleasant place of resort in the summer. Pop. 19,329. chiefly engaged in navigation and the fisheries.

GLOUCESTER, a town of Rhode Island, United States, 16 miles S.W. of Providence. Pop. 2,500.

GLOUCESTER, a town of New Jersey, United States, 10 miles S.E. of Woodbury. Pop. 2,900.

GLOUCESTER. (See SOCIETY ISLANDS.)

GLOUCESTER, a maritime county of New South Wales, Australia. The river Manning separates it from the county of Macquarie. Raymond Terrace is the chief town.

GLOUCESTER, HUMPHREY, duke of, fourth son of Henry IV. On the death of his brother, Henry V., in 1422, he was named protector of England under the regency of the duke of Bedford. He married, first, Jacqueline, countess of Holland and Hainault, but the marriage was annulled, and he afterwards married lady Eleanor Cobham, who was convicted of endeavouring to procure the death of Henry VI., and was sentenced to do penance, and to be imprisoned for life. In 1447, the duke, whose popularity was very great, and who is remembered in history as "The good Duke Humphrey," was arrested on a charge of high treason, through the influence of Cardinal Beaufort, supported by the Queen, Margaret of Anjou, and William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk. Two days afterwards the duke was found dead in his bed, in prison. He was buried in old St. Paul's cathedral, and a fine tomb was erected to his memory. In after years, St. Paul's was a place of resort for penniless adventurers, and the phrase "I have dined with Duke Humphrey," was used to describe the way in which the customary dinner time was passed by those who had nothing to eat.

Born 1391; died at Bury St. Edmunds, 1447.

GLOUCESTER, RICHARD, duke of. (See RICHARD III.)

GLOUCESTER, ROBERT OF, one of the oldest of our English poets. Camden quotes many of his old English rhymes, and speaks highly of him.

Lived in the 13th century.

GLOVER, RICHARD, gluv'-er, an English poet, educated at Cheam school, where, at 16, he wrote some verses to the memory of sir Isaac Newton, prefixed to Dr. Pemberton's view of that great man's philosophy. On leaving school, he entered the mercantile house of his father, who was engaged in the Hamburg trade. In 1737 he married a lady of fortune, and the same year published his "Leonidas," an epic poem, and acquired extraordinary popularity. His poem of "London, or the Progress of Commerce," appeared in 1739. The same year he published his popular ballad, entitled

"Hosier's Ghost," intended to rouse the national spirit against the Spaniards. About this time he distinguished himself as a city politician, in taking the lead of the oppositions at elections. His credit was so great, that he was appointed to manage an application to Parliament in behalf of the London merchants, and his speech, at the bar of the House of Commons, was printed. In 1753 was acted, at Drury-lane, his tragedy of "Boadicea," which had but indifferent success, although it ran for nine nights. His next tragedy, "Medea," in 1761, was better received, although it was written on the Greek model, and therefore not suited for modern representation. The same year he was elected a member of parliament for Weymouth. Another epic of his, entitled the "Athenaid," was published in 1788, in 3 vols. 12mo, and is a continuation of "Leonidas," with which it ought always to be accompanied. Glover wrote also "Jason," a tragedy, and several other things, which have long ago passed into oblivion.

Born in London, 1712; died 1785.

GLOVER, MRS, a famous English actress, (maiden name Betterton). She was the daughter of an actor, and began her theatrical career at six years of age. For more than 50 years she was a leading actress, especially in comedy parts, in London. Her Nurse in "Romeo and Juliet;" Mrs. Malaprop in the "Rivals," and similar characters, were famous personations. She was also an accomplished reader.

Born at Newry, Ireland, 1781; died in London, 1850.

GLUCHOV, or GLOUKHOV, gloo'-kof, a town of European Russia, government of Tchernigov, near the right bank of the Verbovka. It contains eight churches, has manufactories of cloth, and from its vicinity the porcelain clay for the manufactory at St. Petersburg is obtained. Pop. 10,747. Lat. 51° 40′ 30″ N. Lon. 34° 20′ 15″ E. This was formerly the residence of the Cossack hetman, and the governors of Little Russia.

GLUCK, CHRISTOPHER, glook, an eminent musician, who, after studying at Vienna (which he visited as a wandering musician), visited England, and composed for the opera-house. He next went to Vienna, where he acquired great eminence; in 1774 he went to Paris, and his pieces were performed with such applause that he obtained a pension. His principal operas are "The Fall of the Giants," "Orfeo," "Alceste," "Iphigénie en Aulide," "Echo et Narcisse," and "Armide." Burney describes him as the "Michael Angelo of music." Besides his operas he wrote "Letters on Music."

Born in the Upper Palatinate, 1714; died at Vienna, 1787.

GLUCKSTADT, glook'-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Schleswig-Holstein, on the right bank of the Elbe, 32 miles below Hamburg. It is a regular and well-built place, with a harbour, a magazine, an arsenal, a foundry, a house of correction, a workhouse, and a navigation-school. Since 1830 it has been made a free port. Pop. 5,100, many of whom are engaged in the whale fishery.—The town was founded in 1620, and was frequently besieged in the Thirty Years' War.

GLYNN, glin, a county of the United States, in Georgia. Area, 625 square miles. Pop. 6,497. Brunswick is the capital.

GMELIN, JOHN GEORGE, me'-lin, a German botanist and physician, who became member of the academy at Petersburg, and was employed by the Russian government to explore, with others, the boundaries of Siberia. The result of his labours was a history of the flora of Siberia.

Born at Tubingen, 1709; died 1755.

GMELIN, SAMUEL GOTTLIEB, nephew of the preceding, took his degree in medicine at his native place, and, after travelling in France and Holland, went to Petersburg. The empress of Russia appointed him to travel in Astrakan, in 1768. He next explored the coast of the Caspian Sea; but, on his journey to Russia, was seized by the Tartars, and died in confinement. He wrote "Travels through Russia."

Born at Tubingen, 1743; died 1774.

GMELIN, JOHN FREDERICK, an eminent physician and chemist, who became professor of chemistry and natural history at Göttingen. He published numerous pieces on the Materia Medica, chemistry, mineralogy, and every part of natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturæ" of Linnæus. He was also the author of a "History of Chemistry;" and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes from mineral and vegetable substances.

Born at Tubingen, 1748; died at Göttingen, in 1805.

GMELIN, LEOPOLD, author of the well-known "Handbuch der Chemie," and son of the above, was born and educated at Göttingen, and after taking his degree in medicine, completed his chemical studies in Tubingen, Vienna, and Naples. Became teacher of chemistry in 1813 at Heidelberg, and in the next year received the appointment of extraordinary professor of chemistry. This latter office he held until 1850, when he was compelled, in consequence of an attack of paralysis, to resign. He was the author of numerous papers on chemistry and mineralogy, and published in 1826, in conjunction with Tiedemann, the results of a series of experiments on digestion under the title of "Die Verdanung nach Versuchen;" but his reputation rests mainly on the work already mentioned—his handbook of chemistry, of which the last edition (the fourth) appeared between the years 1843 and 1855, in six volumes. An English translation edited by Mr. Watts was published in 1861 by the Cavendish Society.

Born 1788; died 1853.

GMUND, gmoond, a town of Wurtemberg, Germany, on the left bank of the Rems, 28 miles N.E. of Stuttgart. It is surrounded by walls, and contains four ancient churches. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, jewellery, and trinkets. Pop. 6,200.

GMUNDEN, gmoon'-den, a town of the Austrian empire, province of Upper Austria, situated amid most beautiful scenery, at the northern extremity of the lake of Traun, 35 miles S.W. of Linz. Pop. 2,600.

GNESEN, or GNIEZNO, gne'-sen, a town of Prussia, in the province of Posen, 30 miles from the town of the same name. It contains eleven churches, several convents, with a theological seminary, and is the see of an archbishop. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 9,917.

GNOIEN, gno'-e-en, a town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 24 miles S.E. of Rostock. It is situated on a hill side and is surrounded by walls. Manf. Linen and needles. Pop. 3,000.

GNOSSIS, and GNOSSIA, nos'-sis, in Greek legend, an epithet given to Ariadne, because she lived, or was born, at Gnossus. The crown which she received from Bacchus, and which was made a constellation, is called Gnossia stella.

GOA, go'a, a district of India, belonging to the Portuguese. It lies in the province of Bejapoor, on the western coast. Area, 1,100 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Pro. Pepper, rice, betel-nuts, cocoa-nuts, and salt. Pop. 420,000, of whom two-thirds are Roman Catholics. Lat. between 14° 54′ and 14° 45′ N. Lon. between 76° 45′ and 74° 26′ E.

GOA, a maritime city of India, and formerly the capital of the Portuguese settlements in that country. There are Old Goa and New Goa. The former, however, is now nearly deserted. It still contains many magnificent churches and excellent specimens of architecture, but now in a state of decay. The viceroy and principal inhabitants reside in the new city, or Panjim, which is situated on an island at the mouth of the river, within the forts. It possesses two harbours, well defended by various castles and batteries, mounting very heavy cannon. It still carries on an inconsiderable trade with the mother country, with China, and the coast of Africa; but it is fast falling to decay. Pop. about 15,000. Lat. 15° 28′ N. Lon. 73° 57′ E.

GOALPARA, go-al-pa'-ra, a district of British India, in Assam. Area, 4,433 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing cotton, sugar, tobacco, and mustard. Pop. 446,232. Lat. between 25° 40′ and 26° 31′ N. Lon. between 89° 42′ and 91° 8′ E.

GOALPARA, chief town of the above district, on the left bank of the Brahmapootra, 290 miles N.E. of Calcutta. It is a miserable place, but a considerable trade is carried on with the Assamese. Lat. 26° 8′ N. Lon. 90° 38′ E.

GOAR, St., a town of Prussia, 20 miles S.E. of Coblentz, on the W. bank of the Rhine, under the stupendous rock and castle of Rheinfels, with which it surrendered to the French in 1794. On the opposite side of the river is the small town of St. Goarshausen, and on a mountain near it, is the strong castle called Katz. St. Goar has a considerable trade in wines and hides. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 1,500.

GOAT ISLAND, gote, occupies the centre of the falls of Niagara, in North America. Ext. about 80 acres, connected by a bridge with the U.S. side of the country.

GOBAIN, gō'-bain(g), a town of France, department Aisne, 10 miles W. of Laon. It has a large looking-glass manufactory. Pop. 2,300.

GOBELIN, JEHAN, gobé'-ln(g), a French dyer, who is famous for having invented the fine scarlet which goes by his name, and for the establishment of the famous tapestry works which bear his name. He resided in the faubourg of St. Marcel, in Paris, where his house still bears his name.

Died 1476.

GOBI, or COBI, go'-be, a range of country in Central Asia, comprising a large part of Chinese Turkestan and Mongolia. It is 1,800 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 350 to 400 miles. It is mostly a sandy desert, bounded by rocks, and interspersed by a few oases, with a general elevation of more than 4000 feet above the sea level. The inhabitants are wandering Tartar tribes. Lat. between 35° and 45° N. Lon. between 90° and 110° E.

GOCH, gok, a walled town of Prussia, in the Rhine province of Dusseldorf, on the left bank of the Niers, 40 miles N.W. of Dusseldorf. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen goods, muslin, hosiery, hats, worsted, leather, pins, starch, soap, and vinegar. Pop. 3,800.

GODALMING, god'-al-ming, a municipal borough and market-town of Surrey, on the Wey, 4 miles S. of Guildford. The church of St. Peter and St. Paul is an ancient cruciform structure, enlarged and repaired in 1840. The new Charterhouse schools are on the north side of the town. Manf. Fleecy hosiery, blankets, worsteds, cotton cloths, stockings, gloves, leather, and paper, with a trade in hops, coals, timber, and bark. Pop. 2,444.—A station on the London and South Western railway.

GODAVARI, go-da'-ve-re, a river of India, which rises on the eastern side of the Western Ghauts, about 70 miles to the north-east of Bombay. On reaching Rajamundry, in the Northern Circars, it divides into two main branches, the left falling into the Bay of Bengal.

GODAVARI, a district of India in the province of Madras, watered by the river previously mentioned. Area, 7,345 sq. miles. Pop. 1,791,512.

GODDARD, JONATHAN, god'-dard, an English physician and chemist, who was educated at Oxford, but took his degree in physic at Cambridge. He was one of the first members of the society afterwards called the Royal, fellow of the College of Physicians, and physician to Cromwell, by whom he was appointed warden of Merton College, Oxford. At the Restoration he lost that situation, on which he removed to Gresham College, of which he was medical professor. Bishop Ward says he was the first Englishman who made a telescope. He wrote on the abuses of the apothecaries, and several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions."

Born at Greenwich 1617; died 1674.

GODEFROI, DENYS, god'-frwaw, an eminent jurist, and a counsellor in the parliament of Paris. Being a Protestant, he was obliged to quit France, on which he settled first at Geneva, and afterwards at Strasburg, where he died. He was the author of several valuable works on civil law.

Born 1549; died 1621.

GODEFROI, THEODORE, eldest son of the above, became a Catholic, and counsellor of state in France. He wrote on the genealogical history of France.

Died at Strasburg, 1642.

GODEFROI, JACQUES, another son of Denys, adhered to the religion of his father, and became professor of law at Geneva, and a member of the council. He wrote several learned works, and edited Cicero and other ancient authors.

Died 1659.

GODEFROI, DENYS, son of Theodore, wrote "Mémoires et Instructions pour servir dans les Négotiations des Affaires concernant les Droits du Roi," folio.

Born 1615; died 1681.

GODEFROI, JOHN, son of the last-mentioned, edited Philip de Commines's Memoirs, 5 vols. 8vo; and wrote the Memoirs of Queen Margaret, &c.

Died 1732.

GODESBERG, go-des'-berg, a village of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, 4 miles from Bonn. A fine tower which formed part of a castle erected in the early part of the 13th century with materials taken from the ancient chapel of St. Michael is still standing, and there are yet to be seen some ruins of the old chapel. Godesberg is a favourite summer residence, and possesses a mineral spring. Pop. 1,170.

GODFREY, SIR EDMONDSBURY, god-fre, a magistrate, who was active in the discovery of the popish plot in 1678, and was made remarkable by the manner of his death. His body was found pierced by his own sword, and with many marks of violence; on which account his death was imputed to the Papists, and his funeral was performed with great pomp.

Died 1678.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON, whose name is inseparably associated with the first Crusade, was the eldest son of Count Eustace II., of Boulogne, and Ida, sister to Godfrey, the Hunchback, Duke of Lower Lorraine and Bouillon, whom he succeeded in 1076. He had already achieved a high reputation for gallantry in the armies of the Emperor Henry IV. when the Crusade was set afoot, and he was at once selected for one of the chief commands. Having mortgaged Bouillon to enable him to meet his expenses in the undertaking, he set out in the year 1096, accompanied by his brothers Eustace and Baldwin. On the taking of Jerusalem the army would have proclaimed him king, but he refused the title, feeling himself unworthy to "wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had worn one of thorns," and assumed instead the title of "Defender and Guardian of the Holy Sepulchre." A subsequent victory over the Sultan of Egypt on the plain of Ascalon gave him possession of the greater part of Palestine. His efforts were now directed to the organization of a new state. He established a patriarch, drew up a body of law, built a monastery in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and founded two cathedral chapters. He was the hero of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered." At his death he was buried on Mount Calvary.

Born 1061; died 1100.

GODIVA, go-dī'-va, wife of Leofric, Earl of Mercia and Lord of Coventry. According to tradition Lady Godiva, having pleaded with her husband for the remission of some oppressive exactions to which the inhabitants of Coventry were subject, received the brutal answer that he would grant her request if she would ride naked through the town. This to his surprise she actually did, clothed only by her long hair, having first ordered proclamation that all the inhabitants should confine themselves to their houses, and that none should even look out of window. Her husband, in admiration of her intrepid devotion, is said to have performed his promise, and the tradition adds that a tailor, known subsequently as "peeping Tom," who disobeyed the injunction of the lady and looked out of window as she passed, was struck blind. Tennyson has a beautiful poem on the subject, and in modern times processions have taken place to commemorate the service she rendered to the town.

Lived in the 11th century.

GODMANCHESTER, gum'-ces-ter, a town and municipal borough of Huntingdonshire, separated from Huntingdon by the river Ouse. It is seated in a rich and fertile soil, which yields great abundance of corn. When James I. came through it from Scotland, the inhabitants met him with seventy new ploughs, drawn by as many teams of horses; for they held their land by that tenure. It has a school, called the free grammar-school of Queen Elizabeth. Pop. 2,300.

GODOLLO, a market-town in Hungary. On the heights of Göndöllö and Isaszeg, the Hungarian General Görgei defeated the Austrians under Windischgrätz and Jellachich. Pop. 3,700.

GODOLPHIN, SIDNEY, go-dol'-phin, a poet, born of an ancient family in Cornwall, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1640 he was elected member of parliament for Helston, where he took the part of the earl of Strafford. He afterwards joined the king's army, but was slain in a skirmish at Chagford, in Devonshire. He wrote several poems, and translated "The Passion of Dido for Æneas," from Virgil, printed in 1658, 8vo He was very intimate with Hobbes, who, in his "Leviathan," thus speaks of him: "I have known clearness of judgment and largeness of fancy, strength of reason and graceful elocution, a courage for the war and a fear for the laws, and all eminently in one man, and that was my most noble and honoured friend, Mr. Sidney Godolphin." Lord Clarendon says, that, great as this eulogy is, it was deserved.—

"Thou'rt dead, Godolphin, who lov'dst reason true, Justice and peace;—soldier beloved, adieu!"

Born 1610; died 1643.

GODOLPHIN, SIDNEY, Earl of, entered the royal service after the Restoration as groom of the bed-chamber to Charles II.; was appointed a secretary of state in 1664, and subsequently commissioner of the treasury. Visited Holland twice on public business. Voted for the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession, but was nevertheless appointed lord-chamberlain to the queen on the accession of James in 1680; and was one of the commissioners sent by that monarch to negotiate with the prince of Orange on his landing. In 1690 William III. appointed him first lord of the treasury, and in 1695 he acted as one of the seven lords justices to administer the government in the king's absence. On the accession of Queen Anne he became lord high treasurer, and in that office fully sustained the public credit. He was created earl of Godolphin and viscount Rialton in 1706. In his later years he was identified with the Whig party, and in the contest between him and Harley for the premiership, Godolphin was defeated and was dismissed in 1710. He died at St. Alban's, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He left behind him a splendid reputation for business ability and integrity of character.

Born about 1630; died 1712.

GODOWNOV, BORIS, go'-doo-nof, czar of Russia, who instituted serfdom. He succeeded his brother-in-law, Feodor I., the last of the race of Rurik, in 1598. In 1605 he was threatened with deposition, and committed suicide.

Born 1552; died 1605.

GODOY, MANUEL DE, go-doy', duke of Alcudia, Spanish statesman, rose to be a favourite of Charles IV., and, it is said, a lover of the queen, and in 1792 was appointed prime minister, in which capacity he entered on a war with France in 1793, but made a peace two years afterwards, for which the title of "prince of peace," and other honours, were conferred on him. In 1798 he was dismissed through the jealousy of other nobles. He was again in office in 1806, but allied himself with Napoleon, and plotted against the Bourbon dynasty. His treachery becoming known, he was nearly made the victim of a popular insurrection. He went to Rome, and passed his last years in Paris, as a pensioner of Louis Philippe.

Born 1767; died at Paris, 1851.

GODWIN, WILLIAM, god'-win, was the son of a dissenting minister, and was himself educated in a dissenting college, and in 1778 became minister of a congregation in London; but soon afterwards took charge of a meeting-house at Stowmarket, Suffolk. In 1782 he determined to quit the ministry, and, in order to pursue literature as a profession, he removed to London as a permanent residence. His first work appeared in 1793, and was entitled "Political Justice," which brought to its author much public notoriety and £700. In the following year appeared his novel of "Caleb Williams," which, whatever may be its merits as a novel, has certainly a political tendency: "a general review of the modes of domestic despotism, by which man becomes the destroyer of man." For this production he received only £48. His next work worthy of notice was his "St. Leon," which appeared in 1799, and for the copyright of which he received 400 guineas. It is a supernatural tale, and has none of the merits of his "Caleb Williams," unless it be where he describes Bethlem Gabor. In 1801 he produced "Antonio; or, the Soldier's Return," a tragedy, which Serjeant Talfourd pronounced "a miracle of dulness," a judgment which was amply proved at its representation; for it was hooted from the stage in the presence of its unhappy author. He next published a "Life of Chaucer," which can claim no pretensions to merit of any kind, except it be the dreariness of prolixity, if such be merit. In 1805 appeared his "Fleetwood; or, the New Man of Feeling," which, in 1807, was succeeded by his "Faulkner; a Tragedy." This met a similar fate to that which befell his "Antonio." Several other works continued to flow from the prolific pen of Godwin; such as his "Essay on Sepulchres," a "Life of Chatham," the "Lives of the Nephews of John Milton," and one or two others of a passing kind, till 1817, when his novel of "Mandeville" appeared. This effort was generally pronounced inferior to his former productions in the same path. In 1820 his "Essay on Population" was brought out, in answer to the theory propounded by Malthus, and this, in 1824, was succeeded by his "History of the Commonwealth of England," &c., which was well received. In 1830, when 74 years old, he produced his novel of "Cloudesley;" in 1831 his "Thoughts on Man;" and in 1834 his last work, the "Lives of the Necromancers." At the age of 77 he received a place under government. Godwin married Mary Wollstonecraft. (See WOLLSTONECRAFT.)

Born at Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, 1755; died 1836.

GODWIN, a powerful Saxon lord and earl of Kent, who, in 1017, accompanied Canute in an expedition against Sweden, where he behaved with such valour as to receive the daughter of that monarch in marriage, and large grants of land. On the death of Canute, he sided with Hardicanute against Harold, but afterwards espoused the cause of the latter. He was charged with murdering Alfred, one of the sons of Ethelred II., from which he vindicated himself by oath. On the death of Hardicanute, he joined Edward, who married his daughter; but afterwards he rebelled against his sovereign, and being unsuccessful, fled to Flanders. Having gathered fresh forces, he sailed up the Thames, and appeared before London, which threw the country into such confusion, that the king was obliged to negotiate peace with Godwin, who was restored to his estates. He died suddenly, while dining with the king at Winchester. He was father of Harold, who was killed at Hastings.

GOEDEREEDE, geed'-er-ede. (See HOLLAND, SOUTH.)

GOES, goos, a town and port of the Netherlands, in the island of South Beveland, with two harbours on the Scheldt, 10 miles from Flushing. It is well fortified. It has shipbuilding docks, and an active trade in salt, hops, and corn. Pop. 5,490.

GOETA-ELF, or GOTA, ge(r)-ta-elf, a river of Sweden, rising in Lake Werner, and after a course of 50 miles, entering the Cattegat. Near its origin are the falls of Trolhætta, to avoid which the canal of that name was cut.

GOETHE, JOHAN WOLFGANG VON, ge(r)-te(r), the most distinguished name in the modern literature of Germany, was the son of an imperial councillor of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and in his 15th year was sent to the university of Leipsic, where, however, he rather indulged in a desultory than a regular course of study. In 1768 he left the university of Leipsic, and went to that of Strasburg, with a view to the legal profession; but chemistry, anatomy, and other kindred sciences commanded more of his attention than the law. In 1771, however, he took the degree of doctor of jurisprudence, and went to Wetzlar, where love for a betrothed lady, and the suicide of a young man named Jerusalem, supplied him with subjects for speculation, which resulted in the production of "Werther." This work appeared in 1774, and immediately fixed public attention upon its author. In 1782 he entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, to whom he had been introduced, and who loaded him with honours. He was made president of the council-chamber and ennobled. He took up his residence at Weimar, where he was surrounded by some of the first minds of Germany, and where the direction of the theatre was confided to his care. Here he brought out the chefs-d'œuvre of Schiller, with splendid effect, and also produced several of his own dramatic poems. Of these we may mention his "Faust,"—his greatest work; "Goetz de Berlichingen," "Tasso," "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Stella," and "Count Egmont." In 1786 he left Weimar for Italy, and was absent two years, visiting Sicily, and remaining a considerable time in Rome. In 1792 he was with his prince in the campaign in Champagne, and was afterwards created minister. In 1807 he received from the emperor Alexander of Russia the order of Alexander Nevsky, and, from Napoleon I., the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. His writings are too voluminous to be enumerated here; but we must not forget to mention his "Wilhelm Meister," a moral fiction; and his "Herman and Dorethea." A statue of Goethe, in the Thiergarten, Berlin, was inaugurated by the Emperor of Germany, in June, 1880.

Born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1749; died at Weimar, 1832.

GOG and MAGOG. Gog is the name given in Scripture to one of the sons of Japhet; Gog, prince of Magog, is referred to in the prophecies of Ezekiel; and Gog and Magog are spoken of in the book of Revelation. Gog and Magog were also names bestowed upon two huge figures in the Guildhall of the City of London, supposed to represent gigantic monsters, respecting whom some totally unreliable accounts have been preserved in ancient history.

GOGARI, go-ga'-ri, a river in Nepaul, which rises in lat. 27° 20′ N., lon. 86° 40′ E., and after a course of 235 miles joins the Coosy, an affluent of the Ganges.

GOGMAGOG HILLS, gog'-ma-gog, are situate 3 miles from Cambridge. On their topmost summit are the remains of an ancient camp, with a triple intrenchment.

GOGO, or GAGEH, go'-go, a town and seaport on the west shore of the gulf of Cambay, in the presidency of Bombay, British India. It affords a safe anchorage during the S.W. monsoon. Lat. 21° 39′ N. Lon. 72° 15′ E. Pop. 9,571.

GOGOL, NIKOLAI, go'-gal, a Russian author. His first work, entitled "Evenings at a Farmhouse," a collection of tales, achieved an immense success, as did also a supplementary volume of the same character. The "Revisor," a comedy intended to expose some of the abuses existing in the administration, obtained for him the imperial patronage, and he was appointed professor of history in the university at St. Petersburg. In 1842 Gogol published the "Adventures of Chichagov, or Dead Souls," the aim of the novel being the abolition of serfdom. Subsequently he visited Italy for the sake of his health, and appears to have changed his political opinions, and to have become an advocate of and an apologist for despotism—a change which he lived to regret. He returned to his native country after the commotions of 1848, and died at Moscow.

Born 1810; died 1851.

GOGUET, ANTHONY-YVES, go'-goo-ai, a French author, who wrote "Origines des Loix, des Arts, des Sciences, et de leur Progrès chez les Anciens Peuples," which has been translated into English.

Born at Paris, 1716; died 1758.

GOHUD, go-hood', a town of India, in the province of Agra, 28 miles N.E. of Gwalior. It is inclosed by walls, and has a citadel with lofty towers.

GOITO, go-é'-to, a town in northern Italy, 15 miles N.W. of Mantua. It has been the scene of numerous military operations. Was captured by the imperialists in 1630; was alternately taken by the allies and imperialists in the war of the Spanish succession; was captured by the French in 1796, and recaptured shortly after by the Austrians; was the scene of a severe engagement between the Austrians and Italians in 1814; and again in 1848. Pop. 3,600.

GOJAM, go-jam', a province of Abyssinia, lying to the S. of Lake Dembea. In some parts it is mountainous, and in others diversified by hill and dale, covered with grass and watered by affluents of the Abai. The middle region is a table-land nearly 3,000 feet in elevation. Pop. Unascertained, but small. Lat. 10° to 11° N. Lon. 37° to 38° E.

GOKAUH, go'-kawh, a fortified town of British India, province of Bejapoor, 352 miles S.E. of Bombay. Lat. 16° 11′ N. Lon. 74° 58′ E.

GOLCAR, gol'-kar, a township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles from Huddersfield. Pop. 7655.

GOLCONDA, gol-kon'-da, a town of British India, strongly fortified both by nature and art, standing on a hill 6 miles N.W. of Hyderabad. It was once noted as a mart for diamonds. The fortress is now used as a prison. There are mines of salt and fine iron, and manufactures of curious calicoes and chintzes; but the city is now in a partially ruinous state. Lat. 17° 23′ N. Lon. 78° 26′ E.

GOLDAPP, an old town of Prussia, on a river of the same name, 20 miles S. of Gumbennen. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 4,000.

GOLDAU, gol'-do, a valley of Switzerland, canton Schwytz. It is at the foot of the Rossberg mountain, a landslip from which, in 1806, buried the old village of Goldau, with several other villages, and destroyed more than 450 persons.

GOLDAU, a walled town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the Wildenitz, 26 miles S.E. of Schwerin. Manf. Woollen cloth and tobacco. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,700.

GOLDBERG, gold'-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on an affluent of the Oder, 10 miles from Leignitz. It received its name from the gold mines which were formerly worked here, and which are said at the commencement of the 12th century to have yielded 150lbs. weekly, a statement which must be received with considerable allowance. Manf. Woollens, gloves and hosiery. Near this place, in 1813, the French were defeated by the Prussians. Pop. 7,000.

GOLD COAST, a maritime country of Guinea, in Western Africa, stretching along the coast from the river Volta on the E. to Cape Lahu on the W., and bounded on the N. by Ashantee, where the Europeans have several forts and settlements. The district is about 300 miles in length. It includes several districts, in which are two or three towns or villages, lying on the seashore. The negro inhabitants carry on a great trade with the Europeans in gold; and many of them are employed in fishing and cultivating rice, which grows in incredible quantities. This they exchange for maize, yams, potatoes, and palm oil. This country was discovered by the Portuguese, who, at Fort Elmina, founded a settlement, in 1482. The English established themselves in it in 1664, and the Danish settlements in it were ceded to England in 1850. In 1872 the whole of the Dutch settlements were transferred to England. The principal stations on the coast are Cape Coast Castle (the residence of the governor), Annamboe, and Fort James. Pop., English portion, 400,000; French portion, 200,000.

GOLDONI, CARLO, gol-do'-ne, an Italian writer, who was intended by his father to be an actor, but, showing no liking for theatrical art, was educated for the church. This proved equally distasteful, and he was expelled from college for writing coarse satires. He then practised as an advocate, but not being successful, he turned his attention to dramatic writing. The Italian stage was reformed by him; and his comedies, which are numerous, are exceedingly humorous and natural. About 1761, he went to Paris, and became composer to the Italian theatre, besides which he had an appointment at court.

Born at Venice, 1707; died 1795.

GOLDSCHMIDT, MADAME. (See LIND, JENNY.)

GOLDSMITH, OLIVER, gold'-smith, one of the most distinguished ornaments of English literature, was the son of a clergyman of the established church, who held the living of Kilkenny West, in Ireland. Oliver, at an early age, was consigned to the charge of the village schoolmaster, one Thomas Byrne, a retired quarter-master of an Irish regiment, whose peculiarities are commemorated in the poem of "The Deserted Village," and form one of the finest poetical portraitures in the language. Subsequently, he was sent to Trinity College, Dublin, and thence to Edinburgh, to study physic. Here he entered into all the convivialities of the social inhabitants of that city; but, having become security for the debt of a fellow-student, he was obliged to escape to England; but was arrested at Sunderland, and released by two college friends whom he there accidentally met. He was next sent to Leyden, in Holland, through the generosity of an uncle, Contarine, whose exhaustless goodness and kindheartedness to the wayward and thoughtless Oliver do honour to his species. Leaving Leyden, poor but adventurous, Goldsmith, in February, 1755, sent out to travel over Europe on foot. On this occasion, and for this enterprise, he was furnished exactly with "one guinea in his pocket, a shirt on his back, and a flute in his hand." He partly "disputed his way," by accepting university challenges; and when weary of this, he betook himself to his flute; and "whenever I approached a peasant's house towards nightfall," he beautifully says, "I played one of my most merry tunes, and that procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day." The remembrance of the festive joy which his merry pipe produced at such times is finely recalled in his poem of "The Traveller." At Louvain he took the degree of bachelor of physic, the highest degree he ever attained, and, on the strength of that, and with a very rudimentary knowledge of the medical art, he did not hesitate to attempt to establish himself as a physician in London, when he returned to England in 1754. Being reduced to a low state, he became usher in a school at Peckham, where, however, he did not remain long, but settled in London, and subsisted by writing for periodical publications. One of his first performances was an "Inquiry into the State of Polite Learning in Europe." He next commenced a weekly periodical called "The Bee," but it failed; and, in 1760, he contributed, to the "Public Ledger" of Mr. Newberry, his celebrated "Chinese Letters." He at the same time became a contributor to various other publications; but he emerged from obscurity in 1764, by the publication of his poem entitled "The Traveller; or, a Prospect of Society;" of which Dr. Johnson said "that there had not been so fine a poem since Pope's time." The year following appeared his beautiful novel, "The Vicar of Wakefield." His circumstances were now respectable, and he took chambers in the Temple; but the liberality of his disposition, want of ordinary prudence, preposterous vanity, and a propensity to gaming, involved him in frequent difficulties. In 1768 he brought out his comedy of "The Good-Natured Man" at Covent Garden; but its reception was not equal to its merits. In 1770 he published "The Deserted Village," a poem which, in point of description and pathos, is beyond all praise. As a dramatic comic poet, he appeared to great advantage in the play of "She Stoops to Conquer; or, the Mistakes of a Night," which was produced in 1773, and which is still a favourite with the public. Besides these performances, he produced a number of others; as, a "History of England, in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son," 2 vols. 12mo. This useful and pleasing work was, for a long time, attributed to Lord Lyttelton. "A History of England," "A Roman History," "A Grecian History," "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature," and other works, all bear the impress of an original and truly gentle and beautiful genius. He was buried in the Temple churchyard. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, with a Latin epitaph by Dr. Johnson.

Born at Pallas, near Ballymahon, Ireland, 1728; died in London, 1774.

GOLFO DULCE, a small gulf of Guatemala, 16 miles by 11 miles, communicating with the Gulf of Honduras by a narrow strait known as the Rio Dulce.

GOLIATH, go-li'-a, a giant of the Philistines, slain by David.

GOLIUS, JACOB, go'-le-oos, a learned Orientalist, who was educated at Leyden, after which he went to France, and taught the Greek language at Rochelle. In 1622 he accompanied the Dutch ambassador to the emperor of Morocco, who was highly pleased with his conversation. After his return, he succeeded to the Arabic professorship. In 1625 he went to the Levant, and made excursions into Arabia, and, in 1629, returned to Leyden, where he was chosen professor of mathematics, which station he filled with great honour till his death. He published an Arabic Lexicon, a Persian Dictionary, the Saracen History of Elmacin, the Life of Tamerlane, the Astronomical Elements of Alfragan, &c.

Born at the Hague, 1596; died 1667.

GOLIUS, PETER, an elder brother of the preceding, was the author of several works, both in Greek and Latin, and founded a monastery of the Barefooted Carmelites on Mount Libanus. He was afterwards employed on a mission to the East Indies, and died at Surat. He had a considerable share in editing the grand Arabic Bible printed at Rome in 1671. He also translated some religious manuals into that language.

Died about 1673.

GOLLNOW, gol'-now, a small Prussian town, 15 miles N.E. from Stettin, on the right bank of the Ihna, in the province of Pomerania. Manf. Ribbons, woollen cloth, paper, and tobacco. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 7,200.

GOLYDDAN, go-lid'-dan, the bard of Cadwallader, the last nominal king of the Britons.

Lived in the 7th and 8th centuries.

GOMAR, FRANCIS, go'-mar, a zealous defender of the Calvinistic doctrines, who studied at both the English universities, and, in 1594, became professor of divinity at Leyden. When Arminius was chosen as his colleague, in 1603, a difference arose between them on the subjects of grace and predestination, and Gomar conducted himself in the controversy with great bitterness. In 1611 he resigned his professorship, and went to Middleburg, whence, in 1614, he removed to Saumur, and afterwards to Groningen. He distinguished himself by his ardour against the Arminians at the synod of Dort. His works are almost wholly polemical.

Born at Bruges, 1563; died at Groningen, 1641.

GOMBAULD, JOHN OGIER DE, gom'-bolt, a French poet, and one of the first members of the French Academy. His works are tragedies, pastorals, romances, sonnets, and epigrams.

The island is 12 miles long, by 12 broad. Fertile in the valleys, and producing corn, cotton, sugar, fruits, and wine. Pop. 11,500.

GOMM, WILLIAM MAYNARD, SIR, gom', English field-marshal. At the early age of 10 years, he entered the army as an ensign in the 9th Foot, and five years afterwards was on active service, serving under the Duke of York and Sir Ralph Abercrombie; was present at the siege of Copenhagen, and was an officer of the Coldstream Guards in the Peninsular war, taking part in most of the leading battles and sieges. He was present at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. For his services at Waterloo he was made a Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath, and was made a Knight of St. Anne of Russia by the Emperor Alexander. For his services in the Peninsula he had received the Gold Cross and one clasp for Badajoz, Salamanca, Vittoria, San Sebastian, and more recently the Silver War Medal with six clasps for Roliça, Vimiera, Corunna, Busaco, Fuentes d'Onor, and Nivelle. For some years he commanded a battalion of the Coldstream Guards, from which he retired in 1837, on attaining the rank of major-general. In 1840 he was appointed Commander of the Forces and Lieutenant-Governor in Jamaica. On his return in 1841 he was appointed to the command of the Northern District. In November, 1842, he was appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief in the Mauritius, in the place of Sir Lionel Smith, Bart., K.C.B., which appointment he held to May, 1849. In January, 1851, he succeeded General Sir Charles J. Napier as Commander-in-Chief in India, and was an extraordinary member of the Council till the end of his services in India in December, 1855. In 1856 he was appointed colonel of the 13th Foot, and was transferred, as colonel of the Coldstream Guards, in August, 1863. He was appointed Constable of the Tower of London and Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the Tower Hamlets on the death of Field-Marshal Sir John Burgoyne in November, 1872. The last honour conferred upon the field-marshal, and one he greatly appreciated, was by the Emperor of Russia on his recent visit to this country, in 1874, who decorated him with the Imperial Order of St. Vladimir. Sir W. Gomm was for 81 years in the British army, for by far the greater part of the time in active service.

Born 1784; died 1875.

He received the large silver medal of the Society of Arts for his first oil picture, "Finding the Dead Body of a Miner by Torchlight," and exhibited, at the early age of 17, at the Royal Academy, his painting of "French Soldiers playing Cards in a Cabaret." His "Tired Soldier," exhibited in 1842, is now in the Vernon Gallery, as is also "The Village Festival," painted in 1847. He was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1852; and a Royal Academician in 1863. His works are numerous.

Born in London, 1822.

GOODWIN or GODWIN SANDS lie off the coast of Kent, between the N. and S. Foreland. They run parallel with the coast for 9 miles, the roadstead termed the Downs lying between them and the mainland. These sands occupy a space that was formerly a large tract of ground belonging to Godwin, earl of Kent, father of King Harold. It afterwards was given to the monastery of St. Augustine, at Canterbury; but the abbot neglecting to keep in repair the wall that defended it from the sea, the whole tract was submerged in the year 1100, leaving these sands, upon which many ships have been wrecked.

GOOLE, gool, a market-town and river-port in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the right bank of the Ouse, 3 miles S. of Howden. There are extensive docks. GORBALS, gor'-bals, a parish of Scotland, and suburb of Glasgow, on the S. side of the Clyde, between Hutchesontown and Laurieston. (See GLASGOW.)

GORDIANUS I. M. ANTONINUS AFRICANUS, gord-di-ai'-nus, emperor of Rome, a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan, by his mother's side. He composed a poem in thirty books, upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus and M. Aurelius. Having been promoted to the prætorship, and subsequently elected consul, he took the government of Africa in the capacity of pro-consul. After he had attained his 80th year, he was roused by the tyranny of the Maximini, and was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death forced his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son, with whom he shared the imperial dignity, to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed in battle the 25th of June, 236 A.D., and the father strangled himself at Carthage, before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire. He was universally lamented by the army and people.

Born 157; died 236.

GORDIANUS II., MARCUS ANTONINUS PIUS, grandson of the first Gordian, was but twelve years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in his 16th year, and his election was attended with universal approbation. In his 18th year he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Misitheus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Gordian conquered Sapor, king of Persia, who had invaded the Roman provinces, and took many flourishing cities in the East. On this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Misitheus, his father-in-law, as the guardian of the republic. He was assassinated in the East.

Born 226; died 244.

GORDIUS, gor'-de-us, in Greek tradition, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne, in consequence of an oracle having told the Phrygians to give the crown to the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. The famous Gordian knot took its origin from this chariot. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught-tree was made in such an artful manner, that the ends of the cord could not be perceived.

From this circumstance a report was spread that the empire of Asia was promised, by the oracle, to him who would untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium, and as he wished to inspire his soldiers with courage and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword, and asserted that the oracle was then fulfilled and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified.

GORDON, gor'-don, a great historical family of Scotland. In 1305 Sir Adam Gordon was high in favour with Edward I. of England, and sat as one of the representatives of Scotland in the English council at Westminster. From him were descended the Lords of Gordon.

GORDON, CHARLES GEORGE, distinguished as General Gordon, the hero of China and the Soudan. Descending from a long line of Scottish ancestors, and the fourth son of Henry William Gordon, an artillery officer who was stationed at Woolwich in 1833. The young hero was of delicate constitution, but of great determination. He entered as second lieutenant in the Royal Engineers in 1852. In 1855 he served in the severest duty before Sebastopol during the Crimean war, and took part in several spirited attacks upon the Russian works, for which the French Government conferred upon him the Cross of the Legion of Honour. He conducted the destruction of the fortifications of Sebastopol, was conspicuous in the capture of Kinburn, after which he was made assistant commissioner to determine the frontier. He next appears during the war with China in 1860, when he served with increasing distinction. Peace having been made between the European forces and China, the great Taiping rebellion broke out against the Chinese government, and Gordon, with the assent of the home authorities, entered the service of China in 1863 in opposition to the rebels. So great was the rebellion that in May, 1869, its forces gained a great victory over a hundred thousand of the Imperialists near Nanking. To the bravery, firmness and severe discipline of Gordon, the ultimate suppression of the rebellion was due. He had conferred upon him the Chinese Order of the Star, the Peacock's Feather and the Yellow Jacket, which constituted him one of the highest mandarins. On his return in 1864, he was made Commanding Royal Engineer at Gravesend. In the intervals of his official duties there, he deeply concerned himself in visiting the sick, aiding the distressed, teaching ragged schools, and rescuing boys from vagabond lives. From this retirement he was called in 1871 to act as British Commissioner in the adjustment of affairs on the Danube. This indirectly led to his preferment by the Khedive of Egypt to the post of Governor of the Soudan, which position he filled with the assent of the British government. He engaged there in arduous duties and adventures till 1879, when the deposition of the Khedive ended his engagement. Shortly afterwards he became secretary to the Earl of Ripon, who was then Governor-General of India; but he soon gave that up, revisited China, and in 1882 took a command in Cape Colony. Still restless, he again relinquished his post and visited Palestine. Subsequently he contemplated operations on the Congo, but negotiations with that intention were relinquished on receipt of an invitation of the British government to proceed to the Soudan, where he again proceeded under the nominal authority of the Egyptian government. He volunteered to travel in total solitude from Cairo to Khartoum, and did so. He was received joyfully by the defenders of the city, and took the command there. For some months he kept the rebels at bay, but, as evidence of his peril reached London, a British military expedition was sent to his rescue. After enormous difficulties it arrived within two or three days' sail of Khartoum; but, on an advanced party reaching there, it was discovered that the city had been given up to the rebels, and that the hero had been betrayed by treachery and shot down while despairingly resisting. So ended the life of one of the most remarkable men of his time.

Born at Woolwich, January, 1833; died at Khartoum, January, 1885.

GORDON, GEORGE, Earl of Moray in 1524. Actuated by jealously, the king deprived him of the earldom. This drove the earl into revolt, and he was killed at the battle of Corrichie.

Died 1562.

GORDON, GEORGE, sixth earl, grandson of the above, and created marquis of Huntly in 1599; was the head of the Roman Catholic power in England.

Died 1635.

GORDON, GEORGE, second marquis of Huntly, son of the preceding, was an active partizan of the royal cause against the Covenanters, for which he was beheaded at Edinburgh.

Died 1644.

GORDON, PATRICK, a distinguished "soldier of fortune" in the 17th century.

Born in Aberdeenshire, 1635; died 1699.

Born 1790; died June, 1864.

GORDON, GEORGE, commonly called Lord George Gordon. He sat in Parliament for Ludgershall, and opposed further toleration to Roman Catholics, which led to the riots in 1780, for which he was tried and acquitted. In 1788 he was found guilty of publishing a libel against the Queen of France, on which he fled to Holland. A little after this he returned to England, and was taken in the disguise of a Jew, which profession he had adopted, and committed to Newgate, where he died of fever.

Born 1750; died 1793.

GORE, gor, a district of the province of Ontario, Canada, British North America, bounded on the S. and W. by the districts London and Niagara, N. by York and Home, and E. by Lake Ontario. It contains some of the richest and most highly cultivated settlements in this part of the Dominion, and is especially rich in freestone and limestone. Pop. 48,000.

GORE, CATHARINE GRACE, a popular English novelist. Her novels and other works extend to upwards of 150 volumes.

Born in Nottinghamshire, 1799; died 1861.

GOREE, a town and small island, or rather rock, off the coast of Africa, little more than a mile from Cape Verd. It produces nothing, and its importance is solely derived from its inaccessible situation, on a naked rock of black basalt, rising to the height of 300 feet. This island was first occupied by the Dutch, and afterwards taken by the French, to whom it was finally ceded by the treaty of Nimeguen. It is now the bulwark of the possessions of the French in Africa. It is the entrepôt for all the French trade with the opposite coast of Africa. Lat. 14° 36' N. Lon. 17° 22' W. Pop. of town, 3,000; of island, 7,000.

GOREY, a municipal borough and market town, county Wexford, Ireland, 3 miles inland from the coast, 24 miles N.E. of the town of Wexford. Consists mainly of one street, nearly a mile in length. There are a national school, savings bank, Roman Catholic chapel and nunnery. Has a considerable trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,673.

GORGEI, ARTHUR, gor'-gai, a Hungarian, who, in 1837, entered the Hungarian life-guards, and, in 1842, was attached to the hussars of the Palatinate; but, in 1845, quitted the army and retired to his own estates, where he lived a quiet life, devoting himself principally to the study of the sciences. In 1848 he appeared as a volunteer in the field, against the Croatians and Sclavonians, and was invested with the rank of captain. His time was, at first, chiefly occupied in organising the Hungarian forces; and, having been sent to operate in the neighbourhood of Pesth, on the Danube, he obtained full powers from the Hungarian prime-minister, Count Batthyani, to adjudicate upon cases of treason and other crimes in a court-martial. This power was first exercised upon Count Eugene Zichy, who had been found guilty of communicating with Jellachich, and upon him the sentence of death was passed and carried into execution. Gorgei was subsequently called upon to act against General Roth, and was so far successful, as to cause that general to lay down his arms. For this Gorgei obtained the rank of colonel. Subsequently he was defeated at the battle of Schwechat, notwithstanding which, he was appointed by Kossuth as commander-in-chief of the Hungarian armies. Fortune, however, did not smile upon him in the field, and he was shortly afterwards superseded in the command, but had it again conferred upon him. He then won the battle of Nagy-sarlo, and relieved the garrison of Komorn. Hungary was now declared an independent state, with Kossuth for its governor, and Gorgei for its minister-at-war. He next took Buda, but was subsequently forced to retreat before General Haynau. He next rose to be dictator of Hungary; but seeing that it was hopeless to contend against the enormous power of Russia, which had come to the assistance of Austria, and declining to be made the victim of the political intrigues of the Kossuth party, he surrendered with his army, for which he was stigmatised as a traitor by the extreme party. He received the pardon of the emperor of Austria, and retired to Klagenfurt. He has published a work defending his conduct.

Born at Toporaz, 1818.

GORGIAS, LEONTINUS, gor-jé'-as, a celebrated orator of the school of Empedocles, was a native of Leontinum, in Sicily. A golden statue was erected to his honour at Delphi. Plato has given his name to one of his dialogues.

Lived 417 B.C.

GORGONES, gor-gó'-nees, in Greek mythology, three sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto. Their names were Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa, all immortal except Medusa. Their hairs were entwined with serpents, their hands were brass, their body was covered with impenetrable scales, and their teeth were as long as the tusks of a wild boar. They were so frightful that they turned to stone all those on whom they fixed their eyes. Mythologists differ in their accounts of them. They were conquered by Perseus, who, it is said, was furnished, by different deities, with weapons which he afterwards returned to them. The head of Medusa remained in his hands; and after he had finished all his laborious expeditions, he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which she turned into stone all such as fixed their eyes upon it. It is said, that, after the conquest of the Gorgons, Perseus took his flight in the air towards Ethiopia, and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Medusa's head, were changed into serpents, which have, ever since, infested the sandy deserts of Libya. The horse Pegasus also arose from the blood of Medusa, as well as Chyrsaor with his golden sword. Hesiod fixed the residence of the Gorgons in the west, Æschylus in Scythia, and Ovid in Libya, near the lake Triton.

GORGONZOLA, gor-gon-zó'-la, a town of northern Italy, 12 miles N.E. of Milan. There is a very fine church, adorned with sculptures and painting. A large trade is carried on in ewe-milk cheese, and an annual fair is held. Pop. 4,400.

GORLITZ, gor'-litz, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Neisse, 50 miles from Dresden. It is surrounded by walls, entered by eleven gates, and has three suburbs. The church of St. Peter and St. Paul is an interesting Gothic structure of the 15th century, with five naves, magnificent organ, and a bell 12½ tons in weight. A viaduct, one of the grandest in the north of Germany, here crosses the valley of the Neisse. Manf. Cloth, leather, glass, pens, &c. Pop. 55,120.

GORRES, JAKOB JOSEPH VON, a distinguished German journalist and author, and professor of history and literature in the university of Munich. In his early years he was an ardent republican, and established a newspaper, called the "Red Journal," which advocated the most extreme opinions; headed a deputation to Paris, in 1779, to negotiate the annexation of the Rhineland to France. After the revolution of the eighteenth Brumaire, he returned to Coblentz, and devoted himself to literature. He laboured zealously to promote the movement for the re-establishment of German independence, and after this was achieved, continued his career as a journalist until, having offended the government, he was obliged to fly, first to France, and then to Switzerland. In 1827 he accepted a professorship at Munich from the hands of the king of Bavaria. He was the author of a collection of German popular legends, and a work on the mythology of Asiatic nations; he wrote also on physiology, and on the relations of Faith and Science, and took an active and influential part in the religious controversies of his time; was a main supporter of the "Historiche-Politische Blätter," a well-known Roman Catholic journal. His last work was his "Christliche Mystik."

Born 1776; died 1848.

GORTSCHAKOFF, gort'-sha-kof, PETER, prince, a military commander, took part in the Russian wars against Turkey, and, in 1839, was made governor of Eastern Siberia. In 1843 he became general of infantry, and, in 1851, retired from service.

Born 1790; died 1868.

GORTSCHAKOFF, MICHAEL, prince, played a prominent part in many of the Russian wars, and, in 1855, succeeded prince Menschikoff in the command of the Russian forces in the Crimea. He superintended the defence of Sebastopol, which, however, he was at last forced to evacuate, making a masterly retreat.

Born 1795; died 1861.

GORTSCHAKOFF, ALEXANDER, prince, diplomatist, represented Russia at various European courts, and, in 1855, negotiated the peace between Russia and the western powers. Succeeded count Nesselrode, as minister of foreign affairs, in 1856; and, in 1870, issued the circular which led to the London Conference of 1871, and the abrogation of the clause in the treaty of 1856, prohibiting the maintenance of a Russian fleet and arsenal in the Black Sea.

Born 1800.

GORUCKPORE, gor-uk'-por, a district of British India, in the division of Benares, inclosed by Nepaul, Oude, Sarun, and Azimghur. It is generally level, with a fertile soil, producing the usual cerealia, with maize, oil-seeds, tobacco, indigo, and cotton. The district is traversed by numerous streams, the principal of which are the Raptee and Gunduk. There are large tracts of jungle, abounding with elephants, tigers, and game of various descriptions. Area, 7,346 square miles. Pop. 2,617,120.

GOSLAR, gos'-lar, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, principality of Hildesheim, on the Gosa, 28 miles from Brunswick. It is an old place, with crowded streets and mean houses, and surrounded by lofty walls. The most interesting buildings are the town-house, built in the 15th century, the remains of the imperial palace, the Gothic market church, and a portion of the old cathedral, now used as a chapel. Manf. Carpets, leather, playing-cards, tobacco, glue, and hardware goods. This place was formerly a frequent residence of the German emperors, as it was also a seat of the German diets. Pop. 10,791.

GOSPORT, gos'-port, a fortified seaport town of England, in Hampshire. It is situate on a projecting point of land at the W. side of the entrance to Portsmouth harbour, and is connected with Portsmouth by a floating bridge. On the S.W. is a commodious bay. It has numerous government works and magazines for supplying the wants of the navy, especially the Royal Clarence Victualling Yard; also extensive barracks for the accommodation of the military. The principal street extends W. from the harbour to the works, and contains many handsome houses. The Haslar gunboat ship-yard is connected with the town. In the town is an extensive iron-foundry, for the manufacture of anchors and other articles required for shipping. To the S. of the town stands Haslar Royal Hospital, for sick and wounded seamen. Pop. 7,366, mostly engaged in the government navy works.—A station on the London and South-Western railway.

GOTHA, go'-ta, a province of the duchy of Saxe-Coburg Gotha (which see), Germany. Area, 486 square miles. Pop., with Coburg, 198,600.

GOTHA, capital of the above province, 18 miles W. of Erfurt. It stands on the declivity of a hill crowned by the palace of Friedenstein, a large building with two lofty towers, which is the usual residence of the sovereigns of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, and contains a splendid picture gallery. Here also are a valuable library, an arsenal, and an extensive cabinet of natural history, artificial curiosities, and medals, with a suitable library; also several charitable establishments. Manf. Porcelain, woollen, and cotton stuffs, paper, musical and surgical instruments, and tobacco. The great geographical establishment of Justus Perthes is in this town, and since 1764, the "Almanach de Gotha" has been published here. Pop. 28,000.

GOTHARD, ST., go'-tard, the name of an elevated tract in the central part of Switzerland, between the cantons of Uri, Valais, Ticino, and the Grisons. It consists properly of a circular plain, surrounded on all sides by some of the loftiest summits of the Alps. Its height is from 8,000 to 11,000 feet above the level of the sea. Not far from the hospice, the rivers Rhine, Rhone, Reuss, and Ticino, have their sources. The Pass of St. Gothard is one of the best and most frequented routes across the Alps. At its summit, 6,976 feet high, is the hospice, where travellers may commodiously find repose. On the N. slope is the celebrated Devil's Bridge across the Reuss. Here, in 1799, the French and Russians had several combats.

GÖTHE. (See GOETHE.)

GOTHLAND, or GOTTLAND, an island of the Baltic, near the south-east coast of Sweden, and belonging to that crown. It forms, along with some very small islands that surround it, the district of Wisby. In the 15th century king Eric X., having quarrelled with his Swedish and Danish subjects, retired to Wisby, the capital of the district, and took up his residence in the castle, accompanied by his mistress and a band of followers. Here he remained for ten years, and his people having declared his crown forfeited, he maintained himself by piracy and pillage. Area, 1,080 square miles. Desc. The island is hilly on the coast, but level and fertile in the interior, with corn land and pasturage. The principal exports are wood, sandstone, marble, lime and leather. Pop. 52,759; Gotcborg, the capital, 85,181.

GOTTENBURG, or GOTHENBURG, got'-ten-boorg, a seaport-town in the south-west of Sweden, situate near the mouth of the large river called Gotha-Elf, immediately opposite the N. extremity of Denmark. The town is divided into Upper and Lower, the former built upon adjacent rocks, rising to the height of from 100 to 300 feet, and the latter standing in a marshy plain. The principal street runs from east to west, and divides the town into two nearly equal parts. The Upper town, from its situation, is built with less regularity; but it has an imposing appearance, the houses rising one above another in the form of an amphitheatre. The only considerable public edifices of Gottenburg are the cathedral, the town hall, and the exchange. It has several learned societies, a college, a public library, orphan asylum, and schools. The harbour is commodious for vessels of moderate size, and is defended by three forts.

Manf.—Coarse linen and woollen stuffs, leather, glass, sail-cloth, ropes, silk and cotton goods, soap, tobacco; also sugar refineries; and ship building is carried on. Iron and steel, furnished by the rich mines of Vermland, form the principal articles of export; and, after these, herrings, linen, timber, tar, train oil, and alum.

Lived in the 12th century.

GOTTHI, or GOTH, goth'-i, a celebrated nation of Germany, called also Gothones, Gutones, Jythones, and Guttones. They were warriors by profession, and extended their power over all parts of the world, but chiefly directed their efforts against the Roman empire. Their first attempt was on the provinces of Greece, whence they were driven by Constantine. They plundered Rome, under Alaric, one of their most celebrated kings, A.D. 410, and finally introduced disorders, anarchy, and revolutions in the west of Europe.

GOTTINGEN, got'-ting-en, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, and district of Hildesheim, 59 miles S.E. of Hanover. It stands in a pleasant valley, on a canal branching from the Leine. It was formerly fortified; but the walls are now demolished, and their site laid out in public walks. Gottingen is a place of antiquity, and was, some centuries ago, included in the list of Hanse towns; but its chief title to notice arises from its celebrated university, founded by George II. in 1735, which embraces all the great departments of literature and science, and, till 1831, was the principal of the German universities. To the university is attached a library, consisting of 400,000 volumes and 5,000 MSS. In 1751, an academy of sciences was connected with the university, besides a museum, botanic garden, and various other institutions. To it is also attached the Spruch Kollegium, a judicial society, for whose decision questions are brought from all parts of Germany. Gottingen has also a female high school. Its religious edifices consist of several Lutheran and Calvinist churches, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Manf. Woollen and linen stuffs, coloured paper, musical instruments, and steel-ware goods. Lat. 51° 31′ N. Lon. 9° 56′ E.—Under the French empire, 1807-14, Gottingen was the capital of the department Leine. Pop. 16,000.

GOUDA, or TER-GOUW, how-da, a town of the Netherlands, on the Yssel, 12 miles N.E. of Rotterdam. Its church of St. John the Baptist is one of the handsomest and largest in the country. The great market-place is of a triangular form, with a handsome town-house, built in 1449, standing in the centre. Manf. Woollens, tobacco, leather, white lead, snuff, soap, sail-cloth, and cordage. Pop. 18,118.

GOUDELIN, or GOUDOULI, PETER, goo'-de-la, a Gascon poet, whose verses have great sprightliness and a delicate simplicity. His works, which are much admired by his countrymen, have gone through numerous editions.

Born at Toulouse, 1579; died there, 1629.

GOUGH, HUGH, Viscount, G.C.B., gof, entered the army in 1794, and, in the following year, was sent with his regiment to the Cape of Good Hope, which he assisted to capture, and subsequently served in the West Indies. In 1809, as major of the 87th regiment, he was dispatched to the Peninsula, where he commanded his corps at the battles of Talavera, Barossa, Vittoria, Nivelle, Cadiz, and Tarifa. For his bravery in these engagements, his armorial bearings were augmented by an additional heraldic device. At Talavera he was wounded, and had a horse shot under him; but his gallantry was so conspicuous that, on the recommendation of the Duke of Wellington, he received brevet rank for services performed in the field, and became lieutenant-colonel. In 1830 he was made a major-general, and, in 1837, took command of a division of the Indian army. He had not been long at his post, however, when he was ordered to China, where he took the command of the British troops, when his conduct in the attack on Canton caused him to be made a G.C.B. On the close of the Chinese war, in 1842, he was created a baronet, and received the thanks of both houses of parliament. Returning to India, he became commander-in-chief of the British forces, and entered on the Mahratta war. After gaining the battle of Maharajpore, and terminating the war, he in 1845 encountered the Sikhs, whom, with the assistance of the governor-general, lord Hardinge, he successively defeated at Moodkee, Ferozeshah, and Sobraon. For his services in this war he again received a vote of thanks from both houses of parliament, and, in 1846, was raised to the peerage as baron Gough. In 1848-49 he was once more engaged against the same enemy, and finally defeated them at Goojerat, though at a great sacrifice of life. For this victory he was again thanked by both houses of parliament, created a viscount, with a pension of 2,000*l.* per annum from the legislature, and a like sum from the East-India Company. In 1849 he returned to England, and retired from active service. In 1854, on the death of the marquis of Anglesey, he became colonel of the Royal Horse-guards.

Born near Limerick, Ireland, 1779; died 1869.

GOUKEKA, GOUKCHA, or SEVAN, LAKE OF, gou-ke'-ka, Russian Armenia, 24 miles from Erivan. It is 48 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 5 to 20. This lake furnishes fine fish, and contains the island of Sevan. The height is 5,300 feet above the level of the sea.

GOULBURN, gool'-burn, a town of New South Wales, Australia, 128 miles S.W. of Sydney. It is well laid out, has good public buildings, and is the principal depôt of the southern inland trade. It is in the midst of a thriving agricultural district. Pop. 6,839.

GOUNOD, FELIX CHARLES, goo-no', French musical composer. He studied at the Conservatoire, and, obtaining the first prize of the Institute in 1839, was sent to Rome to complete his studies. On his return a Mass brought him into notice, and in 1851 his first opera, "Sapho," was produced. Several other works followed, and the production, in 1859, of "Faust," established his claim to rank with the first composers of the day. He has written other operas and an oratorio.

Born in Paris, 1818.

GOUR, or GAUR, a ruined city of British India, 50 miles N. of Moorshedabad, the ancient capital of Bengal, which extended for 7 miles along the banks of the Ganges. It was a place of fame 2,000 years ago. There are the ruins of a superb mosque, 170 feet long and 130 feet broad, and other remains of interest.

GOWER, JOHN, gour, an English poet, became eminent as a professor of law in the Inner Temple, and is supposed to have been chief justice of the Common Pleas. He was a liberal benefactor to the church of St. Saviour, Southwark, where his monument still remains. His works are of the grave kind; whence his friend Chaucer styles him the "Moral Gower." They consist of three parts,—"Speculum Meditantis," "Vox Clamantis," "Confessio Amantis." They were printed first by Caxton in 1483. The "Confessio Amantis" is said to have been written by command of Richard II., who, "meeting our poet Gower rowing in the Thames, near London, invited him into the royal barge, and, after much conversation, requested him to 'book some new thing.'" According to himself, Chaucer was his disciple, but far excelled him in the true spirit of poesy.

Born in Yorkshire, 1325; died in London, 1402.

GOWER, or GWR, goor, a peninsula of S. Wales, projecting into the British Channel, and forming the W. part of Glamorganshire. It is 15 miles long, with an average breadth of 5; high and precipitous on the coast, with shores deeply indented. Since the time of Henry I., it is said a colony of Flemings have occupied the S.W. of this extremity.

GOYA Y LUCIENTES, FRANCISCO, a celebrated Spanish artist, court painter to Charles IV.; was particularly successful as a portrait painter. He resided in Paris during the last few years of his life, where he died.

Born 1746; died 1828.

GOYANNA, go-yan'-na, a city of Brazil, in the province of Pernambuco, on the Goyanna river. There is a large trade in cotton, sugar, rum, hides, timber, and dyewood. Pop. 10,000.

GOYAZ, go'-yaz, the central province of Brazil, surrounded by the provinces San Paulo, Minas Geraes, Pernambuco, Maranham, Para, and Matto-Grosso. It is mountainous, and watered by the Tocantins. In the valleys the soil is fertile, and produces maize, cotton, tobacco, sugar, and manioc. The fruits are the same as those grown in the south of Europe. Horned cattle are reared in innumerable herds. Area, 360,750 square miles. Pop. 191,711, including about 15,000 of Indian race. Lat. between 6° and 20° S. Lon. between 46° and 52° W.

GOYAZ, a city of Brazil, capital of the province of the same name, situate near the centre of the empire, on both sides of the Vermelho, 680 miles N.W. of Rio-de-Janeiro. It was formerly called Villa Boa, and is the seat of the legislative assembly of the province. Pop. about 7,000.

GOZO, go'-zo, a small island in the Mediterranean, a little to the north-west of Malta. It is 9 miles long, with a breadth of 5, and rocky, but fertile. The chief town is of the same name. Pop. 16,500.—There is, in this island, a Cyclopean giants' tower, which is an object of great interest. On the S.E. coast is Fort Chambray.

GRAAF REYNET, graf, a district in the eastern division of the Cape of Good Hope. Mountainous, consisting almost entirely of the Sneeuwberg (Snow Mountains), which rise in some parts to a height of 7,000 feet. It is well watered, fertile in the valleys, and the climate is healthy. Along the foot of the mountains is a tract known as the Caindeboo, good grazing ground for sheep. Area, 5,350 square miles. Pop. 14,500.

GRAAF REYNET, the chief town of the above district, on a branch of the Sunday river, in a valley of the Sneeuwbergen, 160 miles N. of Port Elizabeth. The streets are laid out at right angles and planted with trees. Pop. 4,000.

GRABOW, grah'-bo, a town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the left bank of the Elde, 24 miles S.E. of Schwerin. Manf. Woollen cloth and tobacco. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,700.

GRACAY, grah'-ka, a town in France, department Cher, 27 miles N.W. of Bourges. It is old and ill-built. Pop. 3,200.

GRACCHUS, TIBERIUS SEMPRONIUS, grak'-kus, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, was twice consul and once censor. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronia, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue.

Born 210 B.C.; died 163.

GRACCHUS, TIBERIUS, son of the above. With a winning eloquence, and uncommon popularity, he began to renew the agrarian law, which, by the means of violence, was enacted. Being himself appointed one of the commissioners for carrying the law into execution, he was assassinated while in office by Publius Nasica.

Died 143 B.C.

GRACCHUS, CAIUS, brother of the preceding, after his death, with more vehemence but less moderation, endeavoured to carry what he left unaccomplished into effect. This, in the end, increased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, about 12 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber. Caius has been accused of having murdered Scipio Africanus the younger.

Died 121 B.C.

GRACCHUS, SEMPRONIUS, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate.

Lived in 1st century.

GRACIAS-A-DIOS, grah'-the-as-a-de'-ose, a decayed town of Central America, in the state of Honduras. Pop. Unascertained.

GRAHAM, GEORGE, grah'-ham, an eminent scientific mechanic, who was journeyman and successor to Tompion, the celebrated clockmaker. He distinguished himself not only by the accuracy of his timepieces, but by the invention of several valuable instruments for astronomical observations. The great mural arch in the observatory of Greenwich was made under his inspection, and divided by his own hand. He invented the sector, with which Dr. Bradley discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. He furnished the members of the French Assembly, who were sent to the north to measure a degree of the meridian, with the instruments for that purpose, and was a member of the Royal Society, to which he communicated several useful discoveries. He was interred in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Cumberland, 1675; died in London, 1751.

GRAHAM, RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR JAMES ROBERT GEORGE, Bart., statesman, was the eldest son of Sir James, the first baronet, and Lady C. Stewart, eldest daughter of the Earl of Galloway. He received his education at Westminster, and at Queen's College, Cambridge. He entered public life as secretary to Lord Montgomerie, English ambassador in Sicily, which situation he continued to hold under Lord William Bentinck, and was the principal in negotiating an armistice with Murat at Naples. In 1818 he was returned member of parliament for Hull, upon extreme liberal principles, but did not long retain his seat. In 1823 he succeeded to his father's baronetcy, and in 1826 was returned member for Carlisle. In 1830 he took office under Earl Grey, as first lord of the Admiralty; in 1831 he assisted in framing the Reform Bill of Earl Grey; and, in 1834, resigned, on account of disagreeing with his colleagues on the appropriation clause in the Irish Church Temporalities Bill. For some years he held an independent position; but, when Sir Robert

Peel, in 1841, came into power, he accepted the home secretaryship. In 1844 he suffered greatly in public opinion, by ordering letters addressed to M. Mazzini to be opened and copied at the General Post Office. (See BANDIERA.) His popularity, however, soon rose again by the active and firm part he took with Sir Robert Peel in carrying the repeal of the corn-laws. Shortly afterwards, the government were driven from office on the Irish Coercion Bill. Sir James, who succeeded, on the death of Sir Robert, to the leadership of the Peelite party in the House of Commons, continued out of place till 1853, when he became again, under the administration of Lord Aberdeen, first lord of the Admiralty, which he retained till February, 1855.

Born in Cumberland, 1792; died 1861.

GRAHAM, JOHN. (See DUNDEE.)

GRAHAM, THOMAS, chemist, studied at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and in 1830 was appointed professor of chemistry at the Andersonian University, Glasgow, a position he retained until 1837, when he was appointed professor of chemistry in University College, London. He resigned the chair in 1855 on receiving the appointment of master of the mint. He was a constant contributor to the scientific literature of the day, and published a treatise on chemistry, which was very successful. He was a fellow and vice-president of the Royal Society, was a prominent member of other scientific bodies, and was frequently employed by government to make important investigations.

Born in Glasgow, 1815; died 1869.

GRAHAM'S LAND, a large extent of continuous uninhabited land in the Antarctic Ocean, discovered by Biscoe in 1832. Lat. 64° 45′ S. Lon. 63° 51′ W.

GRAHAM'S TOWN, the chief town in the east province of the Cape Colony, S. Africa, in the division of Albany, on an elevated valley, 1,728 feet above the sea level, 25 miles from the coast, and 90 miles N.E. of Port Elizabeth. There are a cathedral, several churches, barracks, and other good public buildings. A large trade is carried on with the interior. Pop. 8,000.—Lat. 33° 19′ S. Lon. 26° 30′ E.

GRAHAME, JAMES, Scottish poet, was educated at the university of Glasgow, and afterwards at Edinburgh, and studied for the law. He was appointed writer to the signet 1791, and four years afterwards became a member of the faculty of advocates. Not finding the legal profession agreeable to his tastes, he was ordained in the Church of England in 1809, and became curate of Shipton, in Gloucestershire, and afterwards of Sedgefield, in Durham. He wrote "The Sabbath," a poem variously criticised; but, however heavy it may be to some, none can dispute the excellent spirit in which it is composed. He also wrote "Mary, Queen of Scots," a dramatic poem; "Biblical Pictures," "British Georgics," and several other poems. Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review," treated his effusions with considerable severity, and Lord Byron calls him "sepulchral Grahame;" but equal judges of true poetry have pronounced different verdicts upon his muse.

Born in Glasgow, 1765; died 1811.

GRAIN COAST, a name given to part of the west coast of Africa, comprising the greater part of Liberia. Lat. between 4° and 7° N. Lon. between 7° and 11° E.

GRAINGER, JAMES, grain'-jer, a poet and physician, who served his apprenticeship to a surgeon at Edinburgh. He afterwards acted in that capacity in the army, and, in 1748, took his doctor's degree, and settled in London. His practice, however, was not considerable, and he engaged as tutor to a young gentleman, whom he accompanied to the island of St. Kitt's, in the West Indies, where he died. He published several poems and medical works.

Born at Dunse, Scotland; died at St. Kitt's, 1767.

GRAJEHU, gra'-he-hu, a river of Brazil, rising in the western part of the province of Maranham, receiving the Santa Anna, which doubles the volume of water, and after a course of 240 miles, joins the Mearim, on the left bank.

GRAMAT, gra-ma', a town of France, department Lot, on the Alzon, 27 miles N.E. of Cahors. A mineral spring is in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000.

GRAMMICHELE, or GRAN MICHELI, gram'-me-shé'-le, a town of Sicily, 31 miles S.W. of Catania. Pop. 11,762.

GRAMMONT, gram'-mont, a town of Belgium, in the province of East Flanders, on both banks of the Dender, 20 miles S.E. of Ghent. It is divided by the river into Upper and Lower. Manf. Linen, damask, woollens, lace, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 9,000.

GRAMMONT, ANTOINE, Duc de, marshal of France, and diplomatist. He served in Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands. His "Memoirs," which throw a great light upon the social condition of his age, were published 38 years after his death.

Born 1604; died 1678.

GRAMMONT, PHILLIBERT, Comte de, French courtier and wit. He was brother of the preceding; in his youth, served under Condé and Turenne, and afterwards was one of the gayest, wittiest, and most extravagant and licentious of all who attended the court of Louis XIV. He was banished the court because he presumed to make love to one of the favourites of the king, and came to England, where he made himself quite at home in the profligate court of Charles II. He married Lady Eliza Hamilton. His brother-in-law, Count Hamilton, wrote his memoirs, which were edited by Sir Walter Scott in 1811. They contain a great amount of amusing gossip and scandal.

Born 1621; died 1707.

GRAMPIANS, gram'-pe-ans, a chain of mountains in Scotland, which, stretching along the southern front of the Highlands, extends across the island, from the district of Cowal, in the shire of Argyle, on the Atlantic, to Aberdeenshire, on the German Ocean. It then forms another ridge in a north-westerly direction, extending to the county of Moray and the borders of Inverness. (See SCOTLAND.)

GRAMPIANS, a mountain-range running nearly north and south, in the colony of Victoria, Australia. The loftiest summit is Mount William, 5,600 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. of the range between 36° 52′ and 37° 38′ S. Lon. between 142° 25′ and 142° 47′ E.

GRAN, gran, a considerable river of Upper Hungary, rising in the Carpathians, 8 miles from Dobsma, and, after a course of 130 miles, falling into the Danube, opposite Gran.

GRAN, or ESZTERGAM, a free town of Hungary, on an elevated site, on the right bank of the Danube, near the confluence of that river with the Gran, and the capital of a county of the same name, 25 miles N.W. of Buda. It has a castle standing on the banks of the Danube, an archbishop's palace, a large cathedral, chapter-house, an hospital, and gymnasium. It is the see of the primate of Hungary, and one of the oldest towns in the country. It has been many times besieged. Pop. 9,000.

GRANADA, or GRENADA, gran'-a-da, an old maritime province in the south of Spain. It is now divided into the provinces of ALMERIA, GRANADA, and MALAGA. The Moorish kingdom of Granada was established in 1238. It was the last possession of the Moors in Spain, and was conquered by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492.

GRANADA, a modern province of Spain, bounded N. by Jaen and Albacete, E. by Almeria, S. by the Mediterranean, and W. and N.W. by Malaga and Cordova. The coast line extends for 66 miles, and is rocky and dangerous, but there are several small secure bays. The surface of the country is mountainous, being traversed by several ranges, chiefly running from east to west. The highest point, Mulhacen, 11,977 feet, is the loftiest summit in Spain. There are some beautiful and fertile valleys, and besides the ordinary grain crop, the olive, vine, fruit, and the sugar-cane are cultivated.

Rivers.—Jenil, Darro, and Guadalfeo.
Manf.—Silk and woollen goods, haircloth, and soap.
Area.—5,000 square miles.
Pop.—484,613.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—The province is divided into 15 administrative districts. GRANADA is the chief town.

GRANADA, a city in the south of Spain, and capital of the province of that name. It was the ancient metropolis of the Moors in Spain, and stands on the right bank of the Jenil, 140 miles S.E. of Seville. The town exhibits the form of a half-moon, its streets rising above each other, with a number of turrets and gilded cupolas, the whole crowned by the Alhambra, or palace of the ancient Moorish kings. (See ALHAMBRA.) In the background is the Sierra de Nevada, covered with snow. The town is built on two adjacent hills, and divided into four quarters. The river Darro runs between the two hills, and traverses the town, after which it falls into the largest stream of the Jenil, which flows outside the walls. The principal buildings are the cathedral, a splendid structure, highly decorated, with a noble high altar and the tombs of Ferdinand and Isabella and Philip I. and his queen Juana; the archbishop's palace, the mansion occupied by the captain-general of the province, the university, and several hospitals. The city, that part containing the Alhambra, is surrounded by old walls, with towers. The streets are generally narrow and dirty; the older houses are built in the eastern style, with flat roofs and projecting balconies; and there are several good open squares. On the hill opposite that on which the Alhambra stands is an old suburb, the Albayzin, the greater number of which are gipsies. Manf. Silk and woollen stuffs, gunpowder, saltpetre, paper hats; and there is an oil-trade carried on. Pop. 76,005.—The city was founded in the 8th century, and in the 13th century was selected as the capital of the kingdom of Granada. It became very large and wealthy, had at one time 400,000 inhabitants, and was defended by more than 1,000 towers. It figures conspicuously in the history of the long contest between the Christians and Moors.

GRANADA, or GRENADA, NEW. (See COLOMBIA.)

GRANADA, a city of Nicaragua, Central America, on the north-west shore of Lake Nicaragua. It was founded by Hernandez de Cordova in 1522. Previous to the outbreak of the civil war in 1854, it was a busy commercial town, but suffered greatly, and was almost destroyed in 1857. Pop., including suburban places, 15,000. Lat. 10° 12′ N. Lon. 87° 46′ W.

GRANADILLA, gran-a-dil'-la, a town of the island of Teneriffe, one of the Canary Islands, 30 miles S.W. of Orotava. Pop. 2,600.

GRANBY, JOHN MANNERS, Marquis of, gran'-be, eldest son of the third Duke of Rutland. He served with the Duke of Cumberland in suppressing the Scotch rebellion of 1745, and was commander of the British army in Germany during a portion of the Seven Years' War. In 1763 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance, and in 1766 commander-in-chief of the army. He was very popular, and an especial favourite of painters of sign-boards.
Born 1721; died 1770.

There are a very large depôt of the Detroit and Milwaukee railway (of which the town is the western terminus), a long pier, and a very good harbour. A large export trade is carried on in timber, fish, leather, gypsum, lime, and flour. Pop. 4,000.

GRAND ISLAND is 3 miles above the falls of Niagara, in the United States. Ext. 9 miles long, by 5 broad, mostly woodland.

GRAND RAPIDS, a manufacturing city of Michigan, United States, pleasantly situated on both banks of Grand River, 33 miles E. of Lake Michigan. The town is well-built, and busy. There is abundant water power, and an active trade is carried on in pine-timber, limestone, salt, and gypsum. The city was settled in 1833, and incorporated in 1850. Pop. 32,016.

GRAND RIVER, a river of the United States, in Michigan, which, after a course of 270 miles, falls into Lake Michigan.

GRAND RIVER, or OUSE, a river of Canada, province of Ontario, which, after a winding course, falls into the north-east end of Lake Erie. It is navigable for large vessels 12 miles from its mouth.

GRANDE, or ILHA GRANDE, grand, an island off the coast of Brazil, 70 miles S.W. of Rio-de-Janeiro. Coffee and the sugar-cane are extensively cultivated. Pop 2,000.

GRANDVILLE, JEAN IGNACE, ISIDORE GÉRARD, gran(g)'-veel, French artist and caricaturist, well known for his illustrations to La Fontaine's Fables, Life of Napoleon, Gil Blas, Robinson Crusoe, Gulliver's Travels, and other standard works, and for a vast number of humorous sketches and caricatures.
Born at Nancy, 1803; died at Paris, 1847.

GRANE, or QUADE, gran, a seaport of Arabia, near the northern extremity of the Persian Gulf, 85 miles S. of Bassora. Many rich merchants reside there, and a considerable export trade is carried on. Pop. 8,000.

GRANGEMOUTH, grainj'-mouth, a seaport-town of Scotland, in Stirlingshire, situate on the angle which is formed by the river Carron and the great canal which joins the friths of Forth and Clyde, 20 miles N.W. of Edinburgh. It has a harbour and docks, and carries on a considerable trade in corn, wool, iron goods, hemp, timber, flax, and tallow. There are ship-building works. Pop. 2,570.

GRANICUS, gra-ni'-kus, a river of Asia Minor, now known as the Khodja-tchai, or Kodsha-su, rising on the northern side of Mount Ida, and falling into the Sea of Marmora. It is famous for a battle fought there between the armies of Alexander and Darius, 334 B.C. (See ALEXANDER and ASIA MINOR.)

GRANIER DE CASSAGNAC, BERNARD ADOLPHE, grai'-ne-ai-de-kas-sain'-yak, after receiving his education at the Lycée of Toulouse, went to Paris in 1832, and wrote for the Journal des Débats and the Revue de Paris, under the auspices of M. Victor Hugo. Having thus entered upon a literary career, he continued to write for or to edit various journals, distinguishing himself in his political creed by his ultra-imperialism, and by the violence with which he attacked his opponents. Devoted to the government inaugurated by the coup d'état, he was returned in 1852 deputy from Gers to the Corps Législatif. He was returned again in 1857 and in 1863, and although his re-election in 1869 was warmly contested, he was again returned by an overwhelming majority. M. de Cassagnac has been an industrious writer, and besides his many contributions to the journals of the day, he is the author of "Histoire des Classes Ouvrières et des Classes Bourgeoises," "Histoire des Classes Nobles et des Classes Anobiles," "Histoire de la Chute de Louis Philippe, de la Revolution de Février, et du Rétablissement de l'Empire," "Les Girondins et les Massacres de Septembre," &c. Grand officer of the Legion of Honour in 1857, he was promoted commander August 30, 1865.

Born at Cassagnac, Gers, in 1808.

GRANSEE, gran'-se, a walled town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, 42 miles N. of Potsdam. There are two churches, a Gothic chapel, and a bronze statue of Queen Louisa of Prussia. Manf. Linen and woollen cloth. Four annual fairs are held, and there is a trade in cattle. Pop. 3,100.

GRANT, FRANCIS, Sir, grant, president of the Royal Academy, an artist, son of the laird of Kilgraston, Perthshire. He spent his fortune, and then devoted himself to his art. He became one of the best portrait-painters of fashionable life, and was warmly patronised by Sir Walter Scott. At the commencement of his career he applied himself to the painting of sporting pieces, some of which were engraved; but he subsequently abandoned this branch of art, and applied himself to portrait-painting. In 1842 he was chosen an A.R.A., in 1851 an R.A., and, after the death of Sir Charles Eastlake, elected President in 1866, and shortly afterwards received the honour of knighthood.

Born at Kilgraston, Scotland, 1804; died 1878.

GRANT, JAMES HOPE, Sir, British general, younger brother of the above. He joined the lancers at the age of 18, and served with distinction in China under Sir Hugh Gough, in the campaign of the Sutlej, and during the Indian mutiny. He received the distinction of K.C.B. in 1858, and for his services as commander of the British forces in China in 1860, was raised to the rank of G.C.B., received the thanks of both houses of parliament, and the Emperor Napoleon conferred on him the dignity of grand officer of the Legion of Honour. He received the command of the Madras army in 1860, was appointed quartermaster-general in 1865, and commander of the camp at Aldershott in 1870.

Born at Kilgraston, 1808; died in London, 1875.

GRANT, ANNE, Mrs., of Laggan, was the daughter of Duncan Macvicar, an officer in the British army. She married the reverend James Grant, minister of Laggan, who left her a widow with eight children in 1801. She, after this, resided on a small farm near Laggan, but subsequently removed to Edinburgh, where sir Walter Scott drew up a memorial which procured her an annual pension of 100*l.* from 1826 till the time of her death. She wrote the "Highlanders, and other Poems," which appeared in 1803, by which she respectably assisted in sustaining the honours of the Scottish muse. In 1773 her celebrated "Letters from the Mountains" appeared, and were well received, notwithstanding the "affectation of the title," of which Lord Jeffrey speaks, and her "gross inaccuracy," according to Macaulay, in her account of the massacre of Glencoe. Besides these works, she produced "Memoirs of an American Lady," "Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland," "Eighteen Hundred and Thirteen," a poem, and several other works.

Born in Glasgow, 1755; died in Edinburgh, 1838.

GRANT, ROBERT EDMUND, M.D., a celebrated zoologist and comparative anatomist, who was educated at the High School, Edinburgh, where he distinguished himself in Greek and geometry. In 1808 he entered the literary classes of the university, and, in 1812, was elected president of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of Edinburgh. In 1814 he became president of the Royal Medical Society, and, in the same year, graduated as M.D. In 1824, in conjunction with Dr. Barclay, he delivered lectures on comparative anatomy at Edinburgh, and, during his vacations, devoted himself to original researches upon the animals of the coasts of Scotland. The result of these appeared in the "Transactions of the Wernerian Society." In 1828 he was called upon to fill the post of lecturer on comparative anatomy and zoology at University College, London. From that time he continued to lecture at that institution, and has been a large contributor to zoological literature.

Born at Edinburgh, 1793.

GRANT, ULYSSES SIMPSON, president of the United States of America. He graduated at the Military academy at West Point in 1843, and served in the Mexican war. In 1854 he resigned his commission and engaged in commercial pursuits in Missouri and Illinois. At the outbreak of the War of Secession, in 1861, he offered his services to the Federals, and greatly distinguished himself. In 1864 he was appointed lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief, and carried the long war to a successful issue, compelling the evacuation of Richmond and the surrender of general Lee and the entire Confederate forces. In 1868 he was elected president, and re-elected in 1872.

Born in Ohio, 1822. Died, July 24, 1885.

GRANT, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 426 square miles. Pop. 20,000. Marion is the capital.

GRANT, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 211 square miles. Pop. 13,083. The capital is Williamstown.

GRANT, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 1,122 square miles. Pop. 37,852. Lancaster is the capital.

GRANTA, grant'-ta, a river of England. (See CAM.)

GRANTHAM, grant'-ham, a municipal and parliamentary borough and market-town of Lincolnshire, on the left bank of the Witham, 24 miles S.W. of Lincoln. The town is neat and clean, and consists of four principal streets. The chief buildings are the church, built in the 13th century, lighted with pointed windows, and celebrated for its spire, 273 feet high; dissenting chapels, the guildhall, rebuilt in 1787, with the addition of a large assembly-room, and a monument to Newton, inaugurated by lord Brougham in 1858. The town has derived much benefit from a canal, begun in 1794, and extending for 30 miles, from Grantham to the Trent. The chief trade consists of malting, importing coal, and exporting corn. At the free grammar-school of this town, sir Isaac Newton received his education, previous to his being sent to Trinity College, Cambridge. Pop. 16,886.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

GRANTON, grant'-on, a village of Scotland, on the Frith of Forth, 3 miles N.W. of Edinburgh. Here is a pier 1,700 feet long, and a breakwater, with a ship-building dock, and a patent slip. Pop. 1,100.—A station on the North British railway.

GRANVILLE, gran'-veel, a fortified seaport of France, department of La Manche, on a rocky peninsula, 12 miles N.W. of Avranches. Its principal buildings are a citadel, an old church, hospital, and public baths. There is a large new pier, mounted with cannon. The harbour is well sheltered, but dry at low water. Pop. 14,700, mostly engaged in the oyster, cod, and whale fisheries. In 1695 this place was burned by the English, and, in 1793, besieged by the Vendeans.

GRANVILLE, gran'-vil, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 31,286. The capital is Oxford.

GRANVILLE, GEORGE, Baron Lansdowne, a nobleman of considerable talents. In 1685 he wrote some poetical pieces on the accession of James II. After the Revolution, he lived retired for a considerable time, amusing himself with literary composition. In 1686 was acted, with great applause, his tragedy of "Heroic Love," which was followed by the dramatic poem of "The British Enchanters." On the accession of queen Anne, he obtained a seat in parliament, and, in 1710, was made secretary-at-war. The same year he married a daughter of the earl of Jersey, and was soon after created a peer, by the title of lord Lansdowne, baron of Bideford. The accession of George II. deprived him of his place, and in 1715 he was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in a plot against the government. He obtained his release in 1717, and afterwards went to France, where he resided some years. His works included, besides those mentioned above, several other plays and poems.

Born in Cornwall, 1667; died 1735.

GRANVILLE, JOHN CARTERET, Earl of, was the eldest son of George, lord Carteret, and succeeded to this title at the age of 5 years. He received his education at Westminster School and Christchurch College, Oxford, and, in 1711, took his seat in the house of lords. Here he distinguished himself by his earnestness for the succession of the Hanover family, which recommended him to George I., who gave him several important places. In 1719 he was sent ambassador to Sweden, and mediated the treaty between that power and Denmark. In 1721 he became secretary of state, and, in 1724, was appointed viceroy of Ireland, where his administration, in a trying season, was generally applauded. He was again nominated to that office after the accession of George II., and governed that kingdom with great wisdom till 1730. He was the enemy of Walpole's administration, and moved, in 1741, for the removal of that minister. When this was effected, lord Carteret became secretary of state, and in 1744, on the death of his mother, succeeded to the titles of Viscount Cartaret and earl Granville.

Born 1690; died 1763.

GRANVILLE, GRANVILLE GEORGE LEVESON GOWER, Earl of, educated at Eton and Christchurch, Oxford, took his degree in 1834. In the following year he was attached to his father's embassy in Paris, and in 1836, and also in 1837, on a new election, was returned member of parliament for Morpeth. He was now on the high road to power, and, in a short time, was appointed under-secretary for foreign affairs. In 1840 he was attached to the Russian embassy, and at the subsequent general election, was, in 1841, returned member for Lichfield. In 1846 he was summoned, by the death of his father, to the house of peers, and, in the administration of lord John Russell, became master of her majesty's buckhounds. He subsequently became vice-president and president of the Board of Trade. In 1856 he represented her majesty at the coronation of the emperor of Russia, and, under the Palmerston administration of 1859, held the office of president of the council. In 1868 he was secretary of state for the colonies, and, in 1870, for foreign affairs, in the Gladstone administration. In politics he is both a liberal and a free-trader.

Born 1815.

GRASLITZ, gras'-litz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the border of Saxony. Manf. Cotton goods, looking-glasses, musical and mathematical instruments, machinery, and paper. Pop. 6,700.

GRASLITZ, or GRADLICZE, gras'-litz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, at the confluence of the Silberbach with the Zwoda, 89 miles N.W. of Prague. Manf. Woollen and cotton cloth, lace, musical instruments, and articles in wire and brass. Pop. 6,000.

GRASMERE. (See WESTMORELAND.)

GRASSANO, gras-sa'-no, a town of Italy, on the right bank of the Carmine, 25 miles S.E. of Potenza. Pop. 3,400.

GRASSE, grass, a town of France, department of Alpes-Maritimes, beautifully situated in the midst of flower gardens, on the slope of a hill, 23 miles N.E. of Draguignan. Manf. Perfumery and essences made from the flowers and herbs so abundant in the vicinity; woollens, soap, leather, and silk. There is a large trade in fruit, honey, and wax. Pop. 12,500.

GRATIAN, grai'-she-an, collector of the body of canon law known as the "Decrees of Gratian." Very little is known of his life more than that he was a Benedictine monk of Bologna.

Lived in the 12th century.

GRATIANUS, grat'-she-anus, a Roman emperor, whose father took him as his associate in the empire, when he was only 8 years old. In his 17th year, on the death of his father, he succeeded to the throne, and the army elected as his partner Valentinian II., his half-brother. At this time Valens was still ruling over the eastern part of the empire, having succeeded to the government conjointly with his brother, Valentinian I., who took the western portion on the death of Jovian. The beginning of Gratian's reign is said to have been distinguished by several cruelties; but from the general character of this prince and his tender age when he assumed the government, they must be attributed to his advisers. After the death of their uncle, in 379, the young princes associated with themselves as their colleague Theodosius, afterwards known as Theodosius the Great, whom they set over the eastern part of the empire. Gratian's courage in the field was as remarkable as his love of learning and philosophy. He supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the pagan superstition of his subjects ultimately proved his ruin. He was forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, fighting against Maximinus in Gaul, and murdered by the rebels.

Born 359; died 383.

GRATIANUS, a Roman soldier invested with the purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in opposition to Honorius. He was assassinated four months after, by those very troops to whom he owed his elevation, 407 A.D.

GRATIUS FALISCUS, grat'-she-us fa-lis'-kus, a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem on coursing, called "Cynegeticon," much commended for its elegance and perspicuity.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

GRATTAN, RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY, grat'-tan, Irish politician, was the son of the recorder and member for Dublin in the Irish parliament, and was educated at Trinity College, where he distinguished himself by his ability. After taking his degree, he went to London, for the purpose of following the profession of the law. In 1772 he was called to the Irish bar, and, in 1775, was returned as member for Charlemont, to the Irish parliament, where his fervid eloquence not only procured him the admiration but the love and veneration of his countrymen, whose enthusiasm he raised to the highest pitch. The first public benefit which he was instrumental in conferring on his countrymen, was the partial opening of the Irish commerce, which had hitherto been greatly trammelled by vexatious restrictions. In 1780 he obtained from the Irish parliament the resolution "that the king's most excellent majesty, and the lords and commons of Ireland, are the only power competent to make laws to bind Ireland." His speech on that occasion, especially its closing passages, is a fine specimen of eloquence. In 1790 he was returned for Dublin, and in 1800 for the borough of Wicklow. The Irish nation now voted him £100,000, "as a testimony of its gratitude" for national services; but, at Grattan's own request, it was made £50,000, which he received. After the union of Ireland with Great Britain, in 1800, he was chosen member for Malton, and subsequently sat in the imperial parliament as the representative for Dublin. He is only now remembered for his eloquence; but Lord Brougham, in a speech delivered in the House of Commons in 1823, says:—"He was a man of singular candour, and great moderation; and from his entrance into public life to the close of his illustrious career, gave signal proofs of his moderation, of his extreme forbearance, nay, of his gentleness." "The purity of his life was the brightness of his glory," says Sir James Mackintosh. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Dublin, 1750; died in London, 1820.

GRATZ, or GRAZ, gratz, a town of the Austrian empire, capital of the province of Styria, beautifully situated on both sides of the river Mur, 140 miles S.W. of Vienna. This town owes its origin to the strength of its citadel, which is built on a very steep hill on the banks of the river, which is crossed by two chain and two wooden bridges. The "inner town," as it is called, on the eastern side is surrounded by walls; the old glacis is now a public promenade. The houses are of stone, and the town is generally well built. It has 22 churches and chapels, great and small. The cathedral of St. Agidi was built in the 14th century. There are the castle of the old dukes of Styria, the landhaus, or place of meeting of the nobility, a university, museum, several palaces, and an arsenal. One of the most striking edifices in the place is a mausoleum erected to the emperor Ferdinand II., and the Johanneum, which was founded by the Archduke John, in 1812, for the encouragement of the arts and manufactures in Styria. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and silk fabrics, leather, iron, steel wares, and paper. Pop. 97,791. —It has railway communication with Vienna and Trieste.

GRATZ, or GRODZISKO, a town of Prussia, province of Posen, 22 miles S.W. of the town of Posen. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, and a Bernardine monastery. Manf. Leather, woollens, and linen. Four annual fairs are held, and there is a trade in cattle. Pop. 3,400.

GRAUDENZ, grou-dentz', an old fortified town of Prussia, in the province of West Prussia, on the right bank of the Vistula, here crossed by a bridge of boats, 60 miles S. of Dantzic. It has both Lutheran and Roman Catholic churches, a gymnasium, and a strong fortress. Manf. Woollen goods and tobacco. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. military inclusive, 16,000.

GRAULHET, gro'-lai, a town of France, in the department Tarn, on the left bank of the Adon. Manf. Linen goods, hemp, and leather. Pop. 6,000.

GRAVE, or GRAAF, grafe, a town of Holland, province of North Brabant, on the Maas, 7 miles S.W. of Nijmegan. It is strongly fortified, surrounded by a deep ditch, and has bomb-proof gates. The Roman Catholic church, founded in 1290, and the town-house, are the chief public buildings. Pop. 2,500.

GRAVELINES, grav'-leen, a fortified sea-port-town of France, department Nord, 12 miles E. of Calais. It stands in a marshy plain protected from the sea by sand-hills or dunes, but which can easily be laid under water. The harbour has become useless from neglect. Pop. 6,000, mostly employed in the cod, herring, and mackerel fisheries.—In 1558 a battle took place between the French and Flemish, when the latter, under Count Egmont, obtained a decisive victory.

GRAVES, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 24,138. The capital is Mayfield.

GRAVESEND, graivs'-end, a municipal and parliamentary borough, river-port, market-town, and watering-place, of Kent, on the south side of the river Thames, 24 miles E. of London. The numbers of vessels which usually lie at anchor in the channel, keep up a constant influx of seamen and strangers. The invigorating air and pleasant scenery draw additional visitors in the summer season; and, from these circumstances, this town presents a continued scene of bustle and activity. The inhabitants are much engaged in seafaring employments. The principal buildings are a custom-house, town-hall, union-workhouse, bazaars, theatre, and concert-room. The newer part of the town, on the eastern side, is laid out with wide streets. The older part is closely built. There are two piers, the Town and Terrace piers. A large cemetery has been laid out on the south side of the town. The suburb Milton is on the eastern side, and at a short distance from the town, on the western side, is the well-known pleasure resort, Rosherville Gardens. Manf. Rope-making, and a little shipbuilding are carried on; and there is a large trade in supplying ship's stores. In old times foreign visitors of distinction were met at Gravesend by the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and escorted up the river; and now Gravesend is frequently the place of embarkation or reception of royal and distinguished persons. It was made a parliamentary borough, to return one member, by the Reform Act of 1867. Pop. 23,375.—A station on the North Kent Railway.

GRAVESEND, a township of the United States, in King's county, Long Island, New York, 9½ miles from New York. Pop. 1,000.

GRAVINA, gra-vé-na, an episcopal city of Italy, province of Bari, on the left bank of the river of the same name, 35 miles from Bari. It has a cathedral, several more churches, a college, and some convents. A large and well-attended horse and cattle fair is held annually, and the place is famous for a breed of horses. Pop. 16,663.

GRAY, grai, a town of France, department of Haute-Saone, 27 miles from Dijon. It has a college, public library, and several public fountains. Its trade is active with Lyons in corn, wood, and iron. There are the remains of an ancient castle, formerly the residence of the duke of Burgundy. Pop. 6,300.

GRAY, ASA, American botanist. He practised for a short time as a physician, but relinquished the profession and devoted himself to botanical studies, and became professor of botany in the university of Michigan, and in 1842 Fisher professor of natural history at Harvard university. He twice visited Europe. His "Botanical Text-book," and works on the flora of the United States, and other books, are of great value.

Born at Paris, in the State of New York, 1810.

GRAY, THOMAS, an English poet, was the son of a money-scrivener in London, and was educated at Eton, whence he removed to Peter-house, Cambridge. In 1738, he entered of the Inner Temple, but never engaged much in the study of the law. The year following he accompanied Mr. Horace Walpole in the tour of Europe; but a difference arising between them, they parted in Italy, in 1741, and Mr. Gray returned to England, where his father died soon after. He now took up his residence chiefly at Cambridge, where, in 1768, he became professor of modern history. He had previously declined the office of poet-laureate. The odes of Gray possess uncommon merit, and his "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" has long been considered one of the finest poems in the language. Perhaps no poem of equal length contains so many lines familiarly known. The scene of the elegy was no doubt the churchyard of Stoke Pogis, in Buckinghamshire, where he lies buried by the side of his mother, although the honour has been claimed for other localities.

Born in London, 1716; died at Cambridge, 1771.

GRAYSON, grai'-son, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 15,784. The capital is Litchfield.

GRAYSON, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 910 square miles. Pop. 38,108. Sherman is the capital.

GRAYSON, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 495 square miles. Pop. 13,068. The capital is Independence.

GRAZALEMA, gra-tha-laï'-ma, a town of Spain, province of Cadiz, on a rocky hill, 60 miles N.E. of Cadiz. The French found it so inaccessible that they named it a "Land Gibraltar." The parish church is a large and handsome Gothic building. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, flannel, soap, and leather. There is a considerable export trade. Pop. 8,000.

GREAT BRITAIN. (See BRITAIN, GREAT; BRITISH EMPIRE, ENGLAND, WALES, SCOTLAND, IRELAND, &c.)

GREAT ISLAND, an island on the coast of Ireland, county of Cork. Ext. 5 miles long, by 3 broad.

GREAT ISLAND, in Bass's Straits, between Australia and Tasmania. Ext. 40 miles long, with a breadth of 12.

GREAT KANAWHA. (See KANAWHA, GREAT.)

GREAT MARLOW. (See MARLOW, GREAT.)

GREAT SLAVE LAKE, in British North America, connected by the Great Slave River with Lake Athabaska. It is about 300 miles long, and 50 miles wide. There are many islands. The outlet is by Mackenzie River into the Arctic Ocean. Lat. between 60° 40′ and 63° N. Lon. between 109° 30′ and 117° 30′ W.

GREAT SALT LAKE, North America. (See UTAH.)

GREAVES, JOHN, greeves, mathematician and antiquary, who studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and, in 1621, was chosen fellow of Merton College, and, in 1628, took the degree of M.A. In 1630 he became professor of geometry in Gresham College, and was, soon afterwards, sent by Archbishop Laud to the East, where he made a large collection of oriental MSS., coins, and medals. He also took a careful survey and measurement of the Egyptian pyramids, and made many astronomical observations. After his return, in 1640, he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, but was obliged to resign his situation, from the persecution of the parliamentary visitors. He wrote "Pyramidographia; or, a Description of the Pyramids in Egypt;" "A Discourse on the Roman Foot and Denarius;" and other valuable works.

Born in Hampshire, 1602; died 1652.

GREECE, ANCIENT, GRÆCIA, or HELLAS, greese, a famous country of Europe, comprising within its limits, at the period of its greatest prosperity, the territory of the modern kingdom of Greece, and some portions of the Turkish empire. The physical geography of the various districts is described under the appropriate headings. (See GREECE, KINGDOM OF, TURKEY, &c.)

The northern limit nearly followed the parallel of lat. 40° N., a chain of mountains stretching from the Adriatic eastward to the Ægean Sea, separating Greece from Illyria and Macedonia on the north. The extreme eastern part of this range is the famous Olympus. In later times Macedonia was considered a part of Greece. Ancient Greece is generally described as consisting of two parts—Græcia, or the northern portion, and Peloponnesus (now known as the Morea) a peninsula of irregular shape united to the mainland by the Corinthian isthmus. There are several islands, which belonged to Greece.

Area.—Including Macedonia, 58,000 square miles, about equal to that of England and Wales.

Divisions.—Ancient Greece was divided into numerous states, each managing its own affairs, frequently at war with each other, and occasionally combining for the common protection. Separate leagues were formed at various times, but were not of long duration. Historians generally divide the country geographically as follows:—GRÆCIA—Thessalia, Acarnania, Epirus, Etolia, Eubœa (now Egripo, or Negropont), Phocis, Bœtia, Attica, Doris, Locri, Megaris, and the islands of Leucadia, Ithaca, and Cephalonia. PELOPONNESUS—Achaia, Elis, Arcadia, Argolis, Messenia, Laconia, and the islands of Cythera (CERIGO), and Zacynthus (ZANTE). The most important political states were Athens, Sparta, Corinth, Thebes, Arcadia, and Macedonia.

Pop.—1,800,000.

Chief Cities.—Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, and Delphi.

History.—The name Hellas was originally limited to a portion of Thessaly, but in course of time was given to the whole country. The name Græcia was first used by Aristotle. The aborigines, known as Pelasgians, appear to have been expelled by a people from the East, known as the Hellenes, who made their appearance about 1,400 years before the Christian era. The Heroic age, as it is frequently termed, lasted several centuries, and no history more authentic than that of Homeric and other poetic legends exists. The earliest records on which any reliance can be placed begin at the first Olympiad, 776 B.C. In the first ages, the Greeks were governed by monarchs; but the monarchical power gradually decreased, and the love of liberty established the republican government. No part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an absolute sovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts first, and, in the succeeding age, the wars of Thebes and Troy, gave opportunity to their heroes and demigods to display their valour in the field of battle. The establishment of the Olympic games, and the reward of the conqueror, which was a laurel crown, contributed not a little to their aggrandisement. The austerity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, insensible to bodily pain, fearless and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, sufficiently show what superiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undisciplined barbarians. After many signal victories over the Persians, they became elated with their success, and then began to turn their arms one against the other. In the 5th century B.C. Athens was the predominant state, succeeded, after the Peloponnesian war (431—404 B.C.), by Sparta. In the 4th century, Philip of Macedonia defeated the Athenians and Thebans, and his son, Alexander the Great, completed the subjugation of the Athenian state and added Greece to his dominions. While the Greeks rendered themselves so illustrious by their military exploits, the arts and sciences were highly cultivated. The labours of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a composition was determined by the applause or disapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators, and eloquence seemed to be connected with the military profession; their language became almost universal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring states, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. They planted many colonies, and entirely peopled the western coasts of Asia Minor. In the eastern parts of Italy, there were also many settlements made. The conquest of Corinth, by the Roman consul Mummius, destroyed the Achæan League, or union of the states of Peloponnesus, and Greece became a province of the Roman empire.

GREECE, MODERN, (or KINGDOM OF THE HELLENES), a maritime country in the south-east of Europe. It is bounded on the N. by European Turkey, W. by the Ionian Sea and Islands, S. by the Mediterranean, and E. by the Ægean Sea. The coast line is extensive. Consisting as Greece does of the Morea, the country called Hellas, N. of the gulfs of Lepanto and Ægina, all the islands known as the Cyclades, and some of the Sporades, it necessarily must have not only a great extent, but an irregular line of coast; for it may be regarded as little more than a series of islands and peninsulas. The chief are Marathon and Colonna, or Sunium, in Attica; Malea, Matapan, Gallo, and Klarenza, in the Morea. The Archipelago on the E., includes the channels of Talanti, Negropont, and the gulfs of Nauplia and Ægina; the Ionian Sea on the W., includes the gulfs Arta, Arcadia, Lepanto, Argolis, Patras, Koroni, and Kolokythia. The surface of the country is mountainous, being intersected, particularly in the north, by continued ranges, several of which are interesting from their scenery, but more from their classical recollections. These ranges are connected with those of Turkey, Mount Pindus traversing both countries. From the ridge which forms the northern frontier, the Pindus chain takes a southerly direction between Thessaly and Epirus; and throws off two branches in an eastern direction; Phyrus, or Gura, terminating in the Gulf of Volo; and the Ceta, or Katavothra, about 20 miles farther south, at the eastern extremity of which is the renowned pass of Thermopylæ. The main chain extends in a south-eastern direction through Attica, including the renowned Parnassus, Helicon, and Hymettus, and there are several less important lateral ranges traversing the country in a westerly direction. A range stretches across the isthmus of Corinth into the Morea, and dividing into two main branches, encloses the hilly district of Arcadia. The loftiest mountains are: Olympus in the great northern range, 9,700 feet, and covered with snow; Guiona, on the Turkish frontier, 8,240 feet, Parnassus, 8,000, and there are several other peaks of scarcely inferior altitude. There are extensive fertile plains, the largest being those of Thessaly and Bœotia, and numerous, but small valleys.

Rivers.—The principal are the Achelous, now called the Aspropotamo (discharging into the Gulf of Corinth), the Peneus, the Alpheus, the Eurotas, the Iris, and the Pamisus. All the rest are insignificant streams. There are numerous small lakes.

Islands.—The CYCLADES and IONIAN ISLANDS.

Climate.—Temperate, and, on the whole, healthy, excepting in the neighbourhood of marshes, which, from the neglected state of cultivation, have become numerous.

Zoology.—The bear, wolf, jackal, wild boar, and deer. The domestic animals are neither numerous nor of good breeds. Asses are almost the only beasts of burden employed; and the only animals from which dairy produce is made are the sheep and goat.

Forests.—Considerable. They consist mostly of pine, with a mixture of hardwood, including the oak, in the upper regions; and in the lower, the chestnut and wal nut are frequently met with.

Pro.—Corn, cotton, silk, wool, rice, and tobacco. Bees are still kept, and their honey is the finest in the world. Agriculture is generally in a very backward state, and it is only in Thessaly and the south of Macedon that the vestiges of ancient industry are to be discovered. The Morea, though susceptible of the highest degree of cultivation, is almost entirely neglected. Of fruits, it abounds with figs, almonds, dates, oranges, citrons, and currants, the latter of which are an important article of export, extensive districts, especially along the shores of the Gulf of Corinth and in the islands of Zante and Cephalonia, being appropriated to the cultivation. The vine grows vigorously, and melons are largely cultivated; but the olive takes precedence of every other article in Greece, and is much attended to, olive oil being the chief export.

Minerals.—Rich and varied, but little worked, including lead, copper, iron, some gold and silver, coal, salt, sulphur, alum, and saltpetre; and marble of the purest and most beautiful kind. There are many hot and cold mineral springs.

Manf.—Unimportant, the inhabitants being almost entirely a commercial maritime people.

Area.—19,941 square miles, only about one-seventh of which is under cultivation.

Pop.—1,700,000, of a mixed race. The descendants of the old Hellenic race predominate in Ætolia, Acarnania, Thessaly, the Morea, and most of the islands. Albanians (250,000), Wallachs (a pastoral race), and an influx from the neighbouring countries, make up the population, about one-half of which is agricultural.

Language.—The language generally spoken is the Romaic, or modern Greek, which is derived from, and has a great affinity with, the purer form of the classic tongue. The Albanian (an unwritten language), Turkish, Bulgarian, and Wallachian languages, are also used in some districts.

Religion and Education.—The greater number of the people belong to the Greek Church, which is the state religion, and has four archbishops and six bishops, on the continent of Greece; six archbishops and six bishops in the Peloponnesus; and five archbishops, and as many bishops, besides the metropolitan of Corfu, in the Ionian Islands. All other religions are tolerated. There are about 24,000 Roman Catholics. Education is by law compulsory, but is actually very defective, only about one-third of the grown up men being able to read and write; women of the lower classes are almost entirely illiterate.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—The kingdom is divided into 13 nomos, or nomarchies, and subdivided into 59 eparchies. The following are the nomarchies with the chief towns:—

Nomarchies.	Chief Towns.
Northern Greece:—
Attica and Bœotia	Athens.
Phocis and Phthiotis	Lamia (Zeitoun).
Acarnia and Ætolia	Missolonghi.
The Morea:—
Argolis and Corinth	Nauplia.
Achaia and Elis	Patras.
Arcadia	Tripolitza.
Messenia	Calamata.
Laconia	Sparta.
Islands:—
Eubœa and Sporades	Chalcis.
Cyclades	Hermonpolis (Syra).
Corfu	Corfu.
Zante	Zante.
Cephalonia	Argostoli.

Athens the (capital), Syra (the principal port), and Patras, are the most important towns.

Constitution and Government.—The kingdom of the Hellenes is a limited monarchy. The present constitution was adopted October 29, 1861. There is a chamber of representatives named the Boulé, elected for the term of four years, by the ballot and manhood suffrage. The executive is vested in the king and his responsible ministers, the heads of seven departments. At the side of the executive council of ministers stands, by the terms of the constitution, a deliberative council of state, consisting of not less than 15 nor more than 25 members. They are named by the crown at the recommendation of the ministers, and hold office for ten years. The army is formed by conscription, but there is a general privilege to procure substitutes, which is made use of to a large extent.

Railways and Telegraphs.—At present, a short line from Athens to the Piræus, seven miles in length, is the only railway in Greece. About 1,600 miles of telegraphic wires are in operation.

History.—When the Roman empire was divided, Greece was attached to the Eastern portion. In the early part of the 12th century it was taken possession of by the Venetians; in the 15th century it was subdued by the Turks, and made a part of the Ottoman empire. Two unsuccessful attempts at rebellion were made in 1770 and 1790; and in 1820 a vigorous effort was commenced, which resulted in 1829 in the establishment of Greece as an independent kingdom, under the protection of Great Britain, France, and Russia. Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg (afterwards king of the Belgians) having declined the crown of Greece, it was offered to, and accepted by, prince Otto of Bavaria, who ascended the throne Jan. 25, 1833. He was expelled the kingdom after a reign of 29 years, in October 1862, and the second son of prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein (now king of Denmark) elected king of the Hellenes, with the title of Georgios I. At the liberation of the country, there were only nine towns which had partly escaped the total devastation of the rest; the principal of them being Lamia, Vonitza, Nauplia, and Chalcis. All the other towns and villages were in ruins, so that the first necessity of the inhabitants of the new state was to get housed. Since that time ten new cities have been founded, and twenty-three old towns, including Athens, Thebes, and Argos, have been rebuilt, besides many villages.

GREELEY, Horace, gree'-le, a distinguished American journalist, was the son of a farmer in Amherst, New Hampshire. He served an apprenticeship in a printing office, and afterwards worked for some time as a journeyman printer. He then turned his attention to journalism with varying success, until, in 1841, he started the New York Tribune, which became, under his management, the recognised organ of the radical republican party, and the advocate of "woman's rights," temperance, the abolition of slavery and capital punishment, &c., &c. In 1848 he represented for a short time one of the districts of New York in Congress; he visited Europe in 1851, and was chairman of a committee of the Great Exhibition of that year. Was an unsuccessful candidate for the American presidency in 1872, and died a few weeks after the termination of the contest. Mr. Greeley was a man of great energy and natural ability, eccentric in his habits, and Socialistic in his tendencies. At the commencement of the Civil War, in 1861, he recommended that the seceding states should be allowed to "go in peace," but subsequently became a zealous advocate of the opposite policy.

Born 1811, died 1872.

GREEN, Matthew, an English poet, who was bred a dissenter, but changed his views, and ridiculed his former associates, in his poem of "The Spleen." He obtained a place in the Custom-house. His poems, which possess great merit, were published in Dodsley's collection.

Born in London, 1696; died 1737.

GREEN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 316 square miles. Pop. 11,871. Greensburg is the capital.

GREEN, a county of Nebraska, United States. Almost uninhabited.

GREEN, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area. 592 square miles. Pop. 21,729. The capital is Monroe.

GREEN BAY, a town of Wisconsin, United States, on a bay of the same name, in the north-western part of Lake Michigan. The town is at the mouth of Fox River, which is connected by canal with the Wisconsin, and so with the Mississippi. There is a considerable trade in fish and timber. Pop. 7,464. The bay is 100 miles long, and from 15 to 30 broad, and has numerous islands.

GREEN ISLAND, one of the Philippines, surrounded by a coral reef. Lat. 12° 3′ N. Lon. 119° 49′ E.

GREEN MOUNTAINS. (See America.)

GREENE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 911 square miles. Pop. 21,931. The capital is Eutaw.

GREENE, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 8,000. Gainesville is the capital.

GREENE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 504 square miles. Pop. 17,547. The capital is Greensborough.

GREENE, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 564 square miles. Pop. 23,000. Carrollton is the capital.

GREENE, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 534 square miles. Pop. 22,996.

GREENE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 12,727.

GREENE, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 2,500. Leakesville is the capital.

GREENE, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 1,157 square miles. Pop. 28,801. Springfield is the capital.

GREENE, a county of New York, United States. Area, 583 square miles. Pop. 32,000. The capital is Catskill.

GREENE, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 558 square miles. Pop. 28,273. Waynesburg is the capital.

GREENE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 515 square miles. Pop. 24,000. The capital is Greensville.

GREENE, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 118 square miles. Pop. 5,000. Stanardsville is the capital.

GREENE, MAURICE, Mus. Doc., a celebrated composer of English church music, who received his education in St. Paul's choir, under Brind, the organist. He first became organist of St. Dunstan's in the West, and subsequently succeeded his former master as organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. On the death of Dr. Croft, he became organist and composer to the Chapels Royal, and, in 1736, was appointed master of his majesty's band. Previous to this appointment, he had the degree of Doctor of Music conferred on him at Cambridge, for his exercise on Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day." The fame of Doctor Greene rests on his "Forty Anthems, for one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, and eight voices." These place him at the top of English ecclesiastical music composers.

Born in London at the end of the 17th century; died 1755.

GREENE, NATHANIEL, an American general in the war of independence, and an intimate friend of Washington, was of quaker descent, in which body his father was a leading preacher. Was chosen member of the Rhode Island Assembly in 1770. Abandoning the tenets of his sect he enlisted in the army in 1774, and received a command in the following year, and distinguished himself at Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown. In 1778 he became quartermaster-general, and two years afterwards succeeded Gates in the command of the army of the south. In 1781 he was compelled to retreat before Cornwallis, which he did skilfully, but subsequently defeated the English at Eutaw Springs. For this action, which terminated the war in South Carolina, he received a medal from Congress, and valuable grants of land from the states of Georgia and N. and S. Carolina.

Born 1742: died 1784, of sunstroke.

GREENE, ROBERT, green, English poet, educated at Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Oxford. He went to London, wrote plays and romances, but lived an irregular life, and died in consequence of a debauch. He left for publication a pamphlet, entitled, "The Repentance of Robert Greene, Master of Arts." He was a man of wit and talents, but noted alike for his good advice and bad example. He is said to have been the first Englishman who wrote for bread; but whether this be the case or not, he had great vivacity of mind, and a fertile imagination, which he had increased by extensive reading. His poems are his best productions. He crowded simile upon simile, and wrote after the Euphuistic style, which was fashionable in his time.

Born in Norwich, 1560; died in London, 1592.

GREENLAND, Green'-land, an extensive country to the north of Davis's Straits, belonging to Denmark. It is the most northern land of the western hemisphere. On the W. it is bounded by Davis's Straits and Baffin's Bay; on the N. by some unknown ocean; on the E. by the Arctic Ocean; and on the S.E. by the Atlantic Ocean. Very little is known of this country, which is high, rocky, and sterile. During the short summer the growth of vegetation is rapid, the plants being for the most part the same as those indigenous to the North of Scotland, but more dwarfed. A central ridge of lofty mountains, covered with perpetual snow, stretches from north to south. The coasts are surrounded by many thousand islands of different sizes, on which the inhabitants frequently fix their residence, on account of their good situation for sea game. In the inlets and bays which intersect the coast, immense masses of ice are accumulated during a series of years, which, being loosened during the heat of summer, lose their points of support from the shore, and being set adrift by the currents, embarrass the navigation of the polar seas, and become the terror of the mariner; the "icebergs" so formed sometimes rise more than 500 feet above the surface of the water. Owing to its northern position Greenland is exposed to all the rigours of the frozen zone.

Zoology.—The animals which are most abundant are white hares, reindeer, dogs resembling wolves, Arctic foxes, and white bears, which are very fierce and mischievous. Ravens are plentiful, and eagles of a very large size, falcons, with other birds of prey. The seas abound in whales, seals of different kinds, sea-cows, swordfish, porpoises, halibut, turbot, cod, haddock, with various other sorts of white fish.

Inhabitants.—The Esquimaux of both sexes are generally short, or under the common size, but well proportioned, fat, and plump. They are allied to the Mongolian race, and are miserably poor, depending on hunting and fishing for their subsistence. In their houses and manner of living they have the general habits of savages. In the S. they grow a little corn, some potatoes, and kitchen herbs. Pop. 9 780.

Lat.—Between 59° 49′ and 78° N. Lon. between 20° and 75° W.

Divisions.—The country north of lat. 67° N. is known as North Greenland; the other part as South Greenland. In the former there are 7, and in the latter 6, Danish settlements.

History.—Greenland was first discovered by an Icelander, named Gualbiörn, towards the close of the ninth century. About 986 two settlements were formed on the west coast, which continued to thrive for about four centuries, when the western settlement was destroyed by the "black death," combined with the attacks of the aborigines; the other settlement suffered the same fate about a century later. Frobisher, Davis, and Baffin successively visited the west coast of Greenland, and in 1721 the first of the existing colonies was established at Godthaab, by a Norwegian clergyman, with 43 colonists.

GREENOCK, gren'-ok, a Parliamentary burgh and seaport town of Scotland, on the S. bank of the Frith of Clyde, 22 miles from Glasgow. It extends upwards of two miles along the shore, and in one part rises to a considerable elevation. It contains many neat and well-built houses; but its streets are irregular and narrow, and its general appearance is far from being elegant. In the centre of the town is a square, on the south side of which is a neat church, with a spire 146 feet high. There are two other established churches,—the West and the East church, besides places of worship for other denominations. Other public buildings include the court-house, the town-hall, the exchange, the Watt monument, containing a statue by Chantrey, a museum, lecture room, and a library, the mechanics' institute, &c. The custom-house is a splendid edifice, the front being 120 feet broad, and each end upwards of 50 feet. It includes also the excise. An esplanade, nearly a mile and a half long and 100 feet broad, affords a fine waterside promenade. The harbours are large and commodious. The Albert harbour was opened in 1866, and the Prince's Pier in 1870. There are two public parks, Well park and Wellington park; a cemetery of nearly 40 acres is on the S.W. of the town. Manf. Sugar (fifteen sugar houses turning out refined sugars to the amount of four millions and a half sterling annually), iron, rope, soap, candles, leather, bottles, sailcloth: to these must be added shipbuilding to a considerable extent; about twenty iron vessels are turned off the stocks annually. The herring-fishery is the oldest branch of local industry in Greenock. Prior to 1697 it was an inconsiderable fishing-station; but on the 12th of March in that year, the directors of the Scottish, Indian, and African Company came to a final resolution to erect salt-works in the frith; and out of circumstances that occurred in the deliberations of that sitting, the attention of the superior, Sir John Shaw, was directed to the maritime advantages of the situation. A new wet dock, the James Watt, was begun in 1878. Pop. 69,238—a station on the Caledonian and Great Southern and Western railways.

GREENOUGH, HORATIO, green'-uf, a distinguished American sculptor, who, at an early age, displayed a talent for drawing and modelling, and adopted sculpture for his profession. With the view of studying his art at its source, he proceeded to Rome, where he remained for some years; but his health giving way, he was forced to revisit his native country. He soon returned to Europe, however, and, fitting up a studio at Florence, devoted himself to his art. Here he produced his colossal statue of Washington, now in the grounds of the Capitol at Washington, and the "Pioneer's Struggle," now in the Capitol itself. In 1851 he returned to America to erect his group of the "Rescue," but his health was such as gave no prospect of his being able to continue his professional studies.

Born at Boston, Massachusetts, 1805; died 1852.

GREENVILLE, green'-vil, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 724 square miles. Pop. 37,496.

GREENVILLE, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 440 square miles. Pop. 8,407.

GREENVILLE, SIR RICHARD, a gallant English officer, who served in the imperial army in Hungary, against the Turks, and, on his return, engaged in the reduction of Ireland. In 1551 he represented Cornwall in parliament, about which time he received the honour of knighthood. In 1585 he undertook an expedition to America, and, in 1591, was appointed vice-admiral of a squadron sent out to intercept a rich Spanish fleet. He proceeded as far as the Western Islands, and while there a powerful squadron was sent from Spain to escort the Plate fleet. On their approach the English admiral, Thomas Howard, proceeded to sea; but Greenville, in the Revenge, staying to take on board some of his sick crew, was surrounded by the whole Spanish fleet. He defended his ship with the utmost bravery, and, after receiving several wounds, was about to sink her, but was carried on board the Spanish Admiral's ship, where he died three days after.

Born in Devonshire, 1540; died 1591.

GREENWICH, grin'-ij, a market-town and Parliamentary borough of Kent, on the Thames, immediately below Deptford, 4 miles from London Bridge. The manor of Greenwich was acquired by the crown, at the time of the Conquest, and has ever since remained in the hands of the royal family. Greenwich was the residence of Edward I.; and a palace was built here in 1433 by the duke of Gloucester. Edward IV. enlarged and improved it; Henry VII. resided much in it; and here Henry VIII., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, were all born. It was a favourite residence of Queen Elizabeth and other succeeding sovereigns. The site is now occupied by Greenwich hospital, a magnificent structure, founded by William and Mary, under letters patent of 1694, as a home for superannuated seamen. It consists of four extensive piles of building or wings, entirely detached from each other, into the four corners nearly of a great square, but, at the same time, so connected by the conformity of their dimensions, their figures, and the general arrangement of their decorations, as still to constitute a complete whole. The principal front of this structure, which is nearly all of Portland stone, is towards the Thames on the north. The north-west angle is occupied by King Charles's building, the north-east by Queen Anne's, both of them lying next the river; and the posterior wings, towards the south, are formed of King William's building on the west, and Queen Mary's on the east. The two northern wings are separated by a square, in the middle of which is a statue of George II., sculptured by Rysbrach, out of a single block of white marble. Extending 865 feet along the front, the intervening bank of the Thames is formed into a terrace, with a double flight of steps to the river in the middle. King William's building contains the great hall, vestibule, and dome, designed and erected, between 1698 and 1703, by Sir Christopher Wren. Queen Mary's building comprises the chapel, built from the designs of Stuart, on the site of a former edifice, destroyed by fire in 1709. One of the highest efforts of West, the "Shipwreck of Paul," forms the altar-piece; and the hall is also adorned with representations of sea-fights, statues, and portraits of naval heroes. The pensioners to be received into the hospital were aged and maimed seamen of the navy, or of the merchant service, if wounded in battle, and marines and foreigners who had served two years in the navy. It contained dormitories and dining-halls for about 2,700. In 1732 the forfeited estates of the earl of Derwentwater were made over to the hospital. In 1865 the institution ceased to exist as an asylum, the funds being distributed as out-pensions. Five years afterwards a portion of the building was converted into a royal naval college. The parish church, dedicated to St. Alphege, is a large edifice; there are several other places of worship. On the esplanade of the hospital is a monument to the memory of Lieutenant Bellot, the gallant French officer who perished in the Arctic expedition of discovery. (See BELLOT.) The Royal Naval School is between the Hospital and the Park. The town contains extensive engineering establishments, steamboat yards, and manufactories of submarine cables. It is a place of popular resort in summer, river steamers and the railway affording easy access. One member is returned to parliament. Pop. 131,264.—A station on the London and Greenwich railway.—GREENWICH PARK was detached from the palace when this became part of the hospital, and is still in the hands of the crown. The ranger's lodge now forms the centre of the naval asylum, designed for the support and education of the orphan children of seamen. On a rising ground in the park, and commanding one of the most varied prospects that can well be conceived, stands the Royal Observatory, for ever celebrated by the great names with which it is associated.

GREENWICH, a town of Connecticut, United States, in Long Island Sound, a favourite place of residence for New York merchants. Manf. iron, tools, and wire. Pop. 7,892.

GREGOIRE, HENRI, one of the so-called constitutional bishops of France, was educated at Nancy, entered into orders, and was appointed professor at the Jesuit college of Pont-à-Mousson. He published in 1778 a work on the amelioration of the condition of the Jews, which excited much attention, and was translated into English. Was chosen one of the deputies of the clergy at the election of the states-general in 1789; attached himself to the Tiers-état party; was one of the chief advisers of the secession; took the oath of the Tennis court, and became one of the secretaries to the national assembly. He was a zealous supporter of the civil constitution of the clergy; was the first of his order to take the oaths, and was elected the first "constitutional bishop" of the department of Loir-et-Cher. At the notorious Feast of Reason, when Gobel, the constitutional bishop of Paris, publicly renounced Christianity, Gregoire braved the danger by firmly refusing to follow his example. He took part in the later phases of the revolution under the directory, and after the 18th Brumaire became a member of the Corps Législatif. As he could not be induced to make the retractions required by the church authorities, he ceased to exercise ecclesiastical functions on the conclusion of the concordat between Pius VII. and Bonaparte; he was resolutely opposed to the establishment of the empire, and on the restoration took part in urging on the king the acceptance of the constitution. He was finally excluded from the senate, and retired from public life. Besides the work mentioned above, he was the author of a "Chronique Religieuse," in 6 vols., and a "Histoire des Sects Religieuses" in 6 vols., which, however, he did not live to finish.

Born 1750; died 1831.

GREGORIO, grai-gó're-o, a town of Italy, 18 miles E. of Campagna. Excellent wine is produced in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5,000.

GREGORY THE GREAT, greg'-o-re, pope, was appointed prefect of the city of Rome, and held other civil dignities; but, being inclined to a religious life, he retired to the monastery of St. Andrew, of which he became abbot. On the death of Pelagius, in 590, he was elected pope. He sent Austin the monk to convert the English to Christianity.

Born 544; died 604.

GREGORY II., ST., succeeded Constantine in the pontificate in 715, and died in 731.

GREGORY III., a native of Syria, succeeded to the pontificate in 731. He sent legates to Charles Martel to demand succour against the Lombards, which embassy is considered to be the origin of the apostolic nuncios in France.

Died 741.

GREGORY IV., a native of Rome, succeeded to the pontificate in 827, and was greatly esteemed for his learning and piety.

Died 844.

GREGORY V. (Bruno), a native of Germany, and a kinsman of the emperor Otho, was elevated to the pontificate in 996. An anti-pope, named John XVII., was set up against him by Crescentius, consul of Rome, but was expelled by the emperor.

Died in 999.

GREGORY VI. (Giovanni Graziano), a native of Rome, was elected pope in 1044. Finding the lands and revenues of his church greatly diminished by usurpations, and the roads infested by robbers, he acted with such vigour, that a powerful party was raised against him by those who had been accustomed to live by plunder. At a council, held at Sutri in 1046, Gregory abdicated the pontificate.

Died 1047.

GREGORY VII. (Hildebrand), was the son of a carpenter of Soano, in Tuscany, and succeeded to the pontificate in 1073. This pope, a man of great energy and ambition, formed vast projects for the reform of the church, and, in attempting to execute them, assumed unexampled powers. But he was embroiled with the emperor Henry IV., and, after a violent struggle, retired to Salerno, where he died.

Died 1085.

GREGORY VIII. (Alberto di Mora), succeeded Urban III. in 1187, and died the same year, after having exhorted the Christian princes to undertake a new crusade.

Died 1187.

GREGORY IX. (Ugolino), was nephew of Innocent III., of the family of the counts of Segni. He was elected pope in 1227, and caused a new crusade to be undertaken, in which the emperor Frederick II. engaged, notwithstanding which he twice excommunicated that prince.

Died 1241.

GREGORY X. (Thibaut Visconti), of the illustrious family of Visconti, was elected pope in 1271, at which time he was in the Holy Land. He assembled a council at Lyons, to promote a union between the Eastern and Western churches, and other objects.

Died 1276.

GREGORY XI. (Pierre Roger de Mont Roux), a native of Limousin, in France, was a nephew of Clement VI., and son of the count of Beaufort. He was elevated to the pontificate in 1370, was a patron of learning, and endeavoured to reconcile the princes of Christendom, and to reform the religious societies. He transferred the papal see from Avignon to Rome.

Died 1378.

GREGORY XII. (Angelo Corrario), a native of Venice, was raised to the pontificate in 1406, during the schism in the East; Benedict XIII. being the other pope. Both were deposed by a council held at Pisa, and Alexander V. elected in their stead. Gregory submitted, and laid aside the pontifical dignity.

Died 1417.

GREGORY XIII. (Hugo Buoncompagni), a native of Bologna, succeeded Pius V. in 1572. He embellished Rome with many fine buildings; but that which more particularly marks his government, is the reform of the calendar, which goes by his name. He contributed greatly to correct and amend Gratian's "Decretals," which he enriched with learned notes. The fact of his having ordered a Te Deum to be sung on the occasion of the massacre of St. Bartholomew has left a lasting stain upon his character.

Died 1585.

GREGORY XIV. (Nicholo Sfondrati), succeeded Urban VII. in 1590. He was the son of a senator of Milan, and involved himself in an unsuccessful war with Henry IV. of France.

Died in 1591.

GREGORY XV. (Alessandro Ludovisio), a Bolognese, descended of an ancient family, was elected pope in 1621. He wrote several works, among which is one entitled "Epistola ad Regem Persarum, Schah Abbas, cum Notis Hegalsoni," 8vo, 1627.

Died 1623.

GREGORY XVI. (Mauro Capellari), was elected pope in 1831. He was a man of respectable character, but bigoted and exclusive.

Born 1765; died 1846.

GREGORY ST., commonly called Gregory of Tours, a Romish saint, was chosen bishop of Tours in 573, and, in 578, distinguished himself in a council at Paris. He is said to have converted Chilperic from Pelagianism. Gregory was the author of a history of the Franks, in 10 books; and other works.

Born at Auvergne, 544; died 595.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, bishop of Constantinople, remarkable for his erudition and eloquence; wrote poems to furnish the Christian youth with subjects for study, when Julian prohibited Christians from reading the books of the Gentiles. In 378 he was appointed by the council of Antioch to go to Constantinople to suppress Arianism, and was there chosen bishop. He afterwards resigned that see and retired to his native country, where he died.

Born 326, near Nazianzum, in Cappadocia; died 390.

GREGORY NYSSEN, the younger brother of St. Basil, was bishop of Nyssa, in Cappadocia, but was deposed by the Arian faction. He drew up the Nicene creed, by order of the council of Constantinople. His works were published at Paris in 1615, in 2 vols. folio.

Died about 400.

GREGORY OF ARMENIA, commonly designated the "Illuminator," introduced Christianity amongst the Armenians in the beginning of the 4th century. He is one of the saints of the Roman calendar.

GREGORY THAUMATURGOS (the wonder-worker), sometimes known as St. Theodorus, was educated as an advocate, but having been converted to Christianity applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, under Origen, after which he retired into solitude, whence he was persuaded to return and devote himself to Christian labour. He was consecrated, about the year 240, as bishop of Neocæsarea, and tradition records many miracles wrought by him in the course of his ministry. Several of his works are still extant.

Born about 212.

GREGORY, JAMES, a celebrated mathematician, who, at an early age, discovered a genius for the mathematics, which he cultivated with eagerness in the Marischal college of Aberdeen. In 1663 he published his "Optica Promota," in which he announced the invention of the reflecting telescope, which spread his name over Europe. Soon after this he made a tour to Italy, and resided some years at Padua, where he published his "Vera Circuli et Hyperbolæ Quadratura," &c., in which appeared an account of his discovery of an infinitely converging series for the areas of the circle and hyperbola, and the mode of computing them. Soon after his return to England he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and engaged in a controversy with Huyghens on the subject of his treatise on the quadrature of the circle. In 1668 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the university of St. Andrews. He had an amicable controversy with Newton concerning the reflecting telescope. In 1674 he became professor of mathematics at Edinburgh, where he died in the year following, after being struck with sudden blindness as he was showing the satellites of Jupiter to some pupils. His "Optics" were translated into English by Dr. Desagulieres, and several of his papers are in the "Philosophical Transactions."

Born at Aberdeen, 1638; died 1675.

GREGORY, JOHN, a physician, grandson of the preceding. After studying at his native place, he removed to Edinburgh, and thence to Leyden. In 1745 he obtained the degree of doctor of physic, and became professor of philosophy at Aberdeen, which he exchanged in 1749 for that of physic. About 1751 he settled in London, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1764 he removed to Edinburgh, where, in 1766, he also became professor of physic. His works are, on the "Duties and Offices of a Physician," 8vo; "Elements of the Practice of Physic," 8vo; "A Father's Legacy to his Daughters," 12mo. All his productions have been collected into four volumes.

Born at Aberdeen, 1724; died 1773.

GREGORY, DAVID, cousin of the above, completed his education at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A., and in 1684 became professor of mathematics in that university. In 1691, by the recommendation of Newton, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and elected Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford. In 1695 he published his "Catoptricæ et Dioptricæ Sphericæ Elementa," 8vo. His demonstration of the curve, called the catenarian, appeared in 1697, in the "Philosophical Translations;" but his greatest work was published in 1702, and entitled "Astronomiæ et Geometricæ Elementa," folio. It was afterwards translated into English in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1703 he published a splendid edition of Euclid's works in folio. After his death appeared a treatise on Logarithms, and another on practical geometry. Of this family, sixteen have held British professorships. There are few names therefore, more illustrious in the annals of science and literature.

Born at Aberdeen, 1661; died 1710.

GREIFENBERG, grife'-en-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of Pomerania, on the left bank of the Rega, 41 miles N.E. of Stettin. It is surrounded by walls, and contains a castle, church, and three hospitals. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, and hats. There is a trade in cattle, and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 6,000.

GREIFENBERG, a walled town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the right bank of the Queiss, 35 miles S.W. of Leignitz. Manf. Linen, and there are dye works. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,800.

GREIFENHAGEN, grife-en-ha'-gen, a town of Prussia, province of Pomerania, on the right of the Reglitz, 12 miles from Stettin. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 7,000.

GREIFSWALDE, grifes-val'-de(r), a town of Prussia, in the province of Pomerania, on the Ryck, 20 miles S.E. of Stralsund. It is inclosed by walls; has a gymnasium and a university, with a library containing 100,000 volumes. Manf. Paper, leather, tobacco, soap, &c. Pop. 19,924.

GREZ, gritze, a town of Central Germany, 50 miles from Leipsic, on the right bank of the White Elster. It is inclosed by walls, and is the residence of a sovereign prince. Manf. Woollens and mixed fabrics. Pop. 15,061.

GRENADA, gren'-a-da, an island in the West Indies, belonging to the Windward group. It is of oblong form and mountainous, a ridge of high land crossing it from N. to S.; but, on the whole, it is fertile in a great degree, and, by the variety as well as excellence of its soil, is adapted to every tropical production. The climate, however, is unhealthy, owing in a great degree to the extensive swamps on the south-east coast. Area, 140 square miles. Pop. 38,000, mostly of African descent. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 12° N.—Grenada was discovered by Columbus, in the year 1498. It was originally settled by the French, and in 1762 was taken by the British, to whom it was confirmed by the peace of 1763.

GRENADE, gra-nade', a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, on the right bank of the Save, near its confluence with the Garonne, 16 miles N.W. of Toulouse. Manf. Coarse woollens and serge. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,200.

GRENADINES, a chain of small islands lying between Grenada and St. Vincent, in the West Indies, of which the largest is Carriaco, about 11 square miles in extent. Coffee, indigo, cotton, and sugar are cultivated. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 12° 30′ to 13° N.

GRENELLE, gre-nel', a suburb of Paris (see PARIS), celebrated for the artesian well, 1,800 feet deep, which supplies the upper part of Paris with water.

GRENOBLE, gren'-obl, a fortified town of France, in the department of the Isère, and divided by the river Isère into two parts, which are joined by two bridges, 60 miles from Lyons. The streets are tolerably wide and regular, but the houses are ill-built, and part of the town is exposed to inundations from the Isère. The town is surrounded with ramparts. The public buildings are the ancient palace of justice, originally the palace of the Dauphin; the cathedral (partly ancient and partly modern), and, on an eminence near the middle of the town, stands the ruins of a once strong citadel, called the Bastile. There are, besides, a university, a great provincial school, an academy of arts and sciences, societies of medicine and agriculture, medical schools, and the artillery school. To these institutions belong a library, a museum, a botanical garden, a cabinet of natural history, and a small cabinet of antiquities. In one of the squares is a statue of the chevalier Bayard, and there is a large and well laid out public garden. Manf. Gloves, silk goods, perfumes, liqueurs, leather, and hemp. Pop. 51,371.—This was the first place, which, in 1815, openly received Napoleon I. on his escape from Elba.

GRENVILLE, GEORGE, gren'-vil, brother-in-law to the great earl of Chatham, became member of parliament in 1741, and subsequently filled several minor offices in the government; was made secretary of state in 1762, then first lord of the admiralty; and, on the retirement of Lord Bute, prime minister, holding at the same time the office of chancellor of the exchequer. He was a man of great ability, but was unpopular as a minister. The authorship of the Stamp Act, which drove the American colonies to resistance, is attributed to him.

Born 1712; died 1770.

GRENVILLE, WILLIAM WYNDHAM, Lord, gren'-vil, third son of the preceding, studied at Eton College and Oxford University. In 1782 he became a member of the House of Commons; and Mr. Pitt, subsequently, gave him the office of pay-master in the army. In 1789 he was elected speaker in the House of Commons, and the following year became secretary of state for the home department. At the same time he was created baron Grenville. In 1791 he became secretary of state for foreign affairs. For some years he was now out of office; but, on the death of Mr. Pitt, he became first lord of the Treasury. In 1809 he was chosen chancellor of the University of Oxford, and, up to 1815, usually acted in conjunction with earl Grey. Towards the latter part of his life, he retired from the public eye, and died at Dropmore Lodge, Buckinghamshire.

Born 1759; died 1834.

GRESHAM, SIR THOMAS, gresh'-am, was a merchant of the days of Queen Elizabeth, and amassed a large fortune. In 1559 he received the honour of knighthood from the queen, and was frequently consulted by her in her political and commercial concerns, and for a short time was ambassador at the court of the king of Spain's regent at Brussels. He founded the Royal Exchange, and in January, 1570, the queen dined at his house, and caused the building to be so named, and had it proclaimed by sound of trumpet. The original structure was burned in the great fire of 1666; but it was rebuilt on a larger scale. It was, in 1838, again destroyed by fire; but was replaced by the present building, which was opened by queeen Victoria in 1844. After his death his town residence in Bishopsgate Street was converted into a college according to his will, by which a sufficient endowment was provided to pay the salaries of seven professors. The college was taken down in 1768. In 1843 a lecture hall was built at the corner of Basinghall Street and Gresham Street, where lectures on divinity, physic, astronomy, geometry, law, rhetoric, and music are delivered free to the public every term. Besides other charitable bequests Sir Thomas Gresham left funds for the erection and support of eight almshouses.

Born in London, 1519; died 1579.

GRETNA, or GRAITNEY, gret'-na, a village of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, near the Solway Frith, 9 miles N.W. of Carlisle. The village of Graitney, or Gretna Green, is famous for the marriages of fugitive lovers from England, which were at one time celebrated here.

GRÉTRY, ANDRÉ ERNEST MODESTE, gra'-tre, a French musical composer, who, in early youth, discovered a great passion for music, and went to study in Italy. Returning thence, he brought with him the knowledge of a pure and simple melody, lively but graceful. The true comic accent was given by him to the language of music, and he deserved his surname of the "Molière of Music." Amongst his numerous operas may be named the "Huron," which commenced his reputation, and of which the words were written by Marmontel; "L'Amant Jaloux." "La Caravane," "Richard Cœur de Lion." Grétry also produced an essay on music, in which he described his method. He died at Rousseau's hermitage at Montmorency, which had become his property.

Born at Liège, 1741; died 1813.

GRETSCH, or GRECH, gretch, an eminent Russian author. He edited several influential periodicals, among which may be named the "Northern Bee" and the "Circulating Library." In 1835 he started the great Russian Encyclopædia, but seceded from it in its 7th volume. In 1822, he published a "History of Russian Literature," which is one of the best works of the kind that has yet appeared. He also published some grammars of the Russian language, which, for practical purposes, are esteemed the best.

Born at St. Petersburg, 1787.

GREUSSEN, groos'-sen, a walled town of the principality of Schwarzburg, Sondershausen, Germany, on the left bank of the Helbe. Manf. Flannel, frieze, and tiles. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,200.

GREVENMACHER, grai-ven-mak'-ker, a town of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, Holland, near the Prussian frontier. Manf. Playing cards. A trade is carried on in cattle, wine, and grain, and six annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

GREVILLE, FULKE, Lord Brooke, grev'-il, a patron of letters and an ingenious writer, was in great favour with Elizabeth. He was created Lord Brooke by James I., who gave him Warwick Castle. He founded a history lecture at Cambridge. He was stabbed by a servant whom he had reprimanded for an insolent expression. The man put an end to himself with the same weapon. After his lordship's death, appeared several of his poetical works, and the life of Sir Philip Sydney, written by him. Hallam calls him "of all our poets the most obscure."

Born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, 1554; died 1628.

GREVISMUHLEN, grai-vis-moo'-len, a town of the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 18 miles N.W. of Schwerin. There are an ancient church, town, and court houses, and a triangular market place. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,600.

GREY, JANE, gray, a celebrated and unfortunate English lady, was the daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of the duke of Suffolk and Mary, queen dowager of France and sister to Henry VIII. From her childhood she evinced an intelligent and amiable turn of mind, and was so far advanced in her education at the age of fourteen, that when the learned Ascham visited her family, he found her reading Plato's "Phædon" in Greek. She was also well acquainted with several modern languages. Her religious principles were those of the Reformation, and her virtue and modesty equalled her many accomplishments. When the health of Edward VI. began to decline, Dudley, duke of Northumberland, persuaded him, from a pretended concern for the interests of religion, to bequeath his crown to Lady Jane; thus setting aside his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. About the same time, the duke effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guildford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey. On the death of Edward, her father and the duke of Northumberland, much against her own wishes, paid homage to her as queen, and had her proclaimed in London with the usual formalities. This pageantry, however, lasted only a few days; for Mary proved successful, and the duke of Northumberland was beheaded, and Lady Jane and her husband sent to the Tower. After being confined some time, the council resolved to put these innocent victims of their father's ambition to death. Lord Guildford suffered first, and as he passed her window, his lady gave him her last adieu. Immediately afterwards, she was executed on the same scaffold, suffering with calm resignation, and a firm attachment to the Protestant faith. Fuller, in his "Holy State," says, "she had the innocency of childhood, the beauty of youth, the solidity of middle, the gravity of old age. . . , the birth of a princess, the learning of a clerk, the life of a saint, yet the death of a martyr, for her parent's offences."

Born 1537; died 1554.

GREY, CHARLES, second earl, was educated at Eton and Cambridge, after which he proceeded on a tour to the continent, and on his return, in 1786, became a member of parliament for the county of Northumberland. He took the Liberal side, was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and, in 1792, was one of the founders and most active members of the "Society of the Friends of the People." In 1797 he brought forward a motion for parliamentary reform, for which he continued to labour strenuously, although he was, for many years, unsuccessful in carrying the object of his wishes. When Lord Grenville, in 1806, came into office, he, as Lord Howick, from the elevation of his father to the peerage, became first lord of the Admiralty, and, as one of the leaders of the House of Commons, carried the act for the abolition of the slave-trade. In the following year, the cabinet was broken up, and he, in the same year, succeeded to the title, by the death of his father. In the House of Lords he became one of the leaders of the opposition. For many years he remained out of office; but, in 1830, he was called upon by William IV. to form a new cabinet, after the fall of the Wellington administration. He accordingly became prime minister, and announced "peace, retrenchment, and reform" as the object of his policy. In 1831 the Reform Bill was introduced by Lord John Russell into the House of Commons; but, in the following year, the ministers resigned, on account of a motion of Lord Lyndhurst. They were restored to power, however, and, in the same year, the bill was passed. In the succeeding year, Earl Grey resigned, and, after about a couple of years, retired from public life.

Born at Fallowden, near Alnwick, 1764; died at Howick House, Northumberland, 1845.

GREY, HENRY GEORGE, third earl, the eldest son of the above, received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and, in 1829, entered parliament as member for the disfranchised borough of Winchelsea. In 1831 he represented the county of Northumberland, and, in the previous year, filled the office of under-secretary of state for the colonies. In 1834 he became under-secretary for the home department, and in the following year, under the Melbourne administration, was appointed secretary-at-war. In July, 1845, his father died, when he was called to the House of Lords, and became colonial secretary in the administration of Lord John Russell. At this period the colonies were demanding a representative government, which Earl Grey opposed, and which led to considerable misunderstandings in the colonial office. In 1852 he retired from his post, and vindicated his administration in a treatise of considerable length. In 1853 he declined to serve under Lord Aberdeen, and has ever since continued out of office.

Born 1802.

GREY, SIR GEORGE, K.C.B., entered the army, and rose to the rank of captain, when, in 1836, he offered himself, in conjunction with Lieutenant Lushington, to Lord Glenelg, then colonial secretary, to undertake a journey of discovery in Australia. In the following year, he proceeded on his expedition, and, after an absence of four years, arrived in England, and published the journals of his discoveries. He was then appointed lieutenant-governor of South Australia, and produced "A Vocabulary of the dialect of South-Western Australia." In 1846 he became governor of New Zealand, and published a work entitled "Polynesian Mythology, and Ancient Traditional History of the New Zealand Race." In 1848 he was created a knight-commander of the Bath, and in 1854 he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief at the Cape of Good Hope, where he won golden opinions.

Born at Lisburn, Ireland, 1812. Died 1882.

GREY, DR. ZACHARY, an English divine, well known for his edition of "Hudibras," accompanied with a great number of curious and entertaining notes. Of these notes, Warburton says, "he hardly thinks there ever appeared, in any learned language, so execrable a heap of nonsense, under the name of commentaries, as hath lately been given us on this satiric poet." He also published notes on Shakspeare, and an answer to Neale's "History of the Puritans."

Born 1687; died 1766.

GREY, an inland county of West Australia. There are extensive downs and a large and beautiful sheet of water, Lake M'Dermott.

GREY TOWN, or SAN JUAN DE NICARAGUE, a town of Central America, on the river San Juan, with a very fine harbour. There is a considerable trade in the export of hides, indigo, and specie, and the communication with the Pacific coast is accomplished by steamers on the river and Lake Nicaragua. The population is a mixture of American and European nationalities, and very fluctuating.

GRIESBACH, JOHANN JAKOB, grees'-bak, a distinguished German theologian, who studied successively at Frankfort, Tubingen, Halle, and Leipsic. He subsequently became rector of the university of Jena, and ecclesiastical privy councillor to the duke of Saxe-Weimar. His works are very numerous; but the principal is an edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings.

Born at Butzbach, 1745; died 1812.

GRIESHEIM, grees'-hime, a town of the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, 4 miles from Darmstadt. Pop. 2,900.

GRIFFIN, grif'-fin, prince of Wales, was the last sovereign of that country previous to its being subjugated by England. He was put to death by order of Edward the Confessor, at London.

Died 1060.

GRIFFITH, RALPH, grif'-fith, a man of letters, who was born in Shropshire, settled in London as a bookseller. In 1749 he commenced the "Monthly Review," the success of which was very slow for a considerable time; but it made its way gradually to the first rank of periodical journals. Of this work he was both proprietor and editor, being powerfully assisted, from time to time, by men of first-rate talents.

Born 1720; died 1803.

GRIGORIOPOL, gre-go'-re-o-pol', a town of Russia, government of Kherson, on the left bank of the Dneister, 80 miles N.W. of Odessa. Manf. Morocco leather. Pop. 2,500, chiefly Armenians.

GRILLPARZER, FRANTZ, gril-part'-zer, an Austrian dramatic poet. His first tragedy, "Die Ahnfrau," appeared in 1816. Amongst his subsequent productions are "Sappho," "Das Goldene Vliesz," "König Ottokar's Glück und Ende," "Melusina," "Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen," and "Der Traum im Leben." He was the author also of some comedies and several lyric poems.

Born 1790; died 1872.

GRIMES, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 18,603. Anderson is the capital.

GRIMM, JAKOB LUDWIG, and WILHELM CARL, grim, two brothers, whose devotion to German literature was distinguished by a rare communion of fellowship between them. The nature of their labours is, perhaps, sufficiently indicated in the following quotation made by a contemporary from the works of Jakob: "All my labours," he says, "have been, either directly or indirectly, devoted to researches into our ancient language, poetry, and laws. These studies may seem useless to many; but to me, they have always appeared a serious and dignified task, firmly and distinctly connected with our common fatherland, and calculated to foster the love of it. I have esteemed nothing trifling in those inquiries, but have used the small for the elucidation of the great,—popular traditions for the elucidation of written documents. Several of my books have been published in common with my brother William. We lived, from our youth up, in brotherly community of goods, money, books, and collectanea, belonging to us in common; and it was natural to combine our labours." The greatest work undertaken by the brothers Grimm was a large German Dictionary, which, however, they did not live to complete.

Jakob born at Hanau, 1785; died 1863. Wilhelm, at Hanover, 1786; died 1859.

GRIMM, FRIEDERICH MELCHIOR, Baron, an eminent critic of the 18th century, a friend of Rousseau, Diderot, Baron Holbach, Madame d'Epinay, and other celebrated personages, was for some years secretary to the duke of Orleans; was raised to the rank of baron in 1776 by the duke of Gotha, and became minister plenipotentiary at the French Court. On the outbreak of the Revolution he received the appointment of minister-plenipotentiary at Hamburg from the Empress of Russia. His published works contain a history of French literature from 1753 to 1790.

Born at Regensburg, 1723; died at Gotha, 1807.

GRIMMA, grim'-ma, a town of Saxony, on the left bank of the Mulde, 17 miles S.E. of Leipsic. It is inclosed by walls, and has an old church and castle, and gymnasium. Manf. Woollens and cottons, flannel, starch, and tobacco pipes. Pop. 5,500.

GRIMSBY, GREAT, grimz'-be, a parliamentary borough and seaport of Lincolnshire, on the right bank of the Humber, 20 miles S.E. of Hull. It has a large and handsome church, St. James's, an ancient building in the Early English style, which contains many ancient monuments. The steeple affords an excellent specimen of the pointed, or Gothic architecture. There are other churches and chapels. The town-hall, a large pile of buildings in the modern Italian style opened in 1863; the corn exchange in the Elizabethan style, the mechanics' institute, the Odd Fellows' hall, and the theatre, are the chief public buildings. There is a free grammar school, founded in 1547. A statue of the Prince Consort was erected in 1879. The Royal Dock was opened by the Queen in 1854, and the New Union by the Prince and Princess of Wales in 1879. There are shipbuilding-yards, and an immense fishing trade is carried on.—There are stations of the Great Northern and the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire railways. Pop. 29,682.

GRIMSEL, grim'-sel, one of the loftiest summits of the Bernese Alps, on the frontiers of Bern and Valais, near the source of the Rhine. The famous pass is 8,400 feet above the sea level.

GRINDAL, EDMUND, grin'-dal, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in Pembroke Hall. Being attached to the principles of the Reformation, he became chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Westminster; but on the accession of Mary, he retired to Germany, and settled at Strasburg. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, he returned, and ultimately, in 1575, was made archbishop of Canterbury; but lost the royal favour, and was suspended for a time. He contributed to Fox's "Acts and Monuments."

Born in Cumberland, 1519; died at Croydon, 1583.

GRINDELWALD, grin'-del-vald, a celebrated Alpine valley, 12 miles long and 4 miles in breadth, 35 miles from Bern. The village is 3,600 feet above the sea level. Pop. 3,500.

GRINSTEAD, EAST, grin'-sted, a market-town of Sussex, 30 miles S. of London. The principal buildings are the church, which has a fine tower, and Sackville College, for aged persons, founded in 1616 by Sackville, Duke of Dorset. Pop. 9,755.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast railway.

GRIQUALAND, WEST. A district of South Africa, N. of the Orange River, ceded by the native chief Waterboer to the British empire in 1871. It contains about 2,500 square miles of country, and is famous for its "diamond fields," which include "Du Toit's Pass," "De Beer Rush," and "Bulfontain." The first diamond known to have been found in this district was obtained in 1867, and was afterwards sold for £500. Since that time "diamond digging" has been carried on there. Area, 2,500 square miles.

GRIQUALAND, EAST. A portion of the Transkei territory, South Africa, annexed to the British dominions in 1874.

GRISELDA or GRISELDIS, gre-sel'-da, the heroine of a story of the middle ages, of which there are numerous versions in various languages. It occurs in Boccaccio's "Decameron," was translated into Latin by Petrarch, formed the subject of one of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, and was afterwards dramatised (1559) under the title of "the Patient Grissel." It has also been dramatised in Italy and Germany, and, perhaps few stories have enjoyed so wide a popularity.

GRISI, GIULIA, a celebrated vocalist. She made her first appearance on the stage at Bologna, at the age of sixteen, in the opera of "Zelmira," and afterwards performed with immense success in Florence, Milan, Paris, and London. She excelled alike in tragedy and comedy, and her popularity in the musical world was for many years almost unbounded. She was twice married; first unhappily, afterwards to the eminent tenor, Signor Mario.

Born 1810; died 1869.

GRIS-NEZ, CAPE, gré-nai, a headland of France, in the department of Pas-de-Calais, 10 miles N. of Boulogne. It is the nearest point to the English coast, and the French terminus of the submarine cable. Lat. of lighthouse, 50° 52′ N. Lon. 1° 35′ E.

GROS, ANTOINE JEAN, Baron, gro, French historical painter. He first achieved popularity by an early picture of Bonaparte as the victor of Arcola, and in 1824 he was raised to the dignity of baron by Charles X. for an immense work executed for the cupola of the church of St. Genevieve in Paris. Subsequently finding his popularity diminishing, he committed suicide in the Seine.

Born, 1771; died, 1835.

GROSE, FRANCIS, grose, an eminent English antiquary, who illustrated the antiquities of England and Wales and Scotland. He was executing a work of the same kind relative to Ireland when he died. Besides the above, he published a "Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue;" also, a volume of "Miscellanies," and "Military Antiquities." Burns alludes to him in one of his humorous poems, as "a chiel takin' notes."

Born at Greenford, Middlesex, 1731; died in Dublin, 1791.

GROSSENHAIN, or HAIN, gros'-sen-hain, formerly Markgrafenhain, a manufacturing town of Saxony, famous for its woollen and cotton manufactures. It is situated 20 miles N.W. from Dresden on the left bank of the Röder. Pop. 11,045.

GROSSETESTE, GROSTÊTE, or GREATHEAD, ROBERT, grose'-tait, an English prelate, who received his education at Oxford and Paris. After enjoying several preferments with great reputation, he was chosen bishop of Lincoln in 1234. He successfully resisted the encroachments of the papal power, and was a great encourager of learning. His own acquirements were very great. His "Opuscula Varia" were published at Venice in 1514, and his "Compendium Sphæræ Mundi" in 1508. Some of his discourses and letters are extant.

Born at Stradbrook, Suffolk, 1175; died, 1253.

GROSSETO, gros-sai'-to, a province of Italy, bounded N. by Sienna, E. by Umbria, W. and S.W. by the Mediterranean. It is hilly and well wooded, except near the coast, where it is marshy. There are many fertile valleys watered by the Ombrone, Alberga, and Fiori. Oil and wine are produced and silkworms reared. Area, 1800 square miles. Pop. 118,109.

GROSSETO, an episcopal city, capital of the above province, near the right bank of the Ombrone, 45 miles S.W. of Sienna. The town is surrounded by walls, has a fine cathedral, two convents, and a large square, in the centre of which is a colossal statue of Leopold II. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics, leather, paper, and glass and soap. Pop. 6,500.

GROSSWARDEIN, or NAGY-VARAD, gros-var'-den, a town of Hungary, capital of the county Bihar, on the Körös, 38 miles S.E. of Debreczin. The old town is surrounded by walls, and there are eight suburbs. There are a cathedral, Roman Catholic and Greek churches, monasteries and nunneries, ecclesiastical seminary, and other educational institutions. In the neighbourhood are thermal baths and a marble quarry. Manf. earthenware. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 31,324.

GROTE, GEORGE, grote, the historian of Greece, was the son of Mr. Grote, a London banker, and was for some time a clerk in the banking house. He began to devote himself to literature and politics, and, in 1832, was elected member of parliament for the city of London, and conspicuous for his advocacy of the ballot. In 1841 he resigned his seat, to apply himself exclusively to his great work, "The History of Greece," which has received universal commendation. In 1865 he published a work on Plato; and since his death an unfinished work on Aristotle and a collection of Essays written at various times have been published. At the time of his decease he was president of University College and vice-chancellor of the University of London.

Born near Beckenham, Kent, 1794; died, 1871.

GROTIUS, HUGO, gro'-she-us (DE GROOT), an illustrious writer, was the son of a burgomaster of Delft, and, at the age of eight years, composed Latin verses of great merit. In his twelfth year he was sent to Leyden, and, in 1598, accompanied the ambassador Barnevelt to the court of Henry IV. of France, who was so pleased with Grotius that he gave him his picture and a gold chain. While in France he took the degree of doctor of laws. The year following he commenced practice as an advocate, and pleaded his first cause at Delft. Soon afterwards he published an edition of Martianus Capella, which was followed by a translation of a work of Stevinus, on finding a ship's place at sea. His edition of the "Phenomena" of Aratus appeared in 1600, and, about the same time, he composed Latin tragedies on sacred subjects. He was now appointed historiographer of the United Provinces, and advocate general of the treasury for Holland and Zealand. In 1613 he accepted the post of pensioner of Rotterdam, by which means he obtained a seat in the States of Holland, and was sent to England to settle a dispute on the subject of the Greenland fishery. During the contests which arose in Holland on account of religion, Grotius sided with the Arminians, for which he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Louvestein, whence he was delivered by his wife in 1621. He found his way to Antwerp, and afterwards to France, where he obtained a pension. In 1622 he published his "Apology," which so stung the States, that they ordered it to be burnt, and the author to be seized wherever he could be found. In 1625 he finished his famous book "De Jure Belli et Pacis," which greatly extended his reputation. In 1613 he accepted an invitation from Count Oxenstiern, and went to Stockholm, where he was appointed counsellor of state and ambassador to the court of France. He filled this important station, amidst circumstances of extreme difficulty, with honour to himself and satisfaction to the court which he represented. In 1645 he quitted France, and went to Holland, where he was honourably received. From Amsterdam he sailed to Sweden, and was welcomed in a cordial manner by Queen Christina. His remains were interred at Delft.—The works of Grotius are too many to be enumerated here; but we must mention his treatise on the "Truth of the Christian Religion,' which has become a standard book in all universities for students in divinity; his "Annales et Historiæ de Rebus Belgicis;" and his "Commentaries on the Scriptures:" these last are an immortal monument of learning. In his religious sentiments he coincided with the church of England, and advised his wife to join in communion with it.

Born at Delft, 1583; died on his journey to Holland, at Rostock, 1645.

GRUTER, or GRUTERUS, JOHN, groo'-tair, a distinguished philologist, whose father was a burgomaster of Antwerp, and fled to England, on account of his religion, taking his son, who was an infant, with him. Here he was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards went to Leyden, where he took his degrees in law. He became a professor at Heidelberg, but lost his valuable library when that city was sacked in 1622. His principal works are, "A Collection of Ancient Inscriptions," folio, 1601; "Thesaurus Criticus," 6 vols. 8vo.; "Delicise Poetarum Gallorum, Italorum," &c., 18 vols.

Born at Antwerp, 1560; died at Heidelberg, 1627.

GRUYERES, groo'-yair, a village of Switzerland, 16 miles S. of Fribourg. There is a very fine old castle. It is noted for its cheese, of which about 2,000 tons are made yearly. Pop. 1,100.

GRYLLUS, gril'-lus, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain at the battle of Mantinea. His father, upon receiving the news of his death, observed that it ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy, rather than of lamentation.

Died 362 B.C.

GRYNÆUS, SIMON, gri-né-us, a learned German, and the son of a peasant in Suabia. He became Greek professor at Vienna, and afterwards at Heidelberg. In 1531 he visited England, where his classical acquirements procured him many friends. The learned are indebted to him for editions of several of the ancients, enriched with prefaces and commentaries.

Born at Veringen, in Hohenzollern, 1493; died at Basle, 1541.

GRYPHIUS, ANDREW, gri'-fe-us, a German dramatic writer, whose tragedies were greatly admired. He also wrote a critique, in which he ridiculed the ancient comedies of the Germans.

Born at Glogau, 1616; died 1664.

GRYPHIUS, CHRISTIAN, son of the preceding, and a man of great erudition, became professor of eloquence at Breslau, principal of the college of Magdalen, and librarian. His works are "German Poems," "History of the Orders of Knighthood," "Treatise on the German Language," &c.

Born 1649; died 1706.

GUACHINAGO, goo-ach-e-na'-go, a small Mexican town in the state of Puebla, 103 miles miles N.E. of the city of Mexico, noted for the growth of Vanilla. Pop. 6,000.

GUACHIPAS, goo-ach-e-pas', a river of La Plata, South America, rising in the Andes, and forming the main head stream of the Salado. The total length is about 225 miles.

GUADALAVIAR, goo-a-da'-la-ve-ar, a large river of Spain, rising in the Sierra Albarracin, and, after a course of 130 miles, falling into the Gulf of Valencia, in lat. 39° 25' N.

GUADALAXARA, or GUADALAJARA, goo-a-da-la-char'-a, a province of Spain, part of the old province of New Castile. It forms an elevated plain, intersected by mountains, and traversed by the Tagus. The soil varies considerably in different districts, the most fertile being the district of Alcarria.

Rivers.—The Tagus, Tajuna, Henares, and Jarama.
Minerals.—Iron, very abundant, and lead.
Area.—2,946 square miles.
Pop.—204,145
Divisions and Chief Town.—For administrative purposes the province is divided into nine districts. The capital is GUADALAXARA.

GUADALAXARA, capital of the above province, on the left bank of the Henares, 44 miles N.E. of Madrid. Among the public buildings are a fine old structure, now belonging to the National Society of Engineers, and containing a museum, library, and laboratory; a large palace, barracks, public library, and theatre. There are public promenades, and six fountains, supplied by an aqueduct of Roman construction. Manf. Woollens, earthenware, soap, oil, and wine. Pop. 80,000.

GUADALAXARA (or JALISCO), a province of the republic of Mexico, North America, bounded N. by the provinces of Sonora and Durango; E. by Zacatecas and Guanaxuato; and W., for a length of 309 miles, by the Pacific Ocean. Its greatest length is 350 miles, and its greatest breadth is 300 miles. Area, 39,168 square miles. Pop 870,940.

GUADALAXARA, capital of the above province, on the left bank of the Rio de Santiago, 275 miles N.W. of Mexico. It is large and handsome, containing several squares, many convents, and colleges, and many inferior seminaries. In the principal square, the Plaza Mayor, are the cathedral (the cupolas of which were destroyed by an earthquake in 1818), the government house, and arcades, in which are handsome shops. The Alameda, or public walk, is beautifully laid out. Manf. Shawls, calico, paper, leather, and cigars; and the natives make a sort of jars of a fine scented earth, which are in much request. Pop. 90,000; consisting of Spaniards, mulattoes, and mestizoes.

GUADALAVIER, or TURIA, goo'-a-dal-a'-ve-ar, a river of Spain, which rises in the Sierra Molina, and after a winding course discharges into the Mediterranean, a little below the town of Valencia, after a course of nearly 200 miles.

GUADALCANAL, goo'-a-dal-ka'-nal, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 46 miles N. of the town of that name. It is well built, and the public buildings are good. Manf. Leather, soap, hats, brandy, wine, and oil. A trade is carried on in grain, cattle, and fruits. Pop. 3,900.

GUADALETE, goo'-a-dal-ai'-te, a river of Spain, which falls into the Atlantic, 3 miles E. of Cadiz, after a course of 90 miles. It receives on the right the Salado, Gato, and Tabajale, and on the left the Comares, Majaceite, and Alamillo.

GUADALOUPE-Y-CALVO, goo'-a-dal-oope-kal'-vo, a Mexican town in the state of Chihuahua, in a silver mining district. Pop. 10,000.

GUADALQUIVER, goo'-a-dal-quiv'-ir, one of the largest rivers of Spain. The name is derived from the Arabian wad-al-keber, "great river," and it is the ancient Bactis. It rises in the Sierra de Cazorla, near the eastern border of the province of Jaen, and flows in a south-western direction through Jaen, Cordova, and Seville, forms a portion of the boundary between the provinces of Huelva and Cadiz, and falls into the Atlantic by a broad estuary, after a course of about 260 miles. It is navigable as far as Seville, 80 miles from its mouth.

GUADALUPE, goo'-a-dal-oo'-pe, a river of the United States, rising in Texas, and, after an estimated course of 250 miles, entering the Gulf of Mexico.

GUADALUPE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 840 square miles. Pop. 12,202. Seguin is the capital.

GUADALUPE, a town of Spain, province of Toledo on the southern slope of Mount Atlamira, 95 miles S.W. of Toledo. There is a famous monastery, with a fine church. Manf. Linen, leather, oil, and copper-wire. An annual fair is held. Pop. 3,800.

GUADELOUPE, ga'-da-loop, an island of French West Indies, and one of the largest and most valuable of the Leeward group. It is divided into two parts by a channel about 40 yards wide, known as the Salt river, dividing the isthmus, which otherwise would connect the islands. This channel runs north and south, and communicates with the sea by a large bay at each end, of which that on the north is called Grand Cul-de-Sac, and that on the south Petit Cul-de-Sac. The east part of the island is called Grandeterre, and is about 30 miles long and 12 broad. The west part, which is properly Guadeloupe, is subdivided by a ridge of mountains into Capesterre on the east and Basseterre on the west. Guadeloupe proper is rather larger than the other island, and of volcanic formation. The highest point is an active volcano, La Souffrière, 5,108 feet high, and there are several lofty extinct volcanoes. Grand-Terre is generally flat. In many parts the soil is rich. There are good anchorages. The capital is BASSE-TERRE.

Pro.—Sugar, coffee, rum, ginger, cocoa, logwood, cabinet woods, &c. The island is well stored with horned cattle, sheep, horses, &c.
Area.—534 square miles.
Pop.— 182,866.
Lat. between 15° 47′ and 16° 30′ N. Lon. between 61° 15′ and 61° 44′ W.
History.—Guadeloupe was first discovered by Columbus. It was taken possession of by the French in 1635, who drove the natives into the mountains. In 1759 it was taken by a British squadron, and was restored to France at the peace of 1763. It was again taken by the British in 1794; but was retaken by the French in 1795. In 1810, the British once more took possession of it, and, in 1814, restored it to the French, to whom it now belongs. Slavery was abolished here by the decree of the French republic, in 1848.

GUADIANA, goo-a-de-a'-na, the ancient Anas, a river of Spain rising in La Mancha, and, running westward, passes by Ciudad Real, Merida, and Badajoz, and entering Portugal falls into the sea, between Ayamonte and Castel Marim, in lat. 37° 10′ N.; lon. 7° 26′ W. It is about 420 miles in length; but is navigable only for about 35 miles.

GUADIX, goo'-a-de, a town of Spain, province of Granada, on the north slope of the Sierra Nevada, 31 miles N.E. of Granada. It has a handsome cathedral, several churches and convents, is inclosed by old walls, and surrounded with mulberry-plantations, and there is an ancient castle. Manf. Hemp, flax, silk, earthenware, and saltpetre. The climate is temperate, owing to the elevation of the town among the mountains. Pop. 1,100.

GUADUAS, goo'-a-doo'-as, a city of the United States of Colombia, near the right bank of the Magdalena. It is one of the most elevated towns in the world, being situated 8,700 feet above the sea level. Pop. 4,000.

GUAIANECO, goo'-a-e-a-na'-co, a group of islands on the west coast of Patagonia, composed of Byron and Wager, and several smaller islands. Lat. 47° 41′ S. Lon. 74° 55′ W.

GUAIRA, goo'-a-eer'-a, a town of the Caraccas, in the province of Venezuela, 7 miles from the Caraccas. It has a celebrated port, defended by a castle, which is, however, open to the swell of the ocean. The town of Guaira is so surrounded by mountains, that there is no visible horizon, and its climate is in consequence hot and unhealthy. The town is defended by regular batteries. On the 26th March, 1812, this place was laid in ruins by an earthquake. Pop. 6,000.

GUALDA, goo'-al-da, a town of Italy, 22 miles N.E. of Perugia. Pop. 7,000.

GUAM, or GUAHON, the largest and most southerly of the Mariana or Ladrone islands, in the Pacific Ocean. It is about 100 miles in circumference. The coasts are high and shelving on the east side, and fenced with steep rocks, opposed to the perpetual beating of the sea. As the climate is very fine, vegetables and fruits are in great profusion, particularly guavas, bananas, cocoas, oranges, and limes. The inhabitants are dispersed in hamlets or villages, chiefly situate along the coast; for the interior is yet overrun with woods and in a state of nature. All pursue agriculture; and the facility of obtaining other subsistence, induces them to neglect the fishery. The Spaniards have a settlement on the island, which is defended by two Spanish forts. Pop. Unascertained.

GUAMACHUCO, or HUAMACHUCO, a town of Peru, 66 miles N.E. of Truxillo.

GUANAHANI, or CAT ISLAND, goo'-a-na-ha'-ne, one of the Bahama islands, long regarded as identical with the San Salvador of Columbus, and therefore his first discovery in the new world. It is now considered that Watling Island, 50 miles E. from Guanahani was the "San Salvador" of the great navigator.

GUANARE, goo'-a-na'-rai, a town of the republic of Venezuela, on a river of the same name, 45 miles S.E. of Truxillo. The streets are straight and wide, and the houses, without being sumptuous, are neatly built. There is an hospital, and a parish church adorned in a superior style. The inhabitants chiefly depend on the produce of their pasture-lands, and a good trade is carried on in cattle and mules. Pop. 12,000.

GUANAXUATO, or GUANAJUATO, goo'-a-nax'-oo-a-to, a state of the Mexican Confederation, wholly situate on the ridge of the Cordillera of Anahuac. It is chiefly noted for the richness of its mines, which exceed those of Potosi. Manf. Woollen and cotten fabrics, leather, and sugar. Area, 11,411 square miles. Pop. 268,113.

GUANAXUATO, the capital of the above state, stands on the Sierra de Santa, 160 miles N. of Mexico. It has numerous mining works, and a mint. The ground on which it built is 6,000 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 21° N. Lon. 101° W. Pop. 52,000.

GUANAPARO, a river of Venezuela, South America. It rises in the department Caraccas, and runs E. to join the Portuguesa on the right bank. It is 230 miles in length.

GUAPEY, or RIO GRANDE DE LA PLATA, goo'-a-pai, a river of Bolivia, rising in the southern slopes of the Andes of Cochabamba, and after a course of 600 miles, joining the Mamore in lat. 13° 35′ S., lon. 66° 10′ W.

GUAPORE, or ITENEZ, goo'-a-po-re, a river of Brazil, rising in lat. 14° 42′ S., and, after a course of 1,000 miles, in which are many cascades, joins the Mamore. It receives many affluents on the right bank.

GUARDA, goo'-ar-da, a fortified town of Portugal, in the province of Beira, 65 miles N.E. of Coimbra. There are a large episcopal palace, a handsome cathedral, four other churches, and two convents. An annual fair is held. Pop. 2,300. The heights near this place were abandoned by the French in 1811.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE, goo'-ar-dé-fwe, the most easterly point of Africa. Lat. 11° 50′ N. Lon. 51° 20′ E. It is washed on the S.E. by the Indian Ocean, and on the N.W. by the gulf of Aden.

GUARDIA-GRELE, goo'-ar-de-a, a town in the province of Chieti, S. Italy, 12 miles S.E. of the town of Chieti. Pop. 8,000.

GUARDIA, LA, a town of Spain, province of Toledo, near the left bank of the Cedron. It is surrounded by old walls. Manf. Linen, baize, serge, soap, oil, saltpetre, and wine. Pop. 3,100.

GUARENA, goo'-a-rai-na, a town of Spain, 40 miles S.E. of Badajos. An annual fair, lasting three days, is held. Pop. 4,000.

GUARINO, surnamed VERONESE, goo-a-ré-no, an eminent reviver of learning, and the first who introduced Greek into Italy. He became professor of the learned languages at Ferrara, and translated Plutarch's "Lives," part of "Strabo," and other works.

Born 1370; died 1460.

GUARINI, BATISTA, goo-a-ré-ne, an Italian poet, passed the greatest part of his life in courts, being in the service of Alphonso II., duke of Ferrara, and other princes. In these situations, however, he seems to have been a prey to continual disgusts. He wrote several poems, and a pastoral piece called "Pastor Fido," which gained him considerable reputation. He, however, contemned the title of poet, which he thought beneath the dignity of a gentleman.

Born at Ferrara, 1537; died at Venice, 1612.

GUASTALLA, goo'-as-tal'-la, a fortified town of Italy, province of Reggio, at the confluence of the Crostola and the Po, 17 miles N.E. of Parma. Manf. Silk fabrics, twist, and flannel. Three fairs are held. Pop. 10,000.

GUATEMALA, gat'-e-ma-la, a republic of Central America, having on the N. Yucatan and British Honduras; the Pacific Ocean on the S.; Honduras and San Salvador on the E. and Mexico on the W. The surface is mountainous, being traversed by the Andes, near the Pacific shores sending off ranges towards the Atlantic, and including many volcanoes, six of which are active. Some of these peaks are more than 13,000 feet in elevation. The soil is very fertile, but ill-cultivated. Large flocks of sheep are reared in the northern parts of the state. The climate is mild.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Lacantun, forming part of the Mexican boundary, and the Montagua and the Polochic, flowing into the Bay of Honduras, are the chief rivers; but there are numerous short streams which discharge into the Pacific. There are several lakes, the most important being Dulce, Amatitlan, Atitlan, and Peten, the last a large lake near the frontier of Yucatan.

Pro.—Cochineal, indigo, coffee, rice, and tropical fruits.

Area.—41,830 square miles.

Pop.—1,284,604, one-third of European descent.

Divisions and Chief Town.—The republic is divided into 17 provinces. The capital is GUATEMALA NUEVA (New.)

Constitution and Government.—The republic was established in April, 1839, having previously for 18 years formed part of the Confederation of Central America. The president is elected for four years, and there are two chambers, known as the Council of State and the House of Representatives.

GUATEMALA, NEW, or SANTIAGO DE GUATEMALA, the capital of the above province, is situate 105 miles from San Salvador. It is a magnificent place, adorned with 24 churches, monasteries, and a university. It has a flourishing trade with Vera Cruz and Mexico. Pop. 59,000. Lat. 14° 36′ N. Lon. 90° 13′ W.

GUATEMALA, OLD, or SANTIAGO DE CABALLEROS, the former capital of the province has been twice destroyed by earthquakes; once in the sixteenth century, and again in 1773. After this last catastrophe it was only partially rebuilt Pop. 20,000.

GUAVIARI, goo'-a-ve-ar'-e, a river of South America, rising in the mountains of Bogota, and falling into the Orinoco. Lat. 4° N.; lon. 68° 12′ Length, 450 miles.

GUAYAQUIL, goo'-ai-a-keel, a town of the republic of Ecuador, South America, is situate on both sides of the river of the same name, over which is a wooden bridge, 150 miles from Quito. It is built of good houses; but these being mostly of wood, it is liable, in consequence, to conflagrations, by which it has frequently suffered. It has a commercial port in the river Guayaquil, and an excellent dock to the south, on the shore of the same river. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 2° 9′ S. Lon. 79° 56′ W.

GUAYAQUIL, a river of S. America, rising in the Andes, and entering the sea in the gulf of the same name, in lat. 2° 27′ S.

GUAYMAS, goo'-ai-mas, a seaport of Mexico, on the E. shore of the gulf of California, at the mouth of a river of the same name. The harbour is one of the finest on the coast. Pop. 4,500. Lat. 27° 54′ N. Lon. 80° 10′ W.

GUAYRA, LA, goo'-air-a, the chief seaport of the republic of Venezuela, in S. America, on the Caribbean Sea, 16 miles from Caraccas. The principal exports are coffee, cotton, cocoa, and hides. Pop. 6,500.

GUAY-TROUIN, RÉNÉ DU, goo'-ai troo'-ă, a French naval officer, who commanded a privateer when he was only 18, but afterwards entered the navy, in which he served with success. He took Rio Janeiro, one of the richest colonies of Brazil; and when ennobled, it was stated in his patent, that he had taken more than 300 merchant vessels and 20 ships of war. He was made lieutenant-general of the naval forces of France, and commander of the order of St. Louis. His Memoirs, partly written by himself, were printed at Paris in 1740.

Born at St. Malo, 1673; died at Paris 1736.

GUBBIO, goob'-be-o, a town of Italy, at the foot of the Apennines, 50 miles S.W. of Ancona. It has a cathedral, numerous churches, a ducal palace, several schools, and other institutions. Manf. Woollen and silk stuffs. Near this place, the Eugubine tables were discovered, in 1446. The remains of a temple of Jupiter Apennius are to be seen a few miles from the town. Pop. 23,164.

GUBEN, goo'-ben, a town of Prussia, on the Neisse, 23 miles S.E. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Manf. Woollen goods, tobacco, and wine; shipbuilding is also carried on here. Pop. 25,840.

GUDIN, JEAN-ANTOINE-THÉODORE, goo'-da(n), a French painter of landscapes and marine subjects. His first picture "Brick en Détresse," was exhibited in 1822. The museum of Marseilles contains no less than eighty pictures painted for it between the years 1838 and 1848.

Born in Paris, 1802.

GUEBWILLER, goo'-aib-vil-ler, a town of Upper Alsace, Germany, 13 miles S.W. of Colmar. There are two remarkable churches, one dating from the 11th century. Manf. Woollens, cottons, ribbons, silk, chemicals, and machinery. There are coal-mines and slate quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 10,700.

GUELPH, a town of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, on the Speed, 38 miles N.W. of Hamilton. Pop. 9,899.

GUELPHS, and GHIBELLINES, gwelfs, gib'-e-lines, the names of two political parties conspicuous in German and Italian history from the 11th to the 14th century. They originated in the feuds between two German families, Waiblinger and Welf. The Ghibellines were, in general terms, the supporters of the imperial authority in Italy, the Guelphs taking the opposite side.

GUERANDE, gu-ai-ran'-de, a town of France, department of Loire-Inférieure, on a vine-covered slope, 42 miles N.W. of Nantes. It is fortified, and there is a strong castle in the vicinity. Though now three miles from the sea, it was formerly a harbour. Manf. Linen, cotton, and serges. A considerable quantity of salt is made in the vicinity. Pop. 8,500.

GUERARA, or GERRARA, goo'-a-ra-ra, a town on the left bank of the Zigehir, about 40 miles north-east of Ghardaia, in the district of the Beni-M'zab, in Algeria. It is a walled town with three gates, and is a market for the sale of horses, asses, sheep, ivory, gold-dust, ostrich feathers, silk, cutlery, &c., supplied chiefly from Tunis and Algiers. Pop. 12,000.

GUERRAZZI, FRANCESCO DOMENICO, goo'-ai-rat'-ze, Italian poet, romance writer, and politician. He studied law at Pisa, but while yet a youth, became obnoxious to the government by the boldness with which he uttered democratic opinions. At the age of 23 he was banished, and allowed to return three years afterwards, but was immediately arrested and imprisoned on the island of Elba. Here he wrote his great novel, on the subject of Francesco Ferrucio, the republican hero of Florence. When released from prison he returned to the practice of his profession. In 1848 he was arrested as one of the instigators of the insurrection which broke out at Leghorn, and on his liberation was elected a deputy to the chambers, and became a member of the ministry, and on the flight of the grand duke of Tuscany one of the triumvirate, and soon became dictator. On the re-establishment of the grand duke's government, he was sentenced to perpetual exile. He retired to Bastia, and afterwards was chosen a member of the Turin parliament. He has written a large number of political and poetical works.

Born at Leghorn, 1805.

GUERCHE, LA, goo-aimsh', a town of France, department Ille-et-Vilaine, 24 miles S.E. of Rennes. Manf. Bone black. Pop. 4,600.

GUERCINO, guair-ché-no, "the squint-eyed," (Gian Francesco Barbieri), a Bolognese artist of the 17th century, whose works are to be found in the galleries of Rome, Bologna, Parma, Modena, Perugia, and Paris. The fresco of "Aurora," in the Roman villa of Ludovisi; the "Persian Sybil," and "Saint Petronilla" in the Capitoline Gallery at Rome, are considered to be his masterpieces. His house at Cento, with its paintings and decorations, has been carefully preserved. The church in the same place also contains several works by Guercino.

Born 1590; died 1666.

GUERET, LA, gai-rai', a town of France, department Creuse, 40 miles N.E. of Limoges. There are good public buildings, a large trade in cattle and butter is carried on, and several annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,000.

GUERICKE, OTTO, ger'-ik-e(r), a German philosopher, who was councillor to the elector of Brandenburg, and burgomaster of Magdeburg. He invented the air-pump, and published some treatises on experimental philosophy.

Born 1602; died 1686.

GUERISS, PIERRE NARCISSE, gai-rees', Baron, French historical painter of the classic school. His "Corps de Brutus rapporté à Rome" (1796) was his first production that attracted any considerable notice. He was raised to the dignity of baron in 1829.

Born 1774; died 1833.

GUERNSEY, nern'-se, the second in size of the CHANNEL ISLANDS, in the English Channel, 28 miles from the French and 65 from the English coasts, near the coasts of Brittany and Normandy. It lies in the spacious gulf termed Mount St. Michael's Bay, 15 miles N.W. of Jersey. It is of a triangular form, about 9 miles long and nearly 6 broad, has a coastline of about 30 miles, and is deeply indented with bays. The coast is lofty and abrupt, some of the cliffs being about 270 feet high. The soil, especially in the low part of the island, is rich and fertile, and yields very fine pasture. Dairy products are of excellent quality. Vegetables are in great variety, and of an excellent quality. Timber is neither plentiful nor lofty; and the hedges are chiefly composed of stone, or furze sown on banks of turf. Most kinds of fruit grow in profusion; and so genial is the climate, that myrtles and geraniums flourish in the open ground, and even the orange-tree will fructify, with very little shelter in winter. The fig-tree attains great luxuriance, and sometimes reaches a remarkable size. One of the most useful vegetables is a marine plant, called by the generic name of vraic, which is used both for fuel and manure; but, to prevent the indiscreet destruction of it by the inhabitants, two seasons, Midsummer and Michaelmas, are appointed for its collection. The only town is St. PETER'S, on the south-east coast. There is constant communication by steamers with Southampton, Weymouth, Jersey, and Alderney.

Pop.—32,607. Most of the natives have a greater resemblance to the French than to the English nation. All their domestic utensils and implements of husbandry are after the French fashion, as also their dress, speech, and mode of living. These, however, among the higher ranks, are receiving great modification from their continual intercourse with England.

Government.—Both the judicial and executive authorities are exercised by a convention of several different bodies, collectively designated the Assembly of the States. The judicial language is French. The military government is vested in a lieutenant-governor, who represents the sovereign.

History.—Guernsey, known in the 10th century as Holy Island, from the many monks living there, was, with the other Channel Islands, united to the Crown of England by William the Conqueror, and has ever since remained faithful to its allegiance. The French have made at various times unsuccessful attempts to capture it—the last time in 1780.

GUERNSEY, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 656 square miles. Pop. 27,197. The capital is Cambridge.

GUERRE, MARTIN, gair, a Frenchman, rendered famous by an extraordinary imposture, practised by Arnaud du Thil, his friend. Martin married Bertrande du Rols, and, after living with her about ten years, left her, and entered into the service of Spain. Eight years after, Du Thil presented himself to Bertrande as her husband, and so imposed upon her, by relating various facts, that he lived with her. An uncle of Martin prosecuted Du Thil, and he was condemned to be hanged. Du Thil appealed to the parliament of Toulouse, the members of which were greatly divided, when Martin returned home; on which his treacherous friend was hanged and burned. The case was frequently referred to in the course of the famous Tichborne investigation.

GUESCLIN, BERTRAND DU, ges'-lan, constable of France, and an illustrious warrior. He gained many victories over the English, and defeated the troops of the king of Navarre. He was very strong, and also very unprepossessing. "I am very ugly," he would say, "and shall never be a favourite with the ladies; but, by the enemies of my king, I shall be held in terror." In 1364 he was taken prisoner by the English, his heavy ransom being paid by the pope, the king of France, and other princes. He was again taken prisoner by the Black Prince, and again ransomed. He afterwards greatly distinguished himself against the English, took many towns, and died while assisting at the siege of Châteauneuf de Randon, in Languedoc.

Born 1320; died 1380.

GUEVARA, LUIS VALEZ DE, gwai-va'-ra, a Spanish comic poet, who wrote many comedies, and a celebrated work entitled "El Diabolo Cojuelo," which furnished the foundation for "Le Diable Boiteux" of Le Sage. He was a native of Andalusia.

Born 1570; died 1644.

GUGLIELMI, PIETRO, gool-ye'-al-me, Italian musical composer. His best known operas are "La Clemenza di Tito," "Artaserse," "La Didone," "Enea e Lavinia," "La Morte di Oloferne," "Debora e Sisera," "La Virtuosa di Merzellina," "I due Gemelle," "La Serva Innamorata," "La Pastorella Nobile," "La Bella Pescatrice." His first opera was composed at the age of 28, and was received with enthusiasm. After a very successful career, during which he resided in London for five years, he returned at the age of fifty to Naples. In 1793 he received from Pope Pius VI. the appointment of Maestro di Capella at St. Peter's, which he retained until his death.

Born 1727; died 1804.

GUGUAN, goo'-goo-an, one of the Marianne or Ladrone Islands, in the North Pacific Ocean. There are two peaks, one 2,000 feet high, and an active volcano. Lat. 17° 35′ N. Lon. 145° 53′ E.

GUHRAU, or GORA, gu-ro', a walled town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 42 miles N.W. of Breslau. Manf. Linen, tobacco, and tiles. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,800.

GUIA, ge'-a, a town of Gran Canaria, Canary Islands, 11 miles W. of Palma. Manf. Linen, baize, hats, and wine. Pop. 4,400.

GUIANA, ge-a'-na, an extensive tract of South America, bounded N. by the river Orinoco and the Atlantic; S. by the rivers Negro and Amazon; W. by the Orinoco, and E. by the Atlantic. The length of the territory is 1,090 miles, the greatest breadth 710 miles. It is divided into Brazilian, BRITISH, DUTCH, FRENCH, and Venezuelan GUIANA. Lat. between 8° 40′ N. and 3° 30′ S. Lon. between 50° and 68° W.

GUIANA, BRITISH, a colony on the north-eastern coast of South America, having on the E. Dutch Guiana; W. Venezuela and Brazil; N. and N.E. the Atlantic, and S. Brazil. The coasts are low, and protected from the sea by embankments. This low country, which, except on the banks of the rivers, is the only cultivated part of the colony, extends from 10 to 40 miles inland, beyond which are low sand-hills, and, farther, extensive plains, in some parts of considerable elevation. Mountain ranges traverse the interior, the Pacaraima range, about 25 miles long from N.W. to S.E., having an elevation on the loftiest peak of 7,500 feet, with tremendous precipices and cascades. Other ranges are the Sierra Imataca, parallel to the coast at a distance of from 50 to 60 miles; the Canucu and the Sierra Acarai, the last being the south-eastern boundary of the territory. These ranges do not in any part exceed 4,000 feet in height, and are covered with timber.

Rivers.—The chief are the Essequibo, Demerara, Berbice, and Corentyn, the last forming the boundary between British and Dutch Guiana. The Essequibo has a wide estuary, in which are many well-wooded islands. (See ESSEQUIBO.) The Demerara has a course of 200 miles, navigable for half the distance, and with cataracts and rapids in the upper part. The Berbice is navigable for vessels of moderate size for about 50 miles, and by small vessels for a much greater distance.

Climate.—There are two dry and two wet seasons, each lasting three months. Violent thunder storms are frequent, but hurricanes are unknown. In the dry seasons the interior is healthy.

Pro.—The soil is fertile, and sugar, coffee, bananas, maize, plantains, sweet potatoes, and yams are cultivated. Some of the forest trees attain enormous dimensions. The fruits and flowers and other vegetable productions are of the kind common to tropical America.

Area.—The boundaries are disputed by Brazil and Venezuela; but the district claimed as belonging to British Guiana has an area of 76,000 square miles.

Pop.—252,200, of a varied character, including about 8,000 aboriginal Indians.

Chief Towns.—GEORGE TOWN and AMSTERDAM, NEW.

History.—The first settlement in Guiana was formed by the Dutch in 1580. It was taken by the British in 1781, restored two years afterwards; surrendered to the British in 1796, restored by the peace of Amiens, 1801. It was again taken in 1803, and has since remained in the possession of this country.

GUIANA, DUTCH, or SURINAM, a colony of Holland, situated between British and French Guiana. The great aspect of the country is similar to that of British Guiana, and the productions are of the same kind. It is highly cultivated on the coast and other low lying districts. The chief town is Paramaribo, on the right bank of the Surinam.

Rivers.—The Surinam, which has a course of 300 miles, but is only navigable for a few miles from its mouth; the Saramaca, and the Coppename.

Area.—38,500 square miles.

Pop.—55,530, of whom less than 1,000 are Europeans, and nearly an equal number Chinese. These are about 1,000 aboriginal Indians, and a large number of Maroons, or descendants of runaway slaves.

Lat. 2° to 6° N. Lon. 53° to 57° W.

GUIANA, FRENCH, is separated by the Marony river from Dutch Guiana, on the W., and bounded on the N. by the Atlantic, and S. and E. by the Oyapoch river, and a range of mountains, the Tamucumaque, which separate it from Brazil. There are alluvial lands, partly covered with forests, near the coast, extensive swamps, and in the interior a range of mountains about 1,000 fee high. There are several islands, the most important of which are CAYENNE, and Le Grand and Le Petit Connétable. The productions are similar to those of the other parts of Guiana. There is a rainy season, from November to June. The trade winds make the heat less oppressive than in some of the adjacent regions.

Rivers.—The chief are the Marony and the Oyapoch, both much obstructed by cataracts and rapids. There are nearly 20 other streams, partially navigable.

Area.—27,500 square miles; but the boundary lines are not very clearly defined.

Pop.—20,500.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The colony is divided into two districts, Cayenne and Sinnamary. The chief town is CAYENNE.

Lat.—2° to 6° N. Lon. 51° 30′ to 54° 30′ W.

History.—The first French settlement was in 1604. In 1809 the colony was captured by the English and Portuguese, but restored to France at the peace of 1815.

GUIBERT, JACQUES ANTOINE HYPOLITE, ge-bair', a French writer on military affairs, who served in Germany, and afterwards in Corsica, where he was made a colonel. In 1770, he published his great work, "Essai Général de Tactique." Afterwards he directed his attention to dramatic composition, and produced several tragedies. He also wrote the "Eulogies of Cantinat and L'Hôpital." The French Academy elected him a member, in the room of M. Thomas. Besides the above works, he wrote the "Eulogy of the King of Prussia."

Born at Montauban, 1743; died 1790.

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCESCO, goo-eetch'-e-ar-de'-ne, an eminent Italian historian, descended from a noble family of Florence. He practised in early life as a lawyer, and filled several high offices in his profession. Afterwards he was employed in affairs of state for his native city. From this situation he passed into the service of Leo X. and the two immediate successors of that prince, and was raised by them to the highest civil and military dignities. His "History of Italy," in 4 vols. 4to, is a valuable performance.

Born in Florence, 1482; died at his country seat at Alectri, 1540.

GUICCIARDINI, LUIGI, nephew of the preceding, at first favoured, afterwards persecuted by the duke of Alvi. He wrote, among other works, a "Description of the Low Countries."

Born at Florence, 1523; died at Antwerp, 1589.

GUICOWAR'S, or GAEKWAR'S DOMINIONS, or BARODA, a state of India, under British protection, and subordinate to the Bombay presidency. It consists of the greater part of the peninsula, and some other portions of the province of GUJERAT. It is one of the richest parts of India, with a long line of coast.

Rivers.—The Sabermutty, Mhye, and Nerbudda, flowing into the Gulf of Cambay.

Prod.—Cotton, sugar, indigo, tobacco, oil, and flax.

Manf.—Cotton fabrics, in connection with which the greater part of the Hindoo population are employed.

Area.—4,400 square miles; but including the dominions of some tributary chiefs, 25,000 square miles additional.

Pop.—Of Baroda district, 326,000, chiefly Hindoos; including the subsidiary territory, 2,185,000.

Chief Towns.—BARODA, the capital, Joonaghur, Poorbunder, and Jafferabad.

History.—This was one of the Mahratta states; but in 1780 a treaty was made with the British, and in 1829 the annual tribute was fixed at £80,000 (eight lacs of rupees). There is a British resident at the court.

GUIDIZZOLO, ge'-dets-o-lo, a town of northern Italy, 15 miles N.W. of Mantua. Manf. Silk. Pop. 2,300.

GUIDO, CARLO ALESSANDRO, ge'-do, an Italian poet of the seventeenth century. His earliest productions attracted the notice of the duke of Pavia, under whose patronage he left his native city and took up his residence at the Farnese palace in Rome. His pastoral drama "Endimione" was composed at the suggestion of and conjointly with Christina, queen of Sweden. As a lyrical poet Guido is highly esteemed.

Born in Pavia, 1650; died in Rome 1717.

GUIDO, ARETINO, or D'AREZZO, an Italian musician, who invented the lines and spaces, or staff, reformed the scale, and suggested the mode of notation.

Lived in the 11th century.

GUIDO, RENI, an illustrious Italian painter, whose father was a musician, and who intended him for the same profession; but Reni exhibiting a marked talent for painting, was placed under Dennis Calvert, a Flemish master. He afterwards studied under the Caracci, and soon rose to higher fame than any of his contemporaries. Honours were heaped upon him by several crowned heads, and riches flowed upon him in abundance. He was unfortunate only in an immoderate love of gaming, which reduced him to such distress, that a languishing disease ensued, of which he died. His heads are beautiful, and considered by many to equal those of Rafaelle. His draperies are also much admired. His ideal of female beauty was founded on the antique, as he took the "Venus de' Medici" and the "Daughters of Niobe" for his standard. The greatest works of Guido are the "Penitence of St. Peter after denying Christ," in the Zampieri palace, at Bologna "The Crucifixion of St. Peter," in the Vatican; "The Crucifixion," in the church of St. Lorenzo, Rome; and the famous portrait of "Beatrice Cenci," also in Rome; "The Amora," in the Rospiglioli palace, is a fresco of world-wide fame.

Born at Bologna, 1575; died 1642.

GUIDOTTI, PAUL, ge-dot'-te, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, who made wings with which he imagined he could fly; but in making the attempt at Lucca, he fell, and received great injury.

Born at Lucca, 1569; died, 1629.

GUIENNE, or GUYENNE, ge-en', an old province in the south-west of France, to the north of Gascony, and, in general, separated from it by the great river Garonne. The modern division of this extensive tract is into the following departments; viz., Gironde, Lot-et-Garonne, Dordogne, Lot, and Aveyron. This country was possessed by the English for three centuries, and was an independent duchy from 1453 to 1472, when it was united to France by Charles VII.

GUIGNES, JOSEPH DE, gween, a learned French writer, who studied the Oriental languages under Stephen Fourmont, and was appointed interpreter to the king in 1741, and member of the Academy of Belles-Lettres in 1753. He particularly applied himself to the study of the Chinese characters, and had, for 35 years, a principal interest in the "Journal des Savans." The Revolution reduced him to poverty. He wrote the life of Fourmont, "General History of the Huns, Turks, Moguls, and Tartars;" Memoir proving that the Chinese were an Egyptian colony; "Le Chan-King;" "The Military Art of the Chinese;" "Historical Essay upon the Oriental and Greek Typography;" "Principles of Typographical Composition;" "Memoirs in the Academy of Inscriptions," &c.

Born at Pontoise, 1721; died at Paris, 1800.

GUIJAR, or GUIXAR, a lake 60 miles in circumference, in the N.W. of the state of San Salvador, Central America. It encloses a large island, which contains the ruins of what must have been a large town.

GUILDFORD, gil'-ford, a market-town, and parliamentary and municipal borough, in the county of Surrey (of which it is the capital), on the Wey, which is here navigable for barges from the Thames,

29 miles S.W. of London. Guildford is one of the best inland towns of its size in the kingdom, large, clean, and well built; consisting chiefly of one spacious street, which, running along the declivity of a considerable chalk-hill, presents a very striking appearance. Guildford is mentioned by name in the will of Alfred, and has been the residence of several English monarchs. It contains Abbot's Hospital, and various other public buildings; but is chiefly noted for its ruined castle, situate about 300 yards southward of the High Street, and supposed to have been a palace of several early Anglo-Saxon kings. The other principal buildings are a free grammar-school, founded by Edward VI., a town hall, public hall, and corn-market house, a gaol, a theatre, the church of the Holy Trinity, with several memorable monuments; St. Mary's, an interesting specimen of the Transition style, and one of the most remarkable churches in the county—it was restored in 1863; and several meeting-houses for dissenters of different denominations. A county-hall and assize-court was erected in 1862, and a county hospital in 1863—66. There is a considerable trade in corn, malt, and coals. Pop. 10,858.—A station on the London and South-Western and South-Eastern railways.

GUILDFORD, a town of West Australia, on the Swan river, 9 miles S.E. of Perth.

GUILFORD, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 23,583. The capital is Greensborough.

GUIMARAENS, ge'-ma-ra-ains, an ancient and picturesque inland town of Portugal, on the Ave, 26 miles N.E. of Oporto. The streets are wide and clean, and the houses neat. It contains numerous interesting buildings of early date, and in the vicinity there are hot-springs, which were known to, and used by the Romans. Manf. Damask linen for table-cloths, paper, leather, confectionary, and cutlery. Pop. 6,000.

GUIMAR, ge-mar', a town of Teneriffe, Canary Islands, 20 miles S.W. of Santa Cruz. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics. Pop. 2,700.

GUIMARAS, ge-ma'-ras, an island of the Indian archipelago, one of the Philippines. Area, 220 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

GUINEA, gin'-e, a geographical division of Western Africa. The portion lying south of the Equator is known as Lower Guinea, and is in the nominal possession of the Portuguese, who planted a colony here in 1481. The chief states of Lower Guinea are LOANGO, CONGO, ANGOLA, and BENGUELA. Upper Guinea includes so much of the country as lies N. of the equatorial line, and is divided into GRAIN COAST, IVORY COAST, GOLD COAST, and SLAVE COAST. Numerous European settlements or factories were formerly established in Upper Guinea, chiefly, however, to secure the slave trade, and their commercial importance for the most part ceased in the suppression of the traffic. Sierra Leone and Gambia are settlements formed by Great Britain for the purpose of providing for the liberated cargoes of negroes; the American settlements of Liberia and Monrovia were also established for a similar object, and there are numerous missionary stations on the coast. The principal rivers of Guinea are the Senegal, the Gambia, the Niger, the Old Calabar, the Congo, and the Coanza. It produces every kind of rich tropical fruits, gums, hardwoods, grain, gold, ivory, wax, &c. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 10° 20′ N. and 15° 41′ S. Lon. 11° 40′ E. and 16° 33′ W.

GUINEA, GULF OF, is formed by the Atlantic Ocean on the coasts of North Guinea, between Lat. 6° 20′ and 1° S. Lon. 7° 30′ W. and 10° E.

GUINEA, NEW. (See PAPUA.)

GUINEGATE, geen'-gate, a village near Tourneai, in the province of Hainault, Belgium, the scene of the celebrated "Battle of the Spurs," fought August 16, 1513, when the English troops, assisted by the forces of the emperor Maximilian, defeated the French, who were commanded by the duc de Longueville. The French knights were said to have made a better use of their spurs than their swords; hence the name given to the battle.

GUINGAMP, geen-gahn(g), a town of France, department Côtes-du-Nord, formerly the capital of the duchy of Penthièvre. It is situated in an extensive plain, near the Trieux, 20 miles W. of St. Brieuc, in the department of Côtes-du-Nord. Part of the walls by which it was formerly surrounded still remain; the site of the castle of the dukes of Penthièvre is now planted with trees, and serves for a promenade. There is a college, are several tanneries, and a thread factory. Manf. Linen, threads, hats, and leather. Pop. 6,600.

GUIPUZCOA, gee'-poos-ko-a, one of the Basque provinces of Spain, one of the three into which the ancient province of the same name was divided. It is bordered on the N. by the Bay of Biscay, and the Bidasoa river separates it from France on the N.E. The coast is bold and rocky, with several harbours. The surface of the province is mountainous, being traversed by branches of the Cantabrian mountains, a continuation of the Pyrenees. Its principal source of wealth is its iron-mines. The borders of this province have been long defended by numerous fortresses, and, from time to time, they have been the scene of many conflicts.

Rivers.—The Deva, Urola, Oria, and other streams, none of them navigable, falling into the Bay of Biscay.
Area.—728 square miles.
Pop.—174,929.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—The province is divided into four districts, Azpeitia, San Sebastian, Tolosa, and Vergara. The capital is TOLOSA.

GUISBOROUGH, giz'-bur-o, a town of England, in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, 50 miles from York. The earliest alum-works in England were established here about 1600. Pop. 6,616.

GUISCARD, ROBERT, gees'-kar, duke of Apulia and Calabria, a famous Norman knight, and son of Tancred de Hauteville, one of the warriors who conquered Naples from the Saracens, and acquired the dukedom of Apulia and Calabria.
Born 1015; died in the island of Corfu, 1085.

GUISCHARD, CHARLES GOTTLIEB, ge'-shar, a Prussian officer, who fought with great reputation in the service of the stadtholder, and afterwards in that of Frederick II. of Prussia, who gave him the name of Quintus Icilius, and a regiment. His works are "Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et les Romains," 4to; "Mémoires Critiques et Historiques sur plusieurs Points d'Antiquités Militaires," 4 vols. 8vo.
Born at Magdeburg, 1742; died 1775.

GUISE, CLAUDE DE LORRAINE, duke of gees, was the fifth son of René II., duke of Lorraine. He settled in France, where he married Antoinette de Bourbon, a princess of the blood, in 1513. At the battle of Marignan, when he was but 22 years of age, he received more than twenty wounds.
Born 1496; died 1550.

GUISE, FRANCIS DE LORRAINE, duke of, eldest son of the above, was a man of great talents and valour, and, during the greater part of his life, enjoyed almost unbounded power in France. With him began the famous factions of Condé and Guise. The duke of Guise was at the head of the Catholic party, and a great zealot. Killed by a pistol shot, by a Protestant gentleman, named Poltrot de Méré.

Born 1519; died 1593.

GUISE, HENRI, duke of, eldest son of the preceding, was a good soldier, but of a turbulent temper, and formed the association called the League, on the pretence of defending the Catholic religion, and the liberty of the state. With its aid, the duke of Guise long controlled Henry III., and even was in open rebellion against him. On the celebrated day of the barricades, the king, having escaped from the duke to Blois, convened the states there, where Guise was assassinated.

Born 1550; died 1588.

GUISE, CHARLES, duke of, eldest son of the above. On his father's death, he was shut up in the castle of Tours, from which he escaped in 1591. Proceeding to Paris, he was received with the greatest joy by the partisans of a league which had been formed against Henry IV. He afterwards became governor of Provence; but, under the reign of Louis XIII., he was forced to leave France, on account of the jealousy of Cardinal Richelieu. He went into Tuscany, where he died.

Born 1571; died 1640.

GUISE, HENRI II., son of the above, was brought up to the church, which, on the death of his father, he quitted, and assumed the title of duke of Guise. He conspired against Cardinal Richelieu, and, in 1647, put himself at the head of the revolted Neapolitans, but was taken prisoner by the Spaniards. On being set free he returned to France, where he died, without issue. His younger brother, Louis, left a son, Louis Joseph, of Lorraine, duke of Guise, who died in 1671, leaving an infant son, who died in 1675, and in whom the line of the Guises became extinct.

Born 1614; died 1664.

GUISE, a town of France, department Aisne, on the left bank of the Oise, 12 miles N.W. of Vervins. It is strongly fortified, and there are the remains of an old castle. Manf. Linen, leather, oil, and cotton. Eight annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,700.

GUIZOT, FRANÇOIS-PIERRE GUILLAUME, ge'-zo, French historian and statesman, was the son of an advocate, executed in 1794. Young Guizot and another brother were taken by their mother to Geneva, where they were educated in the Gymnasium, and where François acquired a knowledge of the Latin, Greek, English, German, and Italian languages. In 1805 he went to Paris for the purpose of studying law, but entered as tutor the family of the Swiss ambassador, and, through his means, was introduced to many distinguished literary men. In 1809 he published his "Dictionary of Synonymes," which was succeeded by "Lives of the Poets," "Gibbon's Roman Empire," and other works. In 1812 he became assistant professor of history in the Faculty of Letters, and, shortly afterwards, was appointed professor of modern history. In the same year he married Mademoiselle Pauline de Meulin, a lady who was considerably older than himself, and who supported herself and family by the ability of her pen. In 1814, under Louis XVIII., he became secretary-general; but, on the return of Napoleon I. from Elba, he was driven from his office, and once more resumed his duties as professor of history. On the overthrow of the empire, he became secretary-general to the minister of justice, adopting the principles of a constitutional royalist. He now produced several political and educational pamphlets, and in 1818 was chosen a counsellor of state. In 1820 he was expelled from office, and once more entered the field as a pamphleteer. He also gave lectures at the Sorbonne; but the freedom of his expressions caused them to be suppressed. Between 1822 and 1827 he produced his "History of the English Revolution," "Essays on the History of France," and his "Historical Essays on Shakspeare." He also established the "French Review," and assisted in founding the society called "Assist thyself, and Heaven will assist thee," designed to secure the freedom of elections. In 1828 he was permitted to resume his lectures at the Sorbonne, and, in the same year, married the niece of his first wife, who recommended the union on her death-bed. In the following year he was reappointed a counsellor of state, and became one of the editors of the "Journal des Débats," and of "Le Temps." In 1830 he was elected a member for the Chamber of Deputies, and assisted in accomplishing the revolution which expelled Charles X. from his throne. He now became successively minister of public instruction and minister of the interior; but, in the same year, was driven from office. In 1832 he returned to office, as minister of public instruction, under the administration of marshal Soult, and continued to hold his place till 1836, when he was appointed on an embassy to England. Here he concluded the treaty of 1840, which filled France with dissatisfaction. In that year, however, he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, which he held till the abdication of Louis-Philippe, in 1848. At that time he fled from France in the disguise of a workman, but returned in the following year, and again entered the political arena. He now became active with his pen, and produced many more works; among which we may notice his "History of Civilization," "History of Oliver Cromwell," "History of Richard Cromwell and the Restoration of Charles II.," "Shakspeare and his Times," and "Studies of the Fine Arts in General," "Biographical and Literary Miscellanies," "Political and Historical Miscellanies." At the time of his death he was engaged in writing a "History of France."

Born at Nimes, in the department Gard, 1787; died 1874.

GUJERAT. (See GUZERAT.)

GULDBRANDSDEL, goold'-brands-del, a valley of Norway, famous for beautiful scenery. It commences at the lake of Miösen, and continues in a north-westerly direction to the Dovrefjeld mountain, and is about 170 miles long, and from 2 to 7 miles wide. The cascades of the Lougen, which traverses the valley, are very picturesque.

GULF STREAM, an important ocean current, flowing in a northerly direction from the Gulf of Mexico between the coast of Florida and Cuba and the Bahama Islands. Near Newfoundland it divides into two currents, one of which takes a south-easterly course across the Atlantic towards the northern coast of Africa, and the other passes by the British Islands and Norway, and is perceptible as far north as Nova Zembla. The high temperature of the water produces a marked effect on the climate of the places it passes, for which reason parts of northern Europe are habitable, while in North America, in corresponding latitudes, there is an Arctic climate.

GULGULA, gul-goo'-la, an ancient ruined city of Afghanistan, on the right bank of the Koondooz, in the valley of Bamian. The ruins cover a large space on and around a conical hill. Lat. 34° 49′ N. Lon. 67° 46′ E.

GUMBINNEN, goom-bin'-nen, a town of Prussia, on both sides of the Pissa, an affluent of the Pregel, 68 miles E. of Königsberg. It is neatly built, and has a gymnasium, schools of architecture, a public library, and two hospitals. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Three annual fairs are held. The prosperity of this town is owing to the reception of the Protestants, especially of Salzburg, driven by persecution from their homes. Pop. of the town, 10,000; of district of same name, 778,391.

GUMBUT, gum'-but, a town of Scinde, 10 miles E. of the Indus. Manf. Cotton, but the product is small, the mode of manufacture being very primitive. Pop. 3,001.

GUMMEL, gum'-mel, a town of Bornou, Central Africa, formerly the seat of considerable trade, with a large weekly market, and 10,000 inhabitants, but now much reduced in importance. Lat. 12° 30′ N. Lon. 9° 21′ E.

GUMRI, or ALEXANDRAPOL, goom'-re, a frontier and strongly fortified town of Russian Armenia, 60 miles N.W. of Erivan. The height of this place is nearly 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, and the cold is sometimes so intense that men are found frozen to death in the fields. Pop. 17,500.

GUMTI, or GOOMTEE, goom'-te, a tributary of the Ganges, which takes its rise in a small lake in lat. 28° 35′ N.; lon. 80° 10′ E., and, after a tortuous course, enters the Ganges in lat. 25° 29′ N.; lon. 83° 15′ E. It is navigable for inland craft up to Lucknow. At Jaunpore it is spanned by a bridge of 16 arches.

GUNABAD, or GOONABAD, goon-a-bad', a town of Persia, province of Khorasan. It stands in the midst of orchards, and is famous for the growth of pomegranates. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 34° 20′ N. Lon. 59° 20′ E.

GUNDAMUK, goon-da-mook', a village of Afghanistan, 60 miles N.E. of Cabool. Here the remnant of the British force, consisting of 100 soldiers and 300 camp-followers, were, whilst retreating from Cabool, massacred in 1842, only one man escaping.

GUNDELFINGEN, goon'-del-fin-gen, a town of Bavaria, province of Suabia, on the left bank of the Brenz, 33 miles N.W. of Augsburg. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,750.

GUNDICOTA, goon'-de-ko'-ta, a town and fortress of India, presidency of Madras. There are the remains of a temple, once a place of great resort.

GUNDLING, NICHOLAS JEROM, goond'-ling, a German writer on jurisprudence, history, and politics, who was successively professor of philosophy, eloquence, and civil law at Halle.

Born at Nuremberg, 1671; died at Halle, 1729.

GUNDUK, goon-dook', a river of Hindostan, which, after a course of 400 miles, falls into the Ganges opposite Patna.

GUNDULITSCH, IWAN, goon'-doo-litch, a celebrated Serbian poet of the sixteenth century, was the son of Gundulitsch the historian. He received his education under the Jesuits, and devoted himself to jurisprudence with such success that, whilst still a young man, he was appointed to the highest offices in the republic of Ragusa. The bicentenary of his death was celebrated in 1838. He was the earliest dramatist of the Slavic race. Amongst his dramas are "Ariadne," "The Rape of Proserpina," "Galatea," "Diana," "Armida," "The Sacrifice of Love," "Ceres," "Cleopatra," "Adonis," and "The Coral." His greatest work is an epic poem, entitled "The Osmanli," which celebrates the deeds of Osman II., and those of the Poles and their king Wladislaw IV., in the campaign of 1621. His poems also include a "Hymn on the Greatness of God," and the "Tears of an Afflicted Son," with several translations from the Italian.

Born at Ragusa, 1588; died 1638.

GUNDWANA, an ancient district of India.

GUNNERUS, JOHN ERNEST, goon'-ne-roos, a Norwegian divine, who was made bishop of Drontheim in 1758, where he founded the Royal Norwegian Society, principally for the encouragement of the study of natural history. Linnæus gave the name of Gunnera to a plant in his vegetable system. He published "Flora Norwegiæ," &c.

Born at Christiana, 1718; died at Christiansund, 1773.

GUNS, or KOESZEGH, goons, a town of Hungary, 58 miles S.E. of Vienna. The old town is surrounded by a wall, and there is a large suburb. There are two Roman catholic and one protestant church, an old castle, monastery, and various schools. Manf. Silk and woollens. There is a large trade in fruit, especially cherries; and six annual fairs are held. This town successfully resisted an attack of the Turks under Solyman, in 1532. Pop. 7,000.

GUNTER, EDMUND, gun'-ter, an English mathematician, whose genius led him to the study of mathematics, and he became professor of astronomy in Gresham College. He invented a portable quadrant, which goes by his name, and a scale used by navigators. He also observed the variation of the magnetic needle. He published "Canon Triangulorum, sive Tabulæ Sinuum Artificialum," &c.

Born in Herefordshire, 1581; died in Oxford, 1626.

GUNTERSBLUM, goon'-ters-bloom, a town of the grand duchy of Hesse Darmstadt, on a small affluent of the Rhine, 11 miles N. of Worms. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,600.

GUNTOOR, or GUNTUR, goon-toor', a maritime district of British India, on the western side of the Bay of Bengal, called the Northern Circars. It is mountainous in the west, but, in other parts, sandy and low. Pro. Dry grains, cotton, sugar, and paddy. Area. 4,950 square miles. Pop. 570,000.

GUNTOOR, the capital of the above district, and station of the civil establishment. Lat. 16° 20′ N. Lon. 80° 30′ E. Pop. 18,033.

GUNZBURG, goonz'-burg, a town of Bavaria, province of Suabia, at the confluence of the Günz with the Danube, 30 miles N.W. of Augsburg. There is a bridge over each river. The town is walled, has an ancient castle and five churches. Manf. Carriages. A good shipping trade is carried on. Pop. 3,200.

GUNZENHAUSEN, goen'-zen-hou-zen, a town of Bavaria, province of Middle Franconia, on the Altmühl, 28 miles S.W. of Nürnberg. It is walled, has a castle and three churches. Manf. Red leather and stoneware. Pop. 2,600.—The remains of a Roman camp are near the town.

GURGAON, goor-ga-on', a district of the Punjaub, India, in the commissionership of Delhi.

Lat. 27° 40′ to 28° 30′ N. Lon. 76° 21′ to 77° 35′ E. It contains 1,981 square miles. Pop. 641,848.

Tibet. Lat. 30° 2′ to 31° 20′ N., and lon. 77° 55′ to 79° 20′ E. It is the cradle of the Jumna and the Ganges, and contains the peculiarly sacred localities of Jumnotri Devaprayaga and Gangotri, which are visited by crowds of pilgrims. Area, 5,500 square miles. Pop. 345,629, chiefly Hindoos.

GURIEL, or GURIA, goo'-re-el, a province of Asia, at the east extremity of the Black Sea. It is shared between the Russian and Turkish dominions. It is fertile, producing maize, millet, honey, tobacco, cotton, silk, and wine. Pop. 37,000, mostly Georgians.

GURNEY, SIR GOLDSWORTHY, gur'-ne, the inventor of the oxyhydrogen lime-light, was the son of John Gurney, of Trevorgus, in Cornwall. He was educated for the medical profession, but will be best remembered in connection with the invention mentioned above, and for his strenuous endeavours to adapt steam to ordinary highway traffic. He was employed for many years to light and ventilate the houses of parliament.

Born 1793; died 1875.

GURWOOD, JOHN, gur'-wood, Colonel, entered the army in 1808, and served in the Peninsular war under the duke of Wellington. At the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo, in 1812, he volunteered to lead the forlorn hope, and took general Barrie, the governor, prisoner, whom he carried to the duke of Wellington. "Did you take him?" asked the duke. "Yes," was the reply. "Then it is to you that the sword of the general should belong," said the duke, at the same time handing to Gurwood Barrie's sword. This weapon he wore ever afterwards, and he became a distinguished officer. About 1830 he became private secretary to the duke of Wellington, and, in 1834, commenced issuing "The Despatches of Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, K.G., during his various campaigns in India, Denmark, Portugal, Spain, the Low Countries, and France, from 1799 to 1818, compiled from Official and Authentic Documents by Lieutenant-Colonel Gurwood." This work was a decided success, notwithstanding that it extended to thirteen volumes. In 1841, Gurwood was made a full colonel, and subsequently became deputy-governor of the Tower. He died by his own hand in a fit of insanity, arising from a wound in his head, received at Ciudad Rodrigo.

Born 1790; died 1845.

GUSSING, or NEMETH UJVAR, goos'-sing, a walled town of Hungary, on the Czenitze. There are an old castle with a lofty tower, a Roman catholic church, and a Franciscan monastery. An annual fair is held. Pop. 3,000.

GUSTAVIA, the chief town of St. Bartholomew, a small island in the West Indies, belonging to Sweden. It is situated on the S.W. coast. There is a good harbour. Pop. 1,000.

GUSTAVUS I., gus-ta'-vus, king of Sweden, known by the name of GUSTAVUS VASA, was the son of Eric Vasa, duke of Gripsholm, who was descended from the ancient kings of Sweden, and who was beheaded by the Danish tyrant, Christian II. This sovereign also got Gustavus into his hands, in the war in which he reduced Sweden, and kept him, several years, a prisoner at Copenhagen. At length he made his escape, and, having prevailed on the Dalecarlians to throw off the Danish yoke, in May, 1521, he found himself at the head of 15,000 men. After various fortunes, he recovered the whole of Sweden from the tyranny of Christian. In 1523 he was crowned king of Sweden, and the crown made hereditary in his family. Lutheranism was established as the national religion of Sweden in his reign. His name is still revered by the Swedes.

Born at Ockestadt, near Stockholm, 1496; died in 1560.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, king of Sweden, ascended the throne in 1611, when only in his seventeenth year. Notwithstanding his youth, he displayed great discernment in the choice of able ministers, and distinguished himself in the field, in a war with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. He subsequently rendered his name celebrated, by his illustrious achievements in the war he carried on at the head of the German Protestants against the house of Austria. He penetrated from the Vistula to the Danube, and twice defeated the celebrated Tilly. He was a patron of the sciences, enriching the university of Upsal, founding a royal academy at Abo, and a university at Dort, in Livonia. This great prince fell in the battle of Lutzen, in 1632. Gustavus, before engaging in the battle sang a hymn of Luther's, and was followed in chorus by the whole of his troops. After this, he led the attack in person, and slew the foremost of the enemy with a lance; thus giving promise of the victory which his army obtained, although at an immense sacrifice, over the forces of Wallenstein.

Born at Stockholm, 1594; died 1632.

GUSTAVUS (ADOLPHUS) III., king of Sweden, was the son of Adolphus Frederick and Louisa Ulrica, sister of Frederick II., king of Prussia. He was educated under Count Tessin, whose letters to his royal pupil are well known. He succeeded his father in 1771, at which time a corrupt senate, composed of two aristocratic factions called the Hats and Caps, possessed the government, and held the king as a mere cipher. Gustavus, in the following year, effected a revolution without bloodshed, and established a new constitution. He abolished the practice of torture, and introduced other good regulations in the administration of justice. He also formed a college of commerce, reformed his army and navy, caused a new translation to be made of the Bible, and greatly encouraged agriculture, arts, and literature. In 1777 he paid a visit to the empress of Russia, and was entertained in a magnificent manner. In 1783 he made a tour for his health to France and Italy, and was absent ten months. He afterwards entered into a war with Russia and Denmark. He headed his army himself, and stormed the defences of Fredericksham, where he took and destroyed a great number of vessels. Encouraged by this success, he made an attack on the Russian squadron and arsenal of Revel, but was obliged to retire. He was equally unfortunate in an attempt on Wiborg; but, on July 9, 1790, the Swedish fleet, commanded by the king, gained a victory over the Russians, who lost 45 vessels and a great number of men. This was followed by an immediate peace. On the breaking out of the French revolution, a coalition was formed between the northern powers and Spain, by which it was agreed that Gustavus should march against France at the head of a considerable army; but while preparations were making, he was shot at a masquerade, by Ankarström, a disbanded officer of the army. (See ANKARSTRÖM.) Gustavus wrote some plays, and political pieces of merit.

Born 1746; died 1792.

GUSTAVUS (ADOLPHUS) IV., king of Sweden, after the assassination of his father, ascended the throne in 1792. His reign was remarkable for the caprice with which he was permitted to govern, for several years, a brave people. His hatred to Napoleon I. was of the most intense description, and his avowed attachment to the principles of legitimacy led him to endeavour to restore the Bourbon dynasty to the crown of France. In 1809 he was arrested as a traitor in the name of the nation, and forced to abdicate his crown in favour of Duke Charles of Sudermania, who ascended the vacant throne as Charles XIII. After abdicating his throne, he retired to St. Gall, where he mostly lived afterwards, supporting himself by his writings as an author and his pension as a colonel. He refused all assistance from his family and the people over whom he had reigned.

Born 1778; died at St. Gall, Switzerland, 1837.

GUSTROW, goos'-tro, a town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, on the left bank of the Nebel, 35 miles from Schwerin. It is inclosed by walls, and contains a fine cathedral, an ancient palace, and other good public buildings. Manf. Tobacco, candles, soap, leather, iron, and machinery. Several large fairs are held annually. Pop. 10,500.

GUTERSLOH, goo'-ters-lo, a village of Prussia, near the Dalke, 35 miles S.W. of Minden. A large trade is carried on in yarn, hams, and the rye-bread known as "pumpernickel." Three important annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,600.

GUTHRIE, THOMAS, D.D., guth'-re, an eminent Scottish clergyman, distinguished for his eloquence and philanthropy, was the son of a merchant and banker at Brechin, Forfarshire. Having completed his education at the University of Edinburgh, he was licensed as a preacher by the presbytery of his native place in 1825, after which he visited Paris, where he spent six months in extending his acquaintance with the natural sciences, and on his return conducted a bank agency in Brechin. In 1830 he was appointed minister at Arbirlot, and in 1837 became one of the ministers of Old Greyfriars parish in Edinburgh, where, in consequence of his eloquence and untiring labours amongst the poor, he achieved great popularity. Six years later he joined the Free Church, of which body he continued an active and influential member until his death, and served as Moderator in the General Assembly in 1862. He retired from his regular ministrations in 1864. As an eloquent advocate of Ragged Schools, the Temperance reform, and other measures for the welfare of the degraded and poverty-stricken classes of the community he will be long remembered. His principal published works are: "The Gospel in Ezekiel: a series of discourses;" "The Way to Life," a volume of sermons; "A Plea for Drunkards and against Drunkenness," a pamphlet; two pamphlets entitled "A Plea for Ragged Schools," "Seed-time, Harvest of Ragged Schools," and "The City: its Sins and Sorrows." For some years before his death he edited the "Sunday Magazine."

Born at Brechin, 1803; died 1873.

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, and educated at Aberdeen. His most esteemed work is his geographical grammar. He also wrote a "History of Scotland," "A History of the Peerage," "The Friends," a novel; "Remarks on English Tragedy," and several other works.

Born 1708; died 1770.

GUTS MUTHS, JOHANNES CHRISTOPHER FRIEDRICH, a German instructor of youth, who devoted himself especially to the elaboration of gymnastics as a branch of education. In 1793 he published his "Gymnastik für die jugend," which is regarded as a classic on the subject of which it treats. He also wrote on geography.

Born at Quedlingburg in Prussian Saxony, 1759; died 1839.

GUTTENBURG, or GUTENBERG, JOHANNES, goot'-ten-bairg, one of those to whom the invention of the art of printing is attributed, was descended of a noble German family. If he did not invent printing, it is probable he was the first who conceived the idea of printing a book, which he executed, first with blocks of wood engraved, and afterwards with separate letters cut in wood. He took for a partner John Faust, from whom he separated, and then printed for himself. (See FAUST and COSTER.) There are few particulars of his life and habits, further than that he seems to have been frequently in litigation, and to have been a man of considerable ingenuity. In 1837 a splendid monument in bronze was erected to his memory in Mentz, and the Guttenburg Society, with which the writers of the Rhenish provinces are connected, hold an annual meeting in Mentz, to celebrate his great discovery, and in honour of his memory.

Born at Mentz, 1400; died there, 1468.

GUTZLAFF, KARL, goots'-laf, missionary, a native of Pomerania, was received (at the age of 18) as a student in the Missionary Institution at Berlin, at the instance of the king of Prussia, to whom he had presented a poem embodying his earnest desire to devote himself to labours amongst the heathen. He was subsequently removed to the Dutch Missionary Society at Rotterdam, and ultimately sent to Sumatra. Being detained at Java, he commenced the study of the Chinese language, and two years later terminated his connection with the Dutch Society for the purpose of undertaking mission work in China. In 1828 he accompanied the English missionary, Tomlin, to Siam, and settled with him at Bankok for the purpose of preaching the Gospel, and acquiring a better knowledge of the Siamese and Chinese languages. He subsequently went to China, and took up his residence at Macao, where he formed an intimate friendship with Robert Morrison, and joined Medhurst and two other friends in preparing a new translation of the Bible; founded, with the assistance of Morrison, a society for the diffusion of useful knowledge in China; and published a monthly magazine in Chinese, besides engaging in active evangelistic labours. On the death of the elder Morrison, he received the appointment of interpreter to the British supervisional government in China; and in this capacity attempted, unsuccessfully, to penetrate into the interior of the province of Fe-kien. Finding himself interrupted in his labours, in consequence of the prohibition by the Chinese government of the printing and circulation of Christian books among the inhabitants of Canton, Gutzlaff joined the British forces, to whom his thorough acquaintance with the Chinese enabled him to render efficient service, and whom he assisted in the negotiations for peace, in 1842. In 1849 he returned to Europe, and visited England, Germany, and other countries, to advocate the claims of a Chinese Society, which he had founded for the purpose of diffusing the Gospel in the interior of the country by the agency of native Christians. He returned to China in 1851, landing at Hong Kong, and died there the same year. Gutzlaff was the author of various works, amongst them a "Journal of Three Voyages along the Coast of China, in 1831, 1832, and 1833, with Notice of Siam, Corea, and the Loo-Choo Islands," "A History of the Chinese," and "The Life of Taokuang."

Born at Pyritz, Pomerania, 1803; died at Hong Kong, 1851.

GUY, THOMAS, gi, the humane and charitable founder of Guy's Hospital, was the son of Thomas Guy, lighterman and coal-dealer in Horseleydown, Southwark. He was bred a bookseller, and began trade with only £200. The bulk of his fortune, however, was made by purchasing seamen's tickets, during Queen Anne's wars, and by speculations in South-Sea stock, in the memorable year 1720. Besides the well-known hospital, he erected an almshouse at Tamworth.

Born 1643; died 1724, worth £300,000.

GUYARD DE BERVILLE, gé-yar, a French writer, who, after a life of extreme distress, died in the prison of the Bicêtre, at the age of 73. He wrote the lives of Bertrand du Guesclin and of the Chevalier Bayard.

Born 1697; died 1769.

GUYON, JEANNE BOUVIER DE LA MOTHE, ge-yawng, a famous enthusiast, who, at 16, married, and became a widow at the age of 28. She afterwards devoted herself to religious meditation, and imbibed all the mystical conceits of Quietism, till she worked herself up into the belief that she was the pregnant woman in the Apocalypse, and the destined foundress of a new church. Having gained many followers, she was confined in a convent; but was released, at the instance of Madame de Maintenon. After this, she influenced the illustrious Fenelon; but was treated with great severity by Bossuet of Meaux, by whose means she was sent to the Bastille, whence she was liberated in 1702. Her works are numerous, and still admired by those who are fond of mysticism.

Born at Montargis, 1648; died at Blois, 1717.

GUYON, RICHARD DEBAUFRE, guy'-on, a distinguished English general in the Hungarian service. At an early age he fought against Dom Miguel in Portugal, and in 1832 entered the Austrian service. In 1848 he offered his services to the national government of Hungary, and became major of the Honveds, or national guards of Hungary, and at the battle of Schwechat, fought near Vienna, he was, for his gallantry, made a colonel on the field. Subsequently, at Debreczin, he was raised to the rank of general. He continued to fight in the cause of Hungary, against the Austrians, throughout the war of 1848-49; but when Georgei made an unconditional surrender, he, with Bem, Dembinski, and Kmety, took refuge in Turkey. Here he remained, protected by the sultan, and accepted service under his government. He rose to the rank of lieutenant-general on the staff, and received the title of Kourschid Pasha. In 1853 he was sent to Damascus, and thence proceeded to Kars, where he organised the army, and constructed the defences which subsequently formed a basis for the operations of General Williams in that place.

Born near Bath, 1813; died at Constantinople, 1856.

GUYTON, gé-tŏn, French chemist. He was bred to the bar, and was for a time advocate-general to the parliament of Dijon, but devoted considerable attention to the study of natural philosophy, especially chemistry, articles relating to which he contributed to the "Encyclopédie Methodique." He was one of the most violent of the revolutionists, was successively a member of the Legislative Assembly, the Convention, the Committee of Public Safety, and the Council of Five Hundred. Napoleon made him a baron of the empire, and a member of the legion of honour, and he was appointed director of the Polytechnic School, and administrator of the Mint. He was one of the editors of the "Annals of Chemistry," and wrote several works on the science.

Born at Dijon, 1737; died 1816.

GUZERAT, or GUJERAT, goo-je-rat', a large district of India, comprising several petty states, but chiefly belonging to the Guicowar. (See GUICOWAR'S DOMINIONS.) It is bounded N. by the province of Ajmeer, E. by Malwah and Candeish, S. by Aurungabad and the sea, W. by a sandy desert, the Gulf of Cutch, and the sea. It is mountainous in the interior, and elevated along the coast. The chief range is the Western Ghauts, which have an average height of 1,500 feet. Pro. Rice, wheat, barley, sugar, tobacco, cotton, maize, opium, castor-oil, fruits, and an extremely varied flora. Minerals. Iron only. Area, 42,000 square miles. Pop. 3,000,000. Lat. between 20° and 24° 45′ N. Lon. between 69° and 74° 20′ E.

GWALIOR, gwaw'-le-or, a protected state of Central India, in the dominions of Scindia, inclosed by Bundelcund, Chumbal, Dhar, Rajgurh, and Kotah. It is level in the N., but traversed in the S. by the Vindhya mountains. Pro. Rice, wheat, maize, sugar, opium, cotton, tobacco, and oil-seeds. Manf. Silks, and there is a cannon-foundry. Lat. between 21° 8′ to 26° 50′ N. Lon. between 74° 45′ and 79° 21′ E. Pop. 3,115,857.

GWALIOR, a city and fortress, capital of the above state, situate on an affluent of the Jumna, 68 miles S. of Agra. It is on a hill, at the bottom of which stands the town, which is large and populous, and carries on a considerable trade between the Mahratta and British territories. The fortress is the largest and strongest in India. Lat. 26° 18′ N. Lon. 78° 5′ E. Pop. Unascertained.

GWILT, JOSEPH, gwilt, an eminent English architect, who wrote largely on his profession, and published, with other works, "An Encyclopædia of Architecture, Historical, Theoretical, and Practical." He also wrote "Rudiments of the Anglo-Saxon Tongue," and the article on music in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." He held, for thirty years, the appointment of architect to the Grocers' Company, and was, for forty years, one of the surveyors of the sewers in Surrey.

Born in Surrey, 1784; died 1863.

GWINNETT, gwin'-net, a county of Georgia, United States. Area. 550 square miles. Pop. 19,531. Lawrenceville is the capital.

GWYNNE, ELEANOR or NELL, gwin, an actress, famous for the circumstance of her rising from the lowest situation to be patronised by Charles II. In the early part of her life she entertained companies at taverns by singing; and, previous to her winning the affection of the dissolute king, she had formed various questionable connections. She was an actress in the King's company at Drury Lane, but retired from the stage in 1672. She was a beautiful, clever, and kind-hearted woman, and is credited with having originated the establishment of Chelsea Hospital for old soldiers. Charles probably loved her as much as he was capable of loving anybody, and her name was almost the last word uttered by him. From her are descended the dukes of St. Albans. She was buried with much ceremony in the church of St. Martin's in the Fields, and Dr. Tenison, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, preached her funeral sermon.

Born 1640; died 1691.

GYERGYOO ST. MIKLOS, jé'-er-joo, a market-town of Transylvania, 95 miles E. of Klausenburg. There is a handsome Greek church. Pop. chiefly military, 5,000.

GYGES, or GYES, jí'-jees, celebrated in Greek mythology, a son of Cœlus and Terra, represented as having a hundred hands. He, with his brothers, made war against the gods, and was afterwards punished in Tartarus.

GYGES, a Lydian, to whom, according to legend, Candaules, king of the country, showed his wife naked. The queen was so incensed at this instance of imprudence in her husband, that she ordered Gyges either to prepare for death himself, or to murder Candaules. He chose the latter, married the queen, and ascended the vacant throne, about 718 years before the Christian era. He was the first of the Mermnadæ who reigned in Lydia. He reigned 38 years, and distinguished himself by the immense presents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. In some legends he is described as having been a shepherd, who possessed a ring which rendered him invisible when he turned the stone towards his body.

GYLIPPUS, ji-lip'-pus, a Lacedæmonian, sent by his countrymen to assist Syracuse against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, and obliged them to surrender. After the capture of Athens by Lysander, he was intrusted by the conqueror with the money taken in the plunder, to convey it to Sparta; but he stole from it three hundred talents. His theft was discovered, and, to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. This, since the establishment of the laws of Lycurgus, was the first instance of any Spartan being infected by a corrupt desire for money.

Born 465 B.C.; died 400 B.C.

GYNDES, jin'-dez, a river of Assyria, falling into the Tigris. When Cyrus the Great marched against Babylon, his army was stopped by this river, in which one of his favourite horses was drowned. This so irritated the monarch, that he ordered the river to be conveyed in 360 different channels by his army; so that, after this division, it hardly reached the knee.

GYÖNGYÖS, jé'-on-je-os, a town of Hungary, 43 miles from Pesth. There are a fine castle, five churches, and a Franciscan monastery. Manf. Woollen stuffs and leather. There is a large trade in cattle and cheese. Here the Austrians were defeated by the Hungarians in 1849. Pop. 16,000.

GYULA, je-oo'-la, a market town of Hungary, near the Körös, 35 miles from Arad. It is divided by the Körös into two portions, in one of which only German is spoken, and in the other only Hungarian. It has several churches and oil-mills. Pop. 18,500.

H

HAA, ha, a small island of Scotland, in the county of Sutherland, 4 miles from Far-out Head.

HAARLEM, or HAERLEM, har'-lem, a city of the Netherlands, in the province of North Holland, 10 miles W. of Amsterdam, with which and Leyden it communicates by railway and several navigable canals. It was formerly a place of great strength, but the ramparts are now converted into public promenades. A number of canals traverse the town in different directions, some of them bordered with trees. Among the public edifices are the Stadthouse, containing a valuable collection of pictures, and the Prinsenhof, in which the estates of North Holland meet. The number of churches is considerable, the cathedral of St. Bavon containing a collection of antiquities of the time of the crusades, with the famous Haarlem organ. The other objects of interest are the town library, the Botanical Garden, the Academy of Sciences, founded in 1752, and to which a valuable museum is attached; and the Horticultural Society. Manf. Jewellery; cotton, linen, and silk stuffs; thread and ribbons, and printing-type. Haarlem has long been celebrated for its bleaching-grounds, and carries on an extensive traffic in flowers, particularly tulips. There are six annual fairs. It was the birthplace of the painters Berghem, Ostade, Ruysdael, Vanderhelst, and the Vanderveldes. L. Coster, the reputed inventor of movable printing-types, was also a native of this place, and he has a statue erected to his memory in the market square. Pop. 45,619.

HAARLEM, LAKE OF, an extensive lake of the Netherlands, 2 miles from Haarlem. It was formed by an inundation in the 16th century, but has, recently, been drained by steam-engines of British construction. It is estimated that 50,000 acres of land have thus been gained to the community. Pop. 11,300.

HABAKKUK, hab'-ak-kuk, one of the twelve lesser Jewish prophets, who is supposed to have been contemporary with Jeremiah, and to have prophesied in the reign of Josiah, 615 B.C.

HABA, LA, hah'-ba, a town of Spain, in the province of Badajos. Manf. Linen and baize. Pop. 3,000.

HABELSCHWERDT, hah'-bel-swart, a walled town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 60 miles S.W. of Breslau, at the confluence of the Neisse and Weistritz. Manf. Tobacco, starch, and tiles. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,800.

HABERGHAM-EAVES, hab'-er-gam eeves, a township of Lancashire, 2 miles S.W. of Burnley. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods; and in its neighbourhood are coal-mines. Pop. 18,613.

HABERSHAM, hab'-er-sham, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 769 square miles. Pop. 8,718. The capital is Clarksville.

HABINGTON, WILLIAM, hab'-ing-ton, an English writer, who was educated in France. He wrote some poems, a play called "The Queen of Aragon," and the history of Edward IV. The poetry of Habington has both great elegance and poetical fancy; it exhibits the author to have been possessed, according to Hallam, of "a pure and amiable mind, turned to versification by the custom of the day, during a real passion for a lady of birth, and virtue, the Castara whom he afterwards married."

Born in Worcestershire, 1605; died 1654.

HABSBURG, or HAPSBURG, haps'-burg, a village of Switzerland, with the ruins of a castle, which was the original seat of the house of Austria, of which Rudolph, who lived in the 13th century, was the founder. (See RUDOLPH.)

HACKAERT, JAN, hak'-art, a Dutch artist, who greatly excelled in landscape-painting.

Born at Amsterdam, 1636; died 1699.

HACKERT, PHILIP, hak'-airt, a celebrated German landscape-painter, whose works are not remarkable for any specialty in his art.

Born at Prenzlau, 1737; died at Florence, 1807.

HACKET, JOHN, D.D., hak'-et, an English divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1661 he became bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. He wrote a Latin comedy twice acted before James I.; a life of Archbishop Williams, and "Christian Consolations." "What a delightful and instructive book Bishop Hacket's 'Life of Archbishop Williams' is!" exclaims Coleridge; "you learn more from it of that which is valuable towards an insight into the times preceding the civil wars, than from all the ponderous histories and memoirs now composed about that period."

Born in London, 1592; died 1670.

HACKLÄNDER, FREDERICH WILHELM, hak'-lan'-der, a popular German poet and novelist, born at Burtscheid, near Aix-la-Chapelle. His earliest work, entitled "Bilder aus dem Soldatenleben im Frieden," appeared in the "Morgenblatt," and has been translated into several languages. He accompanied baron von Taubenheim on his travels in the East, and on his return published "Daguerreohypen aufgenommen auf Einer Reise in der Orient," and the "Pilgerzugnach Mekka," a collection of Oriental tales. Was present at the campaign in Piedmont, in 1849, and published in 1849 and 1850 his "Soldatenleben im Kriege." He married in 1849, and settled in Stuttgart, since which he has produced numerous works, romances, comedies, &c.

Born 1816.

HACKNEY, hak'-ne, a parish and parliamentary borough of Middlesex, 3 miles from St. Paul's cathedral, London, of which it is a suburb. The parliamentary borough comprises the parishes of Hackney, Shoreditch, and Bethnal-green. (See LONDON.) Hackney coaches are by some writers supposed to have taken their name from this parish.

HADDINGTON, or EAST-LOTHIAN, hăd'-ding-ton, a maritime county of Scotland, bounded E. by the German Ocean, N. by the Firth of Forth, W. and S.W. by the county of Edinburgh, and S. and S.E. by Berwickshire. Along the coast is a shelving or sloping tract of land, affording a fertile soil. The interior consists of a ridge of ground N. of the Tyne, sloping partly to that river, and partly to the coast land. In the south are the Lammermuir Hills, rising to more than 1,700 feet in height. There is also a large tract, of varied breadth, elevated above the midlands, and continuing along the base of the mountains nearly the whole extent of the county. The whole represents an extensive hilly region; which commences at the S.W. extremity of the county, and terminates at a high promontory called St. Abb's Head, on the E. shore.

Rivers.—The principal is the Tyne; but in general it is well watered.

Pro.—Being one of the most fertile counties in Scotland it produces in large quantities wheat and other grains, beans, turnips, and grasses. The farms are generally large; and immense numbers of Highland cattle are fattened.

Minerals.—Coal, limestone, and sandstone.

Manf.—Pottery-wares and salt; and there are some linen and woollen manufactures carried on. There are, besides, extensive distilleries.

Area.—280 square miles.

Pop.—38,472.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county, and one for the Haddington district.

HADDINGTON, a royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, and the capital of the county of Haddington, on the Tyne, 17 miles N.E. of Edinburgh. It consists of four streets, which cross each other at right angles. The parish church is a large and venerable Gothic structure, 210 feet long from E. to W., 110 feet broad in the transept, and 65 feet broad in the choir. John Knox and George Wishart preached in this church. There is a new parish church, St. John's. The town has, besides, a town-house, with a spire 150 feet high, and county hall, corn exchange, mechanics' institute, and several public libraries. There are two bridges over the Tyne. There are four fairs annually, none of them of much importance; but there is a weekly market on Friday, reckoned the largest in Scotland, and at which all kinds of grain are sold. Haddington unites with North Berwick, Dunbar, Jedburgh, and Lauder in sending a member to parliament. Pop. 5,660. — A station on the North British railway.

HADERSLEBEN, ha'-ders-lai'-ben, a town of Prussia, duchy of Schleswig, on a bay of the Little Belt, 50 miles from Schleswig. There are an old and a new town, and two churches, in one of which the German language is used; in the other the Danish. Pop. 8,300.

HADHAZ, had'-haz, a town of Hungary, 10 miles N. of Debreczin. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture and cattle rearing. Pop. 4,500.

HADJI KHALIFAH, had'-je-ka-lé'-fah, the surname of Mustafa-Ben-Abdallah, a Turkish historian of the 17th century, whose works are in high estimation. A translation of his great work, by Flügel, was published at Leipsic (1835-1858), under the title "Lexicon Bibliographicum et Encyclopædicum à Mustapha-ben-Abdallah." There is an earlier translation in MS. in the Imperial Library. It is the most complete catalogue in existence of works written in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. His "Tarikh Kebir" is a history of the world from the creation of Adam to the year 1655; he also wrote a history of the Ottoman Empire from 1591 to 1658; and a history of the maritime wars of the Turks. Of this last an English translation has been published (London, 1831).

Born at Constantinople, 1600; died 1658.

HADLEIGH, had'-le, a market-town of Suffolk, on the Bret, 8 miles W. of Ipswich. The church is large and handsome, and there are many antique houses. Manf. Silks; but most of the inhabitants are engaged in agriculture. On Oldham common, near the town, is a monument to the memory of Dr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadleigh, who suffered martyrdom in 1555. Pop. 3,500.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

HADLEY, JOHN, had'-le, is the author of several philosophical papers which appeared in the "Transactions of the Royal Society," and the reputed inventor of the sextant which bears his name.

Being on intimate terms with Sir Isaac Newton, it is generally believed that he borrowed from that great man the idea of the sextant, an account of which was communicated by Hadley to the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1731. Hadley became a member of the Royal Society in 1717.

Born 1670; died 1744.

HADRAMAUT, had'-ra-mawt, a large province of Arabia, occupying the greater part of the S. coast, upon the Indian Ocean, along which it extends from Yemen to Oman. It formed a part of the ancient Arabia Felix, and is guarded by mountains along the coast, with an elevation of 5,000 feet. (See ARABIA.)

HADRIAN. (See ADRIAN.)

HÆMON, hē'-mon, in Greek legend, a Theban youth, son of Creon, who was so captivated with the beauty of Antigone, that he killed himself on her tomb when he heard that she had been put to death by his father's orders.

HÆMUS, hē'-mus, a mountain which separates Thrace from Thessaly. It receives its name from Hæmus, son of Boreas and Orithyia, who, according to Greek mythological legend, was changed into this mountain for aspiring to divine honours. It belongs to the Balkan chain, in European Turkey.

HAFF, haf, an extensive bay or gulf of Pomerania, Prussia, 10 miles from Stettin, and separated from the Baltic by a strip of land. It is 30 miles long, by 12 miles wide. Its southern arm forms the harbour of Stettin.

HAFIZ, MOHAMMED-SHEMS-EDDIN, hai'-fiz, a celebrated Persian poet, whose muse delighted to depict the pleasures of love and wine. He was invited to the court of the sultan of Bagdad, but he seems to have passed the greater portion of his life in his native town. His effusions principally consist of odes and elegies, and were, after his death, given to the world under the title of "The Divan."

Born at Shiraz, about the beginning of the 14th century; died 1388.

HAGAR, an Egyptian bondwoman of Sarah, and mother of Ishmael. The Mohammedans regard her as the legal wife of Abraham, and believe her to have been buried in Mecca.

HAGEN, ha'-gen, a town of Prussia, in Westphalia, 26 miles W. of Arnsberg. Manf. Cloth and hardware; with considerable industries in dyeing and printing. Pop. 26,295.

HAGENBACH, KARL RUDOLF, ha'-gen-bak, German theologian, son of Karl Friedrich Hagenbach, professor of anatomy and botany at Basel, studied at the universities of Bonn and Berlin. Received the appointment of ordinary professor of theology in 1828, having previously been extraordinary professor; and became an honorary doctor of theology in 1830. He has published several courses of his lectures on the "Nature and History of the Reformation," "The Early History of the Church," and on the "Church History of the 18th and 19th centuries;" also a work on the "History of Dogmas," and a Theological Manual for Students, which has passed through several editions; a History of Evangelical Protestantism, a Memorial of De Wette, some volumes of sermons, and other works.

Born at Basel, 1801; died 1874.

HAGGAI, hag'-gai, one of the twelve minor prophets, whose predictions form a portion of the Old Testament.

Lived 630 B.C.

HAGUE, THE, haig, a town of the Netherlands, and capital of the province of South Holland, 33 miles S.W. of Amsterdam, and nearly 3 from the seacoast. It is the residence of the king and foreign ambassadors, the seat of the states-general of the Netherlands, and of the chief part of the central administration of the kingdom. It yields to few cities in Europe in the beauty of its streets, the stateliness of its buildings, and the pleasantness of its situation. The largest street is called the Voorhout, and contains a succession of elegant edifices; but the most fashionable part is one of the public squares, in the north quarter of the town, called the Vyverburg. It is of an oblong form, with a beautiful walk, and an avenue of trees on one side, while the other is bordered by a large basin of water and superb edifices. Of the public buildings, the most noticeable are the royal palace, the palace of the prince of Orange, and of prince Frederick of the Netherlands, the Binnenhof (containing the hall of assembly of the states-general and government offices); the Mauritz Huis, where are a museum and a fine gallery of paintings; the town hall, and a large cannon foundry. There are the old church of St. James, with a fine carillon of bells, thirteen other churches, several charitable institusions, an orphan asylum, a theatre, numerous schools, and a prison. The greatest drawback to the town arises from the neglect of the canals, several of which are stagnant, and emit a disagreeable effluvium, forming a strange contrast to its otherwise general cleanliness. The environs of the Hague contain a number of villas; but the principal ornament is the rural palace ("the house in the wood"), belonging to the Orange family, a mile to the N. of the town. To the west of the Hague is Scheveningen, a neat fishing-village and bathing resort. On the opposite side of the Hague, and at a distance of about a mile and a half in a S.E. direction, is the castle of Ryswick, which gave name to the well-known treaty of 1697. Manf. Printing, cabinet work, leather, rope, and gin. Lat. 52° 4′ N. Lon. 4° 18′ E. The Hague became, in 1250, the residence of the governors or counts of Holland. It is the usual residence of the court and the states-general, and has railway communication with both Rotterdam and Amsterdam. Pop. 134,552.

HAGUE, CAPE LA, hag, a headland of France, frequently incorrectly termed Cape La Hogue. It is on the peninsula of Cotentin, opposite the island of Alderney. Lat. 49° 43′ N. Lon. 1° 57′ W.

HAGUENAU, hag'-no, a fortified town in Germany, in Lower Alsace, on the Moder, 18 miles N. of Strasburg. Manf. Tobacco, madder, earthenware, woollen and cotton fabrics, soap, leather, and starch, and it has both breweries and metal foundries. Pop. 12,688.

HAHNEMANN, SAMUEL, han'-man, a German physician, the founder of the system of medicinal practice to which he gave the name of the "Homœopathic." He was the son of a painter on china, and showed such talent as a boy, that he was gratuitously educated at the college of Meissen till he was twenty years old, and then studied medicine at Leipsic, supporting himself by translations. He studied afterwards at Vienna, and in 1784 settled at Dresden. Four years afterwards he established himself at Leipsic, where he was successful in gaining numerous adherents to his system. As he was ruining the apothecaries, however, they rose against him, and in a court of law, it was decided, by an old decree, that no physician could dispense his own prescriptions. Accordingly, he quitted Leipsic, and found an asylum in the dominions of the duke of Anhalt-Cöthen, where, at Cöthen, he obtained a new practice. In 1829 his pupils and admirers in this place, struck a medal in honour of him. In 1835 he married a French lady, with whom he removed to Paris, where, to commemorate his arrival in the French capital, another medal was struck, in gold, silver, and bronze. Here he enjoyed a wide reputation up to the time of his death.

Born at Meissen, Saxony, 1755; died at Paris, 1843.

HAHN-HAHN, IDA, countess of, hahn'-hahn, daughter of count Hahn-hahn. She married her cousin, from whom she was divorced three years afterwards. She travelled in various parts of Europe and Asia, and in 1845 published "Letters of a German Countess," which at once secured a great reputation for the authoress. She afterwards published many romances, and some volumes of poems. Having embraced the Roman Catholic religion, she entered a convent founded by herself at Breslau, and afterwards published several works of fiction of a religious character.

Born in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 1805.

HAIL. (See HAYEL.)

HAINAN, hai'-nan, an island belonging to China, in the province of Kwang-tung. Area, estimated at 12,000 square miles. Desc. Rocky along the coasts, mountainous in the centre, and generally fertile. It is watered by large rivers, and produces great quantities of timber. It also exports sugar, coral, pearls, wax, gold, and silver. The principal city, Kiung-chan, is the most southern of the ports open for trade. Lat. between 18° 10′ and 20° N. Lon. between 108° 25′ and 111° E. Pop. 1,500,000, exclusive of some wild tribes in the interior.

HAINAULT, or HAINAUT, hai'-nawlt, an extensive frontier province of Belgium, bounded on one side by the French frontier, and on the other sides by Flanders, South Brabant, and the province of Namur. It is generally level. Rivers. The Scheldt, Sambre, and Haine. Pro. Agriculture is followed; but cattle-rearing and mining are the principal occupations of the inhabitants, and towards the west, in the neighbourhood of Mons, very extensive coal fields exist, from which about 2,000,000 tons of coal are exported annually. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, lace, leather, glass, and hardware goods. Pop. 1,021,158.

HAINAUT, hai'-no, an old division of French Flanders now comprised in the Belgian province, and the French department Nord.

HAINBURG, hain'-boorg, a town of Austria, on the left bank of the Danube, 10 miles S.E. of Vienna. It has a royal tobacco-manufactory. Pop. 4,200.

HAITI. (See HAYTI.)

HAJDUK, haj'-dook, the population of the district called Hajdu Kerület, in the eastern part of Hungary. They form six "towns," are about 70,000 in number, and are almost exclusively devoted to agriculture. They are descended from the Protestant insurgents of Hungary, who formed the nucleus of prince Bocskay's armies in the lengthened contest with the House of Hapsburg. They enjoyed numerous important privileges and a peculiar organisation until 1848-49, when they were reduced to the same position as the "hereditary" provinces of the empire.

HAKIM, BEN ALLAH, or BEN HASHEM, called Mokannah (the veiled), or Sagende Nah (moon maker), an Arabian impostor of the 8th century, who pretended to have occupied numerous human forms through a succession of ages, commencing with that of Adam, and ending with Abu Moslem, prince of Khorassan. He was an adept in the art of legerdemain, and imposed on the credulity of his adherents by pretended miracles. For the purpose of concealing his natural ugliness, or to hide a deformity produced by a wound, he habitually wore a veil which his followers pretended was necessary to conceal the excessive brightness of his features. At the head of his band he seized upon several fortified places near the cities of Neksheb and Kesh. He was, however, besieged in his stronghold by Sultan Mahadi, and finding himself unable to hold out, he destroyed his soldiers with poisoned wine, and is said to have thrown himself into a vessel of burning acid, in which his body was dissolved. Some remnants of the sect of which he was the founder still exist. He is popularly known as the subject of one of the romances contained in "Lalla Rookh."

Lived in the 8th century.

HAKODADI, or HAKODATE, a northern port of Japan, lat. 41° 40′ N., and lon. 141° 15′ E. The town is three miles in length, at the base of a lofty promontory, which juts into the Strait of T'zagar. The harbour is large and fine. It was opened to foreign commerce in 1859. Pop. 38,420.

HAKLUYT, or HACKLUYT, RICHARD, hak-lut, an English divine, who was distinguished for his skill in cosmography, and published a curious collection of voyages, in 3 vols. folio. In 1605 he was made prebendary of Westminster, besides which he had the benefice of Wetheringset, in Suffolk. His countrymen, out of respect to his labours, named a promontory on the coast of Greenland Hakluyt's Headland. Of Hakluyt's Voyages it has been said that they redound as much to the glory of the English nation as any book that ever was published in it. In the first edition is a map, says Hallam, which "represents the utmost limit of geographical knowledge at the close of the sixteenth century, and far excels the maps in the edition of Ordellius, at Antwerp, in 1588."

Born in London, 1553; died 1616.

HAKO. (See OAKO.)

HAL, or HALLE, hal, a town of Belgium, in the province South Brabant, 30 miles S.W. of Brussels. There are a very fine old church, and an elegant tower, and a town house built in the 17th century. Manf. Articles in wood and wicker work, leather, soap, and oil. Pop. 8,000.

HALA MOUNTAINS, ha'-la, an extensive range of Beloochistan, terminating at Cape Monze, in the Arabian Sea. An elevation of 11,000 feet is attained, and there are two passes, the Bolan and the Alvola Pass.

HALBERSTADT, hal'-ber-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 32 miles S.W. of Magdeburg, with which it communicates by railway. It is a place of great antiquity, is walled, and has an extensive suburb, Gröperstadt. The principal buildings are the church of Our Lady (1005-1284) in the Byzantine style, the cathedral (an ancient Gothic structure), the Jewish synagogue, and the ancient palace, now converted into the town-house and excise-office; it has also numerous Protestant churches, two Catholic chapels, several public libraries, Gleim's Institute, private museums, and picture galleries. Manf. Woollen, linen, leather, soap, gloves, paper, wax, and cigars. Brewing and oil refining are also extensively carried on. Pop. 31,260.

HALDENSLEBEN, NEW, hal'-dens-lai'-ben, a town of Prussia, on the Ohre, 14 miles N.W. of Magdeburg. Manf. Woollens, hats, tobacco, copper, and earthenware. Pop. 5,000.—OLD HALDENSLEBEN is a village about 2 miles to the south, with nearly 2,000 inhabitants.

HALE, SIR MATTHEW, hail, an English judge, who was chiefly educated on Puritan principles and intended for the church. He studied at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn in 1629, where he followed the study of the law with great application. He was one of Archbishop Laud's counsel, and acted in the same capacity for Charles I. He took, however, the Covenant and Engagement, and accepted of a judge's place on the common bench, from Cromwell. On the death of Oliver, he refused to act under his son Richard. In the parliament which recalled Charles II. he sat for his native county, and after the restoration was, in 1660, made chief baron of the Exchequer; whence, in 1671, he was advanced to the chief-justiceship of the King's Bench. He resigned his office in 1676, and died the same year. Cowper, in his "Task," speaks of him as > "Immortal Hale! for deep discernment praised

> And sound integrity, not more than famed
> For sanctity of manners undefiled."

His writings are numerous on theological, philosophical, and legal subjects.

Born at Aldersley, Gloucestershire, 1609; died 1676.

HALES, STEPHEN, hails, an English divine and natural philosopher of great eminence, was brought up at Corpus College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1702, and, having taken holy orders, became perpetual curate of Teddington in 1811. He ardently entered upon the study of botany and experimental philosophy, and invented a machine for demonstrating the motions of the planets, nearly similar to the orrery. In 1741 he published his invention of ventilators. He was greatly esteemed by Frederic, prince of Wales, and was almoner to the princess. His communications to the "Philosophical Transactions" were numerous; besides which he published two volumes of "Statical Essays," &c., and was an early advocate of temperance. His "Friendly Admonition to the Drinkers of Gin" was first published in 1734, and has frequently been reprinted.

Born in Kent, 1677; died 1761.

HALESIUS, ha-lé'-se-us, a mountain and river near Ætna, where, according to mythological legend, Proserpine was gathering flowers when she was carried away by Pluto.

HALESOWEN, hails'-o-en, a market-town of Worcestershire, 7 miles S.W. of Birmingham. The ancient parish church is a fine structure, much admired for its spire, supported by four curious arches. Manf. Nails, various sorts of hardware, pearl and horn buttons. Pop. 3,000.—A station on the Great Western railway.

HALESWORTH, hails'-werth, a market-town of Suffolk, on the left bank of river Blyth, 26 miles N.E. of Ipswich. It is of considerable antiquity, and has a handsome Gothic church. Manf. Spinning and weaving yarn from hemp. Pop. 2,800.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

HALÉVY, JACQUES FRANÇOIS FROMENTAL, ha-lai'-ve, a French operatic composer, of Jewish origin. Was the author of "La Juive," "La Reine de Chypre," "Charles VI.," "Le Juif Errant," "La Magicienne," "Les Mousquetaires," "L'Eclair," "Le Val d'Andorre," &c. He enjoyed a considerable reputation in France.

Born at Paris, 1799; died 1862.

HALFORD, SIR HENRY, M.D., hal'-ford, was the physician of four successive British sovereigns,—George III., George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria. He was president of the Royal College of Physicians from 1820 till the time of his death. In 1831 a collective edition of his essays and orations was published, and pronounced by the "London Quarterly Review" to be a "delightful compound of professional knowledge and literary taste." The original name of Sir Henry was Vaughan, which, on coming into the possession of a large fortune by the death of Sir Charles Halford, his mother's cousin, he exchanged for that name.

Born at Leicester, 1766; died 1844.

HALIBURTON, THOMAS CHANDLER, hal'-i-bur-ton, popularly known by the name of "Sam Slick," was for a long time a judge of Nova Scotia. In 1835 he contributed a series of essays to a weekly paper in that country, professing to paint the peculiarities of Yankee character. These were well received, and, in 1837, they were collected and published under the title of the "Clockmaker; or, the Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville." A second series appeared in 1838, and a third in 1840. In 1842 he visited England as an attaché to the American legation, and, in the following year, embodied, in a work called "The Attaché," the results of his observations made in that country. This went through several editions. Besides these works, Mr. Haliburton has published "Bubbles of Canada;" "An Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia;" "The Old Judge; or, Life in a Colony;" "Traits of American Humour;" "Yankee Stories;" "Nature, and Human Nature;" and a few others. In 1859 he was returned to the House of Commons as member for Launceston.

Born in Nova Scotia, 1796; died 1865.

HALIBUT, or SANNAGH ISLAND, hal'-i-but, lies in the N. Pacific Ocean, near the S.W. extremity of the peninsula Aliaska. Circumference, 24 miles. This island received its name from Captain Cook, from the immense number of halibuts taken off its shores. Lat. 54° 27′ N. Lon. 162° 50′ W.

HALICARNASSUS, hal'-e-kar-nas'-sus, a maritime city of Caria, in Asia Minor, where stood the Mausoleum, one of the seven wonders of the world. It was erected by Artemisia, queen of Caria, to the memory of her husband, Mausolus. The principal sculptures which adorned the building are now in the British Museum. It is celebrated for having given birth to Herodotus, Dionysius, and Heraclitus.

HALICZ, ha'-lich, a town of Austria, situated on the Dniester, 14 miles N. of Stanislawow, in the crownland of Galicia. It was built in the 12th century; the castle, of which the ruins still remain, was the residence of what was in former times the grand principality and kingdom of Halicz. There is a convent of the Minorites here, and a Jewish community of the sect of the Carites. Manf. Soap and candles. Pop. 3,200.

HALIDON HILL, situated about 1 mile N.W. of the town of Berwick, the scene of a celebrated battle in 1333 between the English army under Edward III. and the Scots, in which the Scottish forces were disastrously defeated.

HALIFAX, hal'-i-fax, a market-town and municipal and parliamentary borough of the West Riding of Yorkshire, situated principally on the right bank of the river Hebble, a feeder of the river Calder, 14 miles from Leeds. The town stretches along a gentle declivity, and the houses, in general, are well built, mostly of stone, and many of them large and handsome. There are many fine buildings in Halifax, amongst them the parish church, St. John the Baptist (restored in 1879), a noble building, dating from about the 12th century, with many ancient monuments; All Souls, a new cruciform building, with a spire 236 feet high; and five other churches. The "Square Church" (Congregational) erected in 1863, and another connected with the same body built in 1867, are also fine erections. There are numerous other places of worship. Amongst the principal public buildings are the town hall in the Renaissance style, with a spire rising to the height of 175 feet, opened by the prince of Wales in 1863; the Masonic Hall, a free school, a theatre, assembly rooms, literary-society hall, mechanics' institute, public baths, a gaol, and an infirmary. There is a vast building called the Piece-Hall, containing upwards of 300 rooms or warehouses, in which the manufacturers expose their cloth for sale. In 1858, Sir F. Crossley, M.P. for the West Riding, presented a magnificent park to the town. There are two extensive cemeteries adjacent to the town. Manf. The largest carpet works in the world are to be found at Halifax. The manufactured goods besides carpets are chiefly shalloons, tammies, calimancoes, moreens, snags, serges, baize, narrow and broad cloths, coatings, figured ves ings, kerseys, cottons, and silks. Excellent wool-cards are also manufactured, and great quantities of freestone, with which this neighbourhood abounds, are sent to London. Pop. 73,633.—A station on the Great Northern, London and North Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire railways, and the river Calder is a means of communication being kept up with Liverpool on the one side, and Hull on the other.

HALIFAX, the capital of Nova Scotia, North America, is situate on the west side of a spacious bay, and is laid out in oblong squares, on the declivity of a hill, with the streets parallel and at right angles. The dockyard covers 14 acres, and is one of the finest in the British colonies. There are, besides, the residences of the military commandant and admiral, two sets of barracks, Dalhousie College, a military hospital, assembly-rooms, prison, exchange, theatre, and various churches. The bay or harbour is capable of containing an immense fleet of the largest ships with ease and safety. The port engrosses nearly all the foreign trade of the colony. Manf. Leather, snuff, paper, soap; and there are several distilleries. Pop. 36,100. Lat. 44° 39′ N. Lon. 63° 37′ W.—By a canal, this town communicates with the Bay of Fundy, and by steam mail packets with Liverpool in England, and Boston in the United States.

HALIFAX BAY, on the north-east coast of Australia. It contains the Palm and other islands. Lat. between 18° 30′ and 19° 10′ S., and lon. 146° 20′ and 147° 50′ E.

HALIFAX, GEORGE SAVILLE, Marquis of, an eminent English statesman, who was created marquis in 1682. Charles II. made him a privy councillor, and lord privy seal. He was also offered the post of secretary of state, and that of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but declined both. On the accession of James II., he was appointed president of the council, from which he was dismissed for refusing his consent to a repeal of the tests. In the Convention Parliament he was chosen speaker of the House of Lords, and, at the accession of William and Mary, was made lord privy seal. In 1689 he resigned that office, and became an opponent of the government. His lordship wrote an excellent piece, entitled "Advice to a Daughter." Macaulay says of Halifax, that at the inroads made by James on the constitution, when opposition first appeared in the cabinet, Halifax courageously gave utterance to those feelings which, as it soon appeared, pervaded the whole nation.

Born 1630; died 1695.

HALIFAX, CHARLES MONTAGUE, earl of, statesman, was educated at Westminster and Cambridge, and entered parliament as member for Maldon, and voted for the declaration that James II. had abdicated. He also sat in William III.'s first parliament, and received an appointment as commissioner of the treasury in 1692. In the same year the commencement of the National Debt was made upon his motion for raising a loan of one million sterling, and in 1693 he originated the Bank of England by adopting the scheme laid before the government three years before by William Paterson. Shortly after he became chancellor of the exchequer, and carried out the work of recoinage in 1695, appointing Newton warden of the Mint, and imposing a window tax to meet the expenses of the measure. In 1697 he succeeded Godolphin as prime minister, but was soon after compelled to retire on account of his unpopularity, and on Harley's insisting upon his withdrawing from the Commons, he did so, with the title of lord Halifax. In 1701 and 1703 he was unsuccessfully impeached before the House of Lords for breach of trust. On the death of queen Anne he was appointed a member of the regency, and became an earl on the arrival of George I., and again assumed the office of prime minister, which he retained until his death nine months after. He assisted Prior in the composition of the "Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse," designed to ridicule Dryden's "Hind and Panther," and wrote several other pieces.

Born 1661; died 1715.

HALKET, LADY ANNA, hal'-ket, an English lady, the daughter of Robert Murray, preceptor to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I. In 1656 she married Sir James Halket. She produced twenty-one volumes on religious subjects. From these, a volume of Meditations was printed at Edinburgh, in 1701.

Born in London, 1622; died 1699.

HALL, a county of Georgia, United States, Area, 651 square miles. Pop. 15,298. Gainesville is the capital.

HALL, a town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, situated on the left bank of the river Inn, 6 miles from Innsbruck in the Tyrol. An extensive manufacture of salt is carried on here, the brine for which is brought from Salzberg through wooden pipes, a distance of 9 miles. There is an old church here built in the 13th century, in which Spechbacher, the leader of the Tyrolese, in their struggle for independence, was buried. Pop. 5,000.

HALL, or SWABISCH HALL, a town of Würtemburg, in the valley of the Kocher, 35 miles N.E. of Stuttgart. It is surrounded by a ditch and high walls, has a beautiful Gothic church, five other churches, a handsome town-house, and the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Salt, soap, leather, and cotton goods, &c., &c. It was a free imperial town from the 13th century until 1802, in which year it was annexed to Würtemburg. Pop. 7,800.

HALL, JOSEPH, hawl, an English prelate and distinguished scholar, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1597 he published his "Virgidemiarum," or Satires, in six books, which were reprinted at Oxford in 1753. Of this work Pope said, "it was the best poetry and the truest satire in the English language." He professed himself to be the first English satirist, as is evident by the following egotistic couplet:—

> "I first adventure; follow me who list,
> And be the second English satirist."

Hallam, however, questions his claim to be the first English satirist, and puts Gascoigne before him. About 1603 he was presented to the rectory of Hawsted, in Suffolk, which he resigned on obtaining Waltham, in Essex. Henry Prince of Wales appointed him his chaplain, and had a great regard for him. In 1616 he obtained the deanery of Worcester, and two years afterwards was appointed one of the English divines at the synod of Dort. In 1627 he was promoted to the bishopric of Exeter, whence, in 1641, he was translated to Norwich. In the same year he was committed to the Tower, for having joined with other prelates in a protest against the validity of the laws passed during their exclusion from parliament, but was liberated on bail seven months after. During his imprisonment his revenues were sequestered, and his property pillaged. During the last years of his life he resided at Higham, near Norwich, where he rented a small farm. He was a voluminous writer, his works being mainly controversial. His works have been published in three volumes folio, and abound in fine thoughts expressed in excellent language.

Born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, 1574; died near Norwich, 1656.

HALL, CAPTAIN BASIL, R.N., was the son of Sir James Hall, the fourth baronet, of Dunglass, and, in 1802, entered the British navy. For many years he was actively engaged in various parts of the globe, but is principally known by his popular books of voyages and travels, the names of the most esteemed of which are "Voyage to the West Coast of the Corea and the Great Loo-Choo Island," which was favourably received; "Travels in North America; "Fragments of Voyages and Travels," of which appeared several series, and which met with general favour. These, however, are but a few of his numerous writings, which embraced a considerable variety of subjects. Some time before his death he was deprived of the use of his reason, and placed in the Royal Haslar Hospital, where he remained until his death.

Born in Edinburgh, 1788; died 1844.

HALL, ROBERT, Rev., one of the most distinguished of modern divines in the Baptist connection. He studied at the Baptist Academy, Bristol, and King's College, Aberdeen. His ministerial duties were performed during life in Cambridge, Leicester, and Bristol, where he died. As a preacher, Mr. Hall had a great reputation. "In the eloquence of the pulpit," says Lord Brougham, "Robert Hall comes nearer Massillon than either Cicero or Æschines to Demosthenes." As a writer, he stands equally high. "Whoever wishes to see the English language in its perfection," says Dugald Stewart, "must read the writings of that great divine, Robert Hall. He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections.

Born at Arnesby, Leicestershire, 1764; died 1831.

HALL, MARSHALL, an eminent physician and physiologist, whose name is especially associated with the doctrine of the "Reflex Function of the Nervous System," which engrossed his attention for many years, and with an easily applied method of restoring respiration in cases of apparent death from drowning. He was apprenticed to a chemist at Barford, in Nottinghamshire, afterwards studied at Edinburgh, and commenced practice in Nottingham in 1815. He subsequently removed to London, where he acquired a successful and lucrative practice. He was the author of several valuable works on subjects connected with the nervous system.

Born 1790; died 1857.

HALL, ANNA MARIA, the popular authoress, formerly Miss Fielding, was born in Dublin, but has from an early age resided in England. Her reputation was established by her first work, "Sketches of Irish Character," published in 1828, and has since been maintained by a series of literary productions of varied character, including "The Buccaneer," "Tales of Woman's Trials," "The Outlaw," "The French Refugee," a drama; "Uncle Horace," "Lights and Shadows of Irish Character," "Marian," "The Whiteboy," "Midsummer Eve," "Pilgrimages to English Shrines," &c., &c., besides numerous contributions to periodical literature. In 1824 she married Mr. S. C. Hall, well known as editor of the "Art Journal," and many other works.

Born in Dublin, 1802. Died 1881.

HALLA, or HALA, a town in Scinde, on the left bank of the Lower Indus, 35 miles N. of Hyderabad. There are an old and a new town, the latter the most important. The inhabitants are mostly engaged in the manufacture of earthenware, lacquered work, caps, &c. Pop. 4,090.

HALLAM, HENRY, LL.D., hal'-lam, one of the most distinguished of modern writers, was son of the dean of Bristol, and educated at Eton and Oxford, after which he took up his residence in London, where he ever afterwards principally lived. He was the esteemed friend of Sir Walter Scott, and a contributor to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review." He greatly assisted in achieving the abolition of the slave trade, and became a foreign associate of the Institute of France. In 1830 he received one of the two fifty-guinea gold medals awarded by George IV. for eminence in historical composition, whilst Washington Irving, the American writer, received the other. He wrote three great works, of which it is unnecessary to say more than that either of them is sufficiently meritorious to confer literary immortality upon the author. They are entitled—1. "A View of the State of Europe During the Middle Ages;" 2. "The Constitutional History of England from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II.;" 3. "An Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries." Shortly after his death a monument was erected by subscription to this great writer's memory. Henry Hallam was singularly unfortunate in seeing his two sons, young men of great promise, die. It is to the memory of one of these loved friends, Arthur Hallam, that Tennyson wrote his poem of "In Memoriam."

Born 1778; died 1859.

HALLAMSHIRE. (See YORKSHIRE, WEST RIDING.)

HALLE, hal, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the right bank of the Saale, and several small islands, 20 miles N.W. of Leipsic. It is built in the form of an irregular square, and has five suburbs. Its university, founded in 1694, is of high literary reputation, and had, in 1815, that of Wittemberg united to it. There are seven churches, two of them, the Markt-kirche and the Moritz-kirche, fine Gothic buildings, several libraries, a cabinet of natural history and mechanics, an apothecaries' hall, various museums, and a botanic garden. The Lutherans have several parish churches, and the Jews a synagogue. On the outside of the walls of the town is a monument erected to the memory of the Germans who fell in the battle of Leipsic. Manf. Woollens, linen, stockings, silks, leather, buttons, hardware, starch, and chemicals. It has salt-works in its vicinity. Here, in 1806, the Prussians were overcome by the French. Handel and Michaelis were natives of this place. It is connected with Leipsic, Weimer, and Madgeburg by railway. Pop. 85,385.

HALLÉ, or HALLEIN, a town of Austria, noted for its salt-works and saline baths. It is situated on the right bank of the Salza. The Durrenberg, from which the brine is obtained, is a mountain rising 2,388 feet above the level of the sea. There are also cotton and needle and button factories here. Pop. 3,700.

HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE, hal'-lek, American poet. He began business life as a bank clerk in New York, and was afterwards the confidential agent of Mr. John Jacob Astor, the wealthy merchant. His poems are not numerous, but display considerable elegance and spirit. His longest poem, published in 1849, is "Fanny," a satire in the metre of "Don Juan."

Born at Guildford, Connecticut, 1795; died 1867.

HALLECK, HENRY WAGER, American general, who studied at West Point Military Academy, and for his services in the Mexican war was made a captain in 1847. The same year he was appointed secretary of state for California. In 1854 he left the service and practised as a lawyer in San Francisco. In 1861 he received the appointment of major-general in the Federal army, and he became commander of the department of the west. From 1862 to 1864 he was commander-in-chief, and afterwards chief of the staff. He was the author of a work on the elements of the military art, and another on the mining laws of Spain and Mexico.

Born at Westernville, New York, 1816; died 1872.

HALLER, ALBRECHT VON, hal'-ler, a celebrated physician, who, at a very early age, discovered the possession of considerable genius, particularly for poetry. His reputation procured him a medical professorship at Gottingen, where he afterwards became president of the academy. He was also a member of most of the learned societies in Europe. The poems of Haller are descriptive and elegant. Besides these, he published a number of works on medical subjects.

Born at Berne, 1708; died there, 1777.

HALLEY, EDMUND, LL.D., hal'-le, a celebrated English astronomer, educated at St. Paul's School, whence he was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he applied himself principally to the study of mathematics and astronomy. He made a number of observations, and having formed the design of completing the scheme of the heavens by the addition of the stars near the south pole, he went to St. Helena in 1676, and finished his catalogue. On his return he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1679 went to Dantzic, to confer with Hevelius about the dispute between him and Dr. Hooke, respecting the preference of plain or glass sights in astronomical instruments. In 1680 appeared the great comet, known as Halley's comet, and which he first observed in his passage from Dover to Calais. He afterwards completed his observations upon it at the Royal Observatory at Paris. In 1686 Sir Isaac Newton committed to his care the publication of his "Principia," to which Halley prefixed some Latin verses. In 1698 he sailed along the coasts of Africa, America, &c., for the purpose of trying his theory of the variation of the compass. The year following he made another voyage with the same design, and, from his observations, constructed his general chart, exhibiting the variation of the compass in most parts of the ocean. He was subsequently sent on a third voyage to ascertain the course of the tides in the British Channel; and of these he also published a chart. Soon after he went, at the request of the emperor of Germany, to survey the Adriatic, and to examine two ports which the emperor intended to establish there. On his return, in 1703, the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on him by the university of Oxford. He was also appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and had the half-pay of a captain in the navy settled on him. In 1713 he was chosen secretary to the Royal Society, and in 1719 made astronomer royal. Dr. Halley published several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," a set of Astronomical Tables, and an edition of Apollonius's works, folio, 1710. He excelled in many departments of learning and scientific research.

Born in London, 1656; died 1742.

HALLIGEN, THE, hal'-le-gen, a group of small islands belonging to Prussia, off the south-west coast of Schleswig. As the greater portion of the group is liable to be flooded at high water, they are only partially inhabitated.

HALLOWELL, hal'-lo-well, a small town of Maine, United States, on both sides of the Kennebec, 2 miles S.E. of Augusta. There are granite quarries in the neighbourhood. Steamers ply to Portland and Boston, and a good coasting trade is carried on. Pop. 4,700.

HALLUIN, hahl-ue-an-(g), a town of France, department Nord, 10 miles N.E. of Lille. Manf. Linen, cotton, and bricks. Pop. 8,700.

HALMSTADT, halm'-stat, a town of Sweden, on the Cattegat, at the mouth of the Nissa, 72 miles N.E. of Copenhagen. It is the capital of a district of the same name. Manf. Woollen goods, and it has a salmon fishery. Pop. 4,500.

HALSTEAD, hal'-sted, a market town of Essex, 43 miles N.E. of London. It has a handsome church in the Perpendicular style. There is an endowed grammar school (Lady Mary Ramsey's). Manf. Crape, silk, velvet, and paper, brickmaking and straw-plaiting. Pop. 5,804.

HALYBURTON, THOMAS, hal'-le-bur-ton, a Scotch clergyman, and author of the last century, whose works were formerly very popular in Scotland. They include "Natural Religion Insufficient, and Revealed Necessary to Man's Happiness;" "The Great Concern of Salvation;" and "Ten Sermons, preached Before and After the Celebration of the Lord's Supper."

Born 1674; died 1712.

HALYS, or KIZIL-IRMAK, hal'-is, a river of Asia Minor, rising in Cappadocia, and falling into the Euxine Sea, on the banks of which Croesus, king of Lydia, was defeated by Cyrus the Great.

HAM, one of the three sons of Noah. His descendants, according to the scriptural narrative, peopled Arabia, the Persian Gulf, Egypt, Ethiopia, Libya, &c.

HAM, a town of France, department Somme, 15 miles S.E. of Peronne. It has an old fortress, which is used as a state prison. In the citadel, Prince Polignac and three of the other ministers of Charles X. were confined for having signed the ordinances of the coup d'état of 1830. Prince Napoleon, afterwards Napoleon III., was also imprisoned here for six years, for an attempt to seize the government of France, which a more successful coup d'état subsequently gave to him, in 1851. Ten annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,700.

HAMADAN, or AMADAN, ham'-a-dan, a city of Irak, in Persia, 180 miles W. from Teheran, Lat. 34° 50′ N. Lon. 48° 32′ E. It was taken and destroyed by Timur. This place is an entrepôt for the commerce carried on between Bagdad and Teheran. It was formerly called Ecbatana. Pop. about 30,000.

HAMADRYADES, ham'-a-dri'-a-dees, in Greek mythology, nymphs who presided over trees, and lived and died with the trees to which they were attached.

HAMAH, ha'-ma, a flourishing town of Syria, on both sides of the Orontes, 62 miles S. of Aleppo. It is surrounded by walls, has many mosques, baths, bazaars, and a governor's palace, and is supplied with water by hydraulic wheels of enormous size, by means of which water is raised into stone aqueducts. It is supposed to be the Hamath of Scripture. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and silk fabrics. Pop. 40,000.

HAMANN, JOHANN GEORG, ha'-man, a Prussian author of the last century, whose writings were directed mainly against the rationalistic tendencies of his times. In style they are highly figurative and symbolical, and were greatly appreciated by Herder, Goethe, Jean Paul, and others. Portions of them were republished in Leipsic, 1819; and his "Sämmtliche Werke," by F. Rothe, in 1821-1825 in 7 vols.; an 8th vol. appeared in 1843, with additions and explanations. He adopted the literary pseudonym of the "Magician of the North."

Born at Königsberg, 1730; died 1788.

HAMBATO. (See AMBATO.)

HAMBURG, ham'-berg (Ger. ham'-boorg), a free city and state, the chief commercial town of Germany, on the right bank of the Elbe, about 80 miles from its mouth, at the confluence of the Bille and Alster. The city is much intersected by water communication, formed partly by the Elbe and partly by the Alster, a tributary of the Elbe. The ground on which it stands is rather elevated, except in the insulated parts, and the streets are narrow, rowded, and irregular. The houses are, in general, of great height, and built of brick and wood. In the quarter called the New Town, many of these are neat in their appearance, and some streets elegant, particularly on the Alster. Hamburg has several suburbs; but a great fire, which took place in the May of 1842, consumed 61 streets and 120 passages and courts, leaving nearly 20,000 of the inhabitants without a home, and many of the public buildings on this occasion also suffered. Of these the principal are five parish churches, especially those of St. Michael, with a spire 456 feet high, St. Catherine's, interesting from its age, and St. Nicholas, erected from the designs of Sir Gilbert Scott, a fine Gothic structure, with a lofty spire (483 feet high). This church cost £200,000, and was built as a memorial of the great fire; a Roman Catholic, and several other churches, Jewish temple and seven synagogues, the exchange, town-hall, senate-house, arsenal, gymnasium, the Johanneum, prison, workhouse, theatres, college, numerous libraries, museums, learned societies, chapels, and hospitals. The territory of Hamburg, hardly exceeds 1481 square miles. It consists of a small district lying round the city, of the town and bailiwick of Cuxhaven, at the mouth of the Elbe, and some villages scattered in the duchy of Holstein. Its surface is level and well watered. The Vierlanden and marsh-lands in the river are exceedingly productive, being converted into market and fruit-gardens.

Manf.—Sugar-refining is carried on to a great extent, and the printing of cotton, linen, and handkerchiefs; also dye-works, and machinery for twisting tobacco, making whalebone, jewellery, soap, wax, whale-oil, silk stuffs, gold and silver lace, needles, cards, sailcloth, and stockings. Hamburg has long been a commercial place of great importance, being the entrepôt for European goods of all descriptions, with which it supplies all the countries lying along the Elbe, different districts on the Rhine and the Lower Maine, and a part of the Prussian and Austrian dominions. It communicates with Lubeck by canal, and with Berlin, Brunswick, Hanover, and Kiel, by railway. Nearly 450 vessels, of which 86 are ocean steamers, belong to the port.

History.—Hamburg was founded in the reign of Charlemagne. In 1241 it concluded with Lubeck a treaty which formed the basis of the Hanseatic league. The kings of Denmark, in the quality of counts of Holstein, claimed sovereignty over the city, till 1768, when it received a full confirmation of its rights as an independent city of the German empire. In 1810 it was incorporated with the French empire, and declared the capital of the department of the Mouths of the Elbe. The city, after being occupied by the French armies, was evacuated in May, 1814, when Hamburg regained, under the allied powers, its independence. The present constitution came into force on January 1, 1861. The government is carried on by a Senate and a House of Burgesses. The former consists of 18 members, elected for life; the latter of 192 members, elected by ballot for six years.

Pop.—With suburbs, 450,127.
Lat. 53° 52′ N. Lon. 9° 58′ E.

HAMBURG, a town of South Carolina, United States, 65 miles S. W. of Columbia, on the left bank of the Savannah, and communicating with Augusta by a bridge. Pop. 2,500.

HAMELN, ha'-meln, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, at the confluence of the Weser and the Hamel, 25 miles S.W. of Hanover. There are three churches, including the Münster, which dates from the 12th century, and is now falling into ruins. The river Weser is crossed by a fine suspension bridge. Manf. Tobacco, hats, woollens, and leather. There are besides distilleries, and a salmon-fishery. Pop. 10,924.

HAMILCAR, BARCAS, ha-mil'-kar, a celebrated Carthaginian general, who commanded the Carthaginians in the 18th year of the first Punic war. Fell in a battle against the natives of Spain. Died 229 B.C.

HAMILTON, ham'-il-ton, a parliamentary and municipal burgh and market-town of Lanarkshire, near the confluence of the Clyde and Avon, 10 miles from Glasgow. It is irregularly built, and has a parish church, other places of worship, two hospitals, a mechanics' institute, a new county hall, a cavalry barracks, and the ducal palace of the house of Hamilton. Manf. Lace and muslin fabrics.

Pop. 26,231. This town was erected into a burgh or barony in 1456, and in 1548 it was erected by queen Mary into a royal burgh, but its rights yielded up to the duke of Hamilton, who, in 1670, restored to the community its former privileges, and erected into a burgh of regality, dependent on him and his successors.—A station on the Caledonian railway.

HAMILTON, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 703 square miles. Pop. 6,000. The capital is Jasper.

HAMILTON, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 16,712. The capital is McLeansborough.

HAMILTON, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 412 square miles. Pop. 24,801. Noblesville is the capital.

HAMILTON, a county of New York United States. Area, 1,064 square miles. Pop. 3,000. Lake Pleasant is the capital.

HAMILTON, a county of Iowa, United States. Pop. 11,252.

HAMILTON, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 313,374. The capital is CINCINNATI.

HAMILTON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 615 square miles. Pop. 23,642. Harrison is the capital.

HAMILTON, a county of Texas, United States. Pop. 6,365.

HAMILTON, a city of the province of Ontario, Canada, at the W. end of Lake Ontario, 45 miles from the Niagara falls, and 38 from Toronto. Its position in relation to the chief railways of Canada, and as the centre of the finest grain producing country, have contributed to its rapid development. A new Court-house was opened in 1879. The city contains manufacturing establishments, foundries, locomotive works, &c. Pop. 35,961.

HAMILTON, a town of Victoria, Australia, known as the metropolis of the western interior, 219 miles N.W. of Melbourne. There are good public buildings, including several large educational institutions, and nine places of worship for various denominations. Pop. 2,967.

HAMILTON, HOUSE OF, a great historical family of Scotland. The first authentic records carry back the genealogy to the end of the 13th century. In 1445 sir James Hamilton of Cadyow was created Lord Hamilton, and in 1474 married the eldest daughter of James II. of Scotland. His son was created earl of Arran, and his son was chosen regent of the kingdom on the death of James V., and Henry II. of France made him duke of Châtelherault in that country. His eldest son was at one time proposed as the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, and at another as husband of queen Elizabeth of England. His brother was created marquis of Hamilton in 1599, and his grandson, duke of Hamilton, in 1640. (See HAMILTON, duke of.) From other branches of the family are descended the earls of Selkirk, Orkney, Haddington, and viscounts Boyne.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, American statesman, first attracted public notice by a series of papers, written at the commencement of the disagreement between Great Britain and the colonies, when he was barely eighteen years of age. These papers in defence of the rights of the colonists, were at first attributed to Jay, the eminent statesman, and secured for young Hamilton the consideration of the popular leaders. When war broke out, he received a captain's commission, and became the aide-de-camp and confidential friend of Washington. On the termination of the war he retired from the army with the rank of colonel, and devoted himself to the study and practice of the law, and rose to eminence in the profession. Was returned as a representative of New York to the Continental Congress in 1782; became a member of the New York legislature in 1786; and in the following year, in conjunction with Madison, took the most important part in drawing up the constitution. He was appointed secretary to the treasury on the establishment of the government in 1789, and proved himself a financier of no common skill. In 1795 he retired from official life and resumed the practice of law in New York; but on the breaking out of the war with France, in 1798, he was appointed major-general in the United States army, and succeeded to the chief command on the death of Washington. On the restoration of peace he again resumed his legal practice. His career was terminated by a mortal wound received in a duel with Aaron Burr. Hamilton was born in the island of Nevis, in the West Indies. His father was a Scotch merchant who had married a young French widow. He was educated in New Jersey and Columbia College, New York. His works have been published in seven volumes, which, however, do not include the series of letters which appeared in the New York Daily Advertiser, in defence of the constitution. These —eighty-five in number—of which Hamilton wrote fifty, were collected and published under the title of the "Federalist."

Born 1757; died 1804.

HAMILTON, ANTHONY, Count, a well-known writer, descended from a Scotch family. He attached himself to the fortunes of the house of Stuart, and wrote fairy tales and poems; but his best work is the "Memoirs of the Count de Grammont," a romance. Speaking of these memoirs, in his "History of England," Macaulay says that Hamilton is "the artist to whom we owe the most highly-finished and vividly-coloured picture of the English court in the days when the English court was gayest."

Born in Ireland; died at St. Germains, 1720.

HAMILTON, JAMES, first Duke of, was the son of James, marquis of Hamilton, and, in 1625, succeeded his father, and gained the favour of Charles I. In 1631 he went with an army to the assistance of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and returned to England in the following year. He afterwards accompanied the king of Scotland, and, on the breaking out of the disturbances in that country, respecting episcopacy, was appointed commissioner, and raised forces in defence of the royal cause, for which he was created duke of Hamilton and earl of Cambridge. After distinguishing himself greatly in behalf of the king, he was defeated by Cromwell at Preston, and was brought to trial and beheaded, in 1649.

Born 1606; died 1649.

HAMILTON, JAMES, author of the Hamiltonian system of teaching languages, was an English merchant resident in Hamburg, and then for many years at New York, where in 1815 he developed his method of instruction. Meeting with considerable success in America, he returned to England in 1823, and was very extensively patronised. The chief feature of the "Hamiltonian system" is the use of easy reading books with literal interlinear translations for the purpose of supplying the pupil as quickly as possible with a vocabulary and the most important grammatical peculiarities of the language he is learning.

Born 1769; died 1831.

HAMILTON, PATRICK, a Scotch reformer, was the son of Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincarel and Stanehouse. He was born, it is believed, in Glasgow, and was educated at Paris, where he received his degree in 1520; he returned from the continent, and settled in St. Andrews in 1523. In 1527 he was formally summoned by archbishop Beaton to answer a charge of heresy, and was the next year condemned for holding and maintaining divers heresies of Martin Luther and his followers, repugnant to the faith. Hamilton in the mean time had taken refuge in Germany, where he associated with Luther and Melancthon. After an absence of six months he returned to Kincarel, where he openly preached the gospel, and where it is believed he married. Shortly afterwards he was induced to revisit St. Andrews, where lodgings had been provided for him by the archbishop, and where he was allowed for a month or two full freedom of speech and action. He was then again summoned to answer for his heretical opinions, was condemned, deprived of his ecclesiastical office, and handed over to the secular power to be punished. On the very same day he was burnt in front of St. Salvador's College. His death gave a great impulse to the Reformation, and probably was more effective than his life could have been.

Born 1504; died 1528.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, an ingenious poet, and a man of fortune and family. He is the author of "The Braes of Yarrow," a poem which suggested to Wordsworth his three pieces of "Yarrow Unvisited," "Yarrow Visited," and "Yarrow Revisited." His works were printed at Edinburgh, in 12mo, 1760.

Born in Ayrshire, 1704; died 1754.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, K.B., was, for thirty-six years English ambassador at the court of Naples. He explored the volcanic mountains of Vesuvius and Etna, his observations on which were published. His "Campi Phlegræi," is also an interesting performance. He greatly promoted the publication of the magnificent and elegant work, "Antiquités Etrusques, Grecques et Romaines, tirées du Cabinet de Mr. Hamilton," the editor of which was D'Hancarville. In 1782 he lost his first wife, and, in 1791, married Emma Harte, the Lady Hamilton so well known in connection with Lord Nelson. (See NELSON.) The "Philosophical Transactions" were enriched by many of his communications, and also the British Museum by his presents of antiquities and other curiosities.

Born in Scotland, 1730; died in London, 1803.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, Bart., one of the most eminent of modern metaphysicians, was born at Glasgow, and educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained first class honours. In 1813 he was called to the Scottish bar, but did not court extensive practice. In 1820 he competed with John Wilson for the moral philosophy chair in the university of Edinburgh, without success; but, in the following year, he became professor of universal history in that institution. In 1836 he was summoned to the chair of logic and metaphysics, which he retained up to the time of his death. He also held the appointment of solicitor of Teinds for her majesty in Scotland, and was a member of the Institute of France and of many other learned bodies. This profound thinker contributed largely to the literature of mental philosophy, edited the works of Reid, and, at the time of his death, was engaged in editing an edition of the works of Dugald Stewart. His principal essays have been translated into French and Italian. On the European continent the intellectual calibre of Sir William is very highly estimated.

Born at Glasgow, 1788; died at Edinburgh, 1856.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM ROWAN, LL.D., the eminent mathematician; exhibited extraordinary talents from a very early age, and had exhausted the usual university course of mathematics at fifteen. An elaborate treatise from his pen on the "Theory of the Systems of Rays" appeared in the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, in 1828; this paper was supplemented by others in continuation of the same line of investigation, and in the last of these, published in 1833, he predicted the existence of two kinds of conical refraction, which has been verified by experiment, and is regarded as one of the most convincing proofs of the undulating theory of Light. His next work, entitled, "A General Theory of Dynamics," which appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1834, produced a profound sensation both in this country and on the continent, and he was, in recognition of the original genius displayed in these papers, elected an honorary member of the Academy of St. Petersburg. His grand invention of quaternions, however, will probably confer upon him the most lasting reputation. On this subject he published a large volume of lectures in 1833, which are very highly esteemed, and a more elementary work, with more recent improvements and extensions of his calculus, has been published since his death. In 1827, while still an undergraduate, he succeeded his friend, Dr. Brinkley, in the Andrew's Chair of Astronomy in the University of Dublin, to which is attached the astronomer-royalship of Ireland. He was for many years president of the Royal Irish Academy, and was knighted in 1835, on delivering his address as secretary to the British Association at its meeting in Dublin. He was also member of most of the great European scientific academies. His mathematical works are very numerous.

Born in Dublin, 1805; d. 1865.

HAMM, ham, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, near the confluence of the Ahse and the Lippe, 22 miles from Arensberg. It is surrounded by a wall, which has been converted into a promenade. There are extensive linen manufactures, and it is noted for its excellent hams. Pop. 20.783.

HAMME, ham, a trading town of Belgium, in the province of East Flanders, on the right bank of the Durme, 24 miles N.E. of Termonde. Manf. Woollens, linen, ribbons, starch, soap, chocolate, oil, and mustard. Pop. 10,000.

HAMMAMET, ham-ma'-met, a seaport of Tunis, North Africa, 40 miles S.E. of Tunis, with which a considerable trade in grain, oil, and wool, is carried on. Pop. 8,000.

HAMMELBURG, a town of Bavaria, province of Lower Franconia, at the confluence of the Thulba with the Saale, 26 miles N. of Würzburg. Manf. Linen. A good trade is carried on, and six annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,700.

HAMMERFEST, ham'-mer-fest, the most N town of Europe, in Norway, on the island of Qualoe, in the province of Finmark, of which it is the principal port. The principal commodities of the island are oil, fish, reindeer hides, eiderdown, and fox skins. Pop. 1,200. Lat. 70° 40′ N. Lon. 23° 30′ E.

HAMMERSMITH, ham'-mer-smith, a suburb of London, on the N. bank of the Thames, here crossed by a suspension-bridge (opened in 1827), six miles from the General Post Office. The houses are well-built, and along the Thames are a number of handsome seats and villas. The parish church, St. Paul's, was founded in 1629, as a chapel of ease to Fulham, of which parish Hammersmith formed a portion until 1834; St. Peter's, erected in 1829; St. John's, in 1859, are other churches. There are several chapels for Nonconformists, a Roman Catholic chapel, a catholic theological institute, and Nazareth house, a permanent home for the aged and destitute, superintended by nuns, known as "the little sisters of the poor;" There is also a Roman Catholic reformatory for boys. Hammersmith is included in the parliamentary borough of Chelsea. Pop. 71,916.. A station on the Metropolitan Extension.

HAMMOND, HENRY, ham'-mond, a learned English divine, who, in 1632, obtained the rectory of Penshurst, in Kent, whence he was ejected in the rebellion. In 1643 he was made archdeacon of Chichester, and was with the king at the treaty of Uxbridge, to confer with the parliamentary commissioners on church government, on which subject he disputed with Vines, a Presbyterian minister. In 1645 he was appointed canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and chaplain in ordinary to the king, whom he attended in the Isle of Wight. In 1653 he published his "Annotations on the New Testament," a work of great merit. At the time of his death he was about to be made bishop of Worcester by Charles II. Besides the above, he wrote "A Commentary on the Psalms," "A Practical Catechism," sermons, and controversial pieces.

Born at Chertsey, 1605; died 1660.

HAMPDEN, JOHN, ham'-den, a celebrated English patriot, descended of an ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and first cousin to Oliver Cromwell. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1613 entered on the study of the law at the Inner Temple. He became member for Granspound in 1621, and afterwards sat for Wendover. In 1627 he was imprisoned for refusing to pay his share of a loan raised by the king on his own authority, but was afterwards liberated by an order of council. In 1636 he distinguished himself by his resistance to the crown, and his objection to the payment of ship-money, by which he acquired great popularity. This case was argued twelve days in the court of Exchequer, before the twelve judges; and, although the decision was given in favour of the crown, the popularity of Hampden by no means suffered. He became a leading man in the House of Commons, sitting in the Long Parliament for Buckinghamshire, and, at the commencement of the civil war, took up arms against the king; but fell in an engagement with Prince Rupert on Chalgrove Field, Oxfordshire, 1643. Lord Clarendon observes of him, that "he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a heart to execute any mischief." But others are of a different opinion from his lordship, in reference to Hampden's powers of contriving mischief. In fact, he was one of England's noblest worthies. He spoke, acted, fought, and fell for the liberties of his country; and what more can be allotted for man to do? In private life he was amiable and affectionate; in public debate, eloquent yet temperate; in counsel, sagacious; in action, vigilant; in enterprise, courageous; and his last moments were spent in prayer, breathed for the welfare of his country.

Born in London, 1594; died 1643.

HAMPDEN, RENN DICKSON, D.D., was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. In 1829 he became public examiner in classics; in 1832, Bampton lecturer; the following year, principal of St. Mary's Hall; 1834, White's professor of moral philosophy; 1836, regius professor of divinity; and, in 1847 (not without some opposition on the part of the dean and chapter) bishop of Hereford. He was an able contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." Hallam says that no Englishman has gone so far into the wilderness of scholasticism.

Born in Barbadoes, 1792.

HAMPDEN, a county of the United States, in Massachusetts. Area, 585 square miles. Pop. 104,142. The capital is Springfield.

HAMPSHIRE, HANTS, or SOUTHAMPTON, hamp'-sheer, one of the southern counties of England, including also the Isle of Wight, is bounded S. by the English Channel and the Sound, which cuts off the Isle of Wight; N. by Berkshire, E. by Surrey and Sussex, and W. by Wiltshire and Dorsetshire. Hampshire is distinguished as an agricultural county, though its seacoast has also rendered it of considerable maritime and commercial importance. It is traversed by the ranges of the N. and S. Downs, and the S.W. division of the county is extensively occupied by the New Forest; but generally the county is well wooded, and portions of the forests of Bere, Alice Holt, and Woolmer remain.

Rivers.—The Auborn and Loddon, falling into the Thames; the Anton, the Itchin, the Avon, and the Bolder Water, which empties itself near Lymington. These rivers are navigable for a considerable distance. There are, besides, various convenient canals, which greatly aid the communications of the county, whilst the South-western railway has stations at its most important towns. Along the coast also, and in the Sound, which divides it from the Isle of Wight, are numerous excellent harbours and roadsteads, of the former of which Portsmouth is the principal.

Pro.—Hampshire is famous for the breeding of cattle, especially hogs and sheep, its bacon being reckoned the best in the kingdom. It also produces excellent wheat, abundance of hay, very fine honey; and large quantities of cider are made.

Manf.—Woollen goods, cloths, shalloons, serges, &c. Malt and leather are made at Basingstoke. Silk, straw hats, paper, vast quantities of common salt, and of Epsom and Glauber salts, are also manufactured.

Area.—1,625 square miles.

Pop.—593,487.

Chief Towns.—WINCHESTER, SOUTHAMPTON, PORTSMOUTH, Andover, and Newport.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into North and South Hants, each returning two members. Winchester, Southampton, and Portsmouth each returns two, and Andover one. The Isle of Wight returns two, one for the island and one for Newport. (See ISLE OF WIGHT, NEW FOREST, PORTSMOUTH, SOUTHAMPTON, WINCHESTER, and ANDOVER.)

HAMPSHIRE, a county of Massachusetts, United States. Area, 532 square miles. Pop. 47,000. Northampton is the capital.

HAMPSHIRE a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 838 square miles. Pop. 10,366. The capital is Romney.

HAMPSHIRE NEW. (See NEW HAMPSHIRE.)

HAMPSTEAD, ham'-sted, a town of Middlesex, 4 miles N.W. from London. It is situate on the declivity of a high hill, from which there is a beautiful prospect of the metropolis and adjacent counties. It was formerly famous for its medicinal springs, was a very fashionable resort in the 18th century, and the beautiful heath makes it one of the most popular holiday spots in the neighbourhood of London. The parish church, St. John's, rebuilt in 1745, was enlarged in 1844. There are five other churches, and places of worship for Nonconformists and Roman catholics; New College, for the education of students for the Congregational ministry, and a Roman catholic orphanage and school. The Orphan Working School at Haverstock Hill is within the limits of the parish. Pop. 45,436.—A station on the North London railway.

HAMPTON, hamp'-ton, a village of Middlesex, 12 miles S.W. of London, on the left bank of the Thames, near which is the magnificent palace of Hampton Court, founded by Cardinal Wolsey. It was enlarged by Henry VIII., who formed round it a royal park. Edward VI. was born in the palace, and Charles I. was for some time kept in confinement here. It was afterwards the occasional residence of Cromwell, Charles II., and James II. It was subsequently extended and improved by William III., whose favourite residence it was, and is now usually occupied by persons of rank in reduced circumstances. It contains a magnificent collection of historical portraits. The garden is laid out in the Dutch style, and there is a maze which affords great amusement to the visitors, who are very numerous at holiday times. At Hampton Court there is a vine said to be the largest and most productive in Europe. The parish church, St. Mary's, is a modern building, but contains some ancient monuments. Pop. 13,538.—A station on the London and South-Western railway.

HAMPTON, a village on the Chesapeake Bay, in Virginia, United States. The Hampton Roads form one of the best harbours on the American coast, and are memorable as the scene of the first naval battle between iron-clad vessels, the Merrimac and the Monitor. Pop. 2,300.

HAN, the name of a Chinese dynasty (206 B.C. to 220 A.D) founded by Kau-tsu.

HANG-KIANG, a river of China, a tributary of the YANG-TSE-KIANG. It has a course of about 700 miles.

HANG-YANG, the capital of COREA, near the centre of which it is situated. It is the residence of the sovereign, but is very little known to Europeans. Lat. 37° 40′ N. Lon. 127° 20′ E.

HANCOCK, a county of West Virginia, United States, Pop. 4,500.

HANDEL, GEORGE FREDERICK, han'-del, an illustrious musical composer, a native of Saxony, whose father intended him for the law, and, perceiving his propensity for music, prohibited all instruments from his house. The son, however, contrived to have a small clavicord concealed in the garret, where he used to amuse himself when the family were asleep. At the age of seven he went with his father to the court of the duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, who induced his father to allow his boy to pursue the bent of his genius; and accordingly a master was provided for him. His progress was now so rapid, that, at the age of ten, he composed a set of sonatas, which were in the possession of George III. In 1698 he went to Berlin, where he was greatly noticed by the king of Prussia. Thence he went, in 1703, to Hamburg, where he became director of the orchestra at the opera, and had a duel with Mattheson, another musician, who made a lunge at him, and whose weapon was prevented from penetrating his heart by its being broken against a music score, which Handel happened to have buttoned under his coat. Shortly after this, he composed, at the age of twenty, his opera of "Almera," which had a run of thirty nights. In the following year he produced "Florinda" and "Nerone," and, shortly afterwards visited Italy. At Florence he produced the opera of "Rodrigo," for which he received a service of plate and £50. His fame had now spread far and near, and in 1710 he visited England; but, being under an engagement to the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England, his stay was short. In 1712 he returned, and obtained a pension of £200 a year for a "Te Deum" and his "Jubilate," written by command of Queen Anne, to celebrate the peace of Utrecht. This pension was subsequently doubled. Some of the nobility now projected a plan for erecting an academy in the Haymarket, to secure a supply of operas composed by Handel, and under his direction. This was carried into effect, and succeeded for about ten years, but the result was a failure, and Handel lost £10,000. In 1742, however, his popularity returned, and he retained his glory to the last, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where there is an elegant monument erected to his memory. But his greatest monument is his works. His original MSS. are in the Queen's Library, and consist of 82 large folio volumes. Among these are 20 oratorios, 50 operas, 8 volumes of anthems, and other compositions. In every style of music he excelled, but more especially in sacred music of the choral kind. Wherever his works are now heard performed, admiration is the meed which is universally conceded to them. His most famous works are the "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas Maccabæus," "Samson," "Esther," and "Deborah," among the oratorios; and the "Dettingen Te Deum," "Alexander's Feast" and "Acis and Galatea," among other works. Handel Commemorations were held in Westminster Abbey, in 1784, 1785, 1786, 1790, 1791, and 1834. In 1859, the centenary of his birth was commemorated by a festival in many of the principal places of Europe, America, and even Australia, in token of the universal appreciation in which his compositions are now held. The great Handel Festivals were held at the Crystal Palace in 1859, 1862, 1865, 1868, 1871, 1874, 1877, and 1880, being the most stupendous musical performances ever undertaken.

Born at Halle, Saxony, 1684; died in London, 1759.

HANG-CHOW-FOO, the capital of the Chinese province of Che-Keang, situated about 150 miles S.E. of Nankin, on the left bank of the Tsien-tang river, where it enters the Bay of Hang-chow-foo. Lat. 30° 18′ N. Lon. 120° 15′ E. It was visited by Marco Polo in the 14th century, and was at that time the capital of the empire under the rule of the Mongols. The magnificence of Hang-Chow-Foo is proverbial. It is surrounded by lofty walls, with ten gates, and is 20 miles in circumference; the streets are wide, and lined with elegant shops and large warehouses, and it is reported to be one of the most wealthy cities in China. It is celebrated for its silk manufactures and embroidery; and is also noted for its sanctity, having been from a remote period the resort of pilgrims. It has also a great reputation as a literary centre, and for the possession of numerous colleges and other institutions, amongst them the imperial library, in the palace of Kien-tsing, many of which, however, are going to decay. The remarkable structures of Hang-Chow-Foo and neighbourhood include "The Tower of the Thundering Winds," numerous large Buddhist temples, and the elegant bridges which span the ramifications of the Grand Canal. There is also a remarkable gilt image of Buddha, measuring 48 feet from shoulder to shoulder, cut out of the solid rock. The N.E. portion of the city is occupied by a military colony or garrison. Pop., including environs, 800,000.

HANGO HEAD, or HANGOUD, han'-go, a promontory on the N. coast of the Gulf of Finland, with a harbour and custom-house. Lat. 59° 40′ N. Lon. 22° 58′ E. Here, in 1856, during the war with Russia, an unarmed English boat's crew, although with a flag of truce flying, was treacherously fired upon by Russian grenadiers, all the British sailors being either killed or wounded.

HANKA, WACLAW, han'-ka, a modern Bohemian poet, more celebrated from his having accidentally discovered, in a vault of the church of Kralodvar, the Bohemian manuscript of a poem known as "The Queen's Court," than for the excellence of his own muse. He was, however, an ardent labourer in the field of Bohemian literature, and is said to have been master of eighteen different languages.

Born 1791.

HAN-KOW, a Chinese port situated at the confluence of the Han with the Yang-tze-kiang. It was destroyed during the Tae-ping rebellion, but has since been rebuilt. Han-kow is much frequented by foreigners for trading purposes, and English and American steamers run regularly between it and Shanghai. The principal exports are tea, silk, oil, tallow, furs, tobacco, and wax. Pop. 700,000.

HANLEY, han'-le, a market-town of Staffordshire, 2 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. It has a principal share in the manufacture of the Potteries. It is a station on the North-western railway. Pop. 48,354.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

HANMER, Sir Thomas, han'-mer, an English writer, educated first at Westminster School, and, afterwards, at Christchurch, Oxford. He was chosen speaker of the House of Commons in 1713, and held this office for thirty years. He published an edition of Shakspeare, with notes, in six vols. 4to.

Born 1676; died 1746.

HANNIBAL, han'-ni-bal, a celebrated Carthaginian general, the son of Hamilcar. He was brought up in his father's camp, although, from his earliest years he was accustomed to the labours of the field. He passed into Spain when nine years old, and, at the request of his father, took a solemn oath that he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death, he was appointed commander of the cavalry in Spain and before his 25th year, on the assassination of his brother-in-law, Hasdrubal, was invested with the command of all the armies of Carthage. In three years of continual success, he subdued all the nations of Spain which opposed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum, after a siege of eight months, 218 B.C. This city was in alliance with the Romans, and its fall was the cause of the second Punic war, which Hannibal prepared to support with all the courage and prudence of a consummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he sent to Africa, he left another in Spain, and marched at the head of a third, towards Italy. With this army he crossed the Alps, hitherto deemed impassible, and since accomplished by Napoleon I. under similar military circumstances. He had no sooner entered Italy than he was opposed by the Romans, and after he had defeated the consul, P. Corn. Scipio, on the banks of the river Ticinus (Ticino), he crossed the Apennines, and invaded Etruria. He defeated the army of the consul Flaminius, near the lake Trasimenus, and soon after met the two consuls, C. Terentius and L. Æmilius, at Cannæ, in Apulia. His army consisted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horse, when he here engaged the Romans, and the slaughter was so great, he sent to Carthage three bushels of gold rings, which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in the battle. Had he now marched his army to the gates of Rome, it is usually asserted that it must have yielded amidst the general consternation. After hovering for some time round the city, he retired to Capua, where his soldiers soon forgot to conquer, in the pleasures and riot of this luxurious town. After the battle of Cannæ, the Romans became more cautious; and when the dictator, Fabius Maximus, had defied the artifice as well as the valour of Hannibal, they began to look for better times. Marcellus, who succeeded Fabius in the field, first taught the Romans that Hannibal was not invincible. After many important debates in the senate, it was decreed that war should be carried into Africa, in order to cause Hannibal to withdraw from the gates of Rome; and Scipio, who was the first proposer of the plan, was empowered to carry it into execution. When Carthage saw the enemy on her coasts, she recalled Hannibal from Italy; and he is said to have left, with tears in his eyes, a country which, during sixteen years, he had kept under continual alarms, and which he could almost call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and, after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama, where he suffered a great defeat, 202 B.C. This battle ended the second Punic war. Hannibal, after he had lost the day, fled to Adrumetum, and afterwards to Syria, to king Antiochus, whom he advised to make war against Rome, and lead an army into the heart of Italy. Antiochus distrusted the fidelity of the noble refugee, and was conquered by the Romans, who granted him peace on condition of his delivering their greatest enemy into their hands. The Carthaginian general, being apprised of this, left the court of Antiochus, and fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia. He encouraged him to declare war against Rome, and even assisted him in weakening the power of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, who was in alliance with the Romans. The senate received intelligence of the country in which he had taken shelter from their vengeance, when they immediately sent ambassadors, amongst whom was L. Q. Flaminius, to demand him of Prusias. The king was unwilling to betray Hannibal, and violate the laws of hospitality; but, at the same time, he dreaded the power of Rome. Hannibal, however, extricated him from his embarrassment by swallowing a dose of poison, which he always carried with him in a ring on his finger. As he breathed his last, he exclaimed — "Salvamus diuturnâ curâ populum Romanum, quando mortem senis expectare longum censet." In the same year Scipio and Philopœmen died. The Romans entertained such a high opinion of Hannibal as a commander that Scipio, who conquered him, calls him the greatest general that ever lived, and gives the second rank to Pyrrhus the Epirot, and places himself the next to these in merit and abilities.

Born 247 B.C.; died 183 B.C.

HANNIBAL, a city of Missouri, United States, on the west bank of the Mississippi, 132 miles above St. Louis. It possesses mills, foundries, and machine works, and does a large trade in pork, tobacco, hemp, and grain. Pop. 11,074.

HANNO, han'-no, known as the Great, a Carthaginian general, who was the rival of Hamilcar and afterwards of Hannibal.

Lived in 3rd century, B.C.

HANNO, a Carthaginian, who made a voyage of discovery along the west coast of Africa for the purpose of establishing colonies. Some historians assert that his expedition consisted of 60 ships and 30,000 men and women, a manifestly absurd statement, as each ship must have carried 5,000 persons. He established towns at various places, and it is thought, reached as far south as Sierra Leone. An account of his voyage was inscribed on a temple at Carthage, and translations of it have been preserved.

Lived in the 5th century, B.C.

HANOVER, han'-o-ver, formerly a kingdom of Northern Germany, now a province of Prussia. Its form is irregular, and it is divided by Brunswick into two principal separate portions. It has the Elbe along its N.E. side; the German Ocean on the N.W.; Mecklenburg and the Prussian province of Saxony on the E.; Holland on the W.; and Westphalia and Hesse Cassel on the S. It consists of an immense plain with gentle undulations, but hardly any one that can be called a mountain, with the exception of the Harz range and other elevated tracts in the south, which in some parts attain a height of 3,000 feet. In the south the valleys are fertile, but in the north are many barren heaths and moors: the most productive parts being those along the banks of the rivers, which have been reclaimed from a marshy state. The mountain tract of the Harz is covered with vast forests, which are particularly valuable, as affording fuel for the supply of the numerous mines, which are still more valuable than its forests.

Rivers.—The Elbe, joined by the Jetze; the Ilmenau, the Oste, the Weser, which receives the Leine, the Ocker, the Innerste, the Ruhme, and the Aller. There are several lakes, the chief being the Steinhuder and Dummer.

Climate.—Neither warm nor equable, but mild and healthy; and, except in the loftier mountain districts, not unfavourable to vegetation.

Pro.—The Harz is altogether a mining district. The district of Luneberg contains immense heaths, which are turned to account as sheep-walks, and as affording nourishment to bees, which are very productive. Wheat, barley, and oats, with a considerable proportion of rye and buckwheat, peas and beans, are very generally raised; agriculture, which was formerly in a very backward state, is now pursued with considerable skill and industry.

Minerals.—Mines of silver were discovered as early as 968, and are supposed to have been the first opened in Europe. Iron, copper, and lead are wrought to a great extent; also zinc and sulphur, with green, blue, and white vitriol, arsenic, marble, and freestone.

Manf.—Thread and linen manufactures, coarse woollens, paper, leather, and glass, carried on in a number of places, but generally on a small scale.

Exp.—The chief are coarse linen, iron and copper from the Harz, timber cut into plank; horses and black cattle, from various parts of the country, honey and wax, butter, wheat, and oilcake.

Area.—14,846 square miles.

Pop.—2,120,108, of whom the greater proportion are Protestants.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—Hanover is divided into six districts—HANOVER, HILDESHEIM, LUNEBERG, STADE, OSNABRUCK, and AURICH. The chief town is HANOVER, and EMDEN, HARBURG, LEHE, LEER, and PAPPENBURG, are trading ports.

Railways and Telegraphs.—Nearly 700 miles of railway are in operation, and about the same length of telegraph lines.

History.—Hanover was originally peopled by the Cherusci and the Lombards. In the time of Charlemagne it was occupied by Saxon tribes, and continued, even after its conquest by that monarch, to be governed by Saxon dukes. After being divided into separate duchies, Henry the Superb, duke of Bavaria, extended, by marriage, his dominion over nearly the whole of Hanover; but Otho, his grandson, having been put under the ban of the Church, was despoiled of his estates, with the exception of those which formed the duchy of Brunswick. After his death, the duchy was divided between the different branches of the house. Finally, Ernest Augustus reunited a great portion of the domains of the duchy, and was, in 1692, elevated to the dignity of an elector, under the title of elector of Hanover. This prince had married the daughter of the elector-palatine, grand-daughter of James I., king of England; and thus his family acquired eventual rights to the British throne. George Louis, his son, added to his dominions the remainder of the duchy of Brunswick, by a marriage, in 1698, with Sophia Dorothea, heiress of the other branches of the house of Brunswick; and subsequently Hanover, Bremen, and Verden were joined. The nearest heir to queen Anne, George Louis, succeeded to the crown of England in 1714, under the title of George I. From that period till 1837, Hanover was governed by the kings of England, without, however, forming a part of that kingdom. Under Georges II. and III. it received further acquisitions of territory. In 1803 the French occupied Hanover; but, two years afterwards, ceded it to Prussia. In 1807, however, they again took possession of it, and retained their hold till 1813. In that year the electorate was restored to its former masters, and, in 1815, erected into a kingdom. Various minor changes being made at this period in its territory, the duke of Cambridge, seventh son of George III., was, in 1816, named governor-general of the kingdom, and afterwards viceroy; but in 1837, after the death of William IV., Hanover fell to Ernest Augustus, duke of Cumberland, the fifth son of George III. and younger brother of William IV.; Queen Victoria, by the operation of the Salic law, which excludes females from the throne, not being able to succeed William IV. in his rights over Hanover. The new king abrogated the constitution which had been promulgated in 1833, and opposed the liberal tendencies of the nation. Several important modifications, however, took place in the government, in consequence of the revolutionary movements of 1848. In 1866, Hanover opposed Prussia, in the war with Austria, and the Prussians invaded the country, confiscated the estates of the king, and annexed Hanover, as a Prussian province.

HANOVER, the capital of the former kingdom, and the chief town of the province of Hanover, is situated on the banks of the Leine, 100 miles S.W. of Hamburg. It is separated by the river, which here joins the Ihme, into two parts, called the Old and New Town, which communicate by 10 bridges. These were formerly surrounded by walls and ditches; but in 1780, part of the ramparts were levelled, and laid out into streets, and the rest formed into an esplanade, where a very elegant monument has been erected to Leibnitz. The older parts of the city are meanly built, but there have been great alterations and improvements since the accession of the Duke of Cumberland in 1837. There is a handsome square called Waterloo Platz, with a column surmounted by the figure of Victory. The principal buildings are the town hall, theatre, museum, elector's palace, and the public library, founded by Leibnitz, containing the archives of the kingdom, and a good collection of books. There are several churches, the most interesting being the ancient church of St. Giles, restored in 1827; the antique market church, dating from the 14th century, and the handsome Schloss church, in which are several royal tombs; the Calvinists and the Catholics have each their chapels, and the Jews a synagogue. The palace, once the royal residence, the house where the estates of the kingdom met, and the town-house, are other conspicuous buildings. The charitable institutions are an orphan-house, hospitals, and poor-houses. For the purpose of education, there are a gymnasium, a female school of industry, and various other seminaries. Manf. Gold and silver lace, hosiery, playing cards, tobacco, chicory. Pop. of the district, 462,099; of the town, 137,912.

HANOVER, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area 524 square miles. Pop. 18,588. The capital is Hanover Court House.

HANOVER, a small island off the west coast of Patagonia, South America. Lat. 51° S. Lon. 74° 30′ W.

HANSARD, LUKE, han'-sard. He came up to London, worked as compositor in the office of Hughes, printer to the House of Commons, and succeeded to the business in 1800. The printing of all bills before parliament, reports of committee, &c., &c., is still in the hands of the firm, which also edits and publishes the famous semi-official reports of Parliamentary proceedings, known as "Hansard's Debates."

Born at Norwich, 1752; died 1828.

HANSE TOWNS, hans, certain towns of Northern Germany and the Netherlands, which were associated for the purposes of mutual protection against piracy and robbery, and the arbitrary exactions of existing governments. The Hanse or Hanseatic league was first formed in 1241, by a treaty between Hamburg and Lubeck, with the view of protecting their commerce against the Baltic pirates, and their rights against the encroachments of the neighbouring princes. The advantages gained by this arrangement were so great, that many other towns sought admission into the league, and ultimately it was composed of the principal commercial cities of Europe. Amongst these may be named Bremen, Bruges, Bergen, Novogorod, London, Cologne, Brunswick, Dantzic, and, subsequently, Dunkirk, Antwerp, Ostend, Dort, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, &c.; altogether 85 towns belonged to the league. For a long period this league existed and flourished; but, at the beginning of the 15th century, the discovery of America, and the maritime commerce which resulted from it, caused it rapidly to decline. It was consequently dissolved in 1630, and the only towns now existing, known as Hanse towns, are HAMBURG, BREMEN, and LUBECK.

HANSI, han'-se, a town in the Punjab, India, district of Hissar, 89 miles N.W. of Delhi (lat. 29° 6′ N.; lon. 76° 3′ E.). It is watered by a branch of the Delhi canal. Pop. 13,500.

HANSTEEN, CHRISTOPH, han'-steen, a Norwegian astronomer and mathematician. Having abandoned the legal profession, for which he had been intended, and given himself up to the study of mathematics, he was appointed at the age of thirty (1814) to a professorship in the University of Christiania, and five years afterwards published a work on magnetism, which produced a great sensation. He discovered the "law of magnetic force" in 1821; and between 1828 and 1830 visited Siberia for the purpose of continuing his magnetic observations. He has published several works besides that mentioned above, and since 1837 has had the superintendence of the triangulation of Norway. He also holds the appointment of professor of mathematics in the School of Artillery.

Born at Christiania in 1784.

HANTS. (See HAMPSHIRE.)

HANUMAN, ha-noo-man', the monkey deity of Hindu mythology, the friend and ally of Vishnu during his incarnation as Rama.

HANWELL, han'-wel, a parish of Middlesex, 7 miles from London. Here is situate the lunatic asylum of the metropolitan county, containing, as an average number, 800 lunatics. The church of St. Mary, a beautiful specimen of the Gothic style, was built in 1841, on the site of an older edifice. Pop. 1,547.—A station on the Great Western railway.

HAPAI, or HAVAI. (See TONGA ISLANDS.)

HAPSBURG, HOUSE OF, the name of the imperial family of Austria, derived from the castle of Habsburg, or Habichtsburg (Hawk's Castle), built in the 11th century on the right bank of the river Aar, in the canton of Aargau, in Switzerland, by Werner, bishop of Strasburg. His nephew, Werner II., was the first to assume the title of Count of Hapsburg. (See HABSBURG.)

HARALD I. (surnamed Haarfager "the beautiful haired"), king of Norway in the 9th and 10th centuries. According to tradition, Harald, who was only a jarl, fell in love with a beautiful maiden named Gyda, who declared that she would not marry him until he became sole monarch of his country, which he swore he would achieve before he either cut or combed his hair. He accomplished his vow after a long contest with his brother jarls, whom he defeated and compelled to seek other homes. Ejnar, the son of Rognvald, Jarl of More, settled in the Orkneys; another son of Rognvald founded the Norman power in France, whilst others colonised the Hebrides, Shetland and Faröe Islands, and Iceland, becoming sea rovers and pirates until they were again subdued, with the exception of Iceland, by Harald. He established good government in his dominions, but was much thwarted by family dissensions. He ultimately divided his kingdom amongst his sons, reserving the supreme power to himself, and three years before his death was succeeded by his son Eric Blodoxa.

Died at Trondheim, 936.

HARALD III. (surnamed Haardraade "double beard") king of Norway in the 11th century, was a descendant of Harald I. Was present at the battle at Sticklestadt at which his brother, king Olaf, was killed, after which he sought asylum at the court of the Duke of Russia. For many years subsequently he led a wandering life, and passed through a long series of romantic adventures; became captain of the Scandinavian body-guard of the Greek emperors; took part in the expedition against the Mediterranean pirates, and fought against the Saracens in Palestine. Returning to Constantinople, he was imprisoned in consequence of having rejected the advances of the empress Zoe, and, having escaped from prison, revisited Russia, where he married the daughter of Duke Jaroslav, with whom he went to Norway to share the kingdom with his nephew Magnus. In 1047 Magnus died, and Harald became sole king. He then engaged in a war with Denmark. On the conclusion of peace he occupied himself for some time with the internal affairs of his kingdom, but was killed in 1066 in England, where he had landed to assist Tostig against his brother Harold.

Died 1066.

HARALSON, har'-al-son, a county of Georgia, United States. Pop. 5,974.

HARAMUK, har-a-mook', one of the Himalaya mountains, to the N. of Cashmere. Lat. 34° 26′ N. Lon. 74° 43′ E. (See HIMALAYAS.)

HARBOROUGH, MARKET (see MARKET HARBOROUGH).

HARBURG, har'-boorg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hanover, on a canal which joins the Seve and the Elbe, opposite Hamburg. It has two churches and a palace, and is defended by a citadel and other fortifications. Manf. Tobacco, wax, linen, hosiery, soap, sailcloth, starch, and gunpowder. It carries on an active general and transit trade. Pop. 19,071.

HARDANGER-FJELD, har'-an-ger-feeld, a portion of the great Scandinavian chain of mountains, about 70 miles from Bergen. The average height is 4,000 feet.

HARDANGER-FJORD, fee'-ord, an inlet on the west coast of Norway, 33 miles S.E. of Bergen. It has many branches and islands, has a total length of about 70 miles, and a breadth of from 2 to 5, and is much admired for the beautiful scenery.

HARDEMAN, har'-de-man, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 912 square miles. Pop. 22,921. Bolivar is the capital.

HARDENBURG, hard'-en-bairg, Charles Augustus, prince of, statesman, who several times represented the elector of Hanover at the English court. In 1790 he entered the service of the king of Prussia, whose minister for foreign affairs he became in 1806. At the close of the wars of the first French empire, he signed the treaty of peace at Paris, in 1814. He wrote the memoirs of the period from 1801 to the peace of Tilsit, which still remain in MS. in the state archives, where they were deposited at his death by Frederick-William III.

Born at Hanover, 1750; died at Genoa, 1822.

HARDENBERG, har'-den-bairg, a town of Holland, province of Overyssel, on the left bank of the Vecht, 30 miles N.E. of Deventer. Pop. 2,800.

HARDENBURG, FRIEDERICH VON, was a native of Prussian Saxony, and son of Baron von Hardenburg. His principal works were "Lehringe zu Sais" (Disciples at Sais); "Heinrich von Ofterdingen," which he did not live to finish, and "Hymnen an die Nacht" (Hymns to the Night). He is best known by his literary pseudonym of "Novalis." He died of consumption at the early age of 31.

Born 1772; died 1802.

HARDERWYK, har'-der-vike, a town of Holland, in the province of Gelderland, on the Zuyder Zee, 30 miles E. of Amsterdam. It is a place of some strength, with several churches, townhall, two hospitals, a gymnasium, and different schools. The harbour is suitable only for small vessels. Its environs are beautifully cultivated. It has a trade in grain, timber, and fish. Pop. 5,700.

HARDICANUTE, har-di-ka-nute', eldest son of Canute the Great, king of England, Denmark, and Norway. On the death of his father, whose viceroy he was in Denmark, Harold, a younger son, by Canute's marriage with Alfgiva, daughter of the earl of Northampton, assumed the crown of England, and a bloody struggle was only prevented by the eldest son accepting the sovereignty of the whole country south of the Thames; thus forming the ancient kingdom of Wessex. The chief characteristic of his life was an inordinate love of eating and drinking; and long after his death, by apoplexy, his subjects continued to celebrate the event, under the title of Hog's Tide, or Hock Wednesday. The Danish line in England terminated with Hardicanute.

Born 1018; died at Clapham, 1042.

HARDIN, har'-din, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 184 square miles. Pop. 6,024. The capital is Elizabethtown.

HARDIN, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 17,807.

HARDIN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 439 square miles. Pop. 22,564. The capital is Elizabethtown.

HARDIN, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 27,022. The capital is Kenton.

HARDIN, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 1,043 square miles. Pop. 14,703. Bolivar is the capital.

HARDIN, a county of Texas, United States. Pop. 1,870.

HARDING, STEPHEN, hard'-ing, abbot of Citeaux in the 12th century, was descended from a noble English family and served as a soldier in early life. He subsequently made a pilgrimage to Rome, and afterwards entered the French monastery of St. Claude de Joux. Here he became distinguished for his strictness and exemplary character, and was, in consequence, chosen abbot of St. Bèze, for the purpose of improving its discipline. Thence he was transferred, in 1109, to the monastery of Citeaux, which he reformed. The reputation of the monastery under his rule became so great that the number of applicants for admission compelled him to found several new convents—notably, that of Clairvaux. In 1119 Abbot Stephen, in conjunction with other members of the order, drew up the constitution of the Cistercian order, which, under the title of "Carta Caritaris," received the papal sanction, and has continued in force, with some modifications, down to the present time.

Died 1134.

HARDING, THOMAS, a learned Hebraist and classical scholar, who was one of the tutors of Lady Jane Grey, and afterwards became a Jesuit, and held a controversy with Bishop Jewel.
Born 1512; died 1572.

HARDINGE, HENRY, Viscount, har'-ding, a brave and accomplished English soldier, a field-marshal, and, for some time, commander-in-chief of the British army. He was the third son of the rev. Henry Hardinge, rector of Stanhope, in the county of Durham; became ensign in an infantry regiment in 1798, lieutenant in 1802, and captain in 1804. He served throughout the whole of the Peninsular war, under the Duke of Wellington, who early took him under his patronage. At the battle of Vimiera he was severely wounded, and at Corunna he stood beside Sir John Moore when that hero received his mortal wound. After taking part under the duke of Wellington, in the first and second sieges of Badajoz, he was once more severely wounded at Vittoria. At the battles of the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes, he was present. Returning to England at the close of the Peninsular campaign, he was hailed as one of the bravest English officers. On the renewal of hostilities, he was again in the field, and served upon the duke's staff. He was wounded in the left arm at Ligny, while acting as a brigadier-general of the Prussian army; whereupon his arm was amputated. This skirmish taking place only two days before the battle of Waterloo, he was thus prevented from sharing in that glorious victory. He was created a K.C.B., with a pension of £300 a year. When the duke of Wellington was made premier, in 1828, he selected Sir Henry Hardinge as his secretary-at-war, a post which, two years after, he exchanged for the chief-secretaryship for Ireland, but retired from it a few months after. From 1835 to 1841 he had no official appointment; but, in the latter year, he resumed his former post in Ireland, and continued in it till 1844. In this year he was made governor-general of India, and to his firmness and military skill were chiefly due the successes of the English arms over the Sikhs. When the Sikhs crossed the Sutlej and invaded English territory, they were met by 32,000 British soldiers and 68 guns, and Moodkee and Ferozeshah witnessed the complete rout of the Sikhs. At the latter battle, the governor-general, waiving his title to command, fought under Sir Hugh Gough, and, at the head of the 80th regiment, carried and spiked the Sikh guns. Still acting as second in command, he led the left wing of the British to victory at Sobraon and Aliwal, upon which the Sikhs sued for peace. British troops now garrisoned Lahore, the capital of the Punjab. On the ratification of the treaty which annexed the fertile Punjab to the English dominions, he received the thanks of both houses of parliament, a pension of £3,000 a year, and was made Viscount Hardinge, of Lahore. The East India Company further increased his pension by a grant of £5,000 a year. Under Lord Derby's administration, in 1852, he was made master-general of the ordnance, and, in September of the same year, commander-in-chief, on the decease of the Duke of Wellington. In 1855, he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal. Being seized by a paralytic attack, he resigned the office of commander-in-chief.
Born at Wrotham, Kent, 1785; died 1856.

HARDOUIN, JEAN, har'-doo-an (g), known as "Father Hardouin," a learned French Jesuit, who devoted his life to the study of the dead languages, history, divinity, and philosophy. He was librarian of the college of Louis le Grand, Paris, is famous for his paradoxical attempts to prove that Virgil's "Æneid," the "Odes" of Horace, and other great works of antiquity, were forgeries of the monks during the middle ages. He edited Pliny, and wrote several valuable works on chronology, numismatics, and other subjects, besides a commentary on the New Testament.
Born at Quimper, 1645; died at Paris, 1729.

HARDWICK, PHILIP, R.A., hard'-wik, a distinguished architect and designer of the warehouses and large buildings of the St. Katherine's Dock Company, the new hall of the Goldsmiths' Company, the entrance of the Euston station of the London and Birmingham Railway, and, in conjunction with his son, of the New Hall and Library at Lincoln's Inn. He was, for many years, architect to the Duke of Wellington and to the Greenwich Hospital; received the gold medal of the Institute of British Architects; was a fellow of the same, and has been vice-president; was a fellow of the Royal Society, and was awarded the gold medal of the Paris Exhibition of 1855.
Born in London, 1792; died 1870.

HARDWICKE, PHILIP YORKE, first earl of, a great English lawyer and judge, distinguished for his justice and skill as lord chancellor. In 1718 he was elected into parliament for Lewes, in Sussex; after serving the offices of solicitor and attorney-general, he was, in 1733, appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, and created a peer. In 1736 he was made lord chancellor, which situation he held twenty years. In 1754 he was created Earl of Hardwicke. In all his offices, particularly the last, he so conducted himself as to acquire the esteem of all parties, and the veneration of posterity.
Born at Dover, 1690; died 1764.

HARDWICKE'S ISLAND, off the west coast of British North America, in Johnstone's Strait, between Vancouver's Island and New Hanover. It is about 15 miles long, and 3 broad. Lat. 50° 25′ N.

HARDY, THOMAS MASTERMAN, Sir, English admiral. At the age of 12 he entered the navy as a midshipman, served under Hood and Nelson, greatly distinguished himself at Vera Cruz in 1797, and in 1803 was appointed captain of Nelson's flagship, the Victory. At the battle of Trafalgar Nelson died in his arms. In 1830 he was appointed a lord of the Admiralty, and in 1834 governor of Greenwich Hospital.
Born near Dorchester, 1769; died 1839.

HARDY, a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 1,168 square miles. Pop. 6,000. Moorefield is the capital.

HARDYNG, JOHN, har'-ding, an old English chronicler, who, entering in his youth the service of Sir Henry Percy, eldest son of the Duke of Northumberland, surnamed Hotspur, fought under his banner at the battles of Homildon and Cokelawe. In 1405 he was made constable of Warkworth Castle, in Northumberland; in 1415 he accompanied King Henry to Harfleur; and his account of the march which preceded the battle of Agincourt, forms one of the most striking episodes in his metrical "Chronicle," the composition of which was the sole occupation of his old age. It has been edited by Sir Henry Ellis.
Born 1378; died about 1465.

HARE, JULIUS CHARLES, hair, a distinguished English divine and essayist, and one of the leaders of that section of the Church called "Broad Church." In conjunction with his brother Augustus William, and others, he wrote "Guesses at Truth," a book which has strongly affected thinkers and scholars. He assisted Bishop Thirlwall in translating Niebuhr's "History of Rome." In 1848 he edited the remains of John Sterling. He was fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, rector of Hurstmonceux, and chaplain to the queen. His life was spent in earnestly searching after truth, many short works on philosophy, divinity, sermons, &c., attesting his industry.
Born 1796; died 1855.

HARFLEUR, har'-flur, a town of France, department of Seine Inférieure, situate at the confluence of the Seine and the Lézarde, a mile from the sea, and 4 miles E. of Havre. It has an ancient Gothic church, with a fine spire, built by the English in commemoration of the victory of Agincourt, and a harbour, which was once good, but is now nearly filled up. Manf. Blonde, earthenware, sugar, and leather. Oyster-fishing is also carried on. Pop. 2,000.—Harfleur was formerly fortified, and an important place. It has been twice taken by the English, the most important siege being that undertaken by Henry V., who succeeded in gaining possession of it after being before it forty days.

HARFORD, har'-ford, a county of Maryland, United States. Area, 442 square miles. Pop. 28,042. The capital is Bel Air.

HARGRAVES, EDMUND HAMMOND, har'-graves, the discoverer of gold in Australia, served for some time on board a merchant vessel, but emigrated to Australia in 1839. In 1849 he went to California, where, while searching for "placers," he was struck with the similarity of the Californian soil to that which he had left. Strongly impressed with the idea, he, on his return to Sydney, in 1851, set out towards the Blue Mountains. He reached the Macquarie river, and there saw traces of the precious metal. Returning to Sydney, he induced the authorities to organize an expedition to search for gold. Hardly had it reached the place he had pointed out, when a large quantity of gold was discovered. The gold fever immediately set in. The colony he enriched marked its gratitude by conferring on him a handsome pension. He is the author of "Australia and its Gold-Fields."
Born at Gosport, 1816.

HARGREAVES, JAMES, har'-graives, a celebrated English mechanician, who, while working as a poor weaver at Stanhill, in Lancashire, invented the carding-machine, a substitute for hand-cards, and conceived the idea of imitating, by machinery, the action of the spinner seated at her wool-wheel; by means of which, the "roving" of wool could be extended indefinitely; and, after having been twisted, wound on the cope or spindle. This was the origin of the celebrated "spinning jenny;" and even at the period of its first construction (1764), it produced more work than the combined efforts of thirty spinners with the old wheel. The cotton-spinners, who had hitherto worked by hand, imagining that their trade would be ruined by the new machine, besieged the house of the inventor, and endeavoured to destroy his "jennies." He removed to Nottingham in 1768, and carried on business as a yarn manufacturer. Some Lancashire manufacturers adopted his invention, and, some legal difficulties standing in the way of his patent rights, he obtained no compensation. His only surviving daughter received 250*l.* from the Royal Bounty Fund.
Died 1778.

HARING, WILHELM, hae'-ring, a German novelist who wrote under the pseudonym of Wilibald Alexis, was educated at Berlin, and commenced his career as a volunteer in the campaign of 1815; then studied for the law at Berlin and Breslau. He wrote a number of romances, which have attained a wide popularity. One of his earliest productions was a romance entitled "Walladmor," written in imitation of Sir Walter Scott's style. In Germany, it was for a time received as Sir Walter's, and has been translated into several languages.
Born at Breslau, 1798; died 1871.

HARIPOOR, har-i-poor', a town of the Punjaub, India, on the left bank of the Dor, 10 miles from its junction with the Indus. It is populous and thriving, and has large bazaars and handsome shops.

HARIRI, ABU MOHAMMED AL KASIM BEN ALI, ha-re'-re, a celebrated Arabian grammarian and poet, was the son of a silk merchant at Bassorah, on the Tigris. His best known production is the celebrated "Makamehs" (Sittings), a collection of tales. It has been translated into many languages, and is regarded as next to the "Koran," the highest authority in all questions relating to the Arabic language.
Lived in the 11th century.

HARISCHANDRA, ha-ris-han'-dra, a Hindoo king of the Solar dynasty, and the subject of a legend which bears a curious likeness to the story of Abraham and his son Isaac.

HARLAN, har'-lan, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 954 square miles. Pop. 5,278. Mount Pleasant is the capital.

HARLEBEKE, or HARELBEKE, harl'-bek, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, on the right bank of the Lys, 3 miles N.E. of Courtrai. It is said to be the oldest town in Flanders. There is a very fine church, with a pulpit famous for the beauty of its sculpture. Manf. Linen, ropes, and bricks. Pop. 5,600.

HARLEM. (See HAARLEM.)

HARLESTON, harl'-ston, a market-town in Norfolk, 7 miles S.W. of Bungay. The church, a very fine Gothic edifice, built in 1360, was restored in 1858. St. John the Baptist's is a very handsome church, erected in 1872. There is a great corn-market. Pop. 1,500.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

HARLEY, ROBERT, har'-le, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, a distinguished statesman during the reign of queen Anne, whose weak mind was alternately swayed by him and the celebrated duchess of Marlborough. He was the son of Sir Edward Harley, an eminent Parliamentarian during the civil war, and descended from an old Herefordshire family. He entered parliament for a Cornish borough as a Whig, and soon afterwards joined the Tory party; became speaker of the House of Commons, 1701, and received the appointment of secretary of state, 1704. The treasonable practices of his secretary compelled him to resign this office in 1708, but on the dismissal of Godolphin from power, in 1710, Harley was made chancellor of the exchequer, at the head of the Tory party. He was stabbed by a French spy in the year following, and on his recovery, was congratulated by Parliament, created earl of Oxford and Mortimer, decorated with the Garter, and shortly afterwards appointed lord high treasurer. Three years afterwards he was dismissed from office. He is generally regarded as having been a weak man, with little business ability. He was a patron of literature, as well as a great collector of literary treasures. Impeached for treason by the Whig party, in the year 1715, he was confined in the Tower during two years; but on the Commons declining to prosecute, on his own petition, he was released in 1717, and retired into privacy, when he brought together the splendid collection known as the "Harleian collection" of MSS., purchased by the British Museum for £10,000.

Born in London, 1661; died 1724.

HARLINGEN, har'-ling-en, a seaport of Holland, on the Zuyder Zee, 15 miles W. of Loenwarden. It is protected from the sea by a dyke, 40 feet high; has several churches, and a synagogue; a harbour which communicates with several canals, and where an active trade is carried on with the Baltic. Pop. 10,735.

HARLOW, GEORGE HENRY, har'-lo, an English portrait and historical painter, who possessed a remarkable facility for drawing and colouring. He worked for some time in Sir Thomas Lawrence's studio, which was all the training he received in his art. When at Rome, he finished a copy of Raffaelle's "Transfiguration" in eighteen days; Canova said it looked more like the work of eighteen weeks. The most celebrated of his historical pieces is "The Trial of Queen Catherine," in which Mrs. Siddons is drawn as the queen, and most of the principal characters are portraits of the Kemble family. Although he died almost as soon as he had reached manhood, he achieved a very great reputation in his profession.

Born in London, 1787; died 1819.

HARMODIUS and ARISTOGEITON, two Athenian friends, who were put to death for attempting to avenge an insult offered to the sister of Harmodius. They had also plotted the death of the tyrant Hippias.—In Greek history they are regarded as martyrs, received divine honours, and had statues erected to their memory.

HARMONY, har'-mo-ne, a township of New York, United States. Pop. 3,400.

HARMS, CLAUS, harms, a distinguished German divine, a native of Fahrstedt, in South Ditmarsch, educated at Neldorf and Kiel. From 1802 till 1806 he maintained himself by tuition; in the latter year he was appointed dean of Lunden in Northern Ditmarsch. Ten years later he became archdeacon and afternoon preacher at the Nicolai Kirche, and in 1817, in anticipation of the tricentenary of the Reformation, he issued 95 theses in defence of Protestant orthodoxy under the title "Das sind die 95 Theses Oder Streitsätze Dr. Luthers," which excited much attention. In 1835, an attack of almost total blindness compelled his retirement from the post of chief pastor and provost in Kiel, to which in the interval he had been appointed, and the remainder of his life was spent in literary activity. He was opposed to the prevailing rationalism of his time, and his sermons, of which his published works chiefly consist, are regarded as fine specimens of pulpit oratory.

Born 1778; died 1855.

HARNETT, a county of North Carolina, United States. Pop. 10,862.

HARO, ha'-ro, a town of Spain, in the province of Logrono, near the Ebro, 26 miles N.W. of the town of Logrono. It is not a well-built place, but possesses two churches, a town-house, theatre, and hospital. Manf. Hats, linen, baize, leather, brandy, and earthenware. Pop. 6,000.

HAROERIS, ha-ro'-e-ris. In Egyptian mythology, the brother of Osiris, lord of the South and Nubia, and ruler over heaven, enlightening the world with the brightness of his eyes. He is represented as hawk-headed, wearing the crown of the upper and lower world.

HAROLD I., har'-old, surnamed Harefoot, king of England, was the son of Canute I.; but his legitimacy being questioned, Alnot, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to consecrate any but the sons of Emma. Harold, however, seized upon the throne in 1035, and divided the kingdom with his brother Hardicanute (see HARDICANUTE), and, in 1037, he was crowned king of all England.

Died 1049.

HAROLD II., second son of Godwin, earl of Kent, who had been the favourite during the preceding reign. On the death of Edward the Confessor, in 1066, he seized on the throne. His younger brother, Tostig, at the head of the king of Norway's army, invaded the kingdom; he met him, however, in 1066, when a battle ensued on the Derwent, and Tostig was killed. Scarcely had he disposed of this foe, when his kingdom was invaded once more by William of Normandy, known as William the Conqueror, and, in the celebrated battle of Hastings, Harold fell, pierced through the head by an arrow.

Died 1066.

HAROUN-AL-RASCHID, haroon' al rash'-id, ("the dispenser of justice"), a celebrated Eastern caliph, the most famous of the Abbasides, who was the great patron of arts and letters in his time, and the magnificence of whose court is constantly referred to in Eastern literature to this day. He is the hero of several of the stories of "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments."

Born 765; died 809.

HARPALUS, har'-pa-lus, a Grecian astronomer, who corrected the cycle of eight years, which was invented by Cleostratus, and adopted one of nine, which was afterwards improved by Meton.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian chieftain, to whom Alexander committed the charge of the treasures at Babylon, when he went to the East. He squandered away a large part of the riches, and fled with the remainder. He was assassinated at Crete.

Died 325 B.C.

HARPE, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE LA, harp, a celebrated writer and critic, who, after publishing some lesser pieces, brought forth, in 1764, his tragedy of "Warwick," which was received with applause. This was followed by a number of dramatic pieces, some of which were failures, also poems, which gained prizes from different academies. His éloges of Fénelon, Racine, Catinat, and Charles V., were also greatly admired; but his principal work is a "Complete Course of Literature," in 12 vols. He began his career as an ardent Republican, but completely changed his views, later in life.

Born 1730; died 1808.

HARPER'S FERRY, har'-pers fer'-re, a village of Virginia, United States, at the junction of the Shenandoah with the Potomac, 53 miles N.W. of Washington. It has several churches, iron-foundries, and a national armoury containing nearly 100,000 stand of arms. Here, in 1859, a disturbance took place in the interest of the slaves; but it was soon repulsed, and the leader, John Brown, hanged. Pop. 1,300.

HARPIES, har'-pes. According to Grecian mythology, hideous winged monsters, of fierce aspect, with faces pale from hunger, foul in habit, and polluting everything they approached. They were the ministers of divine vengence. Homer speaks of one; Hesiod mentions two, daughters of Thaumas by the Oceanid Electra; later writers describe them as three in number, daughters of Poseidon or of Typhon. In heraldry a harpy is represented as a vulture with the head and breasts of a woman.

HARPOCRATES, in mythology, the son of Osiris and Isis, honoured by the Greeks and Romans as the divinity of silence. His worship was popular in Rome in the days of Pliny, but was subsequently forbidden.

HARRINGTON, har'-ring-ton, a small seaport in Cumberland, on the Irish Sea, 5 miles N.E. of Whitehaven. It has a shipbuilding-yard, chemical works, and carries on some trade with Ireland. Pop. 1,700.

HARRINGTON, SIR JOHN, an English poet, wit, and satirist. He published a translation of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," and received the honour of knighthood in the field, from the earl of Essex; and, in the reign of James I., was made a knight of the Bath.

Born 1561; died 1612.

HARRINGTON, JAMES, a political writer. On leaving Trinity College, Oxford, he travelled in various parts of Europe. On the outbreak of the civil war he at first joined the parliamentary forces against Charles I., but afterwards became an attendant on his majesty. On the king's death, he devoted his time to study, and composed his "Oceana," a political romance, in which he defended republicanism. This work occasioned a great controversy, and the author formed a society upon its principles. In 1661 he was sent, on a charge of treason, to the Tower; whence he was removed to St. Nicholas's Island, near Plymouth, but was afterwards released on bail.

Born in Northamptonshire, 1611; died 1677.

HARRIOT, THOMAS, har-re-ot, an eminent astronomer and mathematician, who accompanied Sir Walter Raleigh to Virginia, which country he surveyed and mapped. Documents, found after his death, prove him to have discovered the solar spots prior to their being described by Galileo; he is also said to have first observed the satellites of Jupiter, although this discovery has been assigned to Galileo.

Born at Oxford, 1560; died 1621.

HARRIS, or HERRIS, har'-ris, a peninsula of Inverness, forming the S. portion of Lewis Island, in the Hebrides. (See HEBRIDES.)

HARRIS, JOHN, an English divine and mathematician, who was secretary to the Royal Society. He published a translation of Pardie's "Elements of Geometry," but he is best known by having first projected a cyclopædia, or dictionary of sciences. This work appeared in 1710, entitled "Lexicon Technicum;" a supplementary volume was added to it in 1736.

Born about 1667; died 1719.

HARRIS, JAMES, a philological writer. He was a nephew of Lord Shaftesbury, author of the "Characteristics." After leaving Wadham College, Oxford, he sat in Parliament for Christ Church, Hampshire, and in 1763 was appointed commissioner of the Admiralty, but, afterwards, was removed to the Treasury board. In 1774 he was made secretary and comptroller to the queen. He wrote three treatises concerning Art, Music, Painting, Poetry, and Happiness, 8vo; "Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar," and several other philological works.

Born 1709; died 1780.

HARRIS, SIR WILLIAM SNOW, a distinguished natural philosopher and electrician, who introduced an improved form of lightning conductor throughout the British navy. He also improved the mariner's compass; and received one of the gold medals of the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow, and was knighted in 1847 for his eminent scientific services. He was the author of several volumes and pamphlets on electricity and magnetism; a large work on thunderstorms; and many valuable reports by him are included in the Transactions of the learned societies.

Born at Plymouth, 1791; died 1867.

HARRIS, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 414 square miles. Pop. 15,758. Hamilton is the capital.

HARRISBURG, har'-ris-berg, a town of the United States, capital of Pennsylvania, on the left bank of the Susquehanna, 100 miles W. of Philadelphia. It is well built on a fine site, and has a handsome state-house, numerous churches, a court-house with a cupola. There are two bridges over the Susquehanna. Manf. Brewing, tanning, and there are some potteries. It carries on a large trade in timber. Pop. 30,762.

HARRISON, JOHN, har'-ri-son, an eminent mechanician, who, though he began life as a carpenter, displayed such great mechanical powers, that a wooden clock he had constructed was universally admired for its accuracy. Encouraged by his success, he constructed a timekeeper, with which he, in 1735, travelled from Lincolnshire to London. Halley, Graham, and other eminent astronomers admitted its excellence, and procured him a passage to Lisbon in a man-of-war, with the view of correcting the longitude by its means. An Act had been passed in 1714, offering £20,000 for a method of ascertaining the longitude within 30 miles. By means of his instrument he had ascertained the longitude within 18 miles, and he accordingly claimed the reward. After a long delay, and considerable discussion, he received the whole of the £20,000 in 1767. Though he possessed the greatest scientific abilities, he was almost incapable of communicating his knowledge clearly in writing or speaking.

Born near Pontefract, 1693; died in London, 1776.

HARRISON, JOHN, one of the members of the High Court of Justice which sat in judgment on Charles I., and condemned him to death. He was the son of a butcher, and rose by bravery and merit to the rank of colonel in the parliamentary army. He was executed, with nine others of those who signed the king's death-warrant, at the Restoration.

Died 1660.

HARRISON, WILLIAM HENRY, ninth president of the United States, who served against the Indians when a youth, became governor of Indiana in 1801, and in the war against the English in 1811 displayed military qualities. In 1813 he pursued the British forces into Canada, and totally defeated them. In 1816 he was elected to Congress, and became a senator in 1824. In 1828 he went as ambassador to Colombia, and afterwards acted as clerk of a county court in Ohio for twelve years. He was proposed for president in 1836, unsuccessfully, but was elected in 1840. He died only one month after his installation, being the first president who died in office. He communicated a valuable essay on the "Aborigines of the Ohio Valley" to the Philosophical Society of Ohio.

Born in Virginia, 1773; died at Washington, 1841.

HARRISON, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 446 square miles. Pop. 21,326. The capital is Corydon.

HARRISON, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 16,649.

HARROGATE, HARROWGATE, or HIGH HARROGATE, har'-ro-gate, a town of Yorkshire, 20 miles W. of York, partly situated on an elevated flat, and partly in a valley. Its mineral springs (some chalybeate, and some sulphureous and saline) attract numerous visitors, and make it one of the most fashionable watering places in the N. of England. There are many fine public buildings, including baths, hotels, libraries, reading-rooms, &c. Pop. 9,482.—A station on the North Eastern, Great Northern, London and North Western, and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL, har'-ro, a village of Middlesex, 10 miles from London, situate on the most elevated spot in the county, and overlooking a fine expanse of country. It has an old church, St. Mary's, with a conspicuous spire, and is celebrated for its school, one of the great public schools of England, at which many men noted in the history of their country (including Sir W. Jones, Lord Byron, George Canning, Sir R. Peel, and Lord Palmerston) have been educated. Pop. 5,551.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

HARRY, BLIND, har'-re, as he is generally called, or Henry the Minstrel, whose poem on the adventures of Wallace, in eleven books, is celebrated for its animated description of wars and the deeds of soldiers. Blind Harry is the modern parallel to Homer, who, according to some accounts, is said to have travelled from one Greek state to another reciting his Iliad.

Lived in the 15th century.

HART, hart, a county of Georgia, United States. Pop. 9,094.

HART, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 404 square miles. Pop. 17,133. The capital is Munfordville.

HARTENSTEIN, har'-ten-stine, a town of Saxony, on the Thierfeld, 50 miles S.E. of Leipsic. It stands at the foot of a hill, on the summit of which is a royal castle. Manf. Linen and hosiery. Pop. 2,500.

HARTFORD, har'-ford, a city of Connecticut, on the right bank of the Connecticut river. It is one of the two capitals of the state; the legislature meets here and at New Haven alternately. It is regularly built, has a state-house, city hall, Trinity College, asylums for the deaf and dumb, and for the insane, the Wordsworth Athenæum, in the Gothic style, and twelve churches. Manf. Firearms, machinery, leather, earthenware, carpets, linen, and silver plated ware. It has an extensive trade, and carries on a large traffic by rail and river. Pop. 42,015.

HARTFORD, a county of Connecticut, United States. Area, 727 square miles. Pop. 125,382. The capital is HARTFORD.

HARTLEPOOL, har'-tel-pool, a municipal and Parliamentary borough, seaport, and market-town in Durham, 20 miles E. of the city of Durham. It is situated north of the estuary of the Tees, on a small peninsula, has many fine houses and shops, the old church of St. Hilda, restored in 1867, with several dissenting chapels, a guildhall, public baths, fine harbour and docks, and a very extensive export of coals. Steamers sail regularly for Scotland, Antwerp, Rotterdam, and Hamburg. Pop. 12,684.

HARTLEPOOL, WEST, a market-town and seaport 1 mile W. of Hartlepool. It was founded in 1847 by R. W. Jackson, Esq. It possesses numerous public buildings, including a handsome Gothic church, and other places of worship, theatre, custom-house, mechanics' institute, and market house. There are large docks, timber ponds, and 3 miles of quays; also iron foundries, locomotive and boiler works, &c., &c.; and iron shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent. The export of coal alone from the united port is about 1,500,000 tons annually. Pop. 28,167.

HARTLEY, DAVID, hart'-le, metaphysician, and author of a well known work, "Observations on Man," was the son of a Yorkshire clergyman. He was educated at Cambridge with a view to entering the church, but abandoned his intention in consequence of his inability to accept the Thirty-nine Articles, and adopted the profession of medicine. He practised at Newark, Bury St. Edmunds, London, and Bath successively, with great success. His dissent from the articles of the Church appears to have been mainly, if not entirely, confined to the question of future punishment, respecting which he held the doctrine of the universal restoration of mankind. His work mentioned above, upon which his reputation principally rests, was commenced at the age of 25, and occupied his attention for sixteen years, having been published in 1749. It contains two prominent hypotheses, the doctrine of vibrations, which is a theory of nervous action, analogous to the propagation of sound; the second is the doctrine of the association of ideas, which received at his hands a wider extension and fuller application than had previously been attempted.

Born at Armley, 1705; died 1757.

HARTMANN, Von der Aue, hart'-man, a German poet of the 12th century. He was the author of two poems, "Erec" and "Iwein," based on Arthurian legends, besides various narrative poems, one of which, "Der arme Heinrich," is based on the tradition used by Longfellow in his "Golden Legend." His works have been translated into modern German, and republished in the present century. He was a Suabian knight, and joined the crusade in 1197.

Born about 1170; died between 1207 and 1220.

HARTZENBUSCH, Juan Eugenio, hart'-zen-boosh, a Spanish poet and dramatist, born in Madrid, but of German extraction, was educated under the Jesuits, and produced his first work, "Amantes de Teruel," in 1836; since then he has published numerous dramas, fugitive poems, and prose essays. He has a reputation for originality, great imaginative powers, united to vigorous diction and sonorous versification.

Born 1806.

HARVEY, Sir George, P.R.S.A., an eminent Scottish historical and landscape painter. Engravings of some of his works have achieved great popularity, amongst them "Covenanters Preaching," "Battle of Drumclog," "The first Reading of the Bible in Old St. Paul's," "The Curlers," "Columbus discovering America," and "Quitting the Manse." He was born at St. Ninian's, near Stirling, entered the school of the "Trustees' Academy" at the age of 18, was elected an associate of the Royal Scottish Academy on its establishment, in 1826; became an academician in 1829; was elected president in 1864, and knighted in 1867.

Born 1806; died 1876.

HARVEY, William, har'-ve, a celebrated physician, son of a Kentish yeoman. He received his education at the grammar school of Canterbury, and Caius College, Cambridge, and then went to Padua, where he took his doctor's degree in physic. In 1607 he was admitted fellow of the College of Physicians, and in 1615 anatomical reader. This appointment was probably the more immediate cause of the publication of his great discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he made known to the world in his treatise "On the Circulation of the Blood," published in 1628. This discovery effected a revolution in medical science, was for a long time opposed in the most violent manner, and, even when its truth was admitted, many foreign practitioners endeavoured to rob the author of his due honour, by ascribing it to other persons; but the right of Harvey to the discovery has long since been fully established. In 1632 he was made physician to Charles I., and, it is stated, frequently exhibited to him and his courtiers the motions of the heart and other phenomena, upon which his doctrines were based. In 1645 he was chosen warden of Merton College, Oxford; but, when the parliamentary party were in the ascendant, he left it for London, and was elected president of the College of Physicians, but declined the office on account of his infirmities. After his death, he left his estate to the college, for which he had built a library and museum. A handsome edition of his works, all of which were composed in correct and elegant Latin, was published by the College of Physicians in 1766.

Born at Folkestone, Kent, 1578; died 1657.

HARVEY, Gideon, an English physician and writer on medicine, who, after completing his studies at Leyden, became a fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and was physician to Charles II. in his exile, and to the English army in Flanders.

Died 1700.

HARWICH, har'-idj, a municipal and parliamentary borough, market-town, seaport, and watering-place of Essex, on the German Ocean, at the extremity of a point of land near the estuary of the Stour and Orwell, 12 miles S.E. of Ipswich. It consists of three main streets, and has a handsome modern church, several chapels, a town-hall, custom-house, theatre, &c. It also possesses one of the best harbours on the E. coast of England, which is defended by two forts, and is much used for refuge in easterly winds. There are two long jetties. Its chief branches of industry are the manufacture of Roman cement, artificial manure, fishing, and ship building. Pop. 7,810. Lat. 51° 56′ N. Lon. 1° 17′ E.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

HARZ, or HARTZ, hartz, an isolated mountain mass in N. Germany (see Hanover), which does not form a continued chain, but rises in terraces, attaining, in the Brocken, its culminating point. (See Brocken.) It stretches partly through Prussia, Hanover, Brunswick, and Anhalt-Bernburg, having a length of about 70 miles, with a breadth of 20, and it separates the basins of the Elbe and the Weser. The north-western part of the range is known as the Ober, or Upper Harz; the south-eastern portion as the Unter, or Lower Harz. Geographically, it belongs for the most part to the Devonian formation, pierced in places by granite. Metals abound here, principally lead, with some silver, copper, and iron. Lat. between 51° 35′ and 51° 57′ N. Lon. between 10° 10′ and 11° 30′ E.

HARZGERODE, hartz'-ge-rode, a town of Anhalt-Bernburg, Germany, 37 miles N.W. of Halle. It is fortified, and has an old castle. The favourite watering-place, Alexisbad, is about two miles to the west. Pop. 2,500.

HASDRUBAL, has'-dru-bal, son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, the Carthaginian general. Accompanied his father-in-law into Spain, and after his death carried out the plans of his predecessor with great success. Carthago Nova, now known as Cartagena, was founded by him. He was murdered by a slave, who killed him to revenge the death of his master.

Died 220 B.C.

HASDRUBAL, brother of Hannibal, and son of Hamilcar Barca. Was a leader of the Carthaginian forces in the second Punic war, and finding himself defeated by the Roman army, under the consul C. Nero, and M. Livius, at the river Metaurus, he rushed into the midst of the enemy, and was slain.

Died 207 B.C.

HASE, Karl August, hase, a German theologian, author of numerous works on theology, church history, ecclesiastical law, &c., is a native of Saxony, and was educated at Altenburg, Leipsic, Erlangen, and Tübingen; was confined for five months in the fortress of Hohenasperg for taking part in the Burschenschaften. In 1829 he became extraordinary professor of philosophy at Leipsic, where he lectured on Dogmatics and the Life of Christ. In his "Leben Jesu," which appeared in the same year, he opposed the old rationalistic conceptions of Christ, and endeavoured to show "how Jesus of Nazareth, according to divine destination, by the free act of His own spirit, and by the opportunities of his time, became the Saviour of the World." He was soon afterwards appointed professor of theology at Jena. His principal works besides the "Leben Jesu" are "Die Leipziger Disputation," "Theologische Streitschriften," "Die Tubinger Schule," "Hutterus Redivivus," &c., &c.

His "Compendium of Church History" has been translated into English, and is highly esteemed.
Born 1800.

HASLINGDEN, a manufacturing and market-town in Lancashire, 18 miles E. of Preston. There are numerous places of worship, a town-hall, mechanics' institute, &c. There are extensive cotton and woollen manufactures, and in the vicinity coal mines and stone quarries are worked. Pop. 14,333.

HASSAN BEN SABAH, the founder of the sect of the "Assassins," and known in European story as the "Old Man of the Mountains."

HASSE, ADOLPH, hass, a celebrated musical composer, who in his youth was an excellent tenor vocalist. After studying in Italy under the best masters, he produced his opera "Sesostrate," at Naples, in 1725. In 1733 he was chosen by a section of the English nobility hostile to Handel, to compose an Italian opera in opposition to that great master; but, after meeting with some success in London, he retired to Dresden, in 1745, and became the favourite composer of Frederick of Prussia.
Born 1705; died at Vienna, 1783.

HASSELT, the capital of the Belgian province of Limbourg, is situated on the left bank of the Demer, 17 miles west of Maastricht. It is a walled town. Manf. Linen fabric, lace, and tobacco. There is also a considerable trade in distilling. Pop. 12,013.

HASTINGS, a sea rover of the 9th century, whose birthplace is uncertain, the story of his achievements improbable, and his individuality doubtful.

HASTINGS, WARREN, hais'-tings, governor-general of India, was descended from an old Worcestershire family. He was educated at Westminster School, and went out, in 1750, as writer in the service of the East-India Company. Having mastered the Persian and Hindustani languages, which, till his time, had been generally neglected, he was sent on more than one diplomatic and commercial mission into the interior, and in fourteen years he returned to England with a competent fortune, intending, henceforth, to live a life of retirement. In 1769, however, he was appointed second in the council of Madras, and, in 1772, was advanced to the highest civil post in the Company's service,—president of the Supreme Council of Bengal. An act of parliament altering the constitution of the Indian government, made Hastings governor-general. The territories of the Company, although greatly enlarged by the victories of Clive and others, were, at this time, in a very disorganised condition, and were in imminent danger from the persevering enmity of Hyder Ali, rajah of Mysore, supported by the Mahrattas and other native powers. But he vanquished the enemies of the Company, consolidated its power, and increased its revenue; though the English people were informed that all this had been accomplished by cruelty, corruption, and unlimited aggression, while the Court of Directors deemed that he acted in too independent a manner. The Court of Proprietors, however, supported him, and he commenced to wield absolute and irresponsible power, overruling the authority of the council, and refusing to obey orders, from whatever source transmitted. In 1785 he resigned, and on arriving in England was impeached, after long preparation, before the House of Lords, in Westminster Hall. Edmund Burke, in a speech which lasted more than three days, charged him with injustice and oppression towards the native princes, in illegally receiving presents himself, and with enriching his dependants and followers, by bribery and a wasteful expenditure of the Company's revenue. Three sessions were consumed in stating the case for the prosecution, and in the fourth several of the charges were abandoned, in order to bring the trial to a close. His defence was not finished till the 17th of April, 1795, when he was acquitted on each charge brought against him. The historians of India, without palliating the vices of his administration, have sought an apology for his conduct in the difficulties of his situation, and the lax tone of morality prevalent among Indian officials at that period. It is universally admitted that his talents were remarkable, and services great. The law expenses of his defence amounted to £76,080. In 1796 the Company granted him a pension of £4,000 per annum, for 28 years, and lent him £50,000 for 18 years without interest. He retired to Daylesford, an estate which his family had formerly owned, and which he had repurchased.
Born 1733; died 1818.

HASTINGS, a parliamentary and municipal borough, market-town, and favourite watering-place of Sussex, and one of the Cinque Ports, 36 miles from Tunbridge. Its situation is beautiful, and environs abound with picturesque scenery. A walk, called the Marine Parade, has been formed on the west of the town, and continues to St. Leonard's, forming an almost unrivalled promenade. The public buildings are two very ancient churches, one of which, St. Clement's, was restored in 1875, and several modern churches, the town-hall, the custom-house, free schools, and a barrack. The remains of an ancient castle occupy the summit of a lofty hill. The older part of the town is in a hollow between Castle and East Hills. On the East beach is a fish-market, erected in 1870. In the new part are handsome terraces and streets, with large hotels and elegant shops. The Gothic Albert Memorial was erected in 1864, and the pier, 900 feet long, was opened in 1872. In the vicinity are many beautiful places of resort. Pop. 42,256.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South-Coast, and South-Eastern railways.

HATFIELD, or BISHOP'S HATFIELD, hat'-feeld, a town of Hertfordshire, on the Lea, 19 miles from London. Here is Hatfield House, the handsome seat of the Marquis of Salisbury, and in which Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth resided when children. Pop. 6,502.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

HATRAS, ha-tras', a town in the North-West Provinces of Hindostan, 33 miles north of Agra (lat. 27° 36′ N.; lon. 78° 9′ E.). It was formerly a place of some strength, but was dismantled in 1817 by the British. It has a trade of some extent in cotton. Pop. 25,656.

HATTERAS, hat'-te-räs, a cape on the coast of N. Carolina, at the extremity of a sandy island, Pamlico Sound. The heavy sea produced here by storms, makes this headland formidable to navigators. Lat. 35° 15′ N. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

HATTO, hat'-to, archbishop of Mainz in the 10th century, was originally a monk in the monastery of Fulda, and subsequently abbot of the monastery of St. Boniface; was employed by Otho I. as his ambassador to Rome, and afterwards raised to the see of Mainz. His character has been variously represented, and the poet Southey has embodied in his ballad of "Bishop Hatto" the legend of his having been devoured by rats. There was another archbishop of Mainz who presided over the see from 891 to 913.
Died 969.

HATZFELD, hatz-feld, an Austrian town, 24 miles west of Temesvar in the Temesvar Banat. There is an extensive trade in corn, and the breeding of horses is carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. 8,000.

HAUCH, HANS CARSTEN, howk, Danish poet, dramatist, and novelist; was born at Frederickshald, graduated at Christiania, and was appointed professor of physics at the royal academy of Sorve in 1827, which he held until 1846, when he accepted the chair of Northern Literature in the University of Kiel. The outbreak of the Schleswig Holstein revolution in 1848 compelled him to retire to Copenhagen, where, by royal favour, he took up his residence at the palace of Fredericksborg, and in 1850 was appointed professor of Æsthetics at the university of Copenhagen. He is the author of some popular lyric poetry, has written numerous dramas which are highly esteemed, and as a novelist has shown great diversity of talent.
Born. 1791.

HAUPUR, or HAPUR, a town of India, the capital of a district of the same name, 20 miles from Meerut. Pop. 14,500.

HAURAN, hau-ran', a tract of Syria, to the east of the river Jordan, extending to Damascus. It is supposed to be the land of Bashan of the Bible.

HAUSER, CASPAR, how'-ser, the name assumed by a youth found in the streets of Nuremberg on the afternoon of May 26, 1828. He wore the dress of a peasant boy, and carried a letter addressed to the captain of the sixth regiment of horse at Nuremberg. This letter was dated "from the confines of Bavaria, place unknown." It stated that the writer was a poor labourer with a family of ten children, that the boy had been left at his door by his mother, a person who was unknown to the writer of the letter; that he had brought the lad up secretly, and had given him instruction in reading, writing, and the doctrines of the christian religion, and that it was the boy's desire to become a horse-soldier. In this letter was enclosed a statement purporting to be from the mother, stating that she was a poor girl and had given birth to her boy on April 30, 1812; that his father who had been a soldier in the sixth regiment was dead, and that the boy's name was Caspar. The boy himself appeared to be about 16 or 17 years of age, spoke but little, and to all questions replied either "from Regensburg," or "I don't know." He could however, write his name plainly. He was short in stature and well proportioned, with delicate white skin and small hands and feet. He appeared totally ignorant of the most ordinary objects, and showed a great dislike to all kinds of meat and drink, preferring dry bread and water. He could only utter a few words of the old Bavarian language. When found he had but a few articles of clothing and a handkerchief with initials. He subsequently explained that from his childhood he had worn only a shirt and trousers; had been fed upon bread and water by a man who usually cleaned and dressed him, and supplied him with food while he was asleep; that he lived in a small, dark, underground place, and that his sole amusement was to play with a couple of wooden horses, but that some time before he was conveyed to the city of Nuremberg, the man had taught him to write by guiding his hand, and to lift his feet and walk. In July of the year in which Caspar was found he was committed to the care of professor Daumer, but he did not make such rapid progress as had been expected, or that the extraordinary memory he appeared to possess and his desire for knowledge led his instructor to anticipate. In October of the next year he was one day found bleeding from a wound in the brow, which he said had been inflicted by a person with a black beard. After this he was constantly guarded. At the suggestion of Lord Stanhope, who took an interest in his welfare, Caspar was sent to Anspach and employed in an office in the court of appeal. On the 14th of December, 1833, according to a story he persisted in until his death, a stranger under the pretext of having a message from Lord Stanhope and of informing him of the circumstances of his birth, invited him to a meeting in the palace garden, and stabbed him in the left side, from the effect of which he died three days after. No solution of the mystery surrounding the birth and death of Caspar Hauser has ever been arrived at.
Died 1833.

HAUTES-ALPES, a department of the south of France, lying to the north of Basse-Alpes. It is traversed by the chief range of the Cottian Alps, rising to about 14,000 feet. The general elevation is greater than in any other part of France, and the climate is severe and the soil barren, but in some of the southern valleys fruit trees thrive.
Pro. Lead, copper, iron, and anthracite coal.
Manf. Leather, linen, and woollens.
Area, 2,158 square miles.
Pop. 121,787.
Divisions and Chief Towns. There are 3 arrondissements and 189 communes. The capital is GAP.

HAUSSMANN, GEORGE EUGENE, Baron, haus'-man, at an early age entered the service of the French government. In 1853 he was appointed prefect of the department of the Seine, and made himself famous by the extensive alterations and improvements in Paris, completed under his superintendence. He was made a senator in 1857; grand cross of the legion of honour, 1862; and member of the Academy of Fine Arts and of the Imperial Council of Public Instruction in 1867.
Born in Paris, 1809.

HAVANA, or THE HAVANNAH, ha-van'-na (Spanish, HABANA, "the harbour"), the capital of the island of Cuba, on its N. coast, at the mouth of the river Luyano. The harbour is one of the best in the world, being capable of holding commodiously 1,000 ships; but has so narrow a channel, that only one vessel can enter at a time. This channel is strongly fortified; the city is also surmounted with works, all furnished with heavy artillery. A square citadel, of great strength, is erected near the centre of the town; and here is the captain-general's palace, where the treasure is deposited. The city contains a cathedral and 16 other churches, two hospitals, a dockyard, lazaretto, and numerous public buildings. An aqueduct supplies the shipping with water, and turns the saw-mills in the dockyard. The town stands in a plain on the W. side of the harbour; and the houses, which are elegant, are mostly of stone. There are several convents, and the great square is a fine ornament of the place. There is a very fine promenade named Isabel Segunda running through the centre of the city. Manf. Cigars, which are celebrated throughout the world; chocolate, straw hats, and woollen fabrics. The trade of this port is chiefly carried on with the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and Spain. Pop. 203,000, including a large number of slaves. Lat. 23° 10′ N. Lon. 82° 22′ W.—This city has been frequently attacked; it was taken in 1538 by a French privateer, when the town was burnt; was subsequently taken by the English, by the French, and by the buccaneers. In 1762 the British took possession of it, but restored it in 1763.

HAVEL, ha'-vel, a navigable river in the N. of Germany, which, after a course of 218 miles, falls into the Elbe.

HAVELOCK, HENRY, Sir, hav'-lok, major-general in the British army. He was the son of a merchant and shipbuilder of Durham, was educated at the Charterhouse, in London, and entered the army in 1815. In 1823 he went to India, distinguished himself in the Afghan and Sikh wars; and in the expedition to Persia. On the outbreak of the great mutiny in 1856, he commanded the troops employed to release the British in Cawnpore and Lucknow. Before reaching the former place he had three severe engagements with the mutineers, in each of which he was victorious. A series of brilliant victories followed, and being reinforced by general Outram, who, in deference to the great achievements of Havelock, waived his right to the command, he marched to Lucknow, and fought his way to the Residency, where the British garrison was besieged. After the timely arrival of Lord Clyde, Havelock, whose great exertions had affected his health, died from an attack of dysentery. The intelligence that he had been raised to the rank of major-general, appointed colonel of the 3rd Foot, and created a baronet and K.C.B., with a pension of £1,000 a year, came too late. He was a deeply religious man, a soldier of the old Puritan type, of dauntless courage, and distinguished military ability, and a strict disciplinarian, but beloved by his soldiers for his justice and generosity. There is a statue to his memory in Trafalgar square, London.

Born in Durham, 1795; died at Lucknow, 1856.

HAVERFORDWEST, hav'-er-ford-west, a parliamentary and municipal borough, seaport, and market-town of Pembrokeshire, on the West Cleddau, 17 miles N. of Pembroke. It is situate on the sides and at the foot of several steep hills, its site being very uneven, and the streets narrow. There are, however, many good houses, and it has several neat and clean streets. The principal public building is the guildhall. St. Mary's church, one of the finest in South Wales, has a beautifully carved roof, and is richly ornamented. There are other churches, handsome chapels for dissenters, a town and county gaol, and a corn-market. There are the ruins of a castle, belonging to the earl of Pembroke, which, when perfect, must have been a large and magnificent structure. The keep is the only portion that now remains entire, and that is used as the county gaol. Pop. 6,393.—A station on the Great Western railway.

HAVERHILL, hav'-er-hill, a town of Massachusetts, United States, on the north bank of the Merrimac, 32 miles N. of Boston. On the opposite side of the river is Bradford, with which it is connected by two bridges. Manf. Woollen, leather, boots and shoes, hats, iron, soap, candles, tinware, and railway carriages. Pop. 18,472.

HAVERSTRAW, hav'-er-straw, a village in the State of New York, United States, on the right bank of the Hudson, 37 miles N. of New York, with which considerable trade is carried on by steamboats. There are several iron foundries. Pop. 4,000.

HAVRE, LE, or LE HAVRE DE NOTRE DAME DE GRACE, havr, an important commercial town of France, department of Seine-Inférieure, on the north side of the estuary of the Seine, 108 miles N.W. of Paris. The entrance to the harbour is formed by two long jetties, beyond which are the outer harbour, and spacious wet docks. There are several dry docks, one of considerable size, and a basin with an area of 53 acres. The greater part of the town, which now includes the adjacent villages of Ingouville and Graville l'Heure, is modern. The most interesting public buildings are the new city hall, the exchange, the tower of Francis I., the hotel-de-ville, and the fine churches of Notre Dame and St. Francis. There are an arsenal, a school of navigation, and a public library, in front of which are statues of Bernasden, St. Pierre, and Casimer Delavigne, both natives of the town. Havre ranks as the second commercial city of France, about one-fifth of the foreign trade of the country, three-fourths of the imports of cotton, and the greater part of the German American trade passing through it. About 500 vessels belong to the port, and nearly 3000 annually enter. It is the port of Paris, with which it is connected by railway, and has direct communication with England, the United States, South America, Holland, Hamburg, India, and other places. The town had formerly strong fortifications, but they were demolished a few years since. Manf. Cotton goods, lace, paper, machinery, tobacco, sugar, starch, oil, and chemicals. Pop. 105,540. Previous to the 16th century, Havre was a fishing village, but a harbour was formed by Louis XII., and the town rapidly rose into importance, becoming the principal seat of the trade with the French settlements in India and on the West Coast of Africa. The emperor Napoleon I. improved the harbour and docks, and erected two lighthouses. Lat. 49° 29′ N. Lon. 0° 6′ 37″ E.

HAVRE DE GRACE, a small seaport of Maryland, United States, on the right bank of the Susquehanna, 33 miles N.E. of Baltimore, at the termination of the Susquehanna canal, which connects the Chesapeake with the canals of Pennsylvania. Pop. 1,800.

HAWASA. (See AUSSA.)

HAWAII, or OWHYEE, ha-wa-ee', largest and most southerly of the Sandwich or Hawaiian Islands. (See SANDWICH ISLANDS.) In shape it is an irregular triangle, about 100 miles long from north to south, and 64 and 84 miles on the other sides. It is volcanic in formation, and contains several volcanoes, of which the most remarkable are Kilauea and Mauna-Loa. The former is a mountain 3,970 feet high, in the centre of which is a huge pit, the sides of which descend for more than 1,000 feet into the interior like an amphitheatre, in a series of three terraces, with almost perpendicular sides. The red lava is always in a state of ebullition. The natives call the volcano, Pele's Pit, and it was supposed to be the habitation of Pele, a terrible goddess, to appease whom, pigs and other animals were thrown into the crater. Mauna-Loa, to the north-west of the other volcano, is a mountain 13,760 feet in height, with a crater two miles in diameter on the summit. There have been frequent disastrous eruptions of the volcano. Mauna-Huarari, in the western part of the island, 7,822 feet high, has several craters. The loftiest peak in Hawaii is Mauna-Kea, in the north-east. It is 13,953 feet in height, and is topped with nine cones, but there is no apparent crater. The coast, except on the north and north-west, is rocky and precipitous, with deep gulleys and many cascades on the streams which rise in the mountains. In the northern parts of the island, are large tracts of fertile land. The most important bays are Kealakeakua, on the west coast, and Hilo, or Byron, on the north east. The town of Hilo is on the bay of the same name. It is a seaport of, as yet, but slight importance, but has several large sugar manufactories.

Climate.—Salubrious, the heat being greatly tempered by the steady trade winds, which on the windward side of the islands blow uninterruptedly for nine months out of the twelve. The leeward sides are less agreeable, and subject to greater heat and changes. Water is very scarce, the cattle often allaying their thirst by the heavy dews which fall in lieu of water. The temperature near the seashore is very regular indeed, seldom varying more than 12° per day. Almost any temperature may be enjoyed, from the constant summer near the shores to perpetual winter near the summits of Mauna Loa or Mauna Kea; the temperature gradually decreasing towards the interior and rising ground. Two seasons are experienced, the wet and dry, but they are not well marked. The greatest rainfall, about six inches, takes place in November, and the least in June. Hurricanes or very heavy storms, long droughts, or excessive cold winds are little known, and cause great excitement amongst the inhabitants.

Pro.—The staple production is sugar, which is made in excellent mills, worked by steam and water power, many Chinamen being employed as labourers. Sweet potatoes, yams, melons, pine-apples, bananas, bread fruit, and cocoa, are also cultivated.

Area.—4,040 square miles.

Pop.—41,000, of whom more than 12,000 are whites.

History.—Hawaii, or Owhyee, was discovered in 1778 by Captain Cook, who was murdered by the natives at Kealakeakua Bay. A monument to his memory was erected in 1825. For history of the Sandwich or Hawaiian group see SANDWICH ISLANDS.

HAWARDEN, haw'-ar-den, a market-town in Flintshire, partly in Cheshire, 7 miles W. of Chester. Here are iron-foundries and considerable potteries. It has an ancient parish church and a free grammar school, and near the town are the remains of the strong castle of Peny Llwch. Pop. 15,695.

HAWASH, ha'-wash, a river of Abyssinia, rising near lat. 9° N., and lon. 38° E.; flowing in a north-easterly direction, forming the boundary between Shoa and the Gallas country, and falling into Lake Aussa.

HAWES, haws, Stephen, an English poet, well versed in French and Italian poetry, and groom of the privy chamber to Henry VII. His works are, "The Temple of Glass," which is a copy of Chaucer's "House of Fame;" "The Passetyme of Pleasure," which was printed in 1517, by Wynkyn de Worde, with woodcuts.

Died in the early part of the 16th century.

HAWICK, haw'-ik, a burgh of barony of Roxburghshire, 53 miles S.E. of Edinburgh, at the confluence of the rivers Teviot and Slitrig, the latter dividing it into two parts, which are connected by two stone bridges. It has handsome churches, besides other places of worship, a large exchange, erected in 1865, a public library, baths, and a mechanics' institute. Manf. Extensive tweeds, hosiery, shawls, plaids, blankets, leather, yarns, and gloves. Pop. 11,758.

HAWIZA, ha-wi'-za, a large town of Persia, province of Khuzistan, 80 miles S.W. of Shuster. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 31° 15′ N. Lon. 48° E.

HAWKE, Edward, Lord, hawk, English admiral. He was the son of a barrister, and entered the navy at an early age. In 1734 he obtained the command of a ship, and distinguished himself in the famous battle off Toulon, in 1744. In 1747 he was made rear-admiral of the white, and in the same year defeated a large French fleet, and captured five sail of the line. For this he was created a knight of the Bath. In 1759 he defeated Conflans, and was rewarded with a pension of £2,000 a year. In 1765 he was made vice-admiral, and first lord of the Admiralty, and, in the following year, was created a peer.

Born 1715; died at Shepperton, Middlesex, 1781.

HAWKER, ROBERT, Rev., hawk'-er, theological writer, vicar of Plymouth, author of a commentary on the Old and New Testaments, and of "The Poor Man's Morning and Evening Portion."

Born 1753; died 1827.

HAWKER, ROBERT STEPHEN, Rev., poet. He was the son of a Cornish clergyman, and was educated at Oxford, where he gained the Newdigate prize for a poem, "Pompeii." He was for a long period vicar of Morwenstowe, Cornwall, and wrote many vigorous ballads illustrating Cornish history, some of which became very popular. He was eccentric in dress and habits, had some strange superstitious beliefs, and for some years before his death, secretly adopted the Roman Catholic faith, which he openly avowed on his death-bed.

Born at Stratton, Cornwall, 1804; died at Plymouth, 1875.

HAWKESBURY, hawks'-ber-re, a river of New South Wales, Australia, remarkable for inundations. It has a course of about 50 miles, and enters the Pacific 20 miles north of Sydney.

HAWKESWORTH, JOHN, hawks'-werth, an able writer, who succeeded Dr. Johnson in compiling the parliamentary debates. He is stated to have been brought up a watchmaker, but afterwards applied himself to literature with considerable success. "The Adventurer," which he wrote in imitation of the "Spectator" and other collections of essays, is his principal work, and obtained for him the degree of LL.D. He published the life and works of Swift, and was employed to compile an account of the discoveries made by Captain Cook and others in the South Seas, for which he received the sum of £6,000. He afterwards became an East-India director. He translated "Telemachus," wrote "Almoran and Hamet, an Oriental Tale," and other pieces of a like kind, very popular in their day.

Died at Bromley, Kent, 1773.

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, haw'-kins, brave navigator and admiral of the Elizabethan age, who came of a good family, and went early to sea in the merchant service. In 1562 he sailed with three ships from London for the coast of Africa, where he procured a cargo of slaves, which he disposed of in the West India islands. He was, in fact, the first English slave-trader. He made several other voyages to Guinea and the West Indies, and experienced a variety of adventures, which are detailed in Hakluyt's Voyages. In 1573 he was appointed treasurer to the navy, and, in 1588, rear-admiral, and knighted for his services in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. In 1597 he went with his relative, Sir Francis Drake, on an expedition against the Spanish settlements in the West Indies, but died the same year. He founded a sailors' hospital at Chatham.

Born at Plymouth, 1520; died off Porto Rico, 1595.

HAWKINS, SIR RICHARD, son of the above, distinguished himself in the engagement with the invincible armada, and in 1593 obtained a commission under the great seal to attack the Spanish settlements in South America, where, after an obstinate conflict with a superior force, the English were beaten and taken prisoners. Sir

Richard, who was severely wounded in the action, was sentenced to death, but his life was spared, and he was detained a prisoner in America a considerable time, and was then sent to Spain, where he remained some years. On his return to England, he employed himself in writing the history of his own life. He died of an apoplexy while attending the privy council.

Born at Plymouth, about 1560; died 1622.

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, a writer and magistrate, and the historian of music, was apprenticed to an attorney, and acquired a considerable knowledge of the law. At the same time he did not neglect other studies. He formed an early intimacy with Dr. Johnson, which lasted through life. He wrote several pieces in various publications, particularly the "Gentleman's Magazine," and, in 1760, printed a good edition of Walton's "Angler." In 1772 he received the honour of knighthood, for suppressing a riot in Spitalfields. In 1776 he published his "History of Music," having spent 16 years in its composition. His "Life of Dr. Johnson" was written at the request of the booksellers, but not to the satisfaction of the public.

Born in London, 1719; died 1789.

HAWKINS, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 20,610. The capital is Rogersville.

HAWKS, FRANCIS LISTER, American clergyman and historian. He was educated at the university of North Carolina, admitted to the bar in 1817, and two years afterwards was elected to the State legislature. In 1827, he was ordained in the Episcopal Church, and was chosen historiographer of the Episcopal Church of America. He was offered, in 1843, the bishopric of Mississippi, but experiencing some opposition, declined to accept it. He afterwards declined the bishopric of Rhode Island. He was the author of works on the ecclesiastical history of the United States, on the monuments of Egypt, and other works of value, and contributed largely to periodical literature.

Born at Newbern, North Carolina, 1798; died at New York, 1866.

HAWKSBEE, or HAUKSBEE, FRANCIS, natural philosopher. He was curator of experiments to the Royal Society, in 1723 elected assistant secretary, and a constant contributor to the "Philosophical Transactions," principally on subjects connected with chemistry and electricity. He also wrote an important work on the action of light and electricity, improved the air-pump, and was the first who used glass in the electrical machine.

Born 1650; died 1730.

HAWORTH, hai'-worth, an urban district, West Riding of Yorkshire, 10 miles from Bradford. Pop. 3,816.

HAWKE'S BAY, a province of New Zealand, on the east coast of the northern island, bounded N. by Auckland, S. by Wellington, and E. by the Pacific Ocean. It consists of rich alluvial plains and undulating hills, rising gradually from the seacoast, towards the Ruahine mountains, nearly the whole of which is suitable for the operations of a farmer. It is irrigated by the waters of the Nuhaka, Wairoa, Mohoka, and Tutaiker. The coast district is more adapted for vine-growing. In the southern part are the celebrated Ahurira plains of 80,000 acres in extent, and they form a district which is not surpassed in productive capacity by any district of similar size, even in Great Britain. Crops of all kinds can be grown on them in the highest perfection without the use of manure. Hawke's Bay has forests of enormous extent, containing unlimited supplies of the most valuable New Zealand timbers in their highest perfection. To one of these, the Seventy Mile Bush, a railway and tramway have been constructed, and saw mills have now sprung up in large numbers. The northern portion of the province is chiefly taken up by sheep-runs, and the province is already looked on to some extent as the breeding ground of New Zealand, and as the district whence the best type of sheep stud is to be obtained.

Area.—4,687 square miles.
Pop.—10,635.
Chief Towns.—NAPIER (the capital), MEANEE, CLIVE, HAVELOCK, HAMPDEN, and WAIPAWA.
History.—Captain Cook entered the bay in 1769, but the settlement of the province did not take place until 1848. It was at first a portion of the province of Wellington, but a separation took place in 1858.

HAWKWOOD, SIR JOHN, an English soldier of fortune, the son of a tanner in Essex. He was first apprenticed to a tailor, but his martial ardour directed him to a military career, and he displayed so much courage and ability in the French wars that he was knighted by Edward III. On the conclusion of peace, he associated himself with a band calling themselves soldiers of fortune, but really brigands, who plundered towns, and extorted ransoms. He then went to Italy, where he served the pope, and afterwards the republic of Florence, being known as Giovanni della Guglia, or John of the Needle. He continued as a leader of mercenary troops in the service of the Florentines until his death. He was buried with great pomp in the church of St. Reparta, at Florence, being looked upon as one of the foremost soldiers of the age. He founded an English hospital at Rome, for the entertainment of poor travellers.

Born at Hedingham, Essex, 1320; died at Florence, 1394.

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL, haw'-thorn, a distinguished American novelist, who, after leaving Bowdoin College, Massachusetts, was for a short time in a situation in the custom-house, at Boston, but quitted his appointment and adopted literature as a profession. His first published work was an anonymous novel, which he did not afterwards think proper to claim. In 1837 he published a volume of sketches and tales, which had formerly appeared in the American periodicals, under the title of "Twice-told Tales." In 1845 he edited the "Journal of an African Cruiser," the MS. of which was supplied to him by an officer of the U.S. navy. His retired habits led him to take up a residence in an old manse at Concord, where, for three years, he occupied himself in composing some charming tales and sketches, which he afterwards published under the title of "Mosses from an Old Manse," and in the introduction to which, some interesting autobiographical passages are to be found. In 1846, while his friend Mr. Bancroft was at the head of the Boston custom-house, he acted as surveyor to the department, and his mode of life therein forms the introduction to his extraordinary romance of "The Scarlet Letter," published in 1851. In the same year appeared "The House of Seven Gables," and in 1852 "The Blithedale Romance," the chief incidents in the latter work being founded upon his experience as a member of the "Brook Farm Community." A third collection of his contributions to the periodicals, under the title of "The Snow Image," and a "Life of General Pierce, President of the United States," were his next productions. He wrote some excellent works for the young, the chief of which are "True Stories from History and Biography," "The Wonder-

Book," "Tanglewood Tales." In 1853 he obtained the post of American consul at Liverpool, a post he filled for four years, when the state of his health rendered travel advisable, and he went to Italy, one result of the visit being a romance, "Transformation," in which a luxuriant imagination and an unusual graphic power are displayed. After his return to America, he published, in 1863, "Our Old Home," and after his death appeared "Septimus, a Romance of Immortality."

Born at Salem, Massachusetts, about 1807; died at Plymouth, Massachusetts, 1864.

HAY, JAMES, hai, earl of Carlisle, came to England with James I., and was the first Scotchman created an English peer. His first title was Baron Hay; he was afterwards made Viscount Doncaster, and, lastly, earl of Carlisle. James I. employed him in several embassies, particularly to France, to mediate on behalf of the Protestants, and to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and Princess Henrietta Maria.

Died 1636.

HAYDN, JOSEPH, haidn, a German musical composer, of a most original and prolific genius, was the son of a small wheelwright of the village of Rohau, 45 miles from Vienna, his mother having been cook to the chief man of the village previous to her marriage. Both his parents were musical, and being early taught to sing, he was heard by the chapel-master of St. Stephen's cathedral, at Vienna, who immediately engaged him as chorister for that church. At the age of 17 his treble voice broke, and he was left without any means of obtaining a livelihood; but a friendly wigmaker took him into his house, and he was thus enabled to pursue his studies as a composer, while earning a scanty subsistence by teaching and playing in the orchestra. After a time, he married the daughter of his hospitable friend; but the union was an unhappy one, and separation soon followed. Fortune conducted him to the house of the Italian poet-laureate, Metastasio, who then resided at Vienna, who was superintending the education of a little girl, one of Haydn's pupils. His connection with the court poet led him to become acquainted with the wealthy Prince Esterhazy, who, in 1760, made him his chapel-master, an office he held to the end of his life. Comfortably located in the prince's palace in Hungary, he, for thirty years, composed and played over his magnificent works. In 1791 he was induced to visit London, where he produced six of his twelve "Grand Symphonies," causing the utmost possible excitement among the English musical public. In 1794 he again visited England, meeting with a most flattering reception, receiving for his services a sum amounting to £1,550, and becoming a Doctor of Music of the Oxford university, and the guest of royalty. In his 64th year he composed his greatest work, "The Creation;" and two years later "The Seasons." Like Handel, he was remarkable for his fertility: besides smaller works, he wrote 116 symphonies, 83 violin quartets, 15 masses, 4 oratorios, a Te Deum, Stabat Mater, and 14 Italian and German operas. His death is said to have been due to the shock caused by the bombardment of Vienna, although Napoleon gave orders that the great musician's house should be respected; and when the French troops entered the city, a guard was placed at his door to protect him.

Born at Rohrau, 1732; died at Vienna, 1809.

HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT, hai'-don, English historical painter and writer on art. He was educated at the Plympton grammar-school, where Sir Joshua Reynolds had previously been a scholar. His father was a printer and stationer in a large way of business, and apprenticed his son to the same trade, but he was greatly averse to it, and at the same time displayed a strong predilection for art. His father's opposition to his son becoming an artist was at length overcome, and Haydon started for London in May 1804, to enter as a student of the Royal Academy. It was at this period that enthusiasm for the grand "high art," as it is called, was first awakened in his breast. In 1807 he exhibited his first painting at the Royal Academy, "Joseph and Mary resting with our Saviour after a day's journey on the road to Egypt." In 1809 he exhibited the celebrated "Dentatus," a commission from Lord Mulgrave, the hanging of which by the committee of the Royal Academy caused great dissatisfaction. The picture was afterwards shown at the British Institution, and gained the prize of the committee, and became very popular. In the same year Haydon applied for admission into the Royal Academy, as an Associate, but was rejected. The sanguine and ambitious young painter's prospects were now of the most encouraging nature. The Elgin marbles had recently arrived in England, he wrote and talked about them enthusiastically and eloquently, and mainly contributed to get them purchased for the nation. He painted the "Judgment of Solomon," and sold it for 700 guineas. His second application for admission to the Royal Academy, in 1810, was refused. In 1814 he commenced another great work,—"Christ's Entry into Jerusalem," which was exhibited by himself in Bond Street, in 1820, but could not find a purchaser; he, however, added two more works of the same class to his list,—"Christ in the Garden," and "Christ Rejected." In 1821 he married: and in 1823 painted the "Raising of Lazarus," which for many years adorned the Pantheon, in Oxford Street. A few years before, he had opened a school for the purpose of "establishing a better and more regular system of instruction than even the Academy offered;" and had for pupils Edwin, Charles, and Thomas Landseer, Lance, Harvey, and other eminent artists. Another great picture, "Alexander on Bucephalus," was painted in 1826. He also continued to contribute to "The Annals of the Fine Arts" criticisms upon the Royal Academy; but this made him unpopular in his profession, and his large pictures being often left on his hands, caused him to become involved in pecuniary difficulties, which still increasing, he was incarcerated in the King's Bench prison for debt. Here he was witness of a scene which he afterwards reproduced in a popular picture, "The Mock Election," which George IV. purchased for 500 guineas. A continuation of the same subject,—"Chairing the Members," was sold for 300 guineas. About this time his friends procured his release, and he painted "Pharaoh dismissing Moses," which sold for 500 guineas. A great failure and a great success followed: the first was "The Great Banquet at Guildhall, after the passing of the Reform Bill;" the second, "Napoleon musing at St. Helena." A second picture of the same character,—"The Duke on the Field of Waterloo," was unsuccessful, and his debts again overpowering him, he was, once more, an inmate of the King's Bench. On his release, he commenced lecturing on the fine arts, at the mechanics' institutions in the metropolis and in the provinces, meeting everywhere with the greatest success. His great object was the establishment of schools of design in the chief provincial towns, and he was successful in obtaining them for Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Hull, Sheffield, Newcastle, Leicester, and other towns, between 1836 and 1842. As far back as 1811 he had petitioned Mr. Spencer Percival to found schools of design, and had constantly memorialized ministers to carry out his proposition.

Perhaps the severest blow he ever received was now awaiting him. For a long time he had been petitioning, writing, and lecturing for having the interiors of our large public buildings decorated with paintings. The government decided to embellish the interior of the new houses of parliament with cartoons. He set to work, prepared his design, and the judges left his name out of the list of successful competitors, not even giving it a place among the third class. It is said he never completely recovered the shock this disappointment caused him. His last works were "Uriel and Satan," "Curtius leaping into the Gulf," "Alfred and the Trial by Jury," "The Burning of Rome." In 1846 he exhibited this last work, and "The Banishment of Aristides," at the Egyptian Hall, "General Tom Thumb" holding his levees at the hall at the same time. The degree of success which awaited each of the exhibitors is thus chronicled by Haydon in his diary:—"Tom. Thumb had 12,000 people last week; B. R. Haydon, 133½ (the ½ a little girl). Exquisite taste of the English people!" The exhibition was a failure, Haydon's mind gave way under his accumulating embarrassments, and he ended his life by his own hand. Though far from being generally admitted to be a great historical painter, it must be allowed that he did much, both by his works and writings, to elevate the character of English art. His quick temper, love of controversy, and readiness to charge every person that differed from him in opinion with mean motives, combined with his obstinate refusal to paint, as more prudent artists have been forced to do, for the popular taste, marred the character, the career, of a virtuous, earnest, and eloquent lover of his art, and brought his life to a sad termination, after causing him long years of embarrassment.

Born at Plymouth, 1786; died in London, 1846.

HAYEL, or HAIL, haï'-el, a large and busy town of Arabia, capital of the province of Jebel Shomer. It is surrounded with fortifications about 20 feet high, with towers. The palace has enormously thick walls of earth. The streets are wide, and there are a large market and mosque. The town is one of the halting places of the Persian pilgrims to Mecca. Pop. 20,000.

HAYES, ISAAC, hais, American explorer, was surgeon to the expedition to the Arctic regions, undertaken by Dr. Kane. On his return in 1855, he undertook another expedition for the purpose of reaching the open sea, which he believed to be around the North Pole, and was aided by Mr. Grinnell, a wealthy citizen of New York, and by the American and English Geographical Societies. He penetrated as far as lat. 82° 45' N., and made many interesting explorations and observations. He published a narrative of the voyage, and received the gold medals of the Geographical Societies of London and Paris. In 1869 he explored the southern coasts of Greenland.

Born 1830.

HAYLE, hail, a seaport of Cornwall, on the British Channel, 3 miles S.E. of St. Ives. It has an active trade, and there are large iron-foundries and steam-engine factories. The principal trade of the port is the exportation of copper ore to Wales, and tin to Brussels.

HAYLEY, WILLIAM, haï'-le, the friend and biographer of Cowper, and philosophical essayist. Abandoning the profession of the law, for which he had been educated, he retired to his estate in Sussex, and spent his life in lettered ease. Among his best works are his Essays on Painting, Sculpture, and Epic Poetry.

Born at Chichester, 1745; died 1820.

HAYLING, haï'-ling, a small island in Chichester harbour, Hampshire. There is a favourite watering place on the south side. Pop. 1,100.

HAYNAU, JULIUS JACOB, haï'-now, Austrian general, who held important commands in the war with Italy in 1848, and was commander of the Austrian army in Hungary in the following year. He made himself detestable by his cruelties, and on the occasion of a visit to England in 1850, received a severe threshing from the draymen in the employment of Messrs. Barclay and Perkins, the great brewers.

Born 1786; died 1853.

HAYNAU, a town of Prussia, in the province of Silesia, on the Deichsa, 11 miles N.W. of Liegnitz. Manf. Woollens, linen, and tiles. Pop. 3,900.

HAYTER, SIR GEORGE, haï'-ter, portrait and historical painter. He was the son of a well known drawing-master, who wished him to be a sailor. He served for a year as midshipman, but, disliking the sea, started as miniature painter at Southampton. He soon obtained a reputation, and in 1815 was appointed miniature painter to the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold. The following year he went to Rome for the purpose of studying the works of the great masters, and on his return established himself in London as a portrait and historical painter; and was well patronized. In 1826 he made another visit to Italy, and in 1841 was appointed historical painter to the Queen (to whom, when Princess Victoria, he had given lessons in drawing), and received the honour of knighthood. He painted "The Meeting of the First Reformed Parliament;" "The Coronation of Queen Victoria," "The Marriage of the Queen," "The Trial of Lord William Russell," and "The Trial of Queen Caroline," and many other historical pictures, and portraits of eminent persons.

Born 1792; died 1871.

HAYTI, HAITI, ST. DOMINGO, or HISPANIOLA, haï'-te, one of the Leeward Islands, the largest in the W. Indies, with the exception of Cuba, having on its N. the Atlantic Ocean, on its S. the Caribbean Sea, on its W. the Windward Passage (50 miles broad, separating the island from Cuba), and on its E. the Mona Passage. It is of irregular form, about 400 miles long from east to west, and 150 miles across in its broadest part. The coast is deeply indented with bays and inlets. The island is mountainous in the centre, where Mount Cibao attains a height of 7,200 feet, and from which various chains traverse the island in all directions. The plains are extensive, one of these level tracts, called Los Llanos, in the S.E., having a length of 80 miles, and exhibiting considerable fertility. La Vega Real, "the royal valley," lying between the two principal mountain ranges, is about 130 miles long, and contains fine pasture lands. There are extensive forests of logwood, mahogany, iron-wood, cedar, and other valuable trees. Along the E. shore swamps predominate; but on the W. there are several excellent harbours, besides the Bay of Gonaïves.

Rivers.—The Artibonite is the principal; but there are several other considerable rivers, as the Yuma, the North and South Yacki, the Nisao, and the Ozama. There are several lakes, chiefly in the south-west part of the island. The salt lake Enriquillo is 20 miles long by 8 wide, and abounds in caymans.

Climate.—Hot and unhealthy for Europeans. There are a dry and a wet season, and land breezes moderate the summer heat.

Pro.—Coffee, cotton, tobacco, vanilla, manioc, cocoa, sugar, indigo, the usual tropical vegetables, wax, and ginger.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, platina, quicksilver, manganese, antimony, jasper, and marble. There are various mineral springs, containing iron, sulphur, potash, vitriol, and alum, tin, iron, and rock-salt. The mines, however, have ceased to be productive.

Area.—18,045 square miles.

Pop.—400,000, about one-half negroes, and of the remainder the greater part are mulattoes, with from 10,000 to 15,000 of European descent.

Divisions.—The western portion constitutes the republic of HAYTI, and the eastern the republic of San Domingo, or DOMINICA. This island was discovered by Christopher Columbus in 1492; and the first colony settled by Europeans in the W. hemisphere was planted on its N. coast. Until 1665 Spain kept possession of the island; but in that year the French obtained a footing, and retained their position for upwards of a century and a quarter. In 1800 the independence of Hayti was proclaimed by the negro population, and the French finally quitted the island in 1803. (See TOUSSAINT L'OVERTURE and DESSALINES.) Since that time various revolutions have occurred, and a kind of military elective government has prevailed under different leaders. In 1844 the Spanish part of the island declared the government of "Dominica" civil, representative, and republican, with a president, legislative assembly, and council. In 1849 the former French portion of the island was proclaimed an empire under its president Soloupe, who took the title of Faustin I. The sable emperor was, however, deposed in 1858, and General Geffrard was declared president of the republic of Hayti.

HAYTI, or HAITI, republic of, occupies the western portion of the island of Hayti. The county is mountainous, interspersed with fertile plains and valleys, and is well watered. It includes the adjacent islands of Tortuga, Gonaives, and some smaller islands. Agriculture is neglected, and the products are deficient.

Area.—10,204 square miles.

Pop.—800,000, a great number of whom are descendants of negro slaves. The Roman Catholic religion is professed, but practically very little attention is paid to any form of religion; and it is estimated that not more than 4 per cent of the births among the coloured population are legitimate. The Haytian church is not recognised by the Pope, and many of the clergy are of irregular ordination.

Chief Towns.—PORT-AU-PRINCE, the capital, CAPE HAYTIEN, and GONAIVES.

Government and Constitution.—The republic is governed under a constitution proclaimed June 14, 1867. By its terms the legislative power rests in a National Assembly, divided into two chambers, respectively called the Senate and the House of Commons. The latter is elected by the direct vote of all male citizens for the term of three years, while the members of the Senate are nominated for two years by the House of Commons from a list presented by the electoral colleges. The executive power is in the hands of a President, who, according to the Constitution, must be elected by the people, and whose term is four years. This condition, however, has been frequently set aside in various revolutionary movements. The administration is carried on, under the President, by four heads of departments; the ministers of finance and foreign affairs; of justice and public instruction; of the interior; and of war.

HAYWARD, JOHN, Sir, hā'-ward, English historian, who wrote histories of the reigns of Henry IV. and Edward VI. For the latter work, in which were some passages supposed to be unfavourable to Queen Elizabeth, he was imprisoned and narrowly escaped the rack. He wrote various other historical works, was patronised by Prince Henry, son of James I., practised with success as a lawyer, and was knighted in 1619.

Born at Felixstowe, Suffolk, about 1560; died 1627.

HAYWOOD, ELIZABETH, hā'-wood, English author. She published "The Female Spectator," "Epistles for the Ladies," "Fortunate Foundling," "Adventures of Nature," "Jemmy and Jenny Jessamy," "Invisible Spy," "Husband and Wife," "Betsy Thoughtless," and "A Present for a Servant-maid."

Born 1693; died 1756.

HAYWOOD, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 956 square miles. Pop. 10,271. Waynesville is the capital.

HAYWOOD, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 506 square miles. Pop. 26,000. The capital is Brownsville.

HAZERIBAGH, or HAZAREEBAGH, haz-e-ri-bah', the capital of a district of the same name, in the presidency of Bengal, 189 miles S.E. of Benares. It was appointed to be the residence of the ex-Ameers of Scinde. Pop. 11,050; of district, 407,075.

HAZEBROUK, haz'-brook, a town of France, department Nord, 25 miles N.W. of Lille. It is well built, and has a handsome old parish church, town-hall, college, and hospital, with a tall spire. Manf. Thread, linen, starch, soap, and leather. There is a weekly linen market. Pop. 6,000.

HAZLITT, WILLIAM, haz'-litt, a distinguished English essayist and critic of literature and the fine arts, was the son of a Unitarian minister, who, in 1783, emigrated with his family to the United States, but returned two years later, and fixed his residence in Shropshire, where William commenced his education. In 1793 he was sent to the Unitarian college at Hackney, to be educated for the profession of his father, but neglected theology for moral and political philosophy. From an early age he had shown a great predilection for drawing, and, in the year 1802, visited Paris for the purpose of copying the pictures in the Louvre, and, on his return, met with some success as portrait-painter in London and the provinces; but abandoned the pursuit for that of literature, in 1803, displaying great industry and talent in the latter profession, especially as a literary and dramatic critic. In 1813 he delivered a course of lectures on the history of English philosophy, at the Russell Institution, and afterwards, on the "Comic Poets" and the "Poets of the Elizabethan Age." He also wrote for the Morning Chronicle, the Examiner, and, in the latter part of his life, for the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His principal works are "The Round Table," "The Table-talk," "Characters of Shakspeare's Plays." The articles "Fine Arts" and the "Life of Titian," in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," are from his pen.

Born at Maidstone, 1778; died 1830.

HEAD, SIR EDMUND WALKER, hed, governor-general of Canada, and author of some excellent handbooks of English and foreign schools of painting, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and became a Fellow of Merton; succeeded to the baronetcy in 1838; was successively assistant Poor Law Commissioner and Poor Law Commissioner (1841) and lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick in 1847. He received his appointment as governor-general of Canada in September, 1854; was made privy councillor in 1857, and K.C.B. in 1860. He resigned in 1861.

Born 1805; died 1868.

HEAD, SIR FRANCIS BOND, a clever and humorous writer of books of travel, began his career in the British army, but went out to South America in the year 1825, at the head of a mining association. Leaving his party at the foot of the Andes, he returned alone, on horseback, across the Pampas to Buenos Ayres, a distance of 1,000 miles, and performed several journeys in the same manner, riding over upwards of 6,000 miles. On his return to London, he published "Rough Notes of some rapid Journeys across the Pampas," in 1826. In 1835 he was made lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, during which appointment the Canadian insurrection broke out and was suppressed. He resigned in 1837, and on his return to England, in 1838, published a "Narrative" justifying his conduct. In 1850 he produced a pamphlet on "The Defenceless State of England," which excited a great deal of interest. He subsequently employed his leisure principally in composing light, humorous, and graphic sketches of tours made in the United Kingdom and on the continent. "A Faggot of French Sticks," "A Fortnight in Ireland," "Stokers and Pokers," were among his latest productions, as "Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau" formed one of his earliest.

Born at Rochester, Kent, 1793; died 1875.

HEAD, SIR GEORGE, author of several interesting books of travel and adventure. After having served as captain in the West Kent militia in 1802, he joined the British army in the Peninsula, and served as commissariat clerk at Badajoz, and afterwards rose to the rank of deputy-assistant commissariat-general to the Peninsular army, with which he served throughout the campaign. He was sent to superintend the commissariat department in Canada, where he remained for several years. He described his adventures and experience there, in his "Forest Scenes and Incidents in the Wilds of North America," and his "Residence on the Borders of Lakes Huron and Simcoe." In 1831 he was knighted. He wrote many other excellent books; among the chief of which is "A Home Tour through the Manufacturing Districts."

Born 1782; died in London, 1855.

HEANOR, hé'-nor, a township of Derbyshire, 9 miles N.E. of Derby. There is a very ancient church. Manf. Silk and cotton articles, hosiery, and lace. Pop. 6,823.

HEARD, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 267 square miles. Pop. 8,769. The capital is Franklin.

HEARNE, THOMAS, hern, a learned antiquary and editor of old MSS. He had been a domestic servant to Mr. Cherry, of Shottesbrooke, who took him into his family, and gave him a liberal education. In 1695 he entered at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, where he applied himself to the study of antiquities. In 1703 he took his degree of M.A., and in 1714 was appointed under-librarian of the university. He edited and published several ancient MSS. and old books; among others, the "Life of Alfred," by Spelman; Leland's "Itinerary;" and a collection of curious Discourses written by eminent antiquaries.

Born at Little Green, Berkshire, 1678; died 1735.

HEATHCOTE, a town of Victoria, Australia, 70 miles N. of Melbourne, in the centre of the McIvor gold fields. Pop. 1,203; district, 3,300.

HEATHFIELD, LORD. (See ELIOTT.)

HEATON NORRIS, an urban district, Lancashire, forming a suburb of Stockport, from which it is separated by the Mersey, which is crossed by a fine bridge of eleven arches, and by a railway viaduct, 1,780 feet long and nearly 100 feet high, with 22 semicircular arches. There is a beautiful Gothic church. Pop. 5,490, mostly employed in cotton-mills and bleaching-factories.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

HEBDEN, or HEBDEN BRIDGE, heb'-den, an urban district, W. Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles W. of Halifax. There is a very handsome church. Manf. Cotton, silk, and worsted. Pop. 5,008.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

HEBE, hé'-be, in classic mythology, daughter of Jupiter, and the cupbearer in Olympus before that office was conferred upon Ganymede. On the deification of Hercules, she is said to have become his wife; but in Homer she is always described as a virgin. She was worshipped as the goddess of youth.

HEBEL, FRIEDRICH, hai'-bel, German lyrical poet and dramatist. His principal works, besides several dramas, are his "Gedichte," published in 1842 and 1848.

Born at Wesselbaren, Holstein, 1813; died 1863.

HEBER, REGINALD, hé'-ber, bishop of Calcutta, a learned, pious, and accomplished divine. He studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and after a brilliant career, composed his prize poem "Palestine," which, unlike similar productions, has found a permanent place in English literature. In 1805, he set out on an extended continental tour, and visited Russia, the Crimea, Hungary, Austria, &c. He took holy orders in 1807, contributed during the few subsequent years to the "Quarterly Review," and worked at a Dictionary of the Bible, which, however, was never published. He had long considered that devotional poetry stood in need of improvement, and, with a view to raise the standard of this department of sacred literature, he composed a volume of "Poems and Translations for Weekly Church Service." He was appointed Bampton Lecturer in 1815, and received a stall in St. Asaph Cathedral in 1817. In 1819 he edited Jeremy Taylor's works, and in 1822 was made preacher of Lincoln's Inn. After twice refusing the appointment, he was ordained, in the same year, bishop of Calcutta, which diocese, in his day, extended over the whole of India, Ceylon, and Australasia. In June, 1824, he began the visitation of this immense diocese, and travelled through Bengal, and after an eleven months' journey, arrived at Bombay, sleeping, for the most of the time, in a tent or cabin. His journal was published, and in it he describes, with clearness and picturesqueness, the strange provinces he visited, and graphically details the manners and customs of the natives of India. After having visited Ceylon, he left Calcutta on a journey to Madras, and reached Trichinopoly, where, after confirming a number of the natives, he retired to take a cold bath, in which he was found dead a short time afterwards. His life has been published by his widow.

Born at Malpas, Cheshire, 1783; died at Trichinopoly, 1826.

HEBER, the son of Salch, and father of Phaleg. The name of "Hebrews," given to the Jewish nation, is by some supposed to have been derived from him.

HÉBERT, JACQUES RÉNÉ, hai'-bair, better known as Père Duchesne, in consequence of having conducted a paper of that name, published in Paris during the great Revolution. He was born at Alençon, but took up his residence at an early age in Paris, and was twice dismissed from service for embezzlement. He subsequently played an important part in the French Revolution, and was a member of the Revolutionary council. He was profligate in character and atheistical in principle; and he and his associates—known as Hebertists or Enragés—were mainly instrumental in converting the Notre Dame into a temple of Reason. He died on the scaffold, to which he was consigned by direction of Robespierre and his party.

Born at Alençon, 1755; died 1794.

HEBREWS, the descendants of Abraham, who retained the name until the return from the captivity, since which they have been generally known by the name of Jews, in consequence of the returned exiles belonging mainly to the tribe of Judah.

HEBRIDES, or WESTERN ISLANDS, eb'-ri-dees, a cluster of islands situate on the W. coast of Scotland, in the Atlantic Ocean, extending about 180 miles in length, from the Butt of Lewis, their N. extremity, to the small island of Sanday, on the coast of Cantire, and being from 10 to 30 miles in breadth. The principal are Lewis and its adjacent islands, belonging to Ross-shire; Harris, North Uist, Benbecula, South Uist, Skye, Barra, Eig, and the smaller neighbouring islands, attached to Inverness-shire; and Rum, Muck, Canna, Colt, Tiree, Mull, Lismore, Staffa, Luing, Scarba, Colonsay, Oronsay, Jura, Isla, Gigha, Cara, &c., belonging to the shire of Argyle. To these we may add those islands which lie in the Frith of Clyde, to the eastward of the peninsula of Cantire: viz., the isles of Bute, Arran, Cumbrays (Greater and Lesser), and Inchmarnock, which form the shire of Bute. The various tracts of ground and clusters of rocks, thus detached from the mainland, including the most insignificant islets, are estimated to amount to as many as 490, of which about 120 are inhabited. For the most part the islands are rugged and mountainous, with large tracts of moorland. Pasture-land predominates, as the soil is little adapted for the growth of crops.

Climate.—The climate is mild but humid. There are some small rivers, in which salmon are plentiful, and several lakes.

Area.—3,000 square miles.

Pop.—About 100,000.

Lat.—Between 55° 35′ and 58° 34′ N. Lon. 5° to 8° W.

History.—The ancient history of these islands is involved in obscurity. It appears certain, however, that they were ruled by their own independent princes until the 8th century, when the Pictish kingdom was overthrown by Kenneth II. They continued, during the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries, to be the haunts of pirates who infested the neighbouring countries; and, when they came under the dominion of the kings of Scotland, their chieftains were long lawless and turbulent; but, by the gradual increase and consolidation of the royal power, and by the progress, also, of regular order and good government, they were slowly brought within the control of the supreme power. The act of parliament of 1748, abolishing all heritable jurisdictions, gave the final blow to the influence of the independent chieftains of the Western Isles.

HEBRIDES, NEW. (See NEW HEBRIDES.)

HEBRON, hé'-bron, a town of Asiatic Turkey, pashalic of Damascus, at an elevation of 2,800 feet above the sea level. There are nine mosques, one of them a large edifice, built on the tombs of the patriarchs. The town is surrounded by a very ancient wall, and is 21 miles S.W. of Jerusalem. It is celebrated from David having reigned in it seven years before he became master of the whole of Israel; by John the Baptist having been born in it; and for Abraham, Sara, Isaac, Rebecca, Jacob, and Leah, having been buried in its vicinity. Helen, the mother of Constantine, built a church in it; but at the present day the place is in a miserable condition. The modern name is "El Khulil," "the friend," in allusion to the title given to Abraham of "the friend of God." The ancient name is Kirgath-Arba. Pop. 5,000.

HECATÆUS, hec-a-té-us, a Greek historian and geographer. His principal works were a "Tour of the World," and "Histories," or "Genealogies," fragments of which still exist. He was descended from an ancient wealthy family of Miletus.

Born about 550 B.C.; died about 476 B.C.

HECATE, hec'-a-te, according to the ancient mythology, one of the infernal deities—the daughter of the Titan Perses, and Asteria, or Night. Shakspeare, in Macbeth, pronounces the name as a dissyllable, making the Witch say, "Why, how now, Hecate? You look angerly."

HECHINGEN, heck'-in-gen, capital of the principality of Hohenzollern, Prussia, on the Starzel, 30 miles S.W. of Stuttgart. It is divided into a high and low town, is walled, and has a castle. There are two Roman Catholic churches, a synagogue, and a museum. About two miles from the town on a lofty hill is the old castle of Hohenzollern, once the residence of the ancestors of the present royal family of Prussia. There are sulphur springs with a bathing establishment in the vicinity. Manf. Woollen cloth. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 3,400.

HECKER, FRIEDRICH KARL FRANZ, German politician. Studied at Heidelberg, and became an advocate in the supreme court in Manheim in 1838. He was elected a member of the second chamber in Baden in 1842, joined the democratic party in 1846; became a popular leader in the revolutionary movement of 1848, and being defeated in an attempt to surprise the smaller governments of South Germany with the artisan bands that had been sent to the Rhine, he took refuge in the canton of Basel in Switzerland, where he established a newspaper for the advocacy of anti-constitutional opinions. He was again elected to parliament, but was refused admission, upon which he emigrated to America, where he settled, and subsequently took an active part in the war of secession.

Born at Eichtersheim, Baden, 1811.

HECKMONDWIKE, hek'-mond-wik, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 10 miles S.W. of Leeds, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway. Manf. It is the chief seat of the carpet and blanket manufactures in the riding. Pop. 9,286.—A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

HECLA, hek'-la, a volcanic mountain in the S. of Iceland, near the coast, surrounded by higher mountains. It forms three peaks, and contains numerous craters, the largest of which is about 100 feet deep. There have been forty-three recorded eruptions of this volcano, the one of 1783 being the most terrible; the matter then thrown out filled up mountain-glens 600 feet deep, as well as many lakes and river-courses. In the eruption of 1845-6, a stream of lava from the large crater was nearly 50 feet deep and a mile wide; stones of an enormous size were ejected, and the ashes borne as far as the Orkney Isles, a distance of 400 miles. Height, 5,110 feet. (See ICELAND.)

HECQUET, PHILIP, hek'-ai, a French physician, who was a great advocate for the use of warm water and bleeding, and, in consequence, was ridiculed by Le Sage, in his novel of "Gil Blas," under the name of Dr. Sangrado. He was, however, a man of skill and piety. He wrote several medical books.

Born at Abbeville, 1661; died, 1737.

HECTOR, hec'-tor, according to Homeric legend, the bravest of the Trojans, the son of Priam and Hecuba, and husband to Andromache. During the Trojan war he fought gloriously against the most redoubtable of the Greek warriors, Ajax and Diomede, and killed a number of their best leaders; among others Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, who was roused into activity in order to avenge his death, and, after chasing him three times round the walls of Troy, pierced him with his spear. His body was thrown to the dogs to be devoured, but his father supplicating Achilles, it was given up to him, and was buried in Troy, where funeral sacrifices were offered to him as a hero.

HECTOR, a township of New York, United States, 14 miles W. of Ithaca. Pop. 4,000.

HECUBA, hek'-u-ba, in Homeric legend, the second wife of Priam, king of Troy. At the close of the Trojan war she fell into the hands of the Greeks, and having witnessed the murder of her husband, the destruction of all her sons (with the exception of Helenus), and the ruin of the city, she threw herself in despair into the sea.

HEDJAZ, EL, hed'-jas, a province of Arabia consisting partly of an unproductive plain, which extends along the Red Sea from Mount Sinai to the frontier of Yemen. It contains the famous cities of MECCA and MEDINA, and a mountainous tract which in some parts attains an elevation of 8,000 feet, the birth-place and place of burial of Mohammed, which are annually visited by immense numbers of pilgrims.

HEEM, JAN DAVID DE, heem, a Dutch painter, celebrated for his pictures of "still life." He was born at Utrecht, and resided in the later years of his life at Antwerp. He is said to have refused 2,000 guilders for a painting representing a garland of flowers, but afterwards presented it to the Prince of Orange, who brought it with him to England.

Born 1600; died 1674.

HEEMSKERK, JACOB VAN, heems'-kerk, a Dutch admiral, who sailed with Barentien to discover a north-east passage to Asia, in which voyage the commander died, but Heemskerk brought the ships safe to Holland. In 1607 he was made vice-admiral, and sent against the Spaniards in the Mediterranean, where he defeated a superior force, and took the Spanish admiral prisoner, but was himself slain in the action.

Born 1567; died 1607.

HEEREN, ARNOLD HERMANN LUDWIG, heer'-en, an eminent German philologist and historian, who was educated at the university of Göttingen, and after travelling in Germany, France, and Italy, was appointed professor of philosophy at Göttingen in 1787, when he devoted the remainder of his life to learning and research. His "Manual of Ancient History," "Handbook of Modern History," and "Essay on the Influence of the Crusades," are considered to rank among the best productions of their class. He wrote several other historical works of great value, and was elected a member of nearly every European learned society.

Born at Arbergen, near Bremen, 1760; died at Göttingen, 1842.

HEERLEN, heer'-len, a town of Holland, province of Limburg, 14 miles N.E. of Maestricht. Manf. Needles, linen, leather, and oil; a trade in cattle also is carried on. Pop. 4,200.

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH, hai'-gel, a celebrated German philosopher. He studied with Schelling at Tübingen, and afterwards at Jena, where Fichte taught. He at first embraced the doctrines of that philosopher, but afterwards those of Schelling, and finally proceeded to propound a system of his own. In 1806 he became professor at Jena, and from 1808 to 1810 was director of the college of Nuremburg. In 1818 he replaced his former master Fichte in the chair of philosophy at Berlin, where he taught till the time of his death. His works, comprised in nineteen 8vo volumes, were published at Berlin between the years 1832-45, and have been translated in part both into French and English.

Born at Stuttgart, 1770; died at Berlin, 1831.

HEGESIPPUS, he-ge-sip'-pus, a church historian of the second century. He was of Jewish family, but was converted to Christianity at an early age. He was a member of the church of Jerusalem, but afterwards resided at Rome. Eusebius has incorporated with his own history fragments of the "Memorials of Ecclesiastical Affairs," supposed to have been written in Rome about 176; these are the only portions now known to exist.

Died about 180.

HEGYALLYA, haig-yal'-ya, a district of Hungary, near Tokay, famous for vineyards. The choice wine Tokay is produced here. Area, 80 square miles.

HEIBERG, JOHAN LUDWIG, hi'-bairg, an eminent Danish metaphysician and comic dramatist, who, after receiving a good education, was undecided at the age of 27, as to his choice of a profession; but the Danish government granted him a travelling pension; whereupon he went to London, and afterwards spent three years in Paris, in the society of his father, who had been banished thither, and mixed in the best French society. On returning to his native country, he was made professor of the Danish language at the university of Kiel, in Holstein. After spending some years in this occupation, he commenced writing for the stage, and endeavoured to introduce among the Danes pieces written upon the model of the lightest French comedies. "King Solomon and the Hatter" was his first production, which met with the greatest success. "The Danes in Paris" succeeded; and in 1829 he was appointed royal dramatic poet and translator, and soon after married a lady, who, as Madame Heiberg, was accounted the most brilliant Danish actress of her time. Many other dramas, and some philosophical works, were next published by him. In 1827-28 he edited the "Copenhagen Flying Post."

Born at Copenhagen, 1791; died 1860.

HEIDE, hi'-de, a town of Prussia, in Schleswig-Holstein, 32 miles N. of Gluckstadt. Manf. Leather, earthenware, tiles, oil, and tobacco. Pop. 6,820.

HEIDEGGER, JOHANN HEINRICH hi-deg'-ger, Swiss theologian, author of a history of the Papacy.

Born 1633; died 1698.

HEIDEGGER, JOHANN JACOB, Count, a native of Zurich, in Switzerland, who went to England in 1708, and by his address and ingenuity, became the leader of fashion among the English upper classes, and manager of the opera-house in London.

Born about 1660; died 1749.

HEIDELBERG, hi'-del-bairg, an ancient city of the grand duchy of Baden, Germany, on the left bank of the Neckar, which is here crossed by a stone bridge, 13 miles S.E. of Manheim. The chief buildings are the town-hall, hospitals, several churches (in one of which, the church of the Holy Ghost, both Protestant and Roman Catholic services are performed), and the university, for which it is specially celebrated. The town consists principally of a long street, the other streets being narrow and gloomy. From the summit of the Konigstuhl, a hill 2,000 feet high above the town, a view is obtained of the most charming German scenery. On the lower parts of this hill stands the castle, perhaps the most picturesque ruin in Europe, if we except the Alhambra of Spain. It was once the abode of the elector-palatine, and in its cellar is the famous Heidelberg tun, holding 800 hogsheads. The gardens around the castle are beautifully laid out. Manf. Tobacco, wax tapers, saffron, leather, musical instruments, &c. There is a fishery, and a trade is carried on in corn, hops, fruit, and wine. This town has been besieged several times,—by Tilly in 1622; and by the French in 1688 and 1693. On each occasion the most atrocious cruelties were perpetrated. Pop. 24,417.

HEIDELSHEIM, hi'-dels-hime, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, Germany, on the right bank of the Salzbach, 12 miles N.E. of Carlsruhe. There is a trade in wine. Pop. 2,300.

HEIDENHEIM, hi'-den-hime, a town of Wurtemburg, circle of Jaxst, in the Brenz Valley, 46 miles S.E. of Stuttgart. Manf. Woollens, linen, flannel, paper, and earthenware. Formerly there were large ironworks. Pop. 2,500.

HEIDINGSFELD, hi'-dings-feld, a town of Bavaria, province of Lower Franconia, on the left bank of the Main, 3 miles S.E. of Würzburg. Manf. Cutlery, lacquer ware, and worsted. Pop. 3,200.

HEIJN, or HEYN, PETER PETERSEN, hine, a Dutch sailor, who rose by his bravery to the command of the fleet, with which he defeated the Spaniards off the coast of Brazil, in 1626, for which he was raised to the rank of admiral, and for a subsequent victory was named Admiral of Holland. He was killed in an engagement with the French off Dunkirk. When the news arrived, the States sent a deputation to condole with his mother on the melancholy occasion; but the old woman only replied, "Ah, I always said Peter was an unlucky dog, and would come to an untimely end."

Born 1577; died 1629.

HEILBRONN, hil'-bron, a town of Wurtemberg, on the right bank of the Neckar, 28 miles N. from Stuttgart. Its market-place is large, and is adorned with fine fountains; it also has a handsome church, St. Kilian's, partly in the Gothic and partly in the Renaissance styles, with a lofty tower; a palace, an ancient town-hall, an old tower, and the house of the Teutonic Knights, now a barrack and a gymnasium. Manf. Carpets, woollens, gold, silver, and iron ware, white lead, oil, and paper. Gypsum and sandstone are obtained from the vicinity. Pop. 28,021.

HEILIGENBEIL, or SWIENTA-SIERKA, hi'-le-gen-bile, a town of Prussia, province of East Prussia, at the confluence of the Bahnau and the Jarft, 28 miles S W. of Königsberg. There is a trade in cattle, and three annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,900.

HEILIGENHAFEN, hi'-le-gen-haf'-en, a town of Prussia, in Holstein, on the Baltic, 39 miles N.E. of Lubeck. There is a Gothic church, and the harbour accommodates small vessels. Pop. 2,300, many of them engaged in the fishery.

HEILIGENSTADT, hi'-le-gen-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Leine, at its junction with the Gaislade, 50 miles N.W. from Erfurt. It is surrounded by walls, and has a castle, four churches, gymnasium, and academies. Manf. Wooden clocks, worsted, and paper. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,000.

HEILSBERG, hiles-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of East Prussia, 43 miles S. of Königsberg. It is situated on the left bank of the Alle, and was formerly the chief town of Ermeland, a division of Poland. There are a fine castle, five churches, and a monastery. Manf. Woollen, linen, and leather. Pop. 5,900.

HEILSBRONN, hiles'-bron, a town of Bavaria, province of Middle Franconia. There are a convent and church here, noteworthy for their antiquity (founded 1132), and the interesting memorials they contain. The village of Heilsbronn possesses mineral springs. Manf. Wax, cloth and woollen goods. Pop. 850.

HEINE, HEINRICH, hine'-e(r), French-German poet, essayist, and satirist. He was born of Jewish parents, at Düsseldorf, on the 1st of January, 1800, "Which makes me," he wrote, "the first man of my century." He embraced the Protestant faith in 1825, to prevent, he said "M. de Rothschild treating him with familiarity." He studied jurisprudence successively at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen, in which latter city he received the degree of Doctor of Laws, and while resident there, in 1824, made a tour in the Harz Mountains, an account of which he published at Hamburg. England, South Germany, and Italy were next visited; and a description of these countries was written by him, and published under the title of "Reisebilder" (Pictures of Travel), between the years 1826-31, a French translation of which, by himself, under the title of "Impressions de Voyages," made him as celebrated in France as he already was in Germany. The brilliant wit, combined with the bold political addresses to the sovereigns of Germany and the whole of Europe, contained in this volume, established his fame. His "Book of Songs," published at Hamburg, in 1827, placed him at the head of that political and literary section of his countrymen called "The Young German School," and, from its satirical humour, caused him so many enemies in Germany, that he withdrew to Paris, where he became, as much from temperament as from the natural bent of his genius, more a Frenchman than a German. During the last 25 years of his life, he continued to reside in the French capital, making only a few furtive visits to his native land. In 1847 he was attacked with paralysis, by which he lost the sight of one eye; and, in the following year, he had a second attack, which, although it left his mental faculties unimpaired, deprived him of the use of his other eye, and made him a cripple for the remainder of his life, besides subjecting him, at intervals, to intense bodily suffering. Though he was never again able to quit his chamber, he continued to embody in prose and verse the rich and fertile creations of his brain, by the aid of an amanuensis. A translation of his poems into French was made by Gérard de Nerval, under his superintendence, in 1855. In addition to the works we have quoted, he wrote many volumes of poetry, sketches, and satirical pieces. As a satirical wit, he is worthy to be classed with Cervantes, Swift, and Voltaire, while his poems are characterised by tenderness, originality, and rare beauty of versification.

Born 1800; died at Paris, 1856.

HEINECCIUS, JOHANN GOTTLIEB, hine-ek'-ye-us, German jurist and professor of law and philosophy at Halle. His principal works, which are still held in esteem, are "Antiquitatum Jus Romanum Illustratium Syntagma," "Elementa Juris Civilis Secundum Ordinem Institutionum," and "Elementa Juris Civilis Secundum Ordinem Pandectarum."

Born 1681; died 1741.

HEINSIUS, DANIEL, hine'-se-us, an eminent Dutch philologist and critic. He was made Greek professor at Leyden when he was but 18, and, afterwards, succeeded his master, Joseph Scaliger, in the professorship of politics and history. Besides annotating several of the classic authors, he wrote some excellent works in prose and verse.

Born at Ghent, 1580; died 1655.

HEINSIUS, NICOLAS, son of the preceding, was an eminent Latin poet, and editor of several editions of Virgil, Ovid, Claudian, and other classic authors. He was employed by the States-General as ambassador to Sweden, France, and Russia.

Born 1620; died 1681.

HEL, in Scandinavian mythology, the goddess of the dead, daughter of Loki and the giantess Angurboda.

HELDER, hel'-der, a fortified seaport of Holland, on the North Sea, 45 miles N.W. of Amsterdam, at the mouth of the Mars-diep, which separates the province of North Holland from the island of Texel. It contains several churches, a synagogue, town-hall, and orphan hospital, and is protected from the sea by an immense dyke, built of Norwegian granite. There are a large harbour and a lighthouse. It is connected with Amsterdam by the great ship canal. Pop. 20,200.—Near here was fought a naval battle between the English and Dutch, in which Van Tromp was killed. It was taken by the English, under Abercrombie, in 1799, and was afterwards retaken by Brewe, and was subsequently rendered a first-class fortress by Napoleon I.

HELEN, hel'-en, a Grecian princess, celebrated in Homeric legend for her beauty, and for causing the siege of Troy. She was the wife of Menelaus; but, during his absence from Sparta, she fled with the Trojan prince Paris, to Troy. The siege of Troy by the Greeks ensued, and was only terminated by the destruction of the city. Paris having been killed in the siege, she became the wife of Deiphobus, his brother; but, after the taking of the city, she betrayed him to the Greeks, and was conducted by Menelaus back to Sparta, which state she was forced to quit on his death, retiring to Rhodes, where she was put to death by the queen of the island.

HELENA, ST., he-le'-na, a small island in the Atlantic, about 1,200 miles west of the continent of Africa. It is 10½ miles long by 7 broad, and about 28 miles in circumference, and presents to the sea, throughout its whole circuit, an immense wall of perpendicular rock, from 600 to 1,200 feet high. The culminating point, Diana's Peak, is situate nearly in the centre of the island, and attains a height of 2,700 feet. There are other rocks and hills thrown together in the wildest confusion; and the rugged surface presents a number of fantastic peaks, the most remarkable of which are two basaltic columns, 160 and 197 feet high respectively, known as Lot's Wife and Lot. Another very remarkable basaltic column, the Chimney, is 64 feet high. There are some fertile valleys and plains, in one of which, Longwood, is the house in which Napoleon lived and died. The principal opening is St. James's, or Chapel Bay, a fine harbour, on the north-western side of the island, and here the town of St. James is built. There are three other openings, all of which are strongly fortified. The climate is heavy and moist, but not liable to the extremes of heat or cold. Of the small portion of ground fit for cultivation, a part is exceedingly fertile. Potatoes are the principal object of culture, and have, in fourteen years, produced, on an average, more than two crops in the year. At its first discovery, the island presented an immense forest, its chief indigenous trees being ebony, red-wood, and gum-wood. About 1720, the plain was nearly stripped of trees, and, in their place, there began, in a few years, to spring up a species of wire-grass, which covered the ground with excellent pasture. After that time, the rearing of sheep and goats became the principal object of agricultural industry.

Area.—47 square miles.
Pop.—5,060, of whom about half are of European extraction.
Lat.—15° 57′ S. Lon. 5° 42′ W.
History.—Saint Helena was discovered by the Portuguese in 1502, and belonged to the Dutch chiefly till 1673, when it fell into the hands of the British. It derives its principal importance from its being on the direct route from the E. Indies to Europe, and is, consequently, a valuable possession for England. Its chief celebrity, however, is due to its having been selected for the place of exile for Napoleon I. by the allied powers. Here he lived at Longwood, from November, 1815, till his death, in 1821. His remains lay here, also, till 1840, when, by the permission of the English government, they were conveyed to France.

HELENA, ST., a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 520 square miles. Pop. 7,504.

HELENA, ST., EMPRESS, said by some to have been born in Bithynia, but claimed by English church historians to have been a native of Britain, of obscure origin, but of an accomplished mind and handsome person. She became the wife of Constantine Chlorus, and was the mother of the emperor Constantine. When her husband espoused the daughter of Maximilian-Hercules, in 292, he divorced Helena; but, on the accession of her son, she was recalled to court, and treated with the honours due to her rank. She visited the Holy Land, where she was supposed to have discovered the true cross. She founded several churches, and bestowed immense sums in charity. After her death she was canonized.

Born 247; died 327.

HELENA, ST., wife of the Grand Duke Igor of Muscovy. She was baptized at Constantinople in 955, and then renounced her original name, Olga. She is a saint of the Russian and of the Roman Catholic church.

Lived in the 10th century.

HELEN'S, ST., a market town of Lancashire, on a branch of the Mersey, 11 miles N.E. of Liverpool. It has risen rapidly in importance. There are a handsome town hall, a market-house, a mechanics' institute, two churches, and a large cruciform Roman Catholic chapel. Manf. Glass (especially plate), chemicals, watch movements, and earthenware. There are collieries in the vicinity. Pop. 57,234. A station on the London and North Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways.

HELEN'S, ST. (See SCILLY ISLANDS.)

HELENSBURG, hel'-ens-berg, a watering-place in Dumbartonshire, Scotland, on the N. of the Frith of Clyde, opposite Greenock. The houses, which have gardens attached to them, are not numerous, but they are comfortably and pleasingly built, and are occupied in the summer season by the Glasgow citizens, of whom Helensburg is a favourite resort. It was established in 1777 by Sir James Colquhoun, and named after his wife. Pop. 5,975 (exclusive of visitors).

HELICON, or ZAGORA, hel'-i-kon, a mountain range of Bœotia, Greece, celebrated in the songs of many Greek poets as the abode of the Muses. It is composed of a series of peaks, deep ravines, and beautiful valleys, whilst its vegetation is luxuriant. The height of the highest peak is 5,000 feet.

HELIER, ST., hel'-yer, chief town of the island of Jersey, situate on its S. coast, and on the E. side of St. Aubin's Bay. The town was formerly an insignificant village, but now consists of several streets diverging from Royal Square. It has a parish church, five other churches, several chapels, and a House of Assembly. It is defended by a strong citadel, called Fort Regent, which overlooks the inner harbour, and was built at a cost of about £800,000. A strong fortress, called Elizabeth Castle, stands on a rocky island in St. Aubin's Bay, of which it defends the entrance. Manf. Soap and candles. There are shipbuilding yards and stone-works; and a fine harbour, commodious quays and docks. A large trade is carried on both with England and France. Pop. 28,020. Lat. 49° 11′ N. Lon. 2° 7′ W. (See JERSEY.)

HELIGOLAND, hel-e-go-land', a small island in the North Sea, situate about 35 miles from the mouth of the Elbe. It consists of a rock about 200 feet high, on the summit of which is a low plain, with a village and lighthouse, and of a small tract of lowland communicating with the rocks by a flight of steps. The length, from north to south, is about a mile, and the breadth about one third of a mile. It has two good harbours, and near it is a roadstead, where vessels may anchor in 48 feet of water. The island is much resorted to for the purpose of sea bathing. The encroachments of the sea have led some observers to fear that the island will entirely disappear. The name means "holy land," and in ancient times the island was sacred to the Scandinavian goddess Hertha, and the Angli of the mainland resorted thither to worship her. The island was very much larger than at present, the sea having submerged villages, churches, and monastic establishments. Pop. 2,000, subsisting chiefly by fishing and acting as pilots. Lat. 54° 11′ N. Lon. 7° 53′ E. It was taken from the Danes by the British in 1807, and became a depôt for merchandise intended to be smuggled into the continent during Napoleon's continental blockade. At the peace of 1814, it was retained by this country, and is of importance as an outpost of England in war time.

HELIODORUS, he-li-o-dor'-us, a Greek writer of romances. The work by which he is known is a love story, entitled "Æthiopica," the style and morality of which have been much admired. He was descended from a priestly family consecrated to the worship of the Sun, but was himself a Christian, and became Bishop of Trikka, in Thessaly.

Born at Emesa, Syria, in the 4th century.

HELIOGABALUS or ELAGABALUS MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONIUS, he'-le-o-gab'-a-lus, a Roman emperor, so called because he had been a priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phœnician Sun-god. He was, at the age of 14, chosen emperor, after the death of Macrinus, and associated with himself in the government his grandmother Mœsa, and his mother Sæmias, and chose a senate of women, over whom the latter presided. He afterwards fell into every kind of cruelty and debauchery, raised his horse to the consular dignity, and caused divine honours to be paid to himself. A not unnatural result of his conduct was that the army revolted, and he was killed when only 17 years old.

Born 205; died 222.

HELIOPOLIS. (See BAALBEC.)

HELL, MAXIMILIAN, hel, an eminent German astronomer, who, at 25 years of age, was engaged as an assistant in the Jesuits' observatory at Vienna. In 1751 he was made professor of mathematics in Transylvania; but, after some years, he returned to Vienna, and there became head of an observatory, erected after his own designs. He left Vienna for Lapland in 1768 to observe the transit of Venus across the sun's disc. His observation was conducted under very favourable atmospheric conditions, and his report of the phenomena was so accurate and complete, that astronomical science was greatly advanced by it. His report also contained some valuable information relating to the natural history, the geography, and meteorology of Lapland. He wrote many excellent mathematical and astronomical works, as well as editing the astronomical observations made by the Jesuits at Pekin, between the years 1717 and 1752.

Born in Hungary, 1720; died at Vienna, 1792.

HELLANICUS, hel-lan'-i-kus, an early Greek prose writer, who wrote a "History of Argos," and other works which have been quoted by ancient authors.

Born at Mitylene, 496 B.C.; died 411 B.C.

HELLEVOETSLUIS. (See HELVOETSLUYS.)

HELL GATE, or HURL GATE, a pass in the East River between Long Island and Great Barn Island, east of New York, United States, long noted for its dangerous navigation. The rocks have recently (Sept. 1876) been blasted by immense charges of dynamite, and the navigation thereby rendered safe.

HELLIN, hel'-leen, a Spanish town 40 miles S.E. of Albacete, in the province of the same name. It is built on a height, irregularly but substantially, and has an elegant church, the ruins of an ancient castle, and mineral baths. Productive sulphur mines are worked in the vicinity. Pop. 13,657.

HELLOT, JOHN, hel'-lo, a French chemist, who was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris, and of the Royal Society at London. He wrote some treatises on dyeing, and several dissertations in "The Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences;" besides other chemical works of merit. He also conducted, for many years, the "Gazette de France."

Born 1685; died 1766.

HELLOVO, hel-lov'-o, the ancient Othrys, a range of mountains to the N. of Greece, being a spur of the Pindus. The range attains a height of 5,570 feet.

HELL'S SKERRIES, hels sker-res, a cluster of small islands belonging to the Hebrides, 10 miles from Uist, with an extremely rapid current running between them.

HELME, helm, a river rising in the Harz mountains, on the confines of Hanover, flowing through the Prussian province of Saxony, and, after a course of 45 miles, falling into the Unstrut, near Artern.

HELMERS, JAN FREDERIK, hel'-mers, a Dutch poet, chiefly remarkable for his hyperbolical laudation of his native country. After stating that the Dutch nation left every other immeasurably behind in morality, heroism, science, and the fine arts, he makes a comparison between Vondel, a Dutch poet, and Shakspere, to the disadvantage of the latter, who is pronounced to be "barbarous."

Born at Amsterdam, 1767; died 181?.

HELMHOLTZ, HERMANN, helm'-holtz, German physiologist and physicist, was educated for the medical profession, and was appointed a surgeon in the army. He subsequently became assistant in the Berlin anatomical museum; received, in 1849, the appointment of professor of physiology at Königsberg, which he held until 1855, when he was transferred to Bonn, and in 1858 to Heildelberg. He became professor of physics at Berlin in 1871. He is the author of numerous works on optics, on sound, on the conservation of energy, the motion of fluids, &c.

Born at Potsdam, 1821.

HELMONT, JAN BAPTISTA VAN, hal-mawn(g), lord of Merode, Royenborch, Oorschot, and Pellines, an eminent Belgian chemist. On the completion of his education at Louvain, he was appointed to the chair of surgery in that university, and occupied that position for two years, after which he spent several years in the different universities of France and Italy, devoting himself to the study of chemistry and natural philosophy. He then returned home, and settled down on his estate at Vilvorde, where he gave himself up to the pursuit of his favourite sciences. His discoveries were numerous and valuable, especially in connexion with the gases, and he has been described as the greatest chemist previous to Lavoisier.

Born at Brussels, 1577; died 1674.

HELMSLEY, helms'-le, a picturesque market-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, near the Rye, 21 miles N. of York. It has a church and the ruins of an ancient castle. Manf. Cotton and linen. In the vicinity are the remains of Rievaulx Abbey. Pop. 2,500.

HELMSTEDT, helm'-stat, a town of the duchy of Brunswick, 22 miles S.E. of Brunswick. It has churches, hospitals, gymnasium, and the buildings of a university, suppressed in 1809 by Jérôme Bonaparte. Manf. Flannel, soap, hats, tobacco pipes, and vinegar. Pop. 8,084.

HELMUND, hel-moond', a river of Afghanistan, which rises 35 miles W. of Cabul, at a height of 11,500 feet, and enters the lake Hamoon by several mouths, after a course of 650 miles. Its banks are fertile, and discover traces of ancient cultivation, but a barren waste is exhibited by the inland country.

HELOISE. (See ABELARD.)

HELPS, SIR ARTHUR, essayist and historian, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1838. He entered the public service as private secretary to the late Lord Monteagle, then Mr. Spring-Rice and Chancellor of the Exchequer in the cabinet of Lord Melbourne. On Mr. Spring-Rice exchanging that office for the Comptrollership of the Exchequer in 1839, Mr. Helps became private secretary to Lord Morpeth, at that time chief secretary for Ireland, and afterwards Earl of Carlisle and lord-lieutenant. He also filled the office of commissioner of French, Danish, and Spanish claims. In 1859, upon the retirement of the Hon. W. L. Bathurst from the clerkship of the privy council, Mr. Helps was appointed as his successor, and continued to occupy the post until his death. Of his numerous literary works the following may be mentioned:—"Essays written in the Intervals of Business," published in 1841; "Henry II.;" "Catherine Douglas;" "The Claims of Labour," in 1845; "Friends in Council" (first and second series); "Companions of my Solitude," in 1850; "The Conquerors of the New World and their Bondsmen," in 1852; "The Spanish Conquest of America," in 1855-61; "The Life of Pizarro, with some account of his associates in the Conquest of Peru," in 1869; "Casimir Maremma;" and "Brevia, or Short Essays and Aphorisms," in 1870; "Conversations on War and General Culture;" "The Life of Hernando Cortes, and the Conquest of Mexico," and "Thoughts upon Government," in 1871. Some of his most popular works have been those in which he has dealt with subjects connected with the inner life of the Court. He edited the Prince Consort's speeches, and prepared for the press those "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands" in which her Majesty gave to her people a deeply-interesting record of the earlier years of her married life. Sir Arthur Helps received the honour of knighthood in 1872.

Born 1817; died 1875.

HELSINGBORG, hel'-sing-borg, a seaport of Sweden, on the Sound, opposite Elsinore. It is well built, has a good harbour, and a large trade. There are a townhouse, a large market-place, a conspicuous tower of great antiquity, and the remains of an old castle. Manf. Earthenware, leather, tiles, and iron goods. Pop. 2,850.—The width of the Sound is about 3 miles, and here is the principal ferry from Sweden to Denmark. At this place the Swedes, in 1709, obtained a victory over the Danes.

HELSINGFORS, hel'-sing-fors, a fortified seaport of Russia, capital of Finland, on a peninsula in the Gulf of Finland, 190 miles W. of St. Petersburg. It has a good harbour, wherein can lie line-of-battle ships, and it is defended by the almost impregnable citadel of Sweaborg, standing on a number of rocky islands. The town is regularly built, and possesses a university, brought here from Abo in 1829, a library of 80,000 volumes, also brought from Abo, a museum, observatory, statehouse, churches, and botanical gardens. In the summer it is a favourite bathing-place. Manf. Sailcloth and linen; and it carries on a trade in corn, timber, iron, and fish, &c. Pop. 43,316, including the garrison. Lat. 60° 9′ N. Lon. 24° 57′ E.—This town was founded by Gustavus I., and was burnt in 1741, during the war between Sweden and Russia. In 1855, Sweaborg was bombarded for two days by the allied English and French fleets, and considerable damage was done to the interior defences of the place.

HELST, BARTHOLOMEW VAN DER, helst, Dutch painter of portraits. His most famous work is one in the chamber of justice at Amsterdam, representing 30 full-length figures, which is highly valued.

Born at Haarlem, 1613; died at Amsterdam, 1670.

HELSTONE, hel'-stone, a market-town and municipal and parliamentary borough of Cornwall, picturesquely situate near the mouth of the Loe, 10 miles S.W. of Falmouth. It is neatly built, and has a handsome guildhall, several churches and chapels, a good harbour, and carries on a considerable trade in exporting tin, copper, and shoes, and importing iron, coal, and timber for the use of the surrounding mining district. The ancient May games, or Floralia, are still continued here, and on the 8th of May a universal holiday prevails, and floral processions and dances are held. Pop. 3,432.

HELTAU, or NAGY-DIZNOD, hel'-tow, a town of Austria, in Transylvania, 6 miles S. of Hermannstadt. It is well-built, and beautifully situated. The inhabitants are remarkable for their tall stature. Manf. Woollen cloth. A large trade in fruit, especially cherries, is carried on. Pop. 2,600.

HELVELLYN, hel-vel'-lin, one of the highest mountains in England (3,055 feet), on the borders of Westmoreland and Cumberland. The ascent is not difficult, and, from the summit, a magnificent view is obtained of the beautiful lake district.

HELVETII, hel-ve'-ti-i, a Celtic people described by Cæsar, as occupying in his time the region bounded by the Jura on the west, the Rhone on the south, and the Rhine E. and N. They suffered a most disastrous defeat at the hands of Cæsar, and in the commotions which followed the death of Nero they were almost extirpated.

HELVETIUS, CLAUDE ADRIEN, hel-vé'-she-us, French philosophical writer. He was descended from a Swiss family, and was intended for a financial career. At an early age he was appointed a farmer-general, but resigned his office, and for some time led the life of a court gallant, but married, and afterwards led a domestic and retired life. In 1758 he produced his celebrated work entitled, "De l'Esprit," which for its atheistical principles, was condemned by the parliament of Paris. On this he went to England, and thence to Prussia, where he was well received by Frederick the Great. On his return to France, he wrote "Le Bonheur," a poem, and a philosophical work on "Man," of the same nature as his first performance.

Born at Paris in 1715; died there, 1771.

HELVOETSLUYS, hel-vet-sloos', a fortified seaport of Holland, province of South Holland, on an island in an arm of the Maas, 17 miles S.W. of Rotterdam. It is well built, and has an excellent harbour, much used by the Dutch navy. It possesses also extensive magazines and dockyards for the construction and repair of ships of war; also a government naval school. Steamers sail regularly hence to English ports. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 51° 49′ N. Lon. 4° 8′ E.—At this port the Prince of Orange, afterwards William III., embarked for England in 1688. It was taken by the French in 1795, and evacuated by them in 1813.

HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA, hé'-mans' a distinguished English poetess, was the daughter of Mr. Browne, who, dying while she was quite young, left her with her mother, an inmate of a solitary old mansion in North Wales. She commenced writing verses when but nine years of age, and printed a volume of poems, called "Early Blossoms," before she was fifteen. In 1812 she was married to Captain Hemans, of the 4th regiment, whose health had, however, become so shattered by his service in the Peninsular war, and in the ill-fated Walcheren expedition, that, in a few years, he was compelled to leave his young wife and five sons for Italy, with a view to its recovery. Shortly after arriving there he died. Strongly imbued with a love of poetry and literature, she studied Latin, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and German; made translations from Horace, Herrera, and Camoens, and wrote a series of articles on foreign literature for the "Edinburgh Magazine." She published "The Restoration of the Works of Art to Italy," in 1815; "Tales and Historic Scenes," in 1819; and obtained the prize from the Royal Society of Literature, for her poem of "Dartmoor" in 1821. Becoming acquainted with Bishop Heber, she wrote, at his suggestion, the "Vespers of Palermo," a drama, which was produced at Covent Garden theatre in 1823, when it was unsuccessful, but was afterwards more popular at the Edinburgh theatre, upon which occasion Sir Walter Scott wrote an epilogue for it. In 1825 she contributed her "Lays of Many Lands" to the "New Monthly Magazine," then edited by the poet Thomas Campbell. "The Forest Sanctuary," and "The Records of Women," followed. The "Songs of the Affections" were published in 1830. In the spring of 1831, her health became very weak, and she changed her residence to Dublin, where, while preparing a collected edition of her poems, she died.

Born at Liverpool, 1794; died 1835.

HEMEL HEMPSTEAD, hem'-el-hem'-sted, a town in Hertfordshire, 23 miles N.W. of London. It is well built, on a pleasant site, and has an old Norman church, chapels, workhouse, infirmary, and various schools. Manf. Paper. Straw plait-work is the chief employment of the females. Pop. 9,064.

HEMINGFORD, WALTER DE, hem'-ing-ford, canon of Austin priory, Yorkshire, an English chronicler of the 14th century, whose history extends from the Norman conquest to the reign of Edward II.

Died 1347.

HEMMINGSTED, hem'-ming-sted, a village of Prussia, in Holstein, 29 miles N.W. of Glückstadt. It is famous for the great battle fought in the neighbourhood in 1500, when a small force of the natives of the district defeated the King of Denmark and the duke of Holstein, who had an army of more than 20,000.

HEMPFIELD, hemp'-feeld, a township of Pennsylvania, United States, in the county of Westmoreland. Pop. 4,000.

HEMPSTEAD, a township of New York, United States, 20 miles E. of New York. Manf. Leather and paper. Pop. 4,000.

HEMPSTEAD, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 19,015. The capital is Washington.

HEMS, HOMS, or HUMS, a town of Syria, 65 miles N.E. of Baalbec, on the right bank of the Orontes (lat. 34° 44′ N.; lon. 36° 43′ E.). It was formerly celebrated for a temple of the Sun, in which Heliogabalus, one of the emperors of Rome, was a priest before he was raised to the throne. Zenobia was defeated under its walls, A.D. 272. It was taken by the Saracens in 636, and fell into the hands of the Crusaders in 1099. In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha, of Egypt, defeated the Turks with great loss. It now carries on a flourishing trade, and is the seat of several manufactures. Pop. 25,000.

HEMSKERCK, MARTIN VAN, hems'-kerk, a Dutch painter, surnamed the "Raffaelle of Holland." He was the son of a mason, who brought him up to the same trade, but evincing a talent for design, he left his father's house and travelled to Italy. On his return he enriched his native country with his productions, most of which were destroyed by fire on the taking of Haarlem by the Spaniards in 1572.

Born at Hemskerck, 1498; died 1574.

HEMSTERHUIS, TIBERIUS, hem'-ster-hoos, a Dutch philologist and professor of Greek and of history at Leyden from 1740 to 1766. He was celebrated as a Greek scholar, and published an edition of the "Onomasticon" of Pollux in 1706, the "Select Dialogues" of Lucian in 1708 and 1732; and the "Plutus" of Aristophanes, 1744. "Anecdota Hemsterhusiana" were published from his MSS. in 1825, and "Orationes et Epistolæ," in 1839.

Born at Groningen, 1685; died at Leyden 1766.

HENDERSON, JOHN, hen'-der-son, a celebrated English actor, who, evincing in his youth a taste for drawing, was placed under Mr. Fournier, an artist of ability, but of an eccentric character, with whom he did not continue long. He next lived with a silversmith, on whose death he devoted himself to theatrical studies. His first appearance was in 1772, at Bath, under the name of Courtney, in the character of Hamlet, which he performed with great applause. His fame increased; but it was not till 1777 that he made his appearance on the London stage, when he was engaged by Mr. Colman, at the Haymarket theatre, and made his first appearance in Shylock. After this he distinguished himself as a most excellent representative of Falstaff, Richard III., and other Shaksperian characters, which he personated with unbounded applause at Drury Lane, and at different provincial theatres.

Born in London, 1747; died 1785.

HENDERSON, THOMAS, an eminent Scottish astronomer, who, after completing his education as an attorney, became secretary to Lord Advocate Jeffrey, in whose service he remained till 1831. For several years previously he had been an earnest student of astronomy; and, although his health was delicate and his eyes weak, he continued to make himself so proficient therein, that he became the correspondent of Dr. Thomas Young, whom he assisted in the calculations for the "Nautical Almanack." On the death of Dr. Young, a paper was left by him informing the Admiralty that Mr. Henderson was the most proper person to fill the post left vacant; but though the Admiralty did not act upon this suggestion, it appointed him to the charge of the observatory at the Cape of Good Hope in April, 1832. While thus engaged, he communicated upwards of seventy papers of the greatest value to different scientific publications. In 1834 he was made astronomer royal for Scotland, and, while fulfilling the duties of his office, he voluntarily imposed upon himself the task of reducing to order the mass of observations he had brought home from the Cape. His writings and his observations have caused him to be reckoned among the best of modern astronomers.

Born at Dundee, 1798; died at Edinburgh, 1844.

HENDERSON, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 10,722. Oquawka is the capital.

HENDERSON, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 24,515. The capital is HENDERSON.

HENDERSON, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 10,281 Hendersonville is the capital.

HENDERSON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 914 square miles. Pop. 17,430. The capital is Lexington.

HENDERSON, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 9,735. Athens is the capital.

HENDERSON, the capital of Henderson county, Kentucky, United States, on the Ohio, 200 miles below Louisville. Steamers leave regularly for Louisville, Memphis, and other places, and large quantities of tobacco, corn, and wheat are shipped. Manf. Tobacco, carriages, and railway stock. Pop. 5,365.

HENDERSON, a township of New York, United States, on Lake Ontario, 151 miles N.W. of Albany. There is a good harbour. Pop. 2,500.

HENDRICKS, hen'-driks, a county of Indiana, United States. Area. 387 square miles. Pop. 23,000. The capital is Danville.

HENGELO, hen'-ge-lo, a town of Holland, province of Overyssel, 26 miles N.E. of Deventer. Manf. Damask and calico. Pop. 3,600.

HENGELO, a town of Holland, province of Gelderland, 18 miles N.E. of Arnheim. It is well built, and iron ore of good quality is found in the vicinity. Pop. 2,900.

HENGIST, hen'-jist, the first Saxon king of Kent, towards the end of the 5th century, was said to be a descendant of Woden, whom the Saxons deified. Hengist, with his brother Horsa, being called in by Vortigern, king of the Britons, to assist him in expelling the Picts, obtained the kingdom of Kent, one of the seven of the Saxon heptarchy, and in which were included the present counties of Kent, Middlesex, Essex, and Surrey.

Died 489.

HENG-KIANG, heng-ke'-ang, a river of China, flowing through the province of Hunan, and discharging into the lake Tong-ting, after a course of 300 miles.

HENGSTENBERG, ERNST WILHELM, heng'-sten-bairg, German theologian and Biblical writer. He was the son of a clergyman of Westphalia, studied at Bonn, and afterwards established himself at Berlin as a tutor. He published two treatises in defence of orthodox theology, and in 1826 was made professor, and three years afterwards doctor of theology. He edited a newspaper devoted to the support of evangelical principles, and produced numerous works in opposition to the rationalistic interpretation and criticism of scripture. He exerted great influence in ecclesiastical matters, especially under King Frederick William. Several of his works have been translated into English.

Born at Fröndenberg, Westphalia, 1802; died 1869.

HENLEY, REV. JOHN, hen'-le, commonly called "the Orator," was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, after which he entered into holy orders, and became a preacher in London; but, disappointed in obtaining preferment, he commenced lecturing, not only on theology, but on politics, &c., on Sunday evenings near Lincoln's Inn Fields. Pope satirised, and Hogarth caricatured him. He published a translation of Pliny's "Epistles," and other works.

Born 1692; died 1756.

HENLEY-IN-ARDEN, a market town of Warwickshire, at the confluence of the Arrow and Alne, 8 miles N.W. of Warwick. It is situate in the district which formed the ancient forest of Arden and contains many old houses. Manf. Nails. Pop. 1,140.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES, an urban district Oxfordshire, on the left bank of the Thames, here crossed by a handsome bridge, 35 miles W. of London. The richly-wooded Chiltern Hills rise above the town, which consists of two main streets, and has a fine Gothic church, town-hall, market-house, and a valuable public library and theatre. Manf. Silk. It has a considerable trade in corn, malt, and timber, and is much visited by the lovers of the sport of fishing. Pop. 4,604.—A station on the Great Western railway.

HENLOPEN, CAPE, is at the S.W. point of the entrance of Delaware Bay, United States. Lat. 36° 47′ N.; lon. 75° W.

HENNEBON, hen'-bawng, a town of France, department Morbihan, on the Blavet, 5 miles N.E. of L'Orient. It is walled, picturesque in appearance, and there is a good quay, at which vessels of moderate size can unload. There are some traces of the old castle referred to by Froissart. Corn, wine, wax, honey, and hemp are exported, and six annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,000. This was formerly a very strong place, and Charles de Blois, in 1342, unsuccessfully besieged it when defended by the Countess de Montfort.

HENNEPIN, hen'-ne-pin, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 67,013. Minneapolis is the capital.

HENRICHMONT, hen'-reesh-mawng, a town of France, department Cher, on the Lesser Sandre, 17 miles N.E. of Bourges. Manf. Coarse cloths, leather, and pottery. Pop. 3,300.

HENRICO, hen-ri'-co, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 268 square miles. Pop. 82,703. RICHMOND is the capital.

HENRIETTA OF FRANCE, hen-ri-et'-ta, wife of Charles I., king of England, was daughter of Henry IV. and Marie de Medici. During the struggle between the king and the people, in 1644, she was forced to fly to France. On the death of Charles, in 1649, she retired into a convent which she had founded at Chaillot, where she died. Bossuet pronounced her funeral oration.

Born at Paris, 1609; died 1669.

HENRY, hen'-re, the names of several European sovereigns, biographies of whom are given under the following headings.

ENGLAND.

HENRY I., king of England, surnamed, for his learning, Beauclerc, or the scholar, was the youngest son of William the Conqueror, and was the first monarch of the Norman line who was English by birth. He succeeded his brother Rufus in 1100, at which time his brother Robert was in Normandy. Robert soon after invaded the kingdom, but agreed with Henry, for a yearly tribute, to renounce his right. The two brothers again resorted to arms, and Henry invaded Normandy in 1106, defeated Robert, and brought him prisoner to England, where he died in Cardiff Castle. Though the personal character of Henry was cruel and licentious, his reign was marked by some substantial benefits conferred on the English people. He restored the university of Cambridge, forgave all debts owing to the crown prior to his accession; reformed the court, and conquered Wales, and was distinguished by great administrative ability. He was twice married, first in 1100 to Maud of Scotland, and in 1121 to Adelais of Louvain. On his death-bed he bequeathed the crown to his daughter Matilda or Maud, who had married Henry V., emperor of Germany.

Born 1068; died at Rouen, 1135.

HENRY II., son of the Empress Matilda, by her second marriage with Geoffrey Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou, so named from planta genista, Latin for a sprig of broom, which he wore in his cap, succeeded Stephen as king of England, in 1154. He added the provinces of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Poitou, Saintonge, Guienne, and Gascony, to the English crown. He married Eleanor the divorced queen of Louis VII. of France. His reign was troubled by disputes between him and Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, who being murdered in 1170, the pope obliged the king to undergo penance for it at Becket's tomb at Canterbury. In 1170 he caused his eldest son Henry to be crowned king of England; in 1172 he conquered Ireland, and, in the following year, his sons, instigated by their mother, rebelled against him, on account of his attachment to the Fair Rosamond, by whom he had two sons, William Longsword, earl of Salisbury, and Geoffrey, Archbishop of York. The kings of France and Scotland gave them assistance; but peace was concluded between all parties in the following year. In 1184 his son Henry died, and subsequently Richard, his third son, revolted against his father, and was supported by the king of France. Henry, being defeated in Normandy, was obliged to submit to disgraceful terms. He was an able monarch, compelled the ecclesiastics to agree to the Councils of Clarendon, which limited their power, and placed the administration of the law on a sounder footing. The disobedience of his favourite son John is said to have hastened his death.

Born at Le Mans, Normandy, 1133; died at Chinon, France, 1189.

HENRY III., succeeded his father, John, in 1216, when only 10 years of age. When he reached the age of 16 he was declared of age; but his feeble character caused him to relinquish Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Touraine, and Maine to the king of France. A civil war broke out in England, and he was taken prisoner by the barons, after a severe battle at Lewes, in Sussex. The tide of affairs turned in his favour after the battle of Evesham, in which the barons were totally defeated, chiefly through the brilliant skill and courage of his son Edward; whereupon he deprived several of these lords of their estates, and gave them to his friends. He cancelled the Great Charter, and suffered the pope to appoint an archbishop of Canterbury, and to collect tithes in England.

Born at Winchester, 1206; died at Westminster, 1272.

HENRY IV., eldest son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster and third son of Edward III., was made Duke of Hereford, but banished by Richard II. on account of his contention with the Duke of Norfolk, and after some time spent in exile at Paris, invaded England at the head of a few followers, deposed his cousin Richard II., and seized the throne in 1399. This usurpation gave rise to the civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster, which broke out under the sway of Henry VI. After a short reign of only fourteen years, he died, filled with remorse for many of his unscrupulous deeds while king.

Born at Bolingbroke, Lincolnshire, 1366; died 1413.

HENRY V., was eldest son of Henry IV., and was educated at Oxford, under the guidance of his half uncle, Cardinal Henry Beaufort. On commencing his reign in 1413 he displayed many noble traits, although in his youth he had been very irregular; but, on coming to the crown, he discarded his evil companions, and conducted himself with a dignity becoming his station. Having formed the project of conquering France, he left his kingdom in the hands of a regency, and invaded that country, where he displayed uncommon courage. With 15,000 men he gained the battle of Agincourt, though the French amounted to 52,000. He then returned to England; but, three years afterwards, went again to France, where he married Katherine, the daughter of the French king. He was a brave and energetic monarch, and the most popular ruler that had hitherto sat upon the throne of England, not a single instance of insurrection or discontent being manifested throughout his reign. He was a favourite hero of Shakspere, who delighted alike to depict the wild life of his youth, and the brilliant heroism of his later years.

Born at Monmouth, 1388; died at Vincennes, 1422.

HENRY VI., the only son of the above, was but ten months old at the death of his father, and was proclaimed king on the day after that event. His grandfather Charles, king of France, died soon after, and the duke of Orleans, encouraged by the minority of Henry, assumed the title of king, by the name of Charles VII. This renewed the war between England and France, and the English, for a while, were successful. Henry was crowned at Paris, and the great duke of Bedford, his guardian, obtained several important victories. But the raising of the siege of Orleans by Joan of Arc gave a new turn to affairs, and the English power declined, and was, in the end, quite subverted. The death of the duke of Bedford was a fatal blow to the cause of Henry; and, to add to his misfortunes, the York party in England grew strong, and involved the country in a civil war. They adopted the white rose as their badge of distinction, and the Lancastrians the red. Hence the title given to the struggle—"the War of the Roses." After various contests, the king was defeated and taken prisoner. However, his wife, Margaret of Anjou (whom he married in 1445) carried on the war with spirit, and for some time, with considerable success. Richard, duke of York, was slain at Wakefield, and Henry recovered his liberty; but Edward, earl of March, son of Richard, laid claim to the crown, and routed the queen's forces at Ludlow, but was himself afterwards defeated at St. Albans. At length the York party prevailed, and Henry was sent to the Tower, where, it is believed, he was slain by Richard, duke of Gloucester.

Born at Windsor, 1421; died 1471.

HENRY VII. was the son of Edmund Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, and of Margaret, grand-daughter of John of Gaunt. He was grandson of Katherine, the wife of Henry V., by her second marriage with Owen Tudor. By the assistance of the duke of Brittany, he landed in Wales with some troops, and laid claim to the crown in 1485. The people, disgusted at the cruelties of Richard III., joined Henry (who bore the title of Earl of Richmond), in such numbers that he was enabled to give the usurper battle at Bosworth Field, where Richard was slain, and Henry crowned on the spot. He united the houses of York and Lancaster by marrying Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. His reign met with little disturbance, except from two impostors. One was a joiner's son, called Lambert Simnel, who personated Richard, Duke of York, who had been murdered in the Tower. On being taken prisoner, Henry made him a scullion in his kitchen. The other was Perkin Warbeck, who said he was the duke of York; but he was soon taken, and hanged at Tyburn. Henry reigned twenty-four years, and greatly increased trade and commerce; but his avarice was excessive, and led him to commit many mean and infamous acts. He died of consumption, and was buried in Henry the Seventh's chapel, built by him in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Pembroke, 1456; died at Richmond, 1509.

HENRY VIII. succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, at the age of 19. The first years of his reign were very popular, owing to his generosity and manly bearing, but at length his conduct grew capricious and arbitrary. The emperor Maximilian and Pope Julius II., having leagued against France, persuaded Henry to join them, and he, in consequence, invaded that kingdom, where he made some conquests. About the same time, James IV., king of Scotland, invaded England, but was defeated and slain at Flodden Field. Cardinal Wolsey succeeded in bringing Henry over from the imperial interests to that of the French king. When Luther commenced his reformation in Germany, Henry wrote a book against him, for which he was complimented by the pope with the title of Defender of the Faith. This attachment to the Roman see, however, did not last long. Impelled either by conscience, policy, or a passion for Anne Boleyn, he sought a divorce from his wife, Catherine of Aragon, to whom he had been married eighteen years. His plea for the divorce was, that Catherine was his brother Arthur's widow. The divorce being delayed by the pope, who, surrounded by perplexities, pursued a policy of procrastination, in which he was encouraged by Wolsey, the crisis which might otherwise have been postponed was precipitated. Wolsey was deprived of his power, and after a while Henry assumed the title of supreme head of the English church, put down the monasteries, and alienated their possessions to secular purposes. His marriage with Anne Boleyn took place in the meantime, but she was afterwards sent to the scaffold, to which she was condemned for offences said to have been proved; but her guilt or innocence is a matter of discussion to the present day. On Anne's death Lady Jane Seymour was elevated to the throne; she died in childbed with Prince Edward (afterwards Edward VI.). He next married Anne of Cleves; but she not proving agreeable to his expectations, he put her away. His next wife was Catherine Howard, who was beheaded for adultery; after which he espoused Catherine Parr, who survived him. He was a man of strong passions and considerable learning, and great administrative capacity; and it has been said of him, "that he never spared man in his anger nor woman in his lust." This, however, like many other smart sayings, requires modification. It is unfortunate for the memory of Henry VIII., that he gave great offence to both the Catholic and Protestant Churches, and, until lately, it has been taken for granted that the abuse heaped upon him by each party was fully deserved.

Born at Greenwich, 1491; died 1547.

FRANCE.

HENRY I., king of France, succeeded his father Robert in 1031. His mother, Constance of Provence, excited a revolt against him, in favour of her second son Robert, but without success. His wife was Anne, daughter of Jaroslav, duke of Russia. He had the reputation of a valiant commander and a good king.

Born about 1004; died 1060.

HENRY II., the son of Francis I., succeeded his father in 1547, at which time France was at war with England. In 1550 peace was restored, and Boulogne ceded to the French for a large sum. The year following a league was entered into between him and the Protestant princes of Germany against Charles V., which produced a ruinous war to France. In 1556 a truce was concluded for five years; but the emperor having resigned his crown to his son Philip, the war was renewed. In 1557 the French army was defeated by the Spaniards at St. Quintin. In 1559 Henry concluded a dishonourable peace. The same year he was accidentally wounded in the eye at a tournament, by the lance of Count Montgomery, a Scottish nobleman, of which he died. He married, at the age of 15, Catherine de Medici.

Born 1519; died 1559.

HENRY III., third son of the above, succeeded his brother, Charles IX., in 1574. While he was duke of Anjou, the Poles elected him to their throne, on the death of Sigismund Augustus; but he renounced it on taking possession of that of France. The same year he gained the battle of Dormans, and concluded a peace with the Huguenots, in which toleration was granted them. But this was revoked in 1585, and the Protestant princes, of whom Henry, king of Navarre, was the chief, had recourse to arms. The king of Navarre defeated the Catholic army in 1587. The Duke of Guise, on the other hand, obtained a signal advantage over the Huguenots and their allies; but on his marching to Paris, the gates were shut against him. The people, however, were attached to Guise, and the king was obliged to retire from his capital, which was commanded by the head of the Catholic league. France was then divided into three parties; the Royalists, the Guises, and the Huguenots. At length the two first became apparently reconciled, but Henry caused the duke, and his brother the cardinal, to be assassinated soon after. Civil war again broke out with additional fury; the pope excommunicated Henry, and the parliament instituted a criminal process against him. In this exigency, he had recourse to the king of Navarre, who set out on his march to Paris; but the face of affairs was suddenly changed by the death of the king, who was assassinated by a monk, named James Clement, at St. Cloud, 1589.

Born at Fontainebleau, 1551.

HENRY IV., surnamed the Great, king of France and Navarre, was the son of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre, and Jeanne d'Albert. Being descended from Louis IX. of France, he became the heir to that kingdom; but, as he was educated a Protestant, his claim was resisted. Born a mountaineer, he was early trained to activity of body, and soon distinguished himself by feats of arms. After the peace of St. Germain, in 1570, he was taken to the French court, and, two years afterwards, married Margaret, sister of Charles IX. Amid the rejoicings on this occasion happened the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew, and his life was only spared on condition of his becoming a Roman Catholic; but, in 1576, he escaped from Paris, and put himself at the head of the Huguenots. In 1587 he gained the battle of Coutras. In 1572 he succeeded to the throne of Navarre, and in 1589 to that of France; but his religion proving an obstacle to his coronation, he again consented to abjure it in 1593. In 1595 he issued the edict of Nantes, granting toleration to the Protestants. The same year, he entered into a war with Spain, which lasted till 1598, after which his country enjoyed uninterrupted peace till his death. His abjuration was very disagreeable to the Protestants, and did not prove quite satisfactory to the opposite party, who doubted his sincerity. His greatest enemies were the Jesuits, one of whose pupils, Jean Chatel, wounded him in the mouth in an attempt upon his life, which was finally taken by Francis Ravaillac. He was a popular monarch, able and liberal in policy, and encouraged commercial enterprise, but wasted large sums of money on mistresses.

Born at Pau, in Béarne, 1553; assassinated, 1610.

GERMANY.

HENRY I., surnamed the Fowler, emperor of Germany, was the son of Otho, Duke of Saxony, and elected to the imperial dignity in the year 919. He reunited the German princes, and subdued the Hungarians, formed good laws, and built several cities. He vanquished the Bohemians, the Sclavonians, and the Danes, and conquered the kingdom of Lorraine.

Born 876; died 936.

HENRY II., surnamed both the Saint and the Lame, and great-grandson of the preceding, was elected emperor in 1002. He re-established Benedict VIII. in the papal chair, and was crowned by that pontiff in 1014 at Rome. He tranquillised Italy, and expelled thence the Saracens and Greeks. He endowed many churches and abbeys, and was canonised by Pope Eugenius III.

Born 972; died near Göttingen, 1024.

HENRY III., surnamed the Black, or Bearded, son of Conrad II., succeeded his father in 1039. He was crowned at Rome by Clement II., and governed with a firm hand. He subdued Bohemia and Hungary, founded many monasteries and churches, and the cathedrals of Worms, Mayence, and Spires, and encouraged literature and the arts. It is supposed that he died from the effects of poison. He is buried in the cathedral of Spires.

Born 1017; died 1056.

HENRY IV. was son of Henry III., whom he succeeded at the age of 5 years. Agnes of Poitiers, his mother, governed with ability during his minority. The Saxons rebelled against him, and accused him of simony and other crimes, to Pope Gregory VII., who took from him the right of presenting to benefices. Henry then called a diet at Worms, in 1076, for the purpose of deposing the pope, who excommunicated the emperor. The German princes deposed Henry, who went to Italy, and made an abject submission to the pontiff, doing penance barefooted and in the haircloth shirt of a penitent, but Gregory was not to be appeased, and Henry resolved on vengeance. The electors chose Rodolphus, duke of Suabia, and Gregory confirmed his title; but Henry, after defeating his competitor, put him to death. He then called a council, which deposed the pope, and elected in his room the archbishop of Ravenna. In 1106 his son Henry assumed the title, and being supported by the princes of the empire, the emperor was obliged to renounce his crown; after which he became a wanderer, and supplicated the archbishop of Spires to give him a prebend in his church, which he refused. He died in poverty.

Born 1050; died at Liége, 1106.

HENRY V. deposed his father in 1106. In 1110 he forced Pope Pascal II. to restore to him the right of nominating to ecclesiastical benefices, which Gregory VII. had wrested from his father. Pascal afterwards called two councils, and excommunicated Henry. He was the last emperor of the Franconian line.

Born 1081; died 1125.

HENRY VI., surnamed the Cruel, was son of Frederick Barbarossa, and succeeded his father in 1190, at the age of 25. This prince behaved treacherously to Richard I., king of England, who, in his journey from the crusade, through Germany, was arrested by Leopold, duke of Austria, and sent to the emperor, who exacted from him an enormous ransom. He conquered Sicily. His wife Constance is said to have poisoned him.

Born 1165; died at Massena, 1197.

HENRY VII., son of Henry, count of Luxembourg, was elected emperor in 1308, and soon after went into Italy, at that time distracted with the contentions between the Guelphs and Ghibellines. He was crowned at Rome, 1312.

Born 1262; died 1313.

HENRY RASPON, landgrave of Thuringia, was elected emperor by the ecclesiastical princes in 1246, when Pope Innocent IV. deposed Frederick II.; but died the year following, of a wound received in fighting against his rival.

Died 1247.

HENRY THE LION, duke of Saxony, son of Henry the Proud, succeeded to the dukedom on the death of his father, who was poisoned in 1139, and assumed the government in 1146. One of his first acts was to declare war against the emperor Conrad for refusing the whole of the duchy of Bavaria, which had been wrested from his father; in the conflict Henry was worsted, but obtained his Bavarian dominions after the death of Conrad. In 1166 he defeated a formidable combination which had been formed under the direction of the archbishop of Bremen; about the same period he married Matilda, daughter of Henry II. of England, and soon afterwards undertook an expedition to Palestine. In 1178 he was summoned to appear at three different diets for having, in revenge for a breach of faith on the part of the emperor Frederick I., deserted the imperial forces at a critical point in the Italian campaign. Refusing to obey the summons, he was placed under ban, and four years after was forced to make his submission to the emperor, who permitted him to retain the territories of Brunswick and Luneberg only on condition of his going into exile for three years. He consequently betook himself to England, but returned to Brunswick in 1184; was again compelled to take refuge here in 1188, but returned in the following year to plunge into war, by which he obtained a part of his former territories. He appears to have been a brave, generous, obstinate, and passionate man, desirous of promoting industry and commerce, and of fostering literature and science.

Born 1129; died 1195.

HENRY THE NAVIGATOR, the son of John I., king of Portugal, distinguished himself at the age of twenty-one at the conquest of Ceuta, and afterwards developed a passion for navigation and maritime discoveries, for which he became famous. In the course of several expeditions under his direction and at his expense, the Madeira islands were discovered, and the coast of Guinea explored from Cape Nun, which had been previously regarded as the farthest point of the earth, to Cape Blanco. In 1446 Nuno Tristran, one of his captains, doubled Cape de Verd; two years afterward Gonzalez Valle discovered the Azores; and before his death the Portuguese mariners had reached as far south as Sierra Leone.

Born at Oporto, 1394; died 1463.

HENRY, prince of Wales, and the eldest son of James I., of England, was an amiable and accomplished prince, and a great patron of learning and science. His death caused great grief to the nation, which had formed of him the highest expectations.

Born at Stirling, Scotland, 1594; died 1612.

HENRY, infant of Castile, brother of Alfonso X., against whom he revolted, but was defeated, and fled to Tunis. He joined Charles of Anjou in the invasion of Naples, but afterwards quarrelled with him, was taken prisoner, and for a long period confined in a cage. He afterwards returned to Spain and intrigued against Ferdinand IV.

Born 1225; died 1304.

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON, English historian, was canon of Lincoln and archdeacon of Huntingdon. He wrote a "History of England to the Year 1154;" and was also author of a Latin work, entitled "Contempt of the World."

Lived in the 12th century.

HENRY, MATTHEW, an eminent nonconformist divine and Biblical commentator. He received his education under his father, who was one of the 2,000 ministers who left the Church of England on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, and having made a considerable progress in learning, entered at Gray's Inn; but renounced the study of the law, and became a dissenting minister at Chester, where he resided many years, and then removed to Hackney. His chief work is "The Exposition of the Old and New Testament," a very elaborate work, still considered one of the best commentaries upon the Bible. He wrote also many other theological works.

Born in Flintshire, 1662; died 1714.

HENRY, PATRICK, a celebrated American orator and statesman, who, by the display of a great natural eloquence, became a leader of the American people in their struggle against the mother country. Jefferson says of him, that "he gave the earliest impulse to the ball of the revolution." He was of Scottish descent, and having tried farming and store-keeping in Virginia, settled down to the practice of the law, but with little success until 1755, when being engaged to oppose an unpopular tax, he displayed the remarkable ability which afterwards made him famous. In 1769 he became the leader of the democratic party in Virginia, and in 1775 was one of the first to make an appeal to arms. He said, "Of peace there is no longer any hope. If we wish to be free, we must fight." He became the first governor of Virginia, on the declaration of independence, and was re-elected the three following years. He was appointed secretary of state in 1795 by Washington.

Born 1736; died 1799.

HENRY, ROBERT, a Scotch divine, who, in 1776, was chosen one of the ministers of the Old Church at Edinburgh: he is the author of a valuable History of Great Britain to the reign of Henry VII.

Born 1718; died 1790.

HENRY, WILLIAM, F.R.S., an eminent chemist, the author of "Experimental Chemistry," which was at one time a very popular work. It was published in 1799, and reached an 11th edition in 1829. Dr. Henry's researches were mostly conducted at Manchester, where he was born, and in the immediate vicinity of which he died. His scientific pursuits enabled him to amass a considerable fortune; in their application to art and manufacture they have proved exceedingly valuable.

Born 1774; died 1836.

HENRY, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 975 square miles. Pop. 18,761. Abbeville is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 594 square miles. Pop. 14,193. The capital is McDonough.

HENRY, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 830 square miles. Pop. 36,597. Cambridge is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 385 square miles. Pop. 24,000. The capital is Newcastle.

HENRY, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 20,986. Mount Pleasant is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 260 square miles. Pop. 14,492. The capital is Newcastle.

HENRY, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 23,906. Clinton is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 410 square miles. Pop. 20,585. Napoleon is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 22,142. Paris is the capital.

HENRY, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 358 square miles. Pop. 16,009. Martinsville is the capital.

HENRY, PORT, a large and well-sheltered harbour on the west coast of Patagonia. Lat. 50° S. Lon. 75° 15′ W.

HENZADAH, hen-za'-da, a town of Burmah, 68 miles N.W. of Pegu. Capital of district of same name. Pop. 318,077.

HEPHÆSTION, he-phes'-ti-on, the favourite of Alexander the Great, and the companion of his campaigns and festivities, married one of the daughters of Darius.
Died at Ecbatana, 324 B.C.

HEPHÆSTUS. (See VULCAN.)

HEPPENHEIM, hep'-pen-hime, a walled town of the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, 16 miles S. of Darmstadt. There is an old church, built by Charlemagne, and on a lofty hill near the town is the old castle of Starkenburg, a strong fortress, which belonged to the Archbishop-Electors of Mainz, and which was many times besieged. Manf. Leather, lime, and tiles. Several fairs are held. Pop. 4,200.

HEPTARCHY, hept'-ar-ke, the seven kingdoms into which England was divided under the Saxons—namely, Kent, Sussex, Wessex (which included Surrey, Hants, Isle of Wight, Berks, Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and part of Cornwall); Essex (including Middlesex); Northumbria (including all Scotland south of the Forth, Cumberland, Durham, York, and Lancaster); East Anglia (Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge); and Mercia, which comprised the counties in the centre of the kingdom.

HEPTONSTALL, hep'-ton-stall, a township of Yorkshire, 7 miles N.W. of Halifax. Manf. Cotton and silk. Pop. 2,497.

HERACLEA. (See ERekli.)

HERACLEIA, he-rak'-le-a, an ancient city of Magna Græcia, situated on the right bank of the Agri, 3 miles above the Gulf of Tarentum. So little is known of its later history that the date of its decay is uncertain. It was founded about 432 B.C. It is chiefly remarkable for the discovery amongst its ruins of bronze tables containing a copy of the "Lex Julia Municipalis," dating 45 B.C., which form an important contribution to our knowledge of the municipal law of ancient Italy.

HERACLIDÆ, he-ra-kli'-de, in Greek legend, the descendants of Hercules who joined the Dorians in the conquest of the Peloponessus.

HERACLITUS, he-ra-cli'-tus, philosopher of Ephesus. He was fond of solitude, and obtained the appellation of "the mourner," from his custom of weeping at the follies of men. He supported the doctrine of fatalism, and maintained that the world was made of fire, which element he deified.
Lived in the 5th century B.C.

HERACLIUS, her-ac'-li-us, Roman emperor of the East, was the son of Heraclius, governor of Africa, who dethroned Phocas in 610, and caused himself to be crowned in his stead. Chosroes, king of Persia, having ravaged Palestine, and committed dreadful cruelties on the Christians, Heraclius marched against him, forced him to sue for peace, and to deliver up the holy cross. The end of his reign was disturbed by ecclesiastical disputes and the inroads of the Saracens.
Born 575; died 641.

HERACLIUS-CONSTANTINE, son and successor of the above, was associated in the throne of his brother Heracleonas, agreeably to the will of Heraclius. He reigned only a few months, being poisoned, it is said, by his mother-in-law, Martina.
Born at Constantinople, 612.

HERACLIUS, patriarch of Jerusalem, was a debauched and scandalous prelate, and showed great enmity to Henry II., king of England, for not going to Jerusalem in person, agreeably to the terms of his penance, on account of the murder of Thomas à Becket.
Born 1100; died 1163.

HERAT, he'-rat, formerly Heri, a city of Afghanistan, situate in a plain near the Heri river, 390 miles W. from Cabul. It is well fortified, and surrounded by a wet ditch, mound, and bastioned wall. It contains a number of caravanserais, public baths, reservoirs, numerous mosques, and a strong citadel is built. To the north of the city are the ruins of a magnificent religious edifice, dedicated to the memory of the Imaum Reza. The interior of the town is exceedingly dirty, although the vicinity is beautiful and the ground irrigated by numerous canals. Herat is the emporium of the commerce carried on between Cabul and Bokhara, Hindostan, and Persia, and is a grand central mart for the products of India, China, Tartary, Afghanistan, and Persia.

Manf.—Carpets, leather, caps, cloaks, shoes, &c.
Pop.—Supposed to be about 45,000, composed of Persians, Hindoos, Afghans, and many other nationalities.
Lat.—34° 22′ N. Lon. 62° 9′ E.
History.—This place has often been ravaged by various conquerors, disputing the empire of Asia: it was taken by Ghenghis Khan, then by Tamerlane, who made it the seat of government. It was subsequently united to Persia; but the Afghans took possession of it in 1715. Nadir Shah retook it in 1741, and Ahmed Khan, one of Nadir's generals, in 1749. After that date it became a quasi-independent state, and formed a portion of Afghan-Khorassan, in the kingdom of Cabul. In 1829 Herat was independently governed by Khamran Mirza, an Afghan prince, who, with a view of obtaining protection against his neighbour, the king of Cabul, agreed to pay an annual tribute to the shah of Persia. This obligation was, however, disregarded, and, after a few years, the Afghan acted as entirely independent. Some pretext for hostilities having occurred, Mahomet Shah marched against Herat in 1836, but, after a long siege, the Persians were forced to withdraw. The position of Herat is one of the greatest possible importance, and has been well described as the gate of India; for within the limits of the Heratee country all the great roads leading to India from the west converge. By the Herat route alone could a formidable and well-equipped army march upon the Indian frontier from the north-west regions. In 1855 the Persians again made an attempt to get possession of Herat; but after a short war with England, desisted. (See AFGHANISTAN.)

HÉRAULT, hai'-role, a maritime department in the S. of France, formerly comprised in Languedoc. It is bounded along its S.E. side by the Mediterranean. Its surface is mountainous, being traversed in the north and north-west by branches of the Lower Cevennes, with fine valleys, however, intervening. The coasts are low, and exhibit extensive lagoons and salt marshes. The climate is mild and genial, and generally healthy, with the exception of the swampy localities.

Rivers.—Hérault, Lez, and Orbe.
Pro.—This is the most productive wine district France. About one-sixth of the department is occupied by vineyards. Among the other important products are olives, mulberries, fruits, drugs, and dyes.

Minerals.—Coal, copper, iron, marble, and building stone.

Manf.—Cloths, cottons, silks, and woollens, paper, steel, brandy. It has, besides, a large transit trade.

Area.—2,436 square miles.

Pop.—441,527.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 335 communes. MONTPELLIER (the capital) and BEZIERS are the most important towns.

HÉRAULT, a river of France, which rises in the Cevennes mountains, and, after a course of about 90 miles, falls into the Mediterranean at the port of Agde.

HERBART, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, hair'-bar, an eminent German metaphysician and philosophic writer, was educated at Jena; in 1805 was appointed extraordinary professor at Göttingen, and in 1829 was professor of philosophy at Königsberg, while fulfilling the duties of which he greatly assisted in the organisation of the Prussian educational system. He composed a number of works on metaphysics. In 1833 he returned to Göttingen, and was titular professor and aulic councillor. He composed a number of works on metaphysics, wherein it would appear that he was a follower partly of Fichte and partly of Kant.

Born at Oldenburg, 1776; died 1841.

HERBELOT, BARTHÉLEMY D', dair'-be-lo, a learned French orientalist. He obtained a pension from the king, and the place of regius professor of the Syriac language. Ferdinand II., grand-duke of Tuscany, made him a present of a large library of Oriental manuscripts. His great work, entitled "Bibliothèque Orientale," containing whatever relates to the knowledge of the Eastern world, is universally known. He also compiled a Turkish and Persian Dictionary.

Born at Paris, 1625; died 1695.

HERBERT, EDWARD, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, an English statesman and philosopher, was educated at Oxford, after which he travelled on the continent. On his return, he was made one of the king's counsellors for military affairs, and soon after was sent ambassador to France, to intercede on behalf of the Protestants. In 1625 he was made a peer of Ireland, and in 1631, an English peer. At the breaking out of the rebellion, he sided with the parliament, but afterwards Lord Herbert was the author of some singular books: the most remarkable is entitled "De Veritate," in which he advocates deism. He also wrote "The History of Henry VIII.," a treatise in Latin on the Religion of the Gentiles, and his own memoirs, which are the first instances of autobiography in the English language, and which were edited by Horace Walpole, and printed by him at his own press at Strawberry Hill.

Born at Montgomery Castle, North Wales, 1581; died 1648.

HERBERT, GEORGE, an English poet and divine, was brother of the above. He received his education at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became acquainted with Lord Bacon, and where he was chosen fellow. He was also appointed orator to the university. On taking orders, he obtained the rectory of Bemerton, in Wilts, and a prebend of Lincoln. He died from the effects of ague at the early age of 39. His poems, of the same school as Donne and Herrick, were published under the title of "The Temple. He also wrote a prose sequel to "The Temple," wherein he lays down some very excellent rules for the life of a country clergyman. He also translated Cornaro "On Temperance." The sketch of his life by Izaak Walton is a literary treasure.

Born at Montgomery Castle, 1593; died 1632.

HERBERT, JOHN ROGERS, R.A., a distinguished English historical painter, who, after completing his studies at the Royal Academy, began his artistic career as a portrait-painter. His first work which attracted attention was "The Appointed Hour," wherein a young Italian gentleman lies dead, from the dagger of a bravo, at the bottom of a flight of steps, while his mistress, unconscious of the act, is descending to meet him. This was one of the most popular prints of its day. After having travelled in Italy, he produced a series of Venetian pictures, among the best of which were "The Brides of Venice," and "Pirates of Istria bearing off the Brides of Venice." On embracing the Roman Catholic faith, his style underwent a very marked change; henceforth he painted only scriptural or ecclesiastical subjects, all of which were wrought in the mediæval manner: "The First Introduction of Christianity into Britain," "Christ and the Daughter of Samaria," and "Our Saviour and his Parents at Nazareth," being among his best works at this period. He was elected an R.A. in 1846, whereupon his style became again modified. He then painted "King Lear," "Lear Disinheriting Cordelia," which, with some others, were executed in fresco for the new palace at Westminster.

Born at Maldon, Essex, 1810.

HERBERT, SIDNEY, Lord Herbert of Lea, an eminent English politician. He was the son of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke, by a daughter of Count Woronzoff, of Russia. After receiving an education at Harrow and Oriel College, Oxford, at which latter place he graduated in classical honours in 1831, he entered on his public life as member of parliament for the southern division of Wilts. His first speech in parliament was delivered in 1831, upon which occasion he seconded a resolution for the exclusion of Dissenters from the college of Oxford. In 1838 he opposed Mr. Grote's motion in favour of the ballot. But, soon after this period, broader political views appear to have replaced his first opinions as a member of parliament. In 1841 he followed Sir Robert Peel, as a convert to free trade, and, on his accession to the office of premier, he became his secretary to the Admiralty. In 1846 he supported Sir Robert in all his measures tending to pave the way for the repeal of the corn-laws, and the introduction of free trade as the principle of English commerce. During the premiership of Lords John Russell and Derby he was in opposition; but on Lord Aberdeen's accession to power, he accepted the post of secretary at war, but resigned it in 1855. He was colonial secretary for a very short time under Lord Palmerston, but, on the appointment of a committee of inquiry into the state of the army before Sebastopol, he, conceiving it to imply a censure upon the Aberdeen administration, a member of which he had been, relinquished the post. In 1861 he was called to the upper house, under the title of Lord Herbert of Lea. But his health had broken down under his arduous political labours, and he died shortly afterwards. He was a man of great ability and earnestness, a fluent and graceful orator, a philanthropist, and liberal patron of the arts.

Born 1810; died 1861.
